A PLEASANT LAXATIVE
NOT INTOXICATING

"Are you there?"

Back came the echo with startling distinctness:

"Yes, sorr; Oi've been here since four av the clock."

Would Have Enjoyed the Kilties

Wilkie, the Scotch artist, lived in a very quiet street in London, with his widowed mother, who fell ill there. When she was lying at the point of death, Mulready, going to make one of his frequent visits of inquiry, was surprised on entering the street, where itinerant bands were not encouraged, to hear the distant sound of bagpipes, and he was astounded when the music proved to be in Wilkie's house. Wilkie led him to the parlor, where a Highlander was playing for dear life, and when the cessation of the din made speech possible, the anxious Scotchman said:

"Well, ye see, the mother is not so well today. She said she would like to hear the music again, for she is aye fond of the pipes."

Not Equal to the Emergency

A popular speaker who is often asked to talk to Sunday-school children relates that he was visiting a village school and was invited to say a few words. In the course of his remarks he threw out the old chestnut about "Any one of you can be President if you are determined enough." At this point he was interrupted by a little fellow on the front row, who jumped up and said:

"Say, Mister, how long does a President hold?"

"Four years," he answered.

"Then some of us fellows would have to be mighty old before we got there," he retorted.

The popular speaker gave one glance at the hundred or more laughing boys in front of him and sat down in disgrace. He had not a retort ready.

A Tip to Valets

A peer who had always ordered his coats through his valet stepped into his tailor's in Piccadilly to order one himself. When he gave the address the tailor, supposing him to be a new valet, slipped a little packet into his hand, with:

"Here's your commission, and it's your own fault if you don't earn more. Just you take this brush and give the old man's clothes a good wipe down with it every morning. He doesn't wear half as many coats as he should."

It was a steel-wire brush. The peer took the money and his custom with him. —The Raconteur.

Heroines Without Beauty

Occasionally, said Alice Wellington Rollins, some years ago, in discoursing upon beauty in fiction, some great genius has been able to picture a successful and cunning adventuress, like Becky Sharp, without endowing her with beauty or even with charm. But, as a rule, intellectual simplicity—simplicity which we have to smile at a little, even though indulgently—simplicity like that of Dora Copperfield—is gifted with beautiful blue eyes and golden hair. Selfish, frail, naughty Hetty is given a sweet, rounded, blossom-like, dark-eyed beauty that makes the very reader long to kiss her before he shakes her. Plebeian Daisy Miller, innocent but horribly ignorant, is made to bewitch even the tranquil and intellectual Henry James, while women able to work worse folly and evil than the simple silly or the selfishly frail, have been endowed with a certain splendid physical beauty and charm from Ouida's heroines down to Zola's. This may be the sternest realism, for it is exactly what we find in real life—folly, ignorance and weakness, awfully pretty; wickedness, cunning and absolute unscrupulousness, splendidly beautiful. We should expect to find this in fiction; the interest lies, as a study, in seeing the mood in which the author contemplates this undeniable fact. Will he approach it from the puritan standpoint, that all beauty is a snare of the devil? Or with Ouida's insidious belief that whatever is beautiful is irresistible, and therefore pardonable? Or with Henry James's coolly critical and analytical curiosity, that any one who behaves as badly as Daisy Miller should be so genuinely innocent, and that any one so ill-bred should be so maddeningly pretty? The modern heroine, the heroine of the twentieth century, must, to conform with her grandmamma's gowns that are coming into fashion, have her grandmamma's nice, sweet manners and demure looks. Must she be pretty?

Naming the Unborn

"Ever since they were married, ten years ago, Binks and his wife have been quarreling over one thing."

"And what is that?"

"The name of their child."

"Well, what did they name it?"

"They haven't named it because they haven't had one yet. But they're still arguing the question."

—The Clubman.

Judging from the complaint recently voiced by President Eliot of Harvard, graduates of that institution are skilled in the science of marrying without swelling the census.

"Is Jones a literary fellow?"

"I should say not; he writes for the magazines."

Schmitz Is Too Busy

A few years ago there was great enthusiasm in this city over the prospect of a big bond issue. Those of us who fondly regarded the New Charter as the panacea for all the ills of the municipal body, gladly looked forward to the execution of those plans by which we were to have a new sewer system and a new hospital, and which involved the extension of Golden Gate Park to Market street. The supposition in those days was that San Francisco was going to make a great spurt. We believed it because Mr. Phelan told us so. How credulous were the good people of San Francisco! The projected bond issue miscarried because Mr. Franklin K. Lane, the job-chaser, in his capacity as City and County Attorney, advised the local legislators to do things which were in plain violation of the charter. The Supreme Court found that the legislation upon which the bond issue was predicated was all wrong, and then it became necessary to start all over again. But the start has never been made, and such is the apathy of our municipal officials that nobody has ever suggested the advisability of agitating the subject of another bond issue for municipal improvements. The city is prosperous but the Municipal Government is afflicted with dry rot. Our musical Mayor, who was going to do great things when he was elected, has been spending most of his time doing politics. If he were asked about a bond issue he wouldn't know what it meant. Some months ago he talked about raising a fund by popular subscription for the maintenance of a municipal band, but that little matter has probably escaped his memory. A new sewer system is more of an urgent necessity than a brass band, but until Mr. Schmitz settles the fate of Michael Casey and disposes of a few patronage matters we cannot hope to have him devote his official attention to a question that merely concerns the health of the community.

Sneering at the President

The big bosses of the Republican party and the Captains of Industry are apparently intent on sidetracking Theodore Roosevelt. Though they have not shown their hands it is quite evident that they are slyly engaged in developing sentiment against him. The plot against Roosevelt is discernible to readers of the leading Republican papers, such journals as the Times, the Press, the Post, the Sun and Harper's Weekly, which are controlled by the leading financiers of the country. Even in their editorials commendatory of the President the covert sneer is in evidence. They do not attack him openly because they know that to do so would be to strengthen him with the masses. They realize that he is popular; that he has captured the emotions of the country; that he is believed to be independent of Wall street influence, and that there is a strong sentiment in his favor. They know that to harshly criticise or abuse him would tend to provoke the resentment of those that regard him as a hero and a patriot. Therefore they prefer to repress rancor, and to treat him with irreverence. They do not discuss his statesmanship seriously or question his policy, but they tell how he has remodeled the White House, and removed historical relics, replacing them with sumptuous furniture and paintings of himself charging up San Juan hill and chopping down "giants of the forest." They relate that he is taking fencing lessons, that he is going bear-hunting and that he fraternizes with forest guides from Maine and gun-fighters from Colorado. It is evident that they regard him as a fit subject for joshing, and that their purpose is to create the impression that he has a great fondness for the stage-centre, and that he is somewhat of a faker. They hope to force him into obscurity with no other weapons than the shafts of ridicule. At present they tincture their comment with a dash of disrespect, and though they affect admiration for his strenuousness it is quite evident that they wish to accentuate his weakness. Wall street distrusts Roosevelt. It feels that he is likely to do something that will interfere with prosperity, and that therefore he should be sidetracked. Hence the effort to stir up sentiment against him in the South for appointing negroes to office, though he has appointed fewer than were put into jobs by McKinley. But Roosevelt is a very uncertain quantity, and Wall street has had reason to distrust him. Invariably, however, Wall street has convinced him of the error of his ways. He has frequently threatened to interfere with the plans of Morgan and the other trust magnates, but they have always converted him to their views. Hence it is that his acts seldom harmonize with his words, but though the big financiers have never yet failed to convince him that it would be disastrous to "disturb present conditions," they fear that in the event of of his being vouchsafed a second term he would not heed their suggestions. He undertook to accomplish many reforms at the opening of the Fifty-seventh Congress but his plans miscarried. He started out to secure important anti-trust legislation and he failed. Originally he favored the curbing of the trusts through the tariff, but he didn't have the courage to urge a policy in conflict with the interests of the Republican party. In lieu thereof he advocated the creation of a tariff commission and he failed to get that. Indeed, the President was defeated at almost every turn. He was treated almost cavalierly, and the lukewarmness of the Republican leaders at Washington has been noticeable for months, but the President is aggressive, and he has the backing of the rank and file of his party, and it will be hard to beat him for the nomination.

Governor George C. Pardee

That Governor Pardee has made a good beginning those who have watched his course throughout the recent session of the Legislature are quite convinced. He has stood on the side of the people and proved that he was free from those influences that are usually exerted in behalf of powerful corporations, whose arguments seldom fail to convince public officials. The Governor did some things that were not consistent with dignity, but State Executives are only human, and though they usually have high aspirations canonization is not one of them. They are not ambitious of post-mortem honors. The rewards that they seek are to be had in this life and are mostly political. Hence we should not expect a beatific Pardee, and we can afford to smile upon him when engaged in wreaking his private revenges so long as he has the courage to turn down the governor-makers of the State when they demand from him privileges and special favors that encroach on the rights of the public. It is evident that thus far he has tried to do right, and that he has the interests of the people at heart. He went into office free from entangling alliances, and it is apparent that he has managed to steer clear of any since his election. He will undoubtedly be subjected to many temptations, for of course he is ambitious and the way of achieving his ends will be pointed out to him by men skilled in the art of manipulating alluring bait, and it remains to be seen whether he is firmly convinced that the people are more grateful and appreciative than individuals, and that politicians have not the power to prevent the reward of merit. Before his term is far advanced a kind-hearted cicerone will seek to escort him to the summit of the high mountain for the purpose of presenting a beautiful and fascinating prospect, and to promise him everything in sight. It is a prospect that has charmed many budding statesmen, and the empty promise has lured many to their ruin. It is to be hoped that George C. Pardee is somewhat less gullible than those that have gone before.

Our Ridiculous Educational System

A contemporary has been devoting its editorial columns lately to easy lessons in English grammar, and criticism of the education of an earlier day, when so much time was wasted on the classics. It should be remembered that when the time was spent on classics, the newspapers did not find it necessary to devote themselves to primary instruction. Whatever folly or mistaken enterprise attached to putting the Latin grammar into the hands of children of seven years, the fact remains that the children who had Latin grammar and blue-backed speller birched into them did learn to write grammatical English and spell their mother tongue. It was only when some "educator" discovered that there was not time for the filigree embroidery that it became apparent that English grammar was too abstruse for American children. When it became necessary to organize street-cleaning brigades, cruelty societies, base ball, foot ball and basket ball clubs, and to feel and finger every known substance on or under the earth, something had to be done. The faculties of Eastern colleges and universities make annual moan that the classes which seek admission are inadequately prepared in English grammar, orthography and composition. When these classes are graduated and begin their work in the real world, it is in these same elementary branches that they are still deficient. One-third of the applicants for the freshman class of the Northwestern University failed in common English at the beginning of this term. In spite of the theory that English grammar is beyond the comprehension of modern children they are expected to absorb it by instinct, and to give their attention to matters of less importance. One may see, almost any afternoon at the public library, little girls in frocks an inch below their knees, waiting their turn to get possession of the encyclopedias and special reference books, from which they frantically copy whole columns of statistics on such topics as "Home Life of the Greeks in the Time of Homer," "Dress of the Romans at the Period of Julius Cæsar," or "Food of the Egyptians in the Era of Cleopatra." The benighted innocents who ought to be reveling in Arabian Nights and hugging their dolls, have not the capacity to distinguish the essential from the non-essential, or even to spare their overworked muscles by omitting particles and abbreviating words. Children's brains are not elastic. They can absorb only a certain amount, and all over and above that is wasted. For every new subject that is enlarged upon some old one is neglected. It is not necessary to crowd the whole sum of human wisdom and folly into the few years of school life. There is a fairy tale which tells of an Oriental potentate who filled a narrow-necked jar with gold and gems and invited each of his slaves to insert his hand and help himself to all that he could take out. Now, the jar was of such shape that though it would admit the empty hand readily, it was less easy to withdraw the closed fist, and as each dependent had but one trial, those who filled their hand and attempted to take all they could seize were obliged to drop everything in order to extricate themselves, while those who were moderate and contented themselves with a single jewel were able to keep possession of it. The tale would make a fitting allegory for our educators. In attempting everything they accomplish nothing, while in the earlier periods, when only the elementary essentials were taught, there was a creditable showing of achievement.

The Crumbling of Gibralter

The famous Rock of Gibralter is about to lose its usefulness as an object upon which to found figurative expression. The spellbinder to whom accuracy is important will refrain from likening firmness of character, decision, resolution and other things to the old, familiar rock that has so long figured in tropeical utterance. British military authorities have discovered that the Rock of Gibralter is dangerous to its defenders. To such an extent has it been honeycombed with galleries that the discharge of guns of heavy calibre threatens to bring the thin walls crashing down on the heads of the artillerymen. Repeated discharges from the same side of the rock have been prohibited by the engineers. French authorities say that the uses of Gibralter are limited to the coaling and repairing of vessels. The question of the advisability of exchanging Gibralter for the Island of Minorca is therefore being discussed. It has seen its best days as the key to the Mediterranean not only because of the vulnerability of the fortress, but for the reason that modern improvement in naval construction has rendered it almost useless. When the highest speed of a fleet did not exceed ten knots an hour, it would have been hazardous to have attempted to run the straits, but a squadron steaming eighteen knots an hour would not be running much risk, especially at night, with lights covered. The straits nowhere being less than fifteen miles in width, a hostile fleet hugging the Morocco coast would have little to fear from British land guns. The most powerful searchlight would not reveal the enemy at a distance of more than three miles.

More Snares Uncovered

The W. C. T. U., which recently held a convention in New York, uncovered more sources of corruption to youth hitherto unsuspected by the most cautious. Some of the ladies denounced the supposedly innocuous religious papers. Stories published in them are not, as we have heretofore supposed, harmless milk for babes and sucklings, but most insidiously perverting to both manners and morals. The naughty heroines faint or fall ill and have to be revived and stimulated by glasses of wine, thus familiarizing the youthful and innocent minded readers with the use of the nefarious stuff, and the men, one and all, even the doctors and clergymen, are "viewed through a halo of smoke." Just a little while ago a convention of vegetarians laid all the evils of this age and all the ages preceding it to meat. Preachers and teachers, indulging in a flesh diet, exhaled an aura of bloodshed and violence, and all their spoken exhortations and the example of their private conduct are not sufficient to overcome the subtle influence of the meat they eat. Authors and writers, generally, came in for a larger share of condemnation, since they reach wider audiences, and spread their influence afar. They rise from their tables, reeking with the product of the shambles, and betake themselves to their libraries, where, pen in hand and pipe in mouth, they proceed to defile all who come into contact with their words, which, like plague-infested garments, continue to harbor bacilli in spite of purification. This kind of nonsense is so absurdly funny that one wonders how it ever gets itself into print anywhere but in a joke column. It is not a bit more sensible than the anxious inquiry of the super-sensitive wife and mother who debated, with prayers and tears, the advisability of using ammonia in her housekeeping, when she considered the sources from which it was obtained and the souls of her infant offspring. Kipling once wrote a story for one of the exclusively women's magazines. He was injudicious enough to lose sight of his restrictions, and permitted his heroine to accept a glass of wine. When the editor came upon the incriminating confession in the proof he cabled all the way to England, praying that some substitute would be permitted, as it was against the principles of the publication to make use of wine in any form. Answer came back, "Make it Mellin's Food." And if these freak reformers ever get the upper hand in any association or community, that is precisely the level to which they will reduce things. Mellin's Food is all right in its proper place, but there are quite a respectable number of people on this old earth of ours who have advanced beyond the Mellin's Food period. They have cut all their teeth, have sound digestion and good discretion, and there is no reason why they should be restricted to nursery diet, either mental or physical. Since some quack formulated the expressions "alcoholized brain cells" and "tobacco heart," we have had no peace from the preaching and prophesyings. A little learning is a dangerous thing, and a few taking catchwords unbacked by scientific knowledge are still worse. Over indulgence in anything is a mistake that has to be paid for, and there is just as much wrong, just as much harm, just as much "intemperance," in overeating as in overdrinking. The insane asylums are filled with people who have been intemperate in religion, while the intemperate reformers are the bane of existence to people with better balanced minds and less unruly tongues.

The Syndicate Sermon

A Baltimore firm has sent out circulars to the clergy offering to supply them with ready-made sermons, written by "an earnest and able theological student in England." The clergy are horrified and indignant. They want it to be known that they do not patronize second-hand goods nor hire brain force, but each and every one of them is competent to furnish his own discourses, and what is more, better ones than he could buy. Of course, it is taken for granted that a minister who is ordained is capable of filling his office, and the inditing of sermons is an important part of it, but when one considers what the average sermon is, and how little it amounts to when pruned of its rhetorical adornments, how little of thought or anything else but words it contains, the wonder is that long ere this some syndicate or bureau has not been established to furnish appropriate discourses. If it is not considered a violation of the "ethics of the profession" to repeat a sermon, what harm can arise from delivering one supplied from some other source, provided always that due credit is given? And there have been notable instances where sermons have been given and the credit withheld. Why, for example, should a good elocutionist, without the capacity for composition, stand before a congregation and hurl his own weak platitudes at their defenceless heads when he might edify and instruct them by applying his one talent to reading a truly able document? Why should a clerical politician deliver Sunday lectures on secular subjects because they interest him, while his congregation starves for lack of moral food and religious instruction? If he cannot produce a sermon of his own, but is competent to care for his parish in other respects, what possible harm would come from letting him read one supplied by the industrious theological student who, mayhap, is working his way through college on the proceeds of what his pen earns for him? Lawyers and politicians are well enough aware of the advantages of collaboration, and do not disdain to make use of it. In this matter of sermon production, like a good many other of the traditions of the churches, there is as much breach as observance. It is a greater crime to speak of things than it is to do them.

HAVE YOU BEEN THERE?

The Fate of the Flirt

Veracity to sentiment, truth in a relation, truth to your own heart and your friends, never to feign or falsify emotion—that is the truth which makes love possible and mankind happy.—Robert Louis Stevenson.

The truth that virtue is its own reward has for corollary the converse truth, that vice is its own punishment. In this way sins of which the statute books take no account find terrible atonement. The criminals who kill Time commit more than murder and must suffer the remorse of regicides. The fool has perpetually to put up with his own insufferable company and the averted faces of humanity. The leaden hearted cannot hope to climb the hills of dream or to win the heights of happiness.

In the recherche rogue's gallery which the imagination readily fashions a prominent place must be assigned to the flirt. Let us examine the picture somewhat minutely in its relation to the foregoing corollary.

A flirt, in spite of the dictionary, may for a time be of either sex, but it invariably ends by being of neither. The flirt is one who feigns and falsifies emotion; and this is the lie which makes love impossible and mankind miserable. The flirt is a filcher of affection, is guilty of the gross misdemeanor of obtaining love under false pretenses. Now if there is any one infallible test of the moral fitness of a man or woman to survive in society, it is his or her deportment in matters of the heart—in friendship and in love. To bungle here is to make a sorry mess of life's brief business; to prove oneself the mere amateur (the person who does not know how to do it) in the difficult art of living.

Worst of all world bunglers, sorriest specimen of inanity, is the finished flirt, beggared of spontaneity, nature-poor, vainly endeavoring to batter herself into a warm affection (as Burns is said to have done), aping the inimitable aspect of a lover, feeling within the while none of the sacred fire.

For soon the flirt becomes spiritually blasee, impotent of soul, self-slain. The divine desires are dead. At her cold heart may no affinity-flame be kindled. Will a true man ever long to cleave close to this lie? an earnest soul seek for mate this mummer of emotion? The flirt, having lost the precious bloom of purity, is a fruit that no longer invites; for it no heart hungers; no eager hand reaches out. The maid in name only, bedecked with her false jewel of technical virginity, remains such to the end, or else becomes a wife in name only: realities are reserved for the true of heart. The flirt is, I believe, functionally defective; that she is instinctively averse to motherhood I know. Long before she reaches her punitive premature old age, her sin begins to find her out. The utter absence of correspondence between outer expression and inner feeling, or rather lack of feeling, has grown to be a pitiable, patent lie, the abomination of God and man. Her face, like those of actors overmuch made-up when seen near at hand, is such a caricature of a lover's, the misfit between it and emotion so obvious and ridiculous, that pity at once passes into contempt. After awhile, a very little while, the flirt becomes the spoil of callow youths and callous dotards, and has neither chick, child, man, woman, God, nor self to friend.

I do not class with the flirt those impressionable persons who on the least provocation fall in love (or something very like it) and as readily fall out again. For in their cases, though much confusion of feeling may arise, and the delicate outlines of love be lost, and memory become a medley of emotions, yet, because their affections are for the time being true, unfeigned, they escape the fate of the flirt.

The fate of a flirt! the last end of a living lie! Flee it, playactors of passion; for it is in truth appalling. Not to be loved, no matter what the cause, is indeed a sad lot; but to know that you have wilfully forfeited the right to be loved is sadder; and not to be able to love, because of your own vice, is as it were to be conscious of having committed suicide of the soul, and is saddest of all. For to be powerless to rise to a real emotion, much less to maintain an ecstasy, is, especially for a woman, to have failed completely in life.

And now behold the flirt grown old, fallen in midsummer into the sere and yellow leaf of loveless existence—her world within one interminable wintry waste, more desolate than death, hopeless of any spring. For without love youth in woman soon languishes and dies; and contrariwise no woman who loves well and is well beloved ever grows old. Love is the elixir of life, the fountain of perpetual youth. But the divine drink is forbidden the flirt; neither to give it nor take it is hers. Finally she no longer feels thirsty for love, yet suffers a thirst for the thirst; then a thirst for that thirst; and so on ad infinitum. Take a last look at her before the kindly curtain falls, down on her self-conscious knees, it may be, like George Moore's famous, or infamous, celibate, Mildred Lawson, with exaggerated eyes upturned and habitual ineffective simper, imploring the All-Compassionate to remove her impotence and grant her the grace of a genuine emotion. "Give me a passion for God or man, but give me a passion. I cannot live without one." Alas, it is plain to be seen, that all earthly lovers having forever failed her, she is now but flirting with the very Father of Heaven Himself!

When Railroad Lobbyists Fall Out

The recent session of the Legislature was a dreary and monotonous one. Incidentally it may be stated that it was not very profitable to the small-fry statesmen from the cow-paths of the interior and the byways of the metropolis. They didn't have much more than a bowing acquaintance with Colonel Mazuma until the last days, when those several railroad measures came up for action. The Western Pacific railroad bills aroused considerable interest and they were beaten notwithstanding the strenuous efforts of a large but inexperienced lobby guided and directed by attorney W J. Bartnett. There was a clash between the people that urged the passage of those bills, and the sponsors of that other railroad measure which was said to have been introduced in the interest of the owners of a jerk-water road in Humboldt county, but which was believed to have been drawn in the Southern Pacific law department, and to have for its purpose the grabbing of more of the Oakland water front. This latter measure passed both houses but was vetoed by Governor Pardee.

A Fatal Mix-Up

The story that the Southern Pacific Company has designs on more of the Oakland water front is discredited by people who are familiar with the affairs of that corporation, and they say that if the Western Pacific Railroad people were smart they would not have started the opposition to the measure which was vetoed by the Governor. Their notion was that the Southern Pacific was anxious to grab more of the San Francisco water front and to shut them out, whereas the bill, if signed, would have enabled them to get just what they wanted. Indeed it would have given them more than they sought under their own bills, which failed to pass owing to the bungling methods of unskilled lobbyists. The story as I get it is that the Southern Pacific wants to get possession of the water front in a cove north of Point Richmond, in Contra Costa county, and the measure that would have enabled the corporation to secure what it was after would also have empowered the Western Railroad to get terminal facilities in this city. By getting into a mix-up both companies failed to achieve their ends.

A Big Railroad Project

The plans of the Southern Pacific Company relative to the tract of land north of Point Richmond have not been made public. The company contemplates the removal of its Port Costa docks on account of the limited space at that point, and it has in prospect the concentration of its freight business near Point Richmond, where there are splendid harbor facilities. It is proposed to grade away a hill at that point to perfect a site for the erection of all the necessary buildings, and the company has already obtained franchises in Contra Costa county under which it may operate all the necessary roads leading to the water front. It is said that in the near future the water front lying between Point Richmond and Point Pinole will be the scene of great railroad and industrial activity, and there is no doubt but that it was in furtherance of that enterprise that the corporation lobbyists rushed the bill that was vetoed by Pardee under the misapprehension that Oakland was to be despoiled.

Promises Were Broken

One of the most enthusiastic supporters of the Western Pacific Railroad bills at Sacramento was Assemblyman Frank Dunlap of Stockton. Upon his return home he poured a tale of woe into the ears of a Mail reporter. The burden of his plaint was that the bills were beaten by the agents of the Southern Pacific Company, and he made some serious accusations against members of the Legislature. Carter, Stanton and Transue are said to have agreed to vote for the bills and then to have gone back on their word. They admitted that they had promised, but said that they did not expect to be bound by the promise more than one day. Bliss of Alameda also promised and then managed to get himself locked in an upper room. Just as the Sergeant-at-Arms was about to break in the door a key was found, and then Bliss voted against the bills. It was an interesting contest between the two companies, and it put some of our small-fry statesmen in a very bad light.

Pardee's Backbone

Governor Pardee has been winning high encomiums on the rigidity of his backbone. Evidence of the stiffness of his vertebral column was furnished in the cases of Robert Y. Hayne and Frank Short, attorneys, each of whom had a claim against the State for about five thousand dollars for services rendered. The Governor announced shortly after the opening of the Legislative session that he would not approve any bills that reached him before a certain date because he wished to know what the condition of the State's finances was likely to be before drawing against the funds in the treasury. Notwithstanding the announcement Hayne and Short rushed their claims through the Legislature, and then proceeded to bring pulls to bear to persuade the Governor to sign them. He proved immune to influence of all kinds. He said that he had made an announcement and that it was not an empty one. He meant what he said. The pulls were in vain, and though the Governor approved all other personal claims that reached him subsequent to those of Hayne and Short, he rejected theirs and the consequence is that they must wait two years for their money.

Exit Dr. Anderson

Governor Pardee lost no time in retiring that spectacular, gold-braided medical gentleman, Dr. J. Winslow Anderson, to private life. Dr. Anderson was made a member of the State Board of Health by Governor Gage in recognition of his services at the time the Bubonic plague scare had its inception. Dr. Anderson was most emphatic in his denial of the presence of the bubonic germ in this city. He gladly bolstered up the case for those who foolishly tried to suppress the facts, and who, as it appeared from subsequent developments, did the State a great deal of harm. Governor Pardee appointed Dr. Hart of Sacramento to take Dr. Anderson's place on the State Board of Health.

The Teachers are Wondering

That era of purity in School Department affairs which was to have arrived contemporaneously with the New Charter has evidently been delayed. The ways of our School Directors are as badly in need of reform as ever. There are two instructors in physical culture in the school department. At a recent meeting of the teachers, one of the exponents of physical culture, Mr. Walter Magee, of Berkley, stated that neither he nor his assistant, Mr. Robert Barth, was employed to give any instruction in classes visited by them. He explained that their duty was merely to act as inspectors and to report on the quality of the instruction given by class teachers. Two weeks ago the teachers received a circular letter from Mr. Barth informing them that he had opened a school of physical culture in a Mission hall, and stating, "It is the object of my instruction to supplement the physical education begun at the public schools"; also that his terms are moderate. The letter closes with these words: "Knowing that, being an educator, you fully understand and appreciate the high value of a proper physical education, your kind co-operation is herewith solicited. In urging your pupils to join one of the gymnastic classes you certainly will confer a lasting benefit upon them, and greatly oblige, yours etc." The teachers are now wondering whether their failure to "urge" their pupils will prejudice the men who are expected to report on the efficiency of the school system.

The Son of a Self-Made Man

Society in San Francisco is wondering if Mrs. McLean Martin is satisfied with the match her daughter is making. When she was out here a year or so ago she very plainly expressed her sentiments as to what she wanted for a son-in-law. She sneered at the eligibles in this city and declared that there was nothing in sight suitable for a match with her Theodosia. She expected her daughter to marry a man of wealth, lineage and social distinction. Now, though Theodosia Cook's fiance has wealth, the family controlling one of the largest banking houses in the country, he is shy on lineage. His father, a native of Ireland, was a self-made man who lived in San Francisco in the early eighties. His residence was in Fulton street near the Park. He succeeded J. F. Chapman in charge of the Graces' interests here, and was also consul for Peru and Uraguay. His brother, Michael, before he went to New York, lived in South America and in Callao married a beautiful Spanish woman. William P. Grace, who became Mayor of New York city, is said to have taken out his papers just in time to make him eligible for nomination to that office. The Graces have loads of money and by marrying into the family Miss Cook will find herself related to the Countess of Donoughmore and Mrs. Hubert Beaumont of London.

Mrs. Martin's Passion

Though there wasn't anybody in San Francisco sufficiently gilt-edged and aristocratic to merit consideration as a suitor for the hand of Mrs. Martin's daughter, Mrs. Martin was not so exacting so far as her own heart and hand were concerned. Many years ago our gay bachelor millionaire, Mr. James D. Phelan, aroused love's passion in the breast of the charming widow, and she would undoubtedly have been willing to make him the step-father of Theodosia, but the passion glowed in vain. And Mrs. Martin's affection for Mr. Phelan was sincere and unselfish. He too is merely the son of a self-made man, but Mrs. Martin had no thought of lineage in those days.

Fickle Jimmy Phelan

I have been assured by what I regard as very good authority that there is nothing serious in Mr. Phelan's attentions to Zelie de Lussan. He is very fond, says my informant, of music and musicians, and is especially fond of opera singers. He has entertained all the big stars that have visited this city, and he courted the society of a few abroad. He met Zelie de Lussan at the home of the Denis O'Sullivans in London, and it was in London that he entertained Mabel Gilman, the young woman who was wooed by the Prince of Siam. From the same source I learn that our bachelor millionaire is more devoted to Emma Eames than to all other opera singers, but she has a husband. It is also said of Mr. Phelan that he prefers ladies of an uncertain age and well developed figure to jeunes filles. Mary Belle Gwin, before she became Mrs. James Follis, was the only young girl to whom he ever seriously paid any attention. But Jimmy is fickle, and though he goes into raptures over a pretty face it holds him only until another one comes within the range of his vision.

The Sidetracking of Arnold

In Bohemia—the luxurious, voluptuous Bohemia in Post street—there is whispering over the "turning down" of Dr. J. Dennis Arnold. The regular nominating committee of the club has reported in favor of the nomination of James D. Phelan for president. Now it happens that Dr. J. Dennis Arnold is first vice-president of the club, and as he is eminently qualified to succeed Mr. Frank Deering in the presidency many of the members are curious to know why he was overlooked. Dr. Arnold is a man of exceptional culture, he is imbued with the true Bohemian spirit and he is very popular, but the nominating committee regarded Mr. Phelan as a man better fitted for the position. And many of the members are puzzled over the selection. They say that Mr. Phelan has no advantages over Dr. Arnold so far as graceful accomplishments are concerned, and they insinuate that the nominating committee must have favored the ex-Mayor on account of his great wealth. Yet they are reluctant to believe that Mammon wields so much influence in Bohemia. However they recall that Mr. Phelan was elected President some years ago, and that he then defeated a genuine Bohemian in the person of Dan O'Connell the poet. It was surely not special qualifications that won the honor for him then, and yet he was far more popular in those days than he is now.

The Insulting of Phelan

If Dr. Arnold had been sidetracked for almost any other man than James D. Phelan the incident wouldn't have caused much surprise. Phelan has few friends in the Bohemian Club despite his studied affability and his strategic hospitality. He has been guyed in the club and he was insulted at a midsummer jinks when a member rode upon the scene of the festivities mounted on a donkey whose name, he said, was "Jimmy Phelan." That incident aroused the sympathy even of Phelan's enemies who said that he had been so generous to the club that his feelings should be respected. But while the action of the nominating committee has not met with general approval there are many members who argue that no better selection could have been made. They say it is fortunate that such a rich man as Phelan is eager to accept the honor. "He makes a good front," said one Bohemian in discussing the matter, "and he has the money to spend in entertaining distinguished visitors. He wants to keep before the public and I'm in favor of letting him have his fling. He may not be a typical Bohemian, but he patronizes artists and he tries to be a good fellow. I'm for Phelan."

Prejudice Suggested

While much may be said in approval of the action of the nominating committee, and while it is likely that Dr. Arnold had no desire for the nomination, it is certain that many members of the club very much regret that he was not urged to take the presidency. They declare that if he had been, the club would have been given credit for freedom from narrow prejudices, and they go so far as to intimate that the committee was not unbiased when considering the availability of members. In other words it is believed by some that if Dr. Arnold were not of Jewish extraction James D. Phelan would not have been suggested for the office of President of the Bohemian Club. This view of the matter is not voiced much above a whisper but it has been pretty freely expressed. It is said that as it was feared that the turning down of Dr. Arnold would provoke unfavorable comment it would be wise to make a concession to the Jewish element in the club, and hence it was that Edgar Peixotto was nominated for secretary. It is said that under no other circumstances could he have been nominated.

Whitney Refused a Dot

The young Parker Whitneys, hero and heroine of a sensational elopement, have taken to automobiling, and they appear to be still in the cooing dove period of their domestic existence. They are enjoying themselves just as though they had a big fortune in their own right, and I hear that Papa Whitney has been very generous to them. There is a story in circulation that Mrs. Parrott thought that Mr. Whitney should have given his son a big dot for the use of her daughter, but that he absolutely declined to entertain the proposition, which according to rumor was submitted before the elopement.

A Bishop and His Wife

Bishop and Mrs. Partridge were passengers on the Coptic, that left for Japan Thursday. They were in this country several months and were entertained here extensively. Mrs. Partridge was the charming Miss Simpson, and her marriage with the Bishop was a very speedy romance. Though he is more than twenty years her senior she is said to be very much in love with him, and very well satisfied with herself for having captured a Bishop for a husband. When she first went to Japan she imagined that their position was to be one of great honor and glory, and she was surprised to find that her husband was regarded by the Japs with about as much reverence as one has for a Joss in Chinatown. Therefore she prefers being a Bishop's wife in the United States, and no doubt her husband will find many pretexts for returning.

The Millionaire Invasion

Southern California is having a bad attack of lionitis. Southern California dearly loves a millionaire, and the species has been quite common in the citrus belt this season. The lionizing of millionaires has been the most interesting feature of the season. John W. Gates, E. P. Ripley, W. Seward Webb, Paul Morton and John Dough Rockefeller are some of the millionaires who have traveled through the Southland, and Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan is the most distinguished of the millionairesses who have sojourned there. The great Morgan, himself, it is hoped by the hotel men, will materialize later on. Meanwhile they have been devoting most of their attention to poor Rockefeller, whose name was hissed the other day by the students of Chicago's freak university which he has so generously endowed. But Rockefeller has apparently not bothered himself about Chicago ingratitude. The great Oil Trust magnate who seeks to ease his conscience by ostentatious philanthropy need not fret over student hisses while acknowledging the salaams of the multitude in Southern California. The interest of the public in Rockefeller is keyed up by the press. His every movement is reported. When he takes a walk the public is informed that during the stroll his income accumulated to the extent of a few thousand dollars. When he bangs the ball over the golf links it is estimated that ten thousand dollars came rolling into his coffers, and the circumstance of his having "preceded his wife into the dining-room" at the Hotel Green supplies material for a quarter of a column.

Gates Ran Away

Millionaire John W. Gates left the Hotel Coronado hurriedly, and it has since been learned, so a correspondent informs me, that he "jumped the town" to avoid arrest. It appears that when he goes out hunting he never knows when he has enough. He violated the game law in San Diego, and the authorities being apprised of the fact resolved upon the sensational arrest of the multi-millionaire. But Mr. Gates took an early train just to avoid trouble.

Cheered the Wrong Admiral

Admiral Schley, the naval hero, who by a fortuitous circumstance was in command of the fleet that captured Cervera, and who later on figured in a very unpleasant controversy, came in for a great deal of lionizing in Southern California. His democratic affability won for him many friends. He was willing not only to be interviewed, but he stood to be kodaked, and on Mount Lowe he played the slot machine and drank cocktails with ordinary mortals. An unpleasant malapropism occurred during his trip to Mount Lowe which disconcerted him. Just as he was about to depart it was decided to give him three rousing cheers, but the individual selected to lead the chorus got rattled and shouted, "Three cheers for Admiral Dewey," and the throng responded lustily. Admiral Schley looked as though he had been hit with a club.

A Cause Celebre Recalled

The divorce suit instituted by Maud Sloan Woods against her husband, Harry Woods, recalls to mind that celebrated bribery case which grew out of the damage suit of a poor widow against the Sutter street Railway Company. It was the case that involved Bob Morrow and Micah Doane. They were charged with having instigated the bribery but they escaped while Frank Northey and Dick Creighton, the tools of the corporation, went to jail. Young Wood was one of the jurors approached and offered a bribe and he told all about the transaction on the trial of the conspirators. An effort was made to break down his testimony by showing that he was addicted to the use of morphine. His father was a wealthy and cultured attorney.

Why This Coldness?

Major-General, by brevet, Harrison Gray Otis, who was licked by a rival newspaperman last week, has earned for himself the reputation of being the greatest glad-hander in Los Angeles. His residence, The Bivouac, out near Westlake Park, is always open to distinguished visitors and especially to army and navy heroes. Whenever it is announced that General So and So or Admiral Blank has arrived, everybody knows that the hero of the Rubicon is prepared to do the honors. There is in the Southland just now, General Wesley Merritt, U. S. A. retired, under whom Brigadier-General of Volunteers Otis served during the troublous times at the Presidio in 1898. When the announcement was made that General Merritt intended to spend a part of the winter in Southern California, society looked forward to a season of gayety in which camp-fire reunions at the Otis bivouac would be star features. Said Society, "These two old comrades in arms will, as becomes war veterans, fight over the battles of 1898 while we look on and wonder." But, for some unexplained reason, the fires in the Otisan bivouac have not been lighted, and it is current gossip that an exchange of cards between the two veterans of many wars, including the skirmish at the Presidio, was not even hinted at. General Merritt came and saw everything worth seeing except The Bivouac. He has been wined, dined and feted by everybody except his erstwhile companion in arms. And Society, writes my correspondent, is curious to know why Otis failed to pay his respects. That there has been something doing no one doubts.

San Franciscans Abroad

Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Angus, who with their children went to Europe about a year ago, expect to return home soon. They go to London in April after a long sojourn in Florence, where their children made excellent progress in the Italian language. They also studied French and music in Paris, and will continue their music in London.

Preparing for a Big Car Strike

This promises to be the banner strike year in history. Already strikes are cropping up all over the land with advancing spring and San Francisco is threatened with one of the biggest and gravest in the lot. For many months past the local car company and the union have been girding themselves for the inevitable struggle. Almost a year ago the conductors, under union instructions, began to take notes on the daily receipts of each car and such matters, all with a view of ultimately setting data before the public to prove that the company was in receipt of an enormous income and could easily afford to give the carmen three dollars a day and still pay handsome dividends on the stock. The company, through its detectives, has been kept informed of the plans of the union and is consequently fully prepared for the strike issue. I have it on good inside authority that under no consideration will the company yield to the demand for higher wages. Both sides understand that all the other disputed points are merely stalking horses leading up to this vital proposition. If the men throw down the gage the company is prepared for a long, stubborn fight. It will shut down its big plant, cut expenses to the bone and spend the time trying to lose nothing but the interest on invested capital. The company is figuring largely that the public will not support the union with the patience and sympathy that marked the last strike.

Big Attack on Unionism

Mindful of the distressful effects of the last strike to business throughout the city and State, a number of influential citizens are scurrying about trying their mightiest to patch up a truce between the two camps. Cornelius and his followers are not the only ones who have appealed to the East for advice and influence; the company has done the same, and the three dollar wage demand has been chronicled to Eastern magnates as a token of what they may expect in their own bailiwicks unless the car combines of the continent stand together and use their powerful influence to win this fight. If the magnates unite, and there is little doubt but that they will, the courts will be the power appealed to to break the backbone of the unions. Even now this is being foreshadowed in what is occurring in a town on the Eastern seaboard. The eyes of the street car world are just now turned on Waterbury, Conn., where a car strike has been in progress since the middle of January. The company there has just succeeded in getting the court to hand down one of the most sweeping injunctions ever issued during a strike. The decree stops the strikers from boycotting, intimidating, or in any way interfering with the affairs of the railway company, under a penalty of ten thousand dollars. So grave is this injunction considered by the national unions that Gompers, Mahan and other big labor leaders have been despatched to Waterbury to consult as to what had best be done to block this drastic action. Every labor organization in the country has been appealed to to furnish funds for this important contest. Incidentally it may be stated that the railway company has sued the union for twenty thousand dollars on account of damages alleged to have been already committed through loss of business and property. Big car combines in New York, New Jersey and Rhode Island are helping the Connecticut company in its fight. Now that the San Francisco fight is on the local company hopes that some of this great influence will be extended here so as to give the national carmen's union the fight for its life, both East and West.

The Public Pulse

Meanwhile the dear public must suffer while capital and labor fight it out. In the last car strike in this city public sympathy was with the carmen principally for the reason that everybody was sore on that smug psalm-singer, Mr. E. P. Vining, the general manager of the system. But the unpopular Vining is no longer connected with the company. In his place is a gentleman who has made a very favorable impression on the public. The union leaders say that they have felt the public pulse and that they have found that sympathy is with them. They may find that they are mistaken. To properly gauge the public pulse is a very difficult task. It is believed by some of the shrewd labor leaders in this city that the carmen will recede from the position which they have taken. They think that they have been urged on by politicians and it is hinted that behind the controversy is a scheme to give Mayor Schmitz another opportunity for a grand-stand play. If so the Mayor is treading on dangerous ground.

Arbitration Suggested

Since the foregoing pargraphs were written the Conference Committee of the Carmen's Union decided to recede in a measure from its original position. Moreover a proposition to arbitrate was submitted to Manager Chapman. It is evident that the carmen have become less eager to force the issue as originally framed. Perhaps they felt the public pulse a second time, and found a decided change. With public sentiment against the carmen their cause would be a hopeless one, and the probability is that before all differences are settled they will deem it advisable to rescind many of their rules. The one which prohibits the company from discharging men without the approval of the Union is perhaps more responsible for the alienation of public sentiment than all others. Since it went into effect passengers on street cars have been treated by many employes of the company with less consideration than was formerly vouchsafed them.

An Academician's Views

While on this subject I am reminded that the theory of Mr. E. E. Clark, lately a member of the Coal Strike Commission, that a responsibility rests on the public to adjust the differences between capital and labor and bring them into amicable and harmonious relations, is disputed by Professor W. G. Sumner of Yale, a clear-headed and impartial student of the labor problem. He contends that the public should keep out of the controversy. The usual way for the public to engage in it, he says, is through its sympathy, and there is too much of that already. The interference of the public by sympathy has prolonged many hopeless strikes, it has encouraged reckless men to take the law into their own hands. The public's sympathy is occasionally an influence in bringing about a rational settlement, as it was in this city during the last car strike, but more often it is a snap judgment which springs from the false theory that capital must always be in the wrong. There is a responsibility resting on the public, to be impartial.

Latest Idea in Women's Clubs

A Californian in New York informs me that that extremely up-to-date idea "The Man's Club for Women" is rapidly taking tangible shape. Where else on this continent or anywhere on the effete earth could it flourish for a moment? Of course the club will have some striking name when launched among the anxiously waiting smart set but just now the name like the idea is still in the incubator. Mrs. Grundy expects nothing short of a stroke of paralysis when the result is announced. Those two swagger leaders of ultra swell society, Mrs. Jack Astor and Mrs. Borden Harriman, have been actively engaged all winter shaping the course of the embryo club and they now report everything complete except its name and its home. The two propositions will be submitted to the select committee in the near future. Both ladies talk enthustically of their plans, which they have divided under the following heads: First, the object and scope; the club will be a rendezvous and social nerve centre for the emancipated woman, the woman who rides, drives, sails, automobiles and practices the Terentian philosophy that nothing human, regardless of convention, precedent or sex boundary is alien to her sympathy. Second, club motto: A woman is as good as a man and probably a little bit better. Third, membership: Strictly limited to those women who can do anything or snub anybody without fear of social reprisals. Fourth, rules and by-laws: Substantially the same as any first-class man's club. Fifth, dues: Initiation fee, two hundred and fifty dollars, annual dues one hundred dollars, subject to increase without notice.

Cocktails Not Tabu

The originators of the scheme are now trying to get a good up-town location for clubrooms. In the opinion of the projectors there is at present too much restraint in society to suit the emancipated woman. Incredible as it may appear there are still houses in New York where a woman who asks for a cocktail before dinner and a cigarette with coffee has occasionally to face rebuking glances. The atmosphere of the new club will be entirely congenial to the untrammeled development of feminine independence. Men will be tolerated about the premises, but only when they wear the livery of the club. There will be no women servants above the scullery. Needless to say there are hundreds of enthusiastic ultra-society dames who are so anxious to get into the new club that they are willing to climb through the transom over the front door or fall in by the coal chute. But something more than a fat bank account, a swagger reputation and a Newport divorce will constitute qualifications for admission according to the sponsors of this up-to-date club.

Illness of Follansbee

Jack Follansbee has been ill in New York and has had to delay his annual visit to the Hearst ranch in Chihuahua. The recent death of his mother, who was a sister of James R. Keene the great Wall street financier, will prevent his racing his horses in his own name this season, so they will run as the property of the Mexican stable. Jack Follansbee and Hearst are still the best of friends but the former is as wrapped up in thoroughbreds as Hearst is in politics, so the paths of the two do not run so close as in the days when they were inseparable cronies out here. Mr. Follansbee never misses his trip to Babicora, which is the name of the Hearst ranch and also of Follansbee's crack filly. He has half promised to come up to San Francisco after the Mexican visit and there will be plenty of his old-time friends to give him warm greeting. Follansbee always went into society more than Hearst and at one time his engagement with Nellie Joliffe, now Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels, was rumored over the tea-cups.

Resembled Both Langtry and Trilby

It was Frank Norris who first pointed out Sara Collier's resemblance to the Trilby of Du Maurier and her engagement to Reginald Norris is therefore somewhat of a coincidence. There is indeed a striking likeness between Miss Collier's face and the features the artist-author drew for the tone-deaf Trilby. Poor Sara Collier has always been handicapped by comparison with some famous beauty and of course has suffered in the comparison. When Lily Langtry first came to San Francisco she met the Colliers at Del Monte and every one declared that little Sara Collier looked enough like the Jersey Lily to be her own daughter. Mrs. Langtry was the most emphatic of all in her prophecies, and declared that Sara would grow up to be the counterfeit presentment of her own beauty. So every one watched Sara Collier but she grew less Langtryesque every year, and by the time she reached long skirts the resemblance was very faint. That she had good looks of her own did not suffice. People had expected her to look like Mrs. Langtry, the Jersey Lily had herself prophesied it, and when Miss Collier failed to make good these expectations it was taken as a personal failing on her part. And then Trilby came out and along came Frank Norris and discovered that Sara Collier was Trilby in the flesh, and straightway all her friends fell to comparing her line for line and feature for feature with this new standard. Just when she was beginning to be recognized for her own charms another lay figure must appear, and because she is not quite as tall as Trilby, or her eyes are not as deep-lashed, or her mouth a trifle more Cupid-bowed, it is regarded as a personal flaw. "I wish somebody would find out that I look like myself," Miss Collier once complained. And Reginald Norris has evidently done so.

Charles Rollo Peters sent up a big bunch of canvases this week from Monterey to be framed. They will be shown at the forthcoming Bohemian Club exhibition.

Because They Have American Wives

There are rumors of an impending change in the Italian Embassy at Washington, and a correspondent writes me that it is believed that the King of Italy is anxious to follow the example of the other Powers that are now represented at the capital by Ambassadors with wives of American birth. It is well understood that the notion now prevails in Europe that the best way to cultivate the friendship of Uncle Sam is to send to Washington an Ambassador with an American wife. Up to a few years ago alliances between diplomats were frowned upon by the governments of the latter. Moreover in cases where such unions were tolerated, the rule was established never to appoint or accredit the husband to the native country of his wife. The fact is that American women were tabu in European diplomatic circles. Baron von Brandt, one of the greatest authorities on Chinese questions, was deprived of the post of Envoy at Pekin for marrying an American, while the late Count Hatzfeldt, who died as the Kaiser's Ambassador in London, was forced by Prince Bismarck, under threat of dismissal, to part from his American wife, Miss Moulton, to whom he became reunited only a short time before his death.

Some of the Fortunate Ones

How times have changed! The potency of petticoat influence is now recognized by all the crowned heads. There is not the slightest doubt that the Kaiser was prompted to send Baron Speck von Sternberg to the United States by the circumstance of his having married a Kentucky girl. That Miss Wilson of New York was the wife of Sir Michael Herbert, first secretary of the British Legation at Paris, was a fact that undoubtedly served as the chief reason for his appointment to the post of British Ambassador to the United States. And it is doubtful whether M. Jusseraud would have been selected to succeed M. Jules Cambon as French Ambassador in this country, if he had not married Miss Richards. And King Leopold was by no means insensible of the importance of an American wife when he selected as his representative Baron Moncheur, whose better-half is of American birth. The Queen of Holland couldn't find a diplomat with an American wife, so hse was content with Baron Gevers, who happens to have had an American mother. Russia was a little behindhand until a short time ago when the St. Petersburg Foreign Office gladly consented to the marriage of the Secretary of the Czar's Embassy at Washington to the daughter of Paymaster Hoy, U. S. N.

Mrs. Martin's Lenten Dinner

The up-to-date social leader has to exercise a great deal of ingenuity to sustain a reputation for originality. It requires a high order of genius to pull off a novel function every little while. Many a social leader has been overcome with brain-fag while trying to keep society on the tip-toe of expectancy for something rich, rare and racy. Being aware of how it taxes the mental energy of a social leader to keep society interested I have no hesitation in awarding the palm to our own Mrs. Eleanor Martin for having capped the climax of originality by a function that took place at her home last Wednesday night. Mrs. Martin is a distinguished communicant of the Catholic Church, and in no more signal manner could she express her contempt for the conventions than by giving a dinner in Lent, and that is what she did. Moreover the dinner took place on Wednesday evening and Wednesday is one of the fast days of the week, but while that circumstance heightens the humor of the affair, the boldness of the venture was due to the fact that it was in honor of a clergyman.

They Sent Regrets

It was a droll idea indeed to invite a number of distinguished Catholic clergymen to dinner in the middle of Lent. For several days preceding the event Mrs. Martin's press-agent gave great space to it in the Post. It was to be a big social event, and the names of the invited guests were published, but on the last day it was stated somewhat apologetically that it was to be quite informal. Among those invited were Archbishop Riordan and Bishop Montgomery, and I was curious to know whether they would attend. Although it was of course a fish dinner I seriously doubted that either of those gentlemen would care to participate in a function of that sort on a Lenten Wednesday. They did not but I am quite sure that the fact will not be noted. They probably appreciated Mrs. Martin's drollery, but they sent excuses. However Monsignor Nugent, in whose honor the dinner was given, attended the fish banquet. But as Monsignor Nugent is over eighty years of age he is not expected to fast even in Lent. He is a very interesting old gentleman who has devoted his whole life-work to the amelioration of the condition of criminals in the prisons of England and Ireland.

An Interesting Woman

News comes to me from Paris of the separation of the William Tiffanys. I wonder how many of our club men who were gay young blades of fifteen years ago recall the visit to this city of Mrs. Tiffany who was then Mrs. Fernando Yznaga. She came to this State to establish a residence and obtain a divorce and while here she indulged in some very lively escapades. So reckless did she become that she had a narrow escape from figuring in a sensational newspaper story. The story was written up and would have been published had not Mrs. Yznaga secured the intercession of the mother of the publisher of the paper. About that time William Tiffany, the scion of an old Baltimore family, who had run through a fortune of two millions, was frittering away what little money he had left in this city. He met Mrs. Yznaga and after her divorce they were married. Her first husband having settled with her for a large amount of money, she went off to Europe with her young husband and they have spent most of the time in Paris ever since. Fernando Yznaga was the son of a Cuban planter and his mother was a celebrated beauty. His sister became the Duchess of Manchester.

The Smith Sisters

Mrs. Tiffany is one of three sisters all of whom have made important social history in this country. They were originally known as the Smith sisters of Mobile, Alabama, and they were beauties of the voluptuous type. One of them married William K. Vanderbilt, from whom she was divorced, after which she married Perry Belmont. She is the mother of Willie K. Jr. and the Duchess of Marlborough. The third sister married the Baron de Fontelliat from whom she was divorced several months ago, at which time she threatened to go on the stage.

Itinerant Journalists

Those two young French journalists, Messieurs Bles and Boyer, who are singing their way round the world, are to entertain the French club this evening. They are clever fellows, and will undoubtedly make more money on their trip than they would have earned at journalism in Paris. They were cordially received by the local French colony, and they made a great hit with their topical songs about the Humberts and the Crawfords. One of their songs tells of Coquelin's visit to Emperor William on which occasion the latter was suffering from indigestion. The actor asked the cause of his suffering and he replied, "Alsace-Lorraine." At their concert under the auspices of L'Alliance Francaise, the journalists sold copies of their songs and they didn't have enough to supply the demand. During their stay they have given their entertainment for Prince and Princess Poniatowski, the Downey Harveys, Mrs. Roos, the Weill brothers and the Bohemian Club.

Believed Dennis a Lothario

When Mrs. Dennis Kearney heard that her husband figured in Mrs. Older's novel, "The Socialist and the Prince," she rushed off and bought the book. She believed that the whole story was literally true, and that Theodosia Peyton was a real woman with whom her husband was in love. The love scenes roused her indignation, and when

The Million Dollar Baby

The story of the arrival of the millionaire Clark baby published the other day was all wrong. The baby that was confounded with Senator Clark's grandchild was the offspring of Dr. and Mrs. Rennick, who came to town to visit the Charles Clarks at their home in San Mateo. Mrs. Rennick is a sister of Mrs. Charles Clark. The million dollar baby, so-called because it won the one million dollars which Senator Clark agreed to give to the first of his grandchildren, was the offspring of Will Clark, whose wife died a month after the birth of her child.

The exodus from Blingum has begun and I hear that very few of the first families will be left this summer. Mrs. H. T. Scott and Miss McKinstry have started on a trip abroad, and they are soon to be followed by the Carolans, the Hobarts and others. The Downey Harveys are soon to visit their children in Vienna. The James L. Floods, who were reported to be en route to the East with their protegee, Miss Maynard, who was to accompany them on a trip to Europe, are still in San Francisco. The trip has been called off.

The Vanderbilts Outbid

I hear that both Willie Vanderbilt Jr. and his wife are very much disappointed over their failure to capture the imposing northwestern corner at the intersection of Fifth avenue and Fifty-second street, New York, as the site for their New York residence. Those cross corners have long been one of the show places on the avenue, where 'bus drivers pulled up for a moment to point out the splendid mansions of William K. Vanderbilt and William D. Sloane on the westerly corners, and Morton D. Plant's million dollar residence on the southeastern corner. For years the other corner has been occupied by an old-fashioned apartment house. Some time ago Mrs. Birdie Fair Vanderbilt spoke to her husband about capturing the site for a home and he opened negotiations, but they came to naught, owing to the fact that James Henry Smith made a handsome bid for the property and captured it. This is the same James Henry Smith who visited us last season, chaperoned in his own special train by Mrs. "Stuyve" Fish and another member of the ultra swell New York set. He is a bachelor, known as "Silent Smith," and inherited nearly a score of millions from an old Scotch uncle who went to Chicago in early youth and grew up with that bustling town.

Gem of the Palaces

Since losing this lot Willie K. Jr. and his wife have planned to go farther up town and build their residence. There was a time when young Vanderbilt might have acquired a splendid home ready made and lived diagonally across the street from the great stately pile erected by his uncle, Cornelius. This was the house of the late C. P. Huntington. But Mrs. Huntington has sold it. On the opposite corners are the homes of William C. Whitney and Mrs. Paran Stevens. The white marble pile of the latter is now being occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs. The structure which Senator Clark has nearly completed in upper Fifth avenue is said to be the most magnificent among the palaces of these multi-millionaires.

Let Us Bar Politics

The Citizens' Committee appointed to make preparations for a fitting reception to President Roosevelt sent him a communication the other day requesting him to extend the time of his stay in this city. The communication contained this sentence, to which as an humble citizen, though not a member of the committee, I beg leave to take exception: "This city being the metropolis of the Pacific Coast, the great financial centre and controlling power of its invested capital, is, therefore, naturally its political keystone." The ground of my exception is that it is most indelicate to assume that President Roosevelt is to visit us for political purposes. He is coming at the invitation of State and municipal authorities to attend certain ceremonies of a patriotic character and it should be presumed that he doesn't give a tinker's imprecation whether this city is the "political keystone" of the State. He isn't coming out to talk politics and no political significance should be attached to his visit. He is to be entertained by the whole people, who desire to show their respect for the Chief Magistrate of the nation. No doubt the colonels of the Union-League Club will be anxious to entertain him, but they have no more right to take up his time and sequester him from the mass of the people than have the braves of the Iroquois Club. He is coming out in his official capacity and not as a Republican politician.

Dashing Dorothy Tennant

Dorothy Tennant, the San Jose beauty, is back from London where she studied for the stage. She is now in New York, and attracting almost as much attention as she did in England where she was pronounced even more fascinating and original than her British cousin, the Dorothy Tennant who married Sir Henry Stanley the explorer. The California beauty was taken up by society and she played the lion with a swagger that was supposed to be typically Californian. She carried a pistol wherever she went, the glint of it showing in her sealskin muff, or peeping out of the inside pocket of her loose English coat, its menacing outlines even shining in the soft folds of her evening gowns. Lady Stanley obtained invitations for her namesake-cousin to some of the swell English country houses where Dorothy's prowess as a marksman always created a sensation. Hitting a bullseye at thirty feet was a small matter for her. She can ride a horse as well as she can shoot and she rode some cross-country hunts that made even the pink-coated Englishmen gasp. The New York papers have discovered Dorothy but by virtue only of her London social success and her cousinship to Lady Stanley. But Miss Tennant still insists that her sole ambition in life is to work from the bottom up, which is a bit surprising in these days when stars spring full grown in a night. San Jose people remember Dorothy Tennant only as a picturesque little tomboy who was "game" for anything. She once jumped into a foot race with twenty-six boys and came out flushed and first at the end of the quarter-mile. Evidently she is still as fond of running for a long-distance run was gotten up just for her benefit at one of the English country houses and she made the record of a three-quarters of an hour run. The American branch of the Tennant family have lived in San Jose for generations. A part of the city that was once in the suburbs used to be called Tennantville in honor of Dorothy's grandfather.

Fisher the Crack Faker

A sensational story appeared in the despatches the other day about an attempt that was made to poison John C. Fisher, the New York theatrical manager. A bottle of wine containing poison that would have caused instant death had been sent him by express, and he suspected a beautiful woman in Chicago. There is no man in the theatrical profession more skilled in the art of keeping himself and his hired mummers in the public eye than John C. Fisher, who a few years ago was a struggling one-night stand manager in San Diego. He was unknown in the East until he produced "Florodora" on Broadway, and then in a short time he became one of the most prominent of New York managers. His success was due to his breezy, hustling Western methods. He soon discovered that the best advertised shows were the most popular, and he proceeded to invent stories calculated to tempt newspaper men. "Florodora" failed to draw until Fisher got a story into print about a Sextette girl who made a fortune in Wall street on a tip given her by a rich broker. Every week thereafter stories appeared about the love affairs of the sextette girls, and "Florodora" was soon the rage. From the theatrical news in the papers it appeared that all the "Florodora" girls were riding in automobiles or contemplating trips to Europe with millionaire sweethearts. It was Mrs. Stevens of Kansas City who became a Gibson model when she joined the "Florodora" sextette, and was later on arrested for stealing rings from an ardent lover. Fisher was the man who attended to the publication of the stories. It was one of his actresses—Edna Wallace Hopper—who a year ago was reported to be en route to Canada to sue the Premier for the estate left by her step-father, and it was this same little woman who changed her mind the other day and decided not to import brood mares from England to stock her Californian farm. And now Fisher himself comes to the front in the leading role of a sensational poisoning case. Eastern press-agents who visit this city with large wads of manuscript containing stock stories for publication say that it is harder to "work" the local papers than those of any other city. They should emulate Fisher and wire their yarns from New York. The telegraph editor is a "good thing."

The Case of Lady Gordon

London society is making much ado about—well, not nothing. Lady Gordon, the "adoee," may be allied to the "gay Gordons" by nature as well as by name. The truth neither I nor any other man, but one woman only, knows. To judge of character by external acts alone (could one be sure even of them), is fatal philistinism. The one thing that issues from the affair with certainty is that her ladyship has added herself, or been added, rather, to the long list of outlaws for love. Whether, could she have foreseen the price, she would have paid it, perhaps not even she herself can tell. But the fact is that for her sweet sin she must now suffer social ostracism. Her name has been written on the shell-like ears of British aristocracy—and by no less a hand than that of Alexandra herself; a hand admittedly spotless, unless indeed it has been guilty of accepting the consideration of a crown, or the fancied welfare of a nation, for forbearing to prosecute a prince; of compounding a broken commandment.

People Who Live in Glass Houses

Love's tragedies lie too deep for tears, and twice too deep for words. Let us therefore turn to the tearful comedy of the thing. The queen consort has a husband with a reputed "past"; Buckingham Palace is for the gossips a great glass house; last, but by no means least in this matter, the royal lady calls herself by His name who said on just such an occasion: "Neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more": yet in broad daylight she stoops down to pick up the first stone to fling at poor Lady Gordon! That fact, for all its tearfulness, is printable because of the smile in it. The ladies of the London "fast set" are bound to follow the example of their Queen; and soon the air will be dark with avenging stones and the Lady Gordon done to social death. If only those among the women of England who are without sin or unwedded to it should shut their doors upon this modern sinner, Lady Gordon's visiting list might not be very sensibly lessened, but the good Queen's holy horror would assuredly be very sensibly increased. By the way, what is the prominent Britisher's name, who is said to have lied and perjured himself like a gentleman in defense of some woman's fair name? If all gentlemen with "pasts" are to be forbidden the court, Alexandra might not do amiss to take in hand the first that comes to hand. Lack of charity covers a multitude of sins. It would never do to begin it at home!

The Wedding of the Week

At the Merrill-Bates wedding the mothers-in-law elect divided interest with bride and groom. Both are fine looking women and attracted much attention. First came Mrs. Elizabeth Sears Gerberding, who passed down the aisle with her little girl, the bridegroom's half-sister, and later followed Mrs. Merrill. They are both brunettes, with hair lightly touched with silver. Mrs. Gerberding was in black velvet and Mrs. Merrill in the most delicate of gray satins. The bride looked charming, as brides usually do, and the bridegroom was the proudest and happiest of boys. The bridesmaids were all "in the springtime of youth," and the maid-of-honor, the bride's sister Ruth who is not yet "out," and the young ushers, completed the ensemble. The central figures of the function are probably the youngest bride and groom that ever drew a church throng in this city. There was a great mob in the church, two thousand invitations having been issued, but only two hundred were invited to the reception so only a small part of the assemblage was in gala attire. Among these were a few smart frocks. Miss Laura Bates, the bridegroom's cousin, looked very sweet in a white princess gown. Mrs. Alpheus Bull, the sister-in-law of Marie Bull, one of the bridesmaids, wore black lace, and Mrs. Tiffany was also in black.

"I think she's a very stylish woman."

"Yes, if she took as much interest in her husband as she does in her wardrobe he'd be the husband of the most devoted woman in town."

Bertha and Burgess

Bertha Runkle has gone and those that met her during her sojurn here are saying that she was addicted to that baneful habit of posing. She sought to impress people with her youth and to that end she affected a girly-girly way and an artificial giggle. After Ashton Stevens interviewed her and told of that giggle or gurgle the authoress accentuated it on every occasion. Gelett Burgess was Miss Runkle's cicerone. He always takes charge of visiting literary ladies, and he always gives them illustrations of novel love-making. He has been known to declare his passion at first sight, and it is said that on such occasions he is merely acting, his purpose being to get inspiration for love scenes in his stories, to paint from real life as it were instead of giving mere studio compositions.

Art Notes

Charles Rollo Peters and Charles Dickman have joined hands and issued invitations to an exhibition at the Bohemian Club. They will show their friends the things they have done at Monterey during their two years' sojourn there. Dickman has some of his Normandy scenes which he sketched in France, and having brought back from that country costumes of the fishermen, he finished the pictures by having Monterey fishermen pose for him. One of the best portraits at the Mark Hopkins exhibition of pictures is that of General Shafter by Matteo Sandona. It is strong, well-modeled and an excellent likeness. Sandona has also a strong portrait of his father which was done in the open air. The first of this sort that he did was that of Mrs. Emma Shafter Howard in her garden. The exhibition at the Hopkins this year is unusually small because half the pictures were rejected.

Gorman and Cleveland

A Washington despatch to the Bulletin Wednesday last told of the revival of the popularity of Grover Cleveland, of his intention to make a tour in the West in April and May, and of the demand of the New York World, "now the sanest Democratic paper published in the East," that he be nominated for President. It was also stated that Senator Gorman was to succeed James K. Jones as chairman of the National Democratic Committee. There is undoubtedly a movement on foot to secure the nomination of Cleveland, but it is being engineered mainly by Republicans. Roosevelt is persona non grata to Wall street, and the moneyed interests, feeling that he cannot be deprived of the nomination, hope to beat him with a Democrat of the Cleveland type. Gorman is the politician selected to lead the Cleveland forces. He is a politician of tact and ability and an accomplished trickster. Early in the year 1892 Gorman declared himself unalterably opposed to the renomination of President Cleveland. He openly asserted that David Bennett Hill was his choice. He caused anti-Cleveland delegates to be elected in his own State, and when the convention met the Hill-Gorman faction controlled more than one-third of the delegates. As it requires a two-thirds vote to nominate Hill and Gorman had it in their power to prevent the nomination of Cleveland. But at a critical moment Gorman turned traitor and voted his delegates for Cleveland. Gorman's enemies have since frequently insinuated that William C. Whitney put up the money that induced Gorman to desert his allies.

The California Club

The members of the California Club who fancied that the by-laws had been violated by action on the proposition to give a Mascagni concert were mistaken. The fact is that it was at a business and not a social session that the action took place, and the concert was subsequently called off by Mrs. George Law Smith, the President of the club, on her motion, in her executive capacity, because in an interview with the manager of Mascagni she learned that the burden to be imposed on the club was too great. And by the way, I am assured that the most perfect harmony prevails in the California Club, Mrs. Smith having cemented all factions since her last election. She has stimulated enthusiasm in the organization, and there has been unanimity of action in all that has been undertaken. Of course there is a minority in the club as there always is in such institutions, but the California Club minority is said to be so small that it does not occasion any anxiety. It found fault with the Mascagni concert project, but that affair was not abandoned on account of any protest. Mrs. Smith has been renominated for President, and she says that she will make no greater effort to be elected than she did a year ago. She did not seek the office then, and she does not seek it now.

Mary and Her Little Lamb

One of the questions asked of those who took the recent Civil Service examinations for San Francisco Free Public Library positions was "Who wrote 'Mary Had a Little Lamb'?" Nearly all those examined, I am told, who did not care to make a bluff at an answer, passed the question. I doubt if any of the examiners could have answerd it without consulting their scrap-books. Just the other day Miss Anne Hollingsworth Wharton, who is the great authority on disputed authorships, announced that Sarah Josepha Hale wrote the verses about Mary and her woolly follower. But immediately upon the publication of her dictum Miss Wharton received a letter from a friend of Sara Josepha saying that the latter only wrote a part of the poem. The first three stanzas, which virtually constitute the poem, were the work of some one else, unknown to Sara Josepha or her friend. The fact is that Mary's Little Lamb has reached the point of universality and anonymity. It belongs to everybody and nobody. The woolly versicles have long since drifted into the realms of folklore and it doesn't matter much who wrote them.

Gossip of the Service

The strife for the office of Quartermaster-General of the United States Army, which has been going on for some time past, is now understood to be settled by President Roosevelt's choice of Lieutenant-Colonel Charles F. Humphry, who has been in Manila for the past year. Colonel Humphry was on duty in this Department several years ago and stationed at the Presidio.

Captain B. C. Morse's regiment, the Seventh Infantry, at present at Vancouver Barracks, has been ordered to the Philippines and will sail from San Francisco ere long. Captain Morse was General Shafter's aide during the latter's command of the Department here, and was very popular.

It is forty years since Admiral Schley visited San Francisco. He was here in 1864, as a lieutenant on the gunboat Wateree, the first of its class to drop anchor in our harbor.

A Field for the Historical Novelist

With English and French history run to the ground, and the Civil war in the United States done to the death, I am surprised that no material-seeking novelist has cast his eyes upon Hawaii as a field for a three volume work. Prince Albert Kukailimoku Kunuiakea died last week in Honolulu and his funeral occurred in state on Sunday. The Prince was the descendant of Kamehameha the Great, and he died of tuberculosis. A short time before the passing of the last of the Kamehameha dynasty there was a sale in Honolulu of relics of the royal family of Hawaii, and one of the articles sold was a gilt and bronze clock which was a gift to one of the island monarchs from Louis Philippe. The passing of the last Kamehameha recalls the death of Kalakaua, the last male monarch of the Hawaiian kingdom. Kalakaua was prayed to death. While he was on a visit to this city he received knowledge of the fact that the praying men of his people were "praying him to death." The news reached him during a slight illness and it had such a depressing effect on the superstitious monarch that he gave up the fight.

Playwright Davies "Arrives"

Hubert Henry Davies, whose play "Cynthia" has met with success in the East, was for a long time a struggling newspaper man in this city, and several years ago he did dramatic criticism for Town Talk. His ambition was to become a successful playwright, and he received his first encouragement from Lillian Burkhart, who purchased a curtain-raiser from him. Up to that time he found it difficult to induce anybody to give his dramatic work serious attention. He wrote a monologue while here, for Pilar-Morin, which served to introduce her in vaudeville, but it did not make much of a hit. It was not until Lillian Burkhart accepted his charming one-act comedy, "Fifty Years Ago," that he felt that his ambition was soon to be realized. Shortly afterward he went to London, and after many rebuffs succeeded in having three plays accepted, one of which was "Cynthia" which was purchased by Elsie de Wolfe, the New York society actress.

Roderick MacLay of Portland won the Del Monte golf tournament last Monday, defeating W. Fairbanks and E. R. Folger in the semi-finals and finals.

Maiden of Madness

The longing and inveighing
  Are gone—the doubt, the pain;
The nights my soul dismaying,
Not once my head down-laying,
Whilst thoughts of thee kept preying
  Upon my heart and brain,
And whilst a voice kept saying
  That all would be in vain—
  All love would be in vain!

That voice hath truly spoken,—
  Might I have heard before!
Ere my sad heart was broken
For thy triumphant token,
Before Love's great tree oaken,
  Fell blasted to the core;—
Ye angels mild, invoken
  By sorrow, sigh no more,
  Ye angels, weep no more!

The world to mist has faded,
  One waste and moaning sea
By maddened ghosts invaded,
Whose midnight shapes have shaded
Those once fair fields that traded
  Their joy so full and free;—
Through Hell's dire stream I've waded,
  And Life is dust to me—
  The world is dust to me.

That Dog of Reynolds's

He never had a name, in fact Reynolds himself never thought about it, and to the servants he was simply "that dog."

The inflection when delivering the title, implies without biography the dog's exact position in the house.

Even his master had to confess he was not good to look at; the long, lank body suggesting the mongrel was not a thing of beauty.

A certain self pity on the former's part had awakened sympathy for the brute's condition. Who can deny that our good acts are seldom impersonal? It was on a cold evening in December that the friendship had begun. Reynolds had lost heavily and perhaps he had partaken too freely of liquid refreshments, for the world seemed to him abnormally tipped on its axis. Just as a gray light came stealing down the deserted streets he jumped unsteadily from the cab, ringing sharply at the door of his chambers off Picadilly.

A dim shadowy shape brushed against his legs, then there was a whine as the four legged spectre made way for the owner.

It was the whine that attracted the man's attention. Not a howl of canine distemper but more of weary resignation, it aroused curiosity and invited investigation.

"Hold the light higher," commanded Reynolds as the man came sleepily down the stairs, spreading an illuminated zone around the vestibule. The bundle of dark hair crouched down patiently as though expecting the usual cuff. Reynolds stooped and touched the forlorn creature.

"Come, old fellow," he said kindly, "my knocks will do for two tonight." The servant accorded his master the usual leniency a menial tends his superior, when coming home decidedly inferior.

"And to think," Roberts confided to the cook next morning, "he took that ugly brute into his arms and right up to his own sitting room."

Miss O'Brien raised her hands in pious horror at such decadence. In the room adjoining the sleeping apartment the guest was dreaming uneasily. Visions of the night before when someone touched him gently, at the same time speaking kindly, seemed not to be of this earth. He opened mild brown eyes, which a sudden affection made almost childlike. The dog did not know that Reynolds's act had been mingled with self-commiseration, perhaps it would not have mattered if he had. His best friend could not call Reynolds handsome. He had an honest English face and spare sandy hair, but only children and dumb things felt the kindness of his smile, the trueness of his eye. Now when these two classes are drawn to a man the critic should not judge harshly.

Reynolds was an English gentleman and heir to a large estate held in trust by Sir Clover, his uncle. Women smiled and flattered him, but more than one daughter had said when hard pressed by an ambitious mother, "He is a dear fellow, but oh, I couldn't marry him."

Perhaps Reynolds guessed more than people thought, but he made no sign, and that was the saddest part of it.

The night of the dog's advent was an epoch in the master's life, that is, it marked a new era. Sir Clover had absolutely refused to appease his nephew's creditors, had even threatened to cut off his allowance one third, but the worst was yet to come.

Reynolds had taken Her into dinner at Lady Inquest's that evening, and he had meant to tell her all about the secret he thought she half suspected. From under deeply fringed lids she had looked at him smilingly. "You take life too seriously," she said lightly, and then she added that their little act was over, for after all the world's a stage and men and women mere players.

"No, she had meant nothing," in answer to his question. He must come to a certain event in which she would figure prominently, to take place in the spring, perhaps.

He had turned suddenly white and sat staring down into his plate, while She chatted gayly with the man on the other side.

So it was all over, he told himself bitterly. Then he had made excuses to his hostess and turned his face . . . we will not say where.

It was all over . . .all over, the cab wheels seemed to say, and that was the night the dog came.

Something was almost as miserable as he, though it had no memory.

After that night Reynolds went out less, the club saw him seldom, and the beauties of fashion who had once smiled on him—not at all. When he took Her picture down from the mantel and looked at it with a queer contraction of the heart there were no prying eyes to see the act, those of the dog were full of sympathy.

Reynolds almost fancied there was perfect understanding, too, for, sitting down with his hand on the shaggy head, he would tell all about the time when he thought she cared, and when it was told, repeat it all over again, the listener making no sign that it was a twice told tale. Other friends lack this little courtesy.

Then the world was startled by the discovery that Reynolds was no longer an heir, that Sir Clover, the careful guardian, had decamped for African gold fields, leaving his nephew's creditors and his own, snarling over an empty purse. Wine and countless little luxuries no longer appeared, and the coat of Reynolds's grew shabby, and Roberts supercilious. Then the chambers were leased to another tenant, and apartments were taken somewhere on the other side of the Strand. Many things must have been left behind, for they were not seen in the new abode, but the Dog was there.

Finally, Roberts refused to move again. Now Roberts had no personal objection to moving, but the locality of the third translation was not desirable, he unspeakingly conveyed to his master.

Reynolds looked at his valet sadly, then paid him the full wages with an additional pound.

Roberts had a guilty feeling when he looked around the mean, bare room, yet he really couldn't sacrifice his self-respect.

The dog made no demur when lodgings cheaper still were taken. Here Reynolds was known as "the man with the dog."

Sometimes they would sit for hours in the dreary room before the cheerless grate, the yellow fog pressing against the dirty window pane; then the world seemed no place for tired men and women, or aching hearts. The dog would push up against the man's knees, and licking his hand try to convey how sorry he was.

London was just the same to children of plenty, but to Reynolds it was a world of pain, even of hunger, in short, a very friendless world. It is true some of the men at the club tried to hunt him up, but there is an unsuspected fund of shy reserve about the unfortunate that rather shuns than courts pity.

The women never saw him now, so soon forgot him altogether. The freckled face girl behind the counter idly wondered if the shabby gentleman took the buns home to his little children.

Home! Reynolds pressed the brown paper parcel closer to his moss green coat, and smiled; what if his serving man could see him now!

That evening the dog got most of the bun and the man went hungry to bed.

The winter closed in and the opera began.

Then one night life grew harder than ever to bear. Numbers of smartly attired men and women filled the vehicles moving slowly down the Strand. Just at the crossing where the crush is greatest, one carriage halted on the curb. A man in a thin coat paused also, and in doing so looked within. Mechanically his hand went up to his dusty hat, then fell to his side with a hopeless gesture.

A woman's proud, cold face looked back at him calmly. He had forgotten how far divided their paths lay.

A black despair settled upon Reynolds's heart. A smile of recognition would have meant ambition, manhood, and the strength to endure.

"It is all over," he said slowly, fitting the key to his door. They were her words, he remembered.

There was a very low fire in the grate and the dog in canine content basked in the feeble glow. The owner of the room looked around at its meanness. A few really valuable articles tried to give it the glory of better days. A brace of pistols in a highly embossed leather case stood in the corner; it had not been opened since the lodgings had been taken.

Reynolds sat down. There was a strange light in his eye, and his hand trembled as he put the hair out of the dog's face.

"No one wants us, boy," he said brokenly, looking into the faithful eyes. "Even she said it was all over, and I guess it is for you and me."

The dog wagged his tail, barking sharply.

Reynolds paid no heed to his way of saying "Cheer up."

Then the man went over to the pistols, taking one in a firm grasp. He remembered so well the dove he had shot with this twenty-four calibre, and how She had taken the wing and put it jauntily in her cap. That was at his shooting box one September when she had been of the party.

He faltered, then the memory of her face tonight steadied the weakening nerves, and he unflinchingly loaded the dainty toy. Her fingers had pressed the same trigger in playful horror.

"Come, old fellow," there was a martial ring in his voice and the dog sprang to attention. "You must go, too," he said vaguely, "no one wants us here, old boy."

He patted the dog's head, and hastily brushed his hand across his eyes.

"Come, Reynolds," he said shortly, "be a man."

There was a sudden sharp noise, then another sharp noise, and a puff of light smoke.

Then the embers on the hearth settled down into darkness to hide the thing on the floor. John Roberts.

Much Ado About Nothing

Showing Why There Should be a Hell for Gossips.

Scene, at Mrs. Smartem's home during the progress of a Lenten tea.

Mrs. Jones: There's Mrs. Hungry Tallberry.

Mrs. Brown: Yes, and there's that little Perte girl.

[Miss Perte, a pretty girl in a white frock and hat, passes Mrs. Tallberry, a tall and middle-aged matron with glassy eyes. Miss Perte looks toward Mrs. Tallberry, a smile of recognition dimpling her mouth. The matron looks at her and turns the other way.]

Mrs. Jones: Gracious! did you see that cut—the cut frigid, the cut direct?

Mrs. Brown: Awfully pronounced. Wonder what that little Perte has been doing?

Mrs. Jones (to Mrs. White): The most awful thing occurred a second ago. That little Perte girl, you know the one Tom Riche has been hanging around all winter, was snubbed, positively snubbed, by Mrs. Tallberry.

Mrs. White: Why, Mrs. Tallberry was the one who introduced her, at her tea last fall.

Mrs. Jones: Well, she cut her dead today.

Mrs. White: Probably Miss Perte has been doing something to displease Mrs. Tallberry—she's such a prude, you know.

Later, at Mrs. Gay's fish dinner:

Mrs. Jones (to Mrs. Green): I saw Mrs. Tallberry cut Lily Perte dead, the most icy cut, today, at Mrs. Smartem's.

Mrs. Green: Yes, I heard about it. Serves Lily right. From all I hear, we all should cut her.

Mrs. Jones: Really?

Mrs. Green: Yes, the way she has been going on with that Tom Riche is a caution. Why, I heard—but no, I must not gossip. If you can't say good things about any one, I say, say nothing.

Next day, at the Grill.

Mrs. Jones: I hear that there's good ground for all that is said about that Lily Perte.

Mrs. Brown: Why, is anything said about her?

Mrs. Jones: Well, I don't like to assert anything positively—but you know that we saw Mrs. Tallberry cut her at Mrs. Smartem's.

Mrs. Brown: That's true, and what our own eyes saw can't be disbelieved. I'll not let my dear Tiny go with Lily Perte any more.

A fortnight, later, same place.

Mrs. White: See Lily Perte over there. She's lunching with Tom Riche. Who's that with them?

Mrs. Robinson: I forgot my lorgnette, so can't make out. By the way, Lily doesn't seem to be so popular as she was.

Mrs. White: Really?

Mrs. R.: No, I've not seen her at any of the fish dinners this week, or at the bridesmaid's luncheons.

Mrs. White: Probably some reason for it.

Mrs. R.: Do you mean—

Mrs. W.: Yes (significantly) so I've heard.

At the art exhibition.

Mrs. Brown: Lily Perte's here—am surprised she'd care to come.

Mrs. Jones: Care, or dare?

Mrs. White: Well, she's got good chaperonage.

Mrs. Green: Tom Riche?

Mrs. W.: No—Mrs. Tallberry.

Mrs. Jones: I'd not believe it if it were not before my eyes—there they are.

Mrs. Brown: What's the explanation of that scene at Mrs. Smartem's?

Mrs. Robinson: I asked her—and what do you think she said?

Chorus: What?

Mrs. R.: That she didn't see her—she had left her lorgnette at home.

Mrs. Jones: But Lily thought it was a cut.

Mrs. R.: No—Lily didn't see her either.

Ladies all raise eyebrows, and then level lorgnettes at Miss Perte and her companion.

Mrs. Robinson: 'Twill take more than a battalion of lorgnettes for them to see the joke is on them! —The Farceur.

The Miser's Song

My heart is old, is old, is old,
Its warmth went out with a dream untold,
The blood drips slow through each mangled fold—
I heal the hurt with the balm of gold,
Of gold, of gold.

My heart is old, is old, is old,
Is hard and withered, and dead and cold;
Where once the blood of my pulses rolled
Now surges the greed for the yellow gold,
For gold, for gold.

My heart is old, is old, is old,
And dark and heavy as churchyard mold;
For I, like Judas, have smiled, and sold
My friend, and God, for a piece of gold,
Of gold, of gold.

For Art's Sake

Once upon a time there lived an ordinary girl who belonged to a commonplace family. The girl had noble aspirations, but the family preferred gayly-flowered carpets to rugs and oil-paintings to engravings and aquarelles.

The ordinary girl became a student at an Art School where they set her to drawing from casts, and showed her the beauty of a Grecian profile.

After a few day's study she went home sad and gloomy, and instead of eating her dinner she gazed searchingly at the features of her parents, sisters and brothers. Finally she burst into tears.

"What is the matter?" asked her mother, pressing her to take another cup of tea.

"Nothing that anybody can help," returned the ordinary girl, with a heavy sigh. "You're as God made you, I suppose, but father's head is not set right on his shoulders, one of your eyebrows is out of drawing and Sister Jane's mouth is altogether too large."

Nothing could comfort the critical student for the shortcomings she observed in the features of her relatives. A few weeks later, she said she could stand it no longer.

"I can't live here any more, for my art sense is continually shocked," she said, "I cannot sleep in a room that has a green and red carpet on the floor and a pink counterpane on the bed. Art calls me to a studio down town, bare perhaps but not incongruous."

So she moved down town to a large, barren studio where her art sense was not in danger of being wounded. She continued her studies.

One day, while looking in the mirror she discovered that her own nose was not symmetrical.

"Horrors!" she cried, "must I live with a nose out of drawing? It is a crime against art."

In a fit of despondency she committed suicide. She left a note in which she informed her parents that she was indebted to them for the pleasure of proving her devotion to art. Her case is noteworthy merely because it tends to demonstrate that art schools sometimes subserve a good purpose, while it also teaches parents that there is a responsibility on their shoulders that they do not always wot of.

—The Preacher.

"I hear that Miss Smartleigh is going to make her debut on the concert stage."

"Do you think her voice would fill a hall?"

"No, I think it will have the opposite effect."

Little Tommy—But, papa, I've heard Aunt Kate say that she was a bachelor girl.

STAGE

The Republic's Minstrels

San Francisco theatregoers have always dearly loved a minstrel show, and the old-timers who keep alive tradition about the little old Standard theatre, where Reed, Emerson, Sweatnam and Johnson used to finger the bones and jingle the tambourine, have had positive convictions on the certitude of the success of a renascence of minstrelsy as we enjoyed it in the days when those "refined artists," as they were pleased to call themselves, made merry in the little Bush street playhouse. There is now a prospect of the verification of their views, for the Republic minstrels give promise of approximating those entertainments that coined money for Reed and Emerson, and developed such artists as Carroll Johnson, Franz Wetter, Frillman, the Coghill brothers and Eddie Girard. There is an abundance of talent at the Republic, and the opening performance augured well though it was as long-drawn-out as a contest over a frisky millionaire's will. But that was not altogether the fault of the players. The floral offerings and the encores were largely to blame, and most of the bouquets were as de trop as the chaperon of a grass widow. Poor Marie Adelman was greeted with such a profusion of flowers as to suggest the despoiling of a conservatory in her behalf, and as the work of handing them over the footlights was begun before she began, she was overcome by confusion, being a novice, and she didn't regain composure during the entire performance. However, Miss Adelman's debut was inauspicious for several reasons, but that is another story. The minstrel first part which preceded Miss Adelman was a success, though I think it would have been better appreciated if the singers as well as the musicians made a concession to tradition by using burnt cork instead of greasepaint. There is something incongruous about a minstrel show in which the performers try to look pretty, the attempting of which feat leads oftener to failure than achievement. But if suggestions are in order, it may not be amiss to recall that a pleasing feature of the Reed and Emerson minstrels was the music, both vocal and instrumental. The vocal is satisfactory at the Republic but there is a wide margin for improvement in the orchestra, the leader of which is no Mullaly. The end-men, especially Mack and Stine, are energetic mirth-provokers, and they are successful exponents of the old school even in the matter of the antiquity of their gags, though it is evident that they are not prejudiced against up-to-date humor. As for Peurl Wilkerson, the interlocutor, he is almost as pretty (with the aid of rouge) as the late Billy West, and he has the same contempt for syntax that distinguished that panoplied aristocrat of the crescent. The first-night's house was a packed one and the minstrels were on cordial terms with the audience long before Richard Jose, the great contra-tenor with the tears in his voice, sauntered down to the footlights to receive the ovation which he is always accorded. Wallace Irwin's "Chop Suey," a musical burlesque on the wars in Chinatown, has more than the usual elements of a successful minstrel afterpiece. Indeed it would have been better appreciated Sunday night if some of those superfluous elements had been omitted, but the blue pencil is always called into requisition after a first performance, and it has done effective work for "Chop Suey," which is really a clever skit. Irwin has amusingly burlesqued features of life among the highbinders, and he has written some funny dialogue and breezy lyrics. The music by Leo Bruck is light and catchy, and one or two of the tunes are destined to be floated on other air than that of the Republic. There are some pretty girls in the Republic chorus, and Claudia Rodgers "arrives" in the soubrette role. She has form, beauty and temperament. She dances well, too. Joe Kane, the German dialect comedian, in the role of the Chinatown guide, is the most rollicking of the characters in "Chop Suey." Irwin's satire on Sherlock Holmes is funny, but owing to the great length of the opening performance it was unnecessary. However it would have served admirably as an afterpiece to the first part in lieu of the Sousa imitation.

The Grand's Detective Play

"Sherlock Holmes" is not the only high class detective play in town. "The Sixth Commandment" at the Grand is one of the best that has come this way in many a day. There are passages and scenes in it that reveal the playwright as a master hand, and it is presented in most effective style by the stock company at the Grand. Emmet Corrigan does capital work in the role of Targovica, and Miss Odell is seen to advantage as Olga Varlamoff. She is especially good in the scene where she is cornered by Targovica, the villain of this detective play. Miss Odell has mannerisms that are not agreeable, but she has great dramatic force and in this play she displays it in a most fervid manner. But the honors of the production are carried off by Mr. Corrigan, who is a sincere and most enthusiastic actor.

Roger Looks Like a "Comer"

Local theatrical managers appear to be intent on stimulating a passion for the detective drama. Hawkshaws abound behind the footlights this week. The exploits of the sleuths at the Columbia, the Grand and the Alcazar are of absorbing interest, and it is evident that people who have been surfeited with problem plays that deal with matrimonial complications and illicit love affairs are quite willing to be regaled with that style of drama that impressed them in their youth, and which they were inclined to scoff at in later years. "The Cipher Code" at the Alcazar has its detective, a chief of the Secret Service, and his ways are not less interesting than those of Sherlock Holmes, though they do not monopolize the action of the play. Mr. William Warren, who plays the part, is not the central figure in the drama, but he has enough to do to keep you interested in his work. If Mr. Warren were less obviously a stage detective in make-up and manner he would impress one as being more of an artist than he really is. The play is well constructed, the dialogue is interspersed with bright repartee and interest is sustained throughout. Moreover it is in capable hands, and some good work is done by Mr. Wilfrid Roger, the latest acquisition of the Alcazar. This young actor is said to be only twenty-two years old, and he certainly gives promise of great achievements, for his work in "The Cipher Code," for which he prepared on three days' notice, is most commendable. He plays the star part written for that intense, nervous actor, James E. Kellard, who is strongly reminiscent of the gifted "Ted" Henley, whose ashes were flung to the winds at the Cliff by Helen Bertram, in a moment of erotic emotionalism. Roger is a manly young fellow, with an almost spirituelle cast of feature, and he plays the part of the blase young swindler, who is equally a connoisseur in crime and bric-a-brac, with a display of remarkable capacity for the exigencies of the role. Roger is worth watching. In the role of Kate Enderby, Miss Hunt is ingenuous and fetching. Miss Juliet Crosby plays the part of Gwendolen Mayhew as it should be played, but it affords no opportunities for telling effect, and Miss Oza Waldrop is a prepossessing Estelle, which is about all that is required.

Juliet Crosby's reappearance at the Alcazar on Monday night had special significance because it occurred upon her birthday, which was also the fifth anniversary of her marriage with manager Frederick Belasco. Her reception was extremely cordial and there were many offerings of flowers, with an after-the-performance supper.

"Will you join me?" "Well, yes, in a drink of Chapin & Gore."

Mr. Hanford's Petruchio

It is worth while to take in all the productions of Shakespearean dramas that come this way, for there are rarely two alike. The performance of "The Taming of the Shrew" at the California differs in many points from others given here. Mr. Hanford's Petruchio is a very clever characterization, full of life, and he declaims his lines so that none of their significance is lost. Miss Drofnah, too, succeeds in grasping the spirit of her Shakespeare, and her Katherine is a most intelligent conception. Mr. Hanford is at his best in the taming scene at his home, and I doubt if any one could do this scene better. Miss Drofnah gives a charming reading of the final speech of the subdued shrew. The company in support is adequate but not brilliant with the exception of Mr. Hight, who plays Baptista; Mr. Allen, the Grumio, and Mr. Yielding, the Vincentio. They all double up dexterously in enacting the minor characters. There is a rather notable lack of pulchritude in the organization, the one spot of beauty being Rose Curry, who plays Bianca.

A Plethora of Basses

There is no danger of a bass or baritone famine at the Tivoli. Never in the history of the company could it boast of such strength of heavy male voices. In "Pinafore," this week's bill, all the hits are made by the basses and baritones. The songs that win the applause and encores are the Captain's opening solo by Arthur Cunningham, "The Midshipmite" that opens the second act, the Bosun's "He's an Englishman" and the interpolated "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep." The audience could not get enough of Arthur Hahn, the Australian who lately came to the Tivoli, in that old song. He sang it sitting and he sang it standing, but the audience insisted on having it three times before it would let the singer go. This performance of "Pinafore" is by means the best one the Tivoli has staged, but it has many good features. The chorus is remarkably good, and it would pay the composers of new comic operas to pattern theirs after the Sullivan idea. The chorus is always a strong point in the Gilbert-Sullivan works. What can be more taking than the voice accompaniment to Sir Joseph's "Ruler of the Queen's Navee" song, or to the "He is an Englishman" finale? There's nothing half so good as that to be found in "Florodora" or the Smith-DeKoven operas.

In re "Pinafore"

It is natural whenever "Pinafore" is revived that reminiscences of former productions of the Gilbert-Sullivan masterpiece should be in order. The first "Pinafore" I remember was that juvenile production in which Flora Walsh, later Mrs. Charles H. Hoyt, sang Josephine's role and introduced into the score that old song, "She's as pretty as a picture." About the same time another juvenile production of "Pinafore" was given by amateurs at Dr. Kalloch's church, the Clark children being the bright particular stars. The stellar performance of "Pinafore" in San Francisco was that which only a few perhaps remember, when Emelie Melville, the Josephine, was the only professional, the distinguished amateurs in support including Clay Greene and his wife, Frank Unger and Mrs. Unger, Charles Dungan and Gracie Plaisted. Gracie afterwards blossomed out as a professional. A monster production of "Pinafore" was given a good many years ago in the Mechanics' Pavilion under the auspices of the G. A. R. There were both amateurs and professionals in the cast. Alvina Heuer sang Josephine and Mary E. Barnard was Cousin Hebe. It was this bit of stage experience that emboldened Miss Barnard to proceed on her career, which finally brought her within Grau's fold of grand opera singers. In the process Mary E. became Marie Barnard Smith and then Marie Barna, before she retired to private life again as the wife of a wealthy New Yorker.

Armour's Stenographer in Vaudeville

They are having one of those rare performances at the Orpheum this week, that are good from start to finish. So many are the imported stunts that the biograph is eliminated. Among the performers is an interesting individual in the person of Julius Tannen, who, up to five weeks ago, was a stenographer in the employ of the Armours of Chicago. One night he was doing his monologue at a club jinks in Chicago, and in the audience were E. D. Stair, the theatrical manager, and Martin Beck, the Orpheum's booking agent. He made such a hit with them that he was promptly engaged for the Orpheum circuit. His specialty is the imitation of noted actors, in curtain speeches. Nat Goodwin, Richard Mansfield, Sam Bernard, De Wolf Hopper and George Cohan are among the actors whose peculiarities of speech are accentuated by Tannen. Lillian Burkhart is the head-liner this week and her sketch, "A Strenuous Daisy," affords her plenty of opportunity for the display of her rare talents. She plays the part of a rollicking Western girl from whose tongue slang comes trippingly, and who eats with her knife without serious consequences. Foy and Clark appear in an amusing sketch, "The Spring of Youth," and Pepita Aragon, the Spanish dancer, is creating a sensation with her beautiful costumes. She has a gown for each night in the week.

A Toast to Lillian

The folowing lines were written as a toast to Lillian Burkhart by one of her admirers:

Still the plague of pert and dainty
  Damsels who do wheels and splits,
Who with: "He's a darling, ain't he?"
  Dazzles Jack's or Johnnie's wits—
(Such as Dollie Delahainty, Lottie Lowd and Rosie Rage)
Has not banished all the dainty little Ladies from the stage.

To the actress I am drinking,
  To the woman with a heart—
To the artist who is thinking
Not of arts at all, but Art—
  Scorning petty airs and graces,
Thus achieving airy grace—
  Wearing, modestly, the traces
Of God's genius in her face!

Pearl Ola Humphrey, who has dropped her Pearl since she became a "regular," has bravely gotten over the recitation habit, I should judge, seeing that she has made a success on the stage. There was a time when Miss Humphrey was known as an elocutionist. She used to recite at Y. M. C. A. affairs and she recited well, too. She is at present visiting her old home with her husband, Edwin Mordant.

It is more than likely that Florence Roberts will have "Du Barry" for her next season's piece de resistance. The word having come West that Mrs. Leslie Carter will not include us in her tour, it is probable that Belasco will give "Du Barry" to Florence Roberts, if we are to see it at all.

Features of Next Week's Bills

Prices will go down again to the one-fifty scale during Effie Ellsler's engagement at the Columbia. Miss Ellsler has not been seen here since she gave us her Glory Quayle in "The Christian." It is said that her interpretation of Mary Tudor in "When Knighthood was in Flower" is most artistic and as she will be supported by a strong cast an attractive performance may be expected. The dramatization of "When Knighthood Was in Flower," from Charles Major's story of that name, was accomplished by Paul Kester. The stage settings and costuming are said to be superb. The engagement is to be for two weeks. "Are You a Mason?" comes next, with John C. Rice and Sally Cohen, and Mrs. Pat Campbell soon.

The king of all Swedish dialect comedians, Ben Hendricks, comes once more to the California tomorrow night to present his ever popular comedy, "Ole Olsen." Hendricks will be assisted by a capable cast, including the vivacious soubrette, Mattie Lockette, of "At Gay Coney Island" fame, and the original Swedish Ladies'

Quartet. And then comes the California's most pretentious offering of the season, Rose Coghlan, presenting "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" and "Forget Me Not."

New songs and jokes will be insinuated into the Republic minstrels' program. "Chop Suey," pruned and brought to the time limit, will be continued by special desire. There will hereafter be Sunday matinees as well as Saturday afternoon performances.

"Hoity Toity" still packs Fischer's to the doors, but "Helter Skelter" is in active rehearsal. Perhaps the funniest scene in the next Weber & Field's burlesque to be produced is the circus in the second act, in which it is said that the three comedians, Kolb, Dill and Bernard, will appear in tights and ballet costumes.

Emmett Corrigan and Maude Odell will be the leading figures in a mammoth and magnificent spectacular production of Sir Henry Irving's version of "Robespierre," at the Grand. There is no character in history which stands out so clearly cut, which so thoroughly represents unbridled power as Robespierre, the product of the French revolution, that great sanguinary power that preceded the coming of Napoleon. The play is a strong one and will be strongly cast.

"The Husbands of Leontine," the Alcazar's offering, has as heroine an audacious little feather brain, with great elasticity of the affections, who is to be no more seriously considered than a humming bird, and like some of our American divorcees she continues to enslave her husbands after the courts have severed matrimonial bonds. The Alcazar favorites will be well placed, with amusing probabilities for Juliet Crosby and Frank Bacon, to whom falls one of the funniest parts ever assigned to him. It will be a happy week for the popular comedian—quite a family affair—as his wife and daughter are also in the cast. "The Dancing Girl" comes next.

At the Tivoli Zelie de Lussan will give four performances of "Carmen," on Friday, March twenty-seventh, Monday, March thirtieth, Wednesday, April first and Saturday, April fourth. Perhaps no other singer who ever essayed this part has met with the unqualified success accorded to De Lussan. She is a finished vocalist, and as an actress stands without a peer in opera in this country. To support her, the management has engaged especially for these performances the New York tenor and English favorite, George Tennery, of the Castle Square Company and other organizations. Bertha Davis will have the part of Michaela, Cunningham will be the Toreador, and Hartman and Webb will be the two smugglers. Marie Welsh is cast for Frasquita, and Frances Gibson will sing Mercedes. Fogarty and Jacques will be Zuniga and Morales respectively. The intervening performances will be occupied with "Pinafore."

Milly Capell and her wonderful trained horse will be a striking feature of the Orpheum's bill. She is a German, carries a retinue of attendants, horse and several dogs, traveling in a special car. The dogs, which are of the finest breed, are used in a serpentine parade which the equestrienne has lately originated. Esther Fee, violin virtuoso, will make her first appearance here. Eugene Green and Blanche Werner, the "Babes of the Jungle," will appear in a blackface act abounding in pleasing music and quaint comedy, with the latest coon song successes. The Brothers French, trick and expert bicycle riders, will also be new. For her third and last week Lilian Burkhart will revive one of her early successes, "The Salt Cellar." Foy and Clark will change their sketch, presenting "The Man Across the Street." The six Glinserettis, Pepita Aragon and Julius Tannen, will remain.

At the Chutes Dacey, Chase and Ward, three knockabout comedians of note, will present "Fun in a Gymnasium," and Mons. Smot, a globe-trotting Frenchman who makes pictures out of rags at ragtime speed, promises a distinct novelty. M. Smot will also make caricatures of prominent citizens in thirty seconds. The amateurs will appear on Thursday evening. —The Playgoer.

MUSIC

The Brilliant Kocian

Kocian is to be congratulated. To add lasting beauty to brilliancy, to be wonderful and yet to wear well, falls to the lot of but few artists. Unlike poet, painter, or sculptor, the violinist cannot leave behind him permanent records of his ability, such as poem, painting, or statue, and depend upon time for vindication. He must succeed in his own day and hour, or forever fail. He has nothing more enduring than memory to make his mark upon. We may hear old men speak in praise of Paganini, or read what the musical critics of his time wrote about him, or listen to Kocian interpret his compositions; but the music the master himself made is dead and leads only a ghostly existence in the minds of the few now living that heard him. And though they still speak with enthusiasm, we cannot reproduce his sounds from their words; we cannot marvel at his fine fooling with the fiddle or be moved by his high seriousness. Accordingly, the choice between perfection and popularity which most artists have to make is especially hard for the musician. For with him it is now or never. The lean years may not fatten on the hope of posthumous fame. Not to be under any necessity of making the hateful choice or effecting a facile compromise; to be able to please at the same time oneself, one's fellow craftmen, and the populace, is for an artist the most enviable of fates. His farewell concert, notably the Bach Chaconne, proved it to be Kocian's. It would be almost impossible to over-praise Mr. Spindler's accompanying; and the individual applause which his "Alumblatt" called forth was more than merited. He also is to be congratulated. So is San Francisco. So is Mr. Will Greenbaum.

Au revoir Mascagni

So Mascagni, the magnetic, must perforce leave this New Italy by the Pacific ocean. No more at present may he be seen waving his magic stick over San Francisco musicians, turning—moist-eyed, beaming like the big boy he is, delighting to delight—to bow himself, hand over heart, into the hearts of adoring audiences. If he did Italicize Beethoven a bit, who cares? Did he not also out-Damrosch the only Walter in the Wagner numbers? The maestro has a charm great as charity; it can almost completely cover a multitude of the little musical sins of our local performers. California has much in common with the land of "cloudless climes and starry skies," feels itself akin to Mascagni, and enjoys in his presence the subtly sweet "consciousness of kind." "Encore!" shouts the audience as the baton brings the Intermezzo of "William Ratcliffe" to a happy close; and the generous maestro makes it "once more." And now, Maestro Mascagni, adio. Since your coming, San Francisco has experienced a musical Renaissance. If Socrates could find it in his philosophy to call himself a "midwife of the mind," we hope that you will not take it amiss, but on the contrary as a compliment, if we call you a midwife of music.

Musical Needs

Remarked Dr. H. J. Stewart in his lecture before the California Club on Tuesday: "Best of all for San Francisco's musical interests would be a spirit of friendship among the city's musicians." Dr. Stewart is right. There is none of that spirit of camaraderie prevailing among our musicians that one finds in Europe, for instance. Rather is it jealousy and envy that breeds here. Foreign musicians coming to San Francisco merely to give a few concerts are welcomed with open arms, and go away saying what an intensely musical community ours is. But let a native go away and win honors abroad, when he returns he finds as a rule anything but a warm welcome. There are cliques, too, among our musical lights, to a larger extent than one finds among any other class of professionals. This is all wrong, but even Dr. Stewart, who can point out the lack of friendly spirit, cannot offer a remedy that will work a cure.

A very pleasing and varied program of orchestral music under Sir Henry Heyman's direction was given at the Hopkins Institute on Thursday evening. Among the numbers rendered were "The Butterfly," duet for flute and clarinet (Bendix), the csardas from Delibes' "Coppelia," the Prelude and Siciliana from "Cavalleria," and the Dance of the Hours from Gioconda. During the spring exhibition at the Hopkins musicales will be given on Thursday evenings, March twenty-sixth, April second, ninth and sixteenth.

The weird and fascinating predominated in the program of the Loring Club on Tuesday night. The club has been strengthened and is much stronger in tenors than it was, though the basses and baritones still predominate. The feature of the program was Gernsheim's "Salamis" in which Dr. Schalkhammer sustained the solo. Harry Barnhart and A. A. Macurda sang the solos in the other choral selections. Mrs. L. Snider Johnson was the assisting soloist, and Miss Ruth Loring accompanied. Antoinette Trebelli (Dolores) will sing at the next concert of the Loring Club.

The first complete Beethoven Cycle ever given in this country began last evening in Philadelphia. Fritz Scheel is the director of the Philadelphia Orchestra which is giving the Beethoven concerts.

Mrs. Charles W. Rhodes, the well known traveler, author and musician, who has appeared with great success at Harvard university, Bryn Mawr and Vassar colleges, and all the leading musical clubs in the East, will deliver her lecture on Wagner and the Bayreuth Festival at the Alhambra next Wednesday evening and Saturday afternoon. The lecture is illustrated by beautifully colored stereopticon views, showing the principal scenes in the entire "Ring of the Nibelungen" and "Parsifal," besides portraits of the leading singers at Bayreuth, scenes of the little city and at Wagner's home. The musical parts are by Adolf Glose, the New York pianist. There are one hundred and twenty beautifully colored views, all said to be masterpieces of photography. Seats will be on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s next Monday morning, prices fifty cents, seventy-five cents, and one dollar. Special arrangements will be made for schools and colleges on application to Manager Will Greenbaum, care Sherman, Clay & Co.

The senior class of Madame Prill's music school at 618 Golden Gate avenue will hold its examination tomorrow. The junior class examination, in connection with a piano recital, was held this week, the program ranging from Kullak's Technic to Asher, Liszt and Thalberg. Mascagni and Signor Martinez were the critics.

Invitations are out for a song recital by four pupils of Edward Xavier Rolker, next Tuesday evening at Steinway hall. The pupils who will take part are Miss Hedwig Pohlmann, Miss B. Rosenbaum, Fred Hotaling and Bert Georges. Special interest centres in the appearance of Mr. Georges, who has not sung in public since his late illness, and his return from Europe about a year ago.

J. Wesley Wilkins, formerly choir director at the First Baptist Church and later of St. Peter's Episcopal Church here, is now choirmaster at the Church of the Epiphany in New York.

Mr. Zech has decided to change the date of his next symphonic concert at Fischer's to Thursday afternoon, April sixteenth. The program will be exceptionally interesting.

Pachmann is quoted as having said to an interviewer, "I am the most unmodest man in the world, except Hans von Bulow. He is a more unmodest man as I, but after him I am a very unmodest man. I play very, very beautiful."

Hambourg, the Russian pianist, will give his recitals at Fischer's. He is expected shortly. —The Music Critic.

In addition to the French and other imported goods, Aimee carries a line of medium-priced hats, all distinguished for beauty, chic and style.

THE BEER OF BEERS—RAINIER.

Ask nine out of ten men which beer he prefers and he will reply, "Rainier, of course." The Seattle Brewing Company's prize brew made a hit from the instant it was placed on the market, and its favor has increased every moment of the day since. Rainier beer owes its success to its own intrinsic excellence. It is a pure beer, absolutely free from adulteration, and that the public appreciates it is shown by its immense and constantly increasing sales.

With the Money Makers

Quiet on 'Change

The past week has been rather quiet as far as transactions in industrial securities are concerned. While there has apparently been a dearth of buying orders, holders have manifested no anxiety and judging by their firmness in adhering to their asking figures there is no lack of confidence in the stability of values. In some ways the business of the week has varied slightly from the usual course which has ruled for some weeks past. By this it is meant that considerable of the trading has been confined to a few of the leading stocks and it is safe to say that the business of the week in its entirety embraces sales in a smaller number of stocks than any week since early in the year. The fluctuations in prices have for the most part been unimportant and as a general rule they represented merely the usual ups and downs incident to ordinary trading. The sugar stocks have been about as firm as any on the list and for a part of the time there were more buyers than sellers. There seems to be an undercurrent of opinion which, without being traceable to any particular source, seems to indicate some substantial movement in the future which will bring about an advance in prices. Whether this has any foundation in fact or not cannot be determined, but there are some operators on the street who claim to be in a position to know, who freely assert that a prospective combination is in process of formation which will develop more interest in sugar shares with a resultant higher standard of prices than has been heretofore known. The recent acquirement of the California & Hawaiian Sugar Company's plant at Crockett, by the Western Refinery, has given rise to rumors that the latter corporation is seeking options on all the beet sugar refineries in the State, with a view of controlling thereby the entire sugar output and as a matter of course regulating prices. While this is the talk on the street it is known that nothing definite has been done with any plant except the one at Crockett as above referred to. The price of sugar has lately been advanced and this is another element of strength in the recently improved prices for sugar plantation shares. Hawaiian Commercial stock has changed hands at $47.87 1-2 and occasionally a sale has been made at $48. This for the present, however, appears to be a maximum figure although it must also be stated there are no round lots offering even at that. Paauhau shares, which for a time advanced at a greater proportionate rate than any of the others, have eased off a trifle, so that now $18.50 seems to be the highest figure buyers are willing to pay. Makaweli, which also showed some strength, has dropped back a trifle, with $27 as the best bidding figure and sellers demanding $28. Honokaa has shown but little change. When shares advanced under the influence of reported improved conditions Honokaa stock was apparently unaffected, but when the tone of the market developed a weaker tendency this stock experienced a fractional decline in sympathy with all the others. Hana has attracted but little attention, buyers and sellers being apart on a $4 bid, while most sellers demand $4.75. Lighting shares have been quite active and sales have been extensive. The effect of the recent boom operations has to some extent passed away, but San Francisco Gas & Elctric has thus far fairly well maintained the higher prices reached. At present this stock sells at about $57 to $57.50, but the transfers are generally in moderate lots. Pacific Gas Improvement has changed hands at $38.25 and may be rated as fairly steady at that figure. Equitable shares are a trifle easier and $4.25 is the best bid. There have been no further developments with reference to the identity of the parties who are principals in the procurement of options on the Equitable and other plants and nothing definite may be expected until the maturity of the options. The only factor in the situation, which is known as a certainty, is that the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company has nothing to do with the deal and that no attempt is being made to secure an option on the plant of the latter corporation. Beyond this no one can state any facts in the local lighting situation. Spring Valley Water shares have met with a moderate inquiry, but as there has been a divergence of opinion between buyers and sellers on the subject of values, but little actual business has been consummated. Buyers have been bidding $85.25, while sellers have been asking $86, with the tendency on the part of sellers to increase their asking figures to $86.50. Contra Costa Water is wanted at $62.50, but the orders cannot be filled at that price and it is doubtful if any holders could be induced to part with his holdings at less than $64. Alaska Packers, which for months past has been one of the steadiest stocks on the list, experienced quite a sharp decline during the week, and at present about $151.25 is considered the top price. It is generally believed, however, that this decline is but a temporary speculative movement caused by the announcement that the Pacific Packing and Navigation Company has passed into a receiver's hands. California Wine Association stock is slowly but gradually advancing in price so that now there are ready buyers at $105 with scarcely any stock obtainable at that figure. The bidding price for Oceanic Steamship shares was advanced a trifle and $13 now appears to be the ruling bid, with sellers demanding $15. Bank shares have been quite active with a generally improving tendency apparent. Shares of the Bank of California are selling readily at $500 per share, the highest price on record, and even at this figure there are more buyers than sellers. Transactions in Bonds have not been very extensive but the prices obtained on the several recorded sales show a general steadiness of tone, with but slight fluctuations from day to day.

Lone Mountain Wealth

Lone Mountain is fast becoming the centre point of interest among Tonopah investors. Several good strikes have been made of late, that of the Princess Maude Gold Mining Company promising unusual results, the surface cropping running to very high-grade ore with excellent indication of "Gold" as the work progresses. This stock has just been put on the market and is considered a very good buy at the present time.

The contest between President Harriman of the Southern Pacific and Jim Keene has been eagerly watched during the week, and it was predicted by people in touch with the Eastern stock market that there would soon be a big advance in the stock of the railroad corporation. According to rumors that have floated out from the East, the veteran manipulator espoused the short side of the market in revenge, attacking Harriman issues. There was talk of Hill and Morgan being behind Keane, and this gave encouragement to those who looked for a big advance in prices.

The Ed Pinaud Building

One of the latest additions to the skyscraping office and business buildings of New York is the Ed Pinaud Building, at corner of Fifth avenue and Fourteenth streets. This massive structure is a great addition to the neighborhood, replacing as it does the old building occupied for so many years by Old Guard as an Armory.

To celebrate the opening of the elegant offices and warerooms, Messieurs Victor Klotz (the proprietors of Parfumerie Pinaud) gave a reception to their friends and customers, from two until seven Thursday afternoon, March fifth. In honor of the occasion the proprietor, Mr. Klotz, made a special trip from Paris to attend this function.

The elegantly fitted up offices were beautifully decorated with palms, etc., the French and American colors, while the Hungarian orchestra enlivened the occasion with music.

A collation was served by Mazzetti that was in keeping with his reputation, while champagne corks were popping like the discharge of a rapid fire gun.

The wonderful growth of the popularity of Pinaud's Perfumes in the United States is due to their remarkably fine quality, backed by the great business ability and untiring energy of the American Manager, Mr. Emil Utard. The growth of the business during his incumbency, thirteen years ago, has been truly wonderful, necessitating a constant increase of room and facilities to transact the growing business. Mr. Utard is a thorough believer in advertising, attributing his great success to the wide and unique advertising used in popularizing Pinaud's Perfumes.

Among those present were: The Consul-General of France; the President of the French Chamber of Commerce; representatives from the financial and commercial world; representative publishers from the magazine and newspaper field, including Mr. Frederic M. Krugler, the popular Eastern representative of Town Talk. And among the professional women attending were: Miss Lillian Russell, Miss Amelia Bingham, Miss Fay Templeton, Miss Blanche Walsh, Miss Blanche Bates, Mrs. M. M. Fiske, Miss Edna Wallace Hopper.

The Siberia has among its passengers a large number of the elect of the land, members of Collver's Tours, operated by the Nippon-California Tour Company. The party will be gone from one hundred to one hundred and ten days. The Tour is made for a fixed price, all expenses included, to and from San Francisco. It will take in Japan, in untrodden paths, Shanghai, Hongkong and Manila. The same company operates the Grand Canyon of Arizona Tours, under personal direction, all expenses paid, the ideal short vacation for the business man, seven days to and from the Canyon. This is a high class tour under personal escortage. The advertisement of the Company may be found in another column.

Connoisseurs of perfect goods appreciate "Jesse Moore" Whiskey for its purity and delightful flavor. It is without a peer.

LETTERS

A Moorish Romance

A strange tale is that which A. J. Dawson has given us in "Hidden Manna." One might call it the tragedy of the half-caste, since one of the principal figures is Joseph Khassan, who appeared in "African Nights Entertainments," an earlier book by the same author. This Joseph is a mongrel of mongrels, an illegitimate child of a Spanish Jewish mother and a Christian Turk, born in the slums of an Armenian village. Adopted by a white missionary, reared as a white man and educated, in time he himself became a missionary, going to London, no less, as a fitting field for his labors. An idol for a time, a broken idol, cast aside, an actor, always sinking lower, but always a profligate, he finally deserts his white wife and his acquired religion, having arranged matters so that it is supposed that he has died a suicide's death. But Joseph has merely "removed himself." The Christianity which he had acquired was laid aside as readily as the garb of civilization, and when he appears again it is as a holy man of the Mohammedans, a hermit beggar seated at the gate of Ed-Dar, in Morocco. By a strange turn of the wheel of fate the Shareef of Ain-Araish, lineal descendant of Mohammed, temporal and spiritual lord of the district, has just taken to wife an English woman, one whom Joseph had wronged during his London career, and who had been adopted, after his supposed death, by his wife and her second husband. Thereafter the story deals with the ambitions of this Margaret Wycombe and her schemes to have her own child supplant Ben Hassan, the son of her lord by his first wife, and the only heir to the honors and emoluments of the Sheerifate. Joseph Khassen, now Haj Yusuf, has been taken into the household of the young prince, and becomes his guide and director in all things. But in order to win a place in paradise for himself, it has been given to him as a penance by another holy man to whom he has confessed all his transgressions, that he shall serve the alien Shareefa in all things well and truly, but never look upon her face. So he sees his young master degraded, deprived not only of the honors due him, but of the comforts and even the necessaries of life. He knows of the plots against his life, yet he scarcely lifts a finger to hinder their consummation. He is torn between his natural love for this most lovable youth and his vow of atonement to the Shareefa. Margaret is a stepmother such as one rarely meets with outside of oriental tales and fairy stories. Kipling gave us a glimpse of one of her kind, the gypsy wife of the Maharaj in "The Naulahka," and Margaret adds to the heartlessness of the gypsy all the craft of civilization. With such a woman as this, able to gradually concentrate all the power into her own keeping, and the superstition of the Moors together with that spirit which leads them to attach themselves to the winning side, it is evident that Mr. Dawson has an exceptionally strong and unhackneyed situation to deal with. The action takes place far from the track of the Cook's Tourists, and personally conducted routes. Mr. Dawson is a traveler of note, and his descriptions of scenes and ceremonies read like the observations of one who has taken his life in his hands and seen for himself what only the Moors are permitted to see. There are wonderfully effective bits of description in every chapter, pictures which reproduce themselves in color before the mind's eye. Explanations and footnotes are abundant, so that the most careless and superficial reader is fairly forced to understand. The style, while never heavy or halting, is as leisurely as the caravans which traverse the country. One gets more of an insight into the life and character of the Mohammedan Moors from this book than from all the superficial tales of tourists that have ever been written. It makes as strong a plea against mixed marriages and half-breed races, from the mental and spiritual standpoint, as Philip Verrill Mighels does in "The Inevitable," from the physical side. "Hidden Manna" will repay more than one reading. It is not often that as much can be said of a modern romance. [Published by A. S. Barnes, New York.]

Tales of Fishermen

James B. Connelly has done an excellent piece of work in his volume entitled "Out of Gloucester." There are half a dozen tales comprised in the book, all but one of which relate to the exploits of the Gloucester fishermen and their boats, and for the most part the boats are the heroines of the adventures. A fisherman's "gamming," in which we are permitted to take the part of lookers-on and listeners, is the means through which the tales are given to us, and rattling good ones they are. No one with a drop of salt water in his blood can fail to be thrilled by the performances of the Lucy Foster, the Henry Clay Parker, or the Nannie Q, and the "Wild Irishman," Tommy Ohlsen, Clancy and Billie Simms are living personalities. While there is a certain leisurely matter-of-factness in the relation, a recalling, as it were, of what is too well known to the group to need much particularization or explanation, there is at the same time nothing omitted, and no technicality which would render the stories unintelligible to a landsman. Mr. Connelly has succeeded admirably in giving us the attitude of these men of daring deeds who, though they are not bragging in the least, but simply going over what is little more than the daily routine of their calling, still give a sense of repressed exultation in their skill and the quality of their craft. "On the Echo of the Morn" will recall the excitement which held the whole country, as well as the port of Gloucester, a few years ago, over the seizure of craft said to be fishing inside the Canadian shore limit, and it is a poor heart that does not beat faster while Billie Simms is making his daring escape from his Canadian captors. Clancy is a sort of "wild Irishman," whose smuggling enterprise is no worse in its way than the readily condoned "pranks" of Harvard students. "A Fisherman of Costla" takes us to the bay of Galway, and serves to show that all the daring and danger is not pure recklessness, nor all the heroes Gloucestermen. It is not every day that a volume of short stories contains half a dozen stories of equal strength and excellence, such as are here presented. If there be readers who find no enjoyment in this book, the fault will lie with themselves, not with the author. [Published by the Scribners.]

General Charles King is about to publish a new novel of army life, the scene of which is located at Fort Frayne, an environment with which the author has made us familiar. The title "A Daughter of the Sioux," would indicate that the action revolves around an Indian uprising. There is ample field for romance, heroism and cowardice, and there is no question but that General King knows the army as no civilian can. Judging by precedent, there will be a big demand for this book, for since our forays in the Philippines and Cuba there is hardly a family in the United States which has not some connection with the army. Illustrations are by Remington and Willard Deming, both of whom may be called experts on the depicting of the soldier, the Indian and the plainsman.

An unsigned comment pencilled in the back of a copy of "Senator North" belonging to one of the public libraries is: "It is astonishing to my mind that this most gifted authoress persists in depicting women of the aristocracy when she has not the first idea of what constitutes a lady." An Eastern magazine which maintains a department for review and criticism recently mentioned "The Splendid Idle Forties" as the work of "Miss Grace" Atherton. Such is fame.

A "literary" writer points a moral by quoting the "Mrs. Allison of Du Maurier's 'Sir George Tressady,'" when poor Du Maurier was dead long before that wretched and soon forgotten piece of work by Mrs. Humphrey Ward was given to a confiding world. Was it Josh Billings who said it is better not to know so many things, than to know so many that are not so?

Mrs. Mighels is engaged on a book of Californian fairy tales after the plan of the Arabian Nights, which she proposes to call "The Enchantments of Gold and Silver." It is a labor of love, and may not be finished for a considerable period.

The Bookman tells of a most amusing blunder into which the London Academy recently fell. Mentioning Jacob I. Riis's late book, "The Battle with the Slum," it speaks of the excellent frontispiece portrait of the author, and notes the curious resemblance to "Mr. Dooley" Dunn. And it happens that the frontispiece is really a photograph of Theodore Roosevelt.

Elder & Shepard, who have a continental fame for getting out timely and artistic booklets, announce two Easter publications. "An Easter Song," by Grace Hibbard, whose two recent volumes of poems have been so well received, will be illustrated by Gordon Ross. The other is to be a compilation of quotations on "Happiness," a companion volume to the "Friendship" of last year. It will also be decorated, and will have as a frontispiece a reproduction of the Stevenson monument. —The Bookworm

Other People's Ideas

From "Children of the Soil," by Sienkiewicz:

Marynia: Memory is a magazine, in which the past lies stored away, and recollection appears when we go to the magazine to take something.

The man who has failed and for that reason falls into trouble, feels the friendship of people more keenly than others.

Plavitski: A woman should have courage to grow old, then a relation would end in friendship; otherwise it becomes slavery.

Bukatski: It always makes me impatient that people do everything from weighty reasons. What privilege have weighty reasons, that every man must accommodate himself to them?

Marynia: There is in suicide this ghastly thing, that one feels bound to condemn it; and while condemning there is an impression that there should be no sympathy for the misfortune.

A woman who evades rouses contempt; a woman who recognizes her fault dashes the weapon from the hand of every opponent in whose nature, or even in whose education, there lies the least spark of knightly feeling.

Women, when they sympathize with some one, wish first that some one to be really unhappy, and, secondly, they wish to alleviate the misfortune themselves; when it turns out that another is able to do that, they undergo a certain disillusion.

Mashko: When a man takes a wife he should think before all of future peace. In a mistress seek what pleases thee,—wit, temperament, a poetical form of sensitiveness. But with a wife one must live years; seek in her that on which one can rely—seek principles.

He had said frequently that women, without reference to their origin, are divided into patricians, who have culture, principles and spiritual needs, which have entered the blood, and parvenues, who dress in them, as in mantillas, to go visiting.

Success intoxicates a man and strengthens his self-confidence.

Svirski: A grateful heart is one which feels when it is loved, and is moved by love; and in return for the loving, loves more and more, yields itself more and more, prizes the loving, and honors it. The ungrateful heart gets all it can from the love given; and the more certain it feels of this love, the less it esteems it, the more it disregards and tramples it. It is enough to love a woman with an ungrateful heart, to make her cease loving.

Stanislav: Enthusiasm comes almost always from the warmth of a good heart, while impetuousness frequently agrees with a dry heart, and often comes even from this, that the head is hot, and the heart is asleep.

Bigiel: There are women who love music with their souls, and there are others who love it with their skin; these last I fear.

Stanislav: Noble souls pay for confidence with gratitude; mean ones, with contempt.

In certain cases women demand more regard the less it belongs to them, and the more respect the less they are worthy of it, because they need it for their own self-deception, and often too because the infatuation, or delicacy, or comedian character in men gives women all they demand, at least for a season.

Common natures, by contact with persons or things which are higher, lose esteem for them through this familiarity, as if showing involuntarily that whatever becomes near to them must thereby be infected with vulgarity and meanness, and cannot, for that very reason, continue lofty.

Svirski: Let people say what they like, still in an open confession of fault there is a certain awakening of honesty, a certain courage, a certain turn, a groan of sorrow, which, if it does not redeem the offence, may redeem the soul.

From "Can Such Things Be?" by Ambrose Bierce:

It is one of the important uses of civility to signify resentment.

As the greatest cities are most provincial, so the self-complacency of aristocracies is most frankly plebeian.

To those who view the voyage of life from the port of pleasure, the bark which has accomplished any considerable distance appears already in close approach to the further shore.

Poverty and zeal are an upper and a nether millstone. It is dangerous to make a third in that kind of sandwich.

A Clever Guide

An English traveler who had often heard that the Venetian gondolieri were remarkable for their perfect acquaintance with every building and locality, however obscure, in their beautiful city, determined to put their knowledge to the test, and with this view stepped into a gondola, saying to the boatman who awaited his orders:

"Take me to the church of San Berlingo."

The gondolier fell into a brown study, and answered after awhile:

"Signore, I don't know where that church is."

The Englishman pretended to get angry, and went in search of another boat, repeating the same proposal and receiving the same answer, and thus four or five times in succession. At length, one gondolier received his orders in silence, and plying his oars sailed on and on for over an hour, drawing the boat to land opposite some distant church, where he said to the passenger:

"Here you are, signore."

"And is this really the church of San Berlingo?" inquired the latter, in great surprise, well knowing that there existed no church of that name.

"Oh, certainly!" added the boatman, "this is All Saints' Church, so that if your San Berlingo is really one of them this must be his church, too."

Fraternal Degenerates

Great was the consternation in Masonic circles over the discovery that a swindler had been admitted into that most exclusive of all fraternal societies. When a man of questionable character is admitted to membership in a Masonic lodge it becomes evident that the affairs of the lodge are not conducted in strict accordance with the principles of the order. Firm adherence to those principles renders it impossible for a man of bad character and in ill repute to be received into membership. But the case that caused a sensation in the East is not an exceptional one. Men of bad character do get into the Masonic order, and they are admitted to every fraternal society. It is unfortunate that fraternal societies are not more exclusive; that the grip and other evidences of membership in orders devoted to religious and charitable purposes and to the uplifting of one another do not always proclaim the possessor a man of honor and integrity. What a glorious privilege would membership in a fraternal society be if all the members were sincerely devoted to the noble principles and high aims to which they pledged themselves at the time of their initiation! There is not sufficient virtue in the world to justify the hope of so much goodness ever being concentrated in one society. But there was a time when secret societies were very exclusive, and when their members were devoted to the fostering of the spirit of brotherly love, the stimulating of the spirit of charity and the promotion of high ideals. In those days men joined fraternal organizations with pure motives and not for the purpose of enlisting the support and patronage of their lodge-room brothers. Nowadays fraternity is almost the synonym of selfishness. There are men that join secret societies not through any spirit of benevolence or through religious fervor or generous impulses, but in the interest of their private enterprises. There are "good-joiners" that belong to every secret society under the sun, and they unblushingly urge others to follow their example—"for business reasons." The case of the politician running for office who circulates "literature" calling attention to the secret societies of which he is a member is by no means rare. Quite frequently you are handed a business card on which has been engraved the emblem of some fraternal society. The lodge-room is the Mecca of men of mediocre talent who would be failures in the world were it not for the patronage they brazenly seek in the shadow of the altar on which they swore allegiance to noble principles. It is no longer difficult for a man, no matter what his character may be, to achieve membership in one of the many fraternal orders, for since the ascendency of commercialism and materialism many lodges are to be found in all orders, the members of which do not take the principles seriously. And in many lodges the most enthusiastic members are those that are getting the most benefit out of their fraternal connections, either in some profession or in politics. But since the universal brotherhood of man has been achieved through the multiplication of fraternal orders to such an extent that every adult has the right to sport at least one emblem, what does membership in a secret society avail a man? Nothing but the opportunity to extend the circle of his acquaintances, which is quite serviceable for both commercial and political purposes. The "good joiner" always has an advantage over his opponent in politics, and consequently fraternal societies have been responsible for the election of bad men to office. If there were no bad men in fraternal societies this could not be. However the fraternal institution is one that subserves many good purposes. It inculcates the spirit of charity, and it has imbued men with noble impulses. Perhaps some day there will be an awakening followed by a purging of the rolls and an effort to expunge the taint of commercialism from the lodge-room.

Railroad Accidents

The numerous railroad wrecks that have occurred in the last few months have stimulated discussion of the problem of how to make travel by rail less perilous, and incidentally theories are set forth as to the principal causes of disaster. There is a disposition on the part of the public to blame the railroad companies for the great loss of life, it being assumed that they do not take necessary precautions. People are slow to consider that loss of life in a railroad wreck usually involves great pecuniary loss to the company on whose road it occurred. They overlook the fact that the executive officers of the great railroad corporations are men of intelligence, that they are skilled in the railroad business, familiar with all the details of operation, and sensible of the responsibility that rests upon them by reason of the lives and property interests that are entrusted to their care. Those men spend a great deal of time in formulating regulations and systems for the protection of life and property, and in the last quarter of a century they have solved many important problems, but during that same period the transportation business has been revolutionized. Fast trains are now faster and more numerous than ever, and the crews engaged in handling them are subject to the same influences that have always operated upon railroad men and other human beings. Mechanical contrivances to avert railroad disasters cannot be substituted for the mental equipment of engineers, conductors and despatchers. Usually when orders are disobeyed those guilty of the disobedience suffer the most. In the majority of instances they sacrifice their lives. They are sensible of the importance of vigilance and caution, but they have been known to do things for which they could in no way account. A switchman accustomed to do a certain thing in a certain way at a certain time every day, has been known to do it the wrong way, wrecking a train. He was puzzled at his own action. Engineers have wrecked trains while brooding over domestic troubles. A train despatcher in this State recently caused a big wreck, and the papers said he was overworked. The contrary was the case. He had so little work that he gradually found himself performing it like an automaton, and one day, acting instinctively, he gave the wrong orders, and his sub-conscience at once apprised him of the fact, but it was too late. Of course the peril of railroad travel can be greatly minimized by the more general use of the double track system, but even then accidents will occur.

Dissensions in Church of England

Some time ago when Town Talk commented on the tendency toward Roman Catholic doctrine in the Church of England, a local clergyman of the Episcopal Church took exception to our remarks, but since then they have received such repeated verification that he has probably deemed it unwise to discuss the matter further. So strong has the tendency been that efforts are now being made to counteract the encroachments of the Ritualists, and last week a bill passed to its second reading in the House of Commons directed against the so-called Romish practices of the clergymen of the High Church. The measure abolishes the Bishops' right of veto on proceedings against contumacious Ritualistic clergymen, and provides that they may be deprived of their living when they persist in disobedience. The debate upon the bill was one of the most exciting in the history of Parliamentary discussion of religious and theological questions, making evident the intensity of feeling which has been aroused by the spread and stubborn aggressiveness of Ritualism. Significant was the statement of Sir William Harcourt that conditions have reached a stage where if the right of veto is left to the Bishops, and laymen are without rights in ecclesiastical matters, it will be better to disestablish the church. In other words the Church of England can no longer depend on its clergymen to maintain its Protestant character. Their influence must be overcome by its lay members. One London vicar has resigned his church rather than yield in the matter of the invocation of the saints and the adoration of the Real Presence, and there are five other incumbents of the same spirit who persist in defying episcopal authority. Are they not drifting toward the Church of Rome?

The Street Car Hog

Some one is anxious to have a book of street car etiquette written with a view to improving the manners of both employes and passengers. There is no obstacle in the way of "some one," whenever he or she chooses to set about the task, and judging by the sales of other guides to good manners, there might even be a reasonable demand for such a volume, but how anything of the kind would effect an improvement in behavior is not so easy to comprehend. It is not lack of knowledge of what is right that impels women to spread their draperies over a double allowance of space, and no man can plead ignorance as an excuse when he sprawls his feet half-way across the car or crosses his knees so that his dusty shoes leave their imprint upon the garments of every one who passes him. The woman who seats herself sideways, or piles her packages on the seat beside her, oblivious to the "strap-hangers" until the conductor asks her to make room, is not under any delusions as to her rights under the circumstances, nor are there two opinions concerning the late fashion of standing in the doorway and crowding the platform. There is no form of street car annoyance practiced by the American hog which the said hog has not also experienced, and is not therefore, perfectly well aware of how "the other fellow" feels. It is simple selfishness and indifference to the discomforts which, for the time being, do not inconvenience him. Men are often thoughtless. They become absorbed in their papers or magazines and sprawl or cross their knees, or do not notice that by moving up a few inches they can make room for another passenger. The conductors usually remind them of their delinquencies, and it rarely happens that they do not immediately and cheerfully set themselves right. But the female of the porcine species is monarch of all she surveys. If she does not choose, of her own accord, to crush her draperies or take up her parcels, he is a brave man who will attempt to compel her to. It is a dangerous business for a conductor to address a request, much less a command, to such a one. She is usually able to wield a sharp tongue in her own behalf, be she right or wrong, and besides the unpleasantness of becoming involved in a public argument, the conductor is liable to find himself made the subject of complaint at headquarters, with fine or dismissal as a consequence of his temerity. There is just one effective course of treatment for the genus, and that is precisely what a book of etiquette would not advocate. Instead of casting longing glances at the occupied space, the thing to do is to take possession. A book of etiquette would doubtless make interesting reading, but how are rules to be enforced? If common sense, kindly feeling and a recognition of the rights of others will not banish the street car hog, books will not.

The Futility of College Education

From the outcroppings in editorial columns East and West, there are indications that the educational fetich has had its day, and common sense is once more to have a chance. For the last generation or two there has been an increasing tendency to regard universities and colleges as crucibles into which all sorts of base metal could be cast with the certainty of having it emerge as refined gold. Much has been written and more said about the cheap education to be acquired, but the result has been not so much cheap learning as the cheapening of learning. Instead of maintaining standards and requiring students to come up to them, there has been a desire for large attendance and long lists of graduates. Instead of weeding out incompetents, requirements have been scaled down, until today a university diploma ranks hardly higher than a grammar school certificate did thirty years ago. The Nineteenth Century for February contained an article which purported to show the fallacy of the argument that a college education is an advantage in any sphere of life, and that the much-schooled youth has an advantage over his fellows, but the arguments are as old as time itself. The book-learned man is apt to be prejudiced and narrow in his views. He is tradition-bound, and unwilling to consider any but book problems. It is the same argument that Horace Greeley used against the college graduate in journalism, and the one which mechanics employ against "manual training" pupils. They are hag-ridden by methods. If things are done by the "wrong method" it does not count that the result is correct. If the right form of procedure is followed that is more to the purpose, even if the end is not the one sought. There is no school like that of experience, and what Horace Greeley objected to in the college graduate is what the mechanic finds fault with in his school-taught apprentice. Both have a smattering, both are sure they know it all because they learned in the school, and in both cases there is friction and waste of time before they discover that they have only an approximate knowledge. The notion that education could be rubbed in is rapidly being dissipated, and from all sides we begin to hear arguments that there is no use in spending five thousand dollars to educate a four-bit boy, and that small and narrow minds are contracted, not broadened, by sending them to colleges. It is beginning to dawn upon parents that too many other youths are supported in comparative luxury and idleness for four years in the hope of picking up useful acquaintances, for it to be worth while for them to enter into the competition, and moreover, the husky fellows who make such brilliant track and football records never do much else. In fact, it is coming to be generally acknowledged that a college education in itself is of about as much practical value to the average student as the Kohinoor would be to an untamed Maori.

Rathbone's Attack on Wood

Major Rathbone has utterly failed to involve General Wood in a scandal. It was too big a task for the Major to undertake. General Wood is the pet of the Administration and Major Rathbone is its scapegoat, and therefore it is not likely that serious consideration would be vouchsafed the charges preferred by the latter against the ex- Military Governor of Cuba. Wood is the intimate friend and boon companion of Roosevelt. He was jumped by the President from a medico captain to a general, over the heads of men that had served the country well in the field, and he was made Military Governor of Cuba, in which capacity he proved himself a man of splendid executive ability. He may have been guilty of technical violations of the law, but Rathbone is not the man to successfully prosecute him for his delinquencies. Rathbone was formerly Director of Posts in Cuba, and he was convicted of conspiring to defraud the postal revenues of the island. He has always complained of having been persecuted by General Wood, and the probability is that he was severely dealt with for he was involved in the old familiar row between the civil authorities and the military. However, the fact remains that frauds were committed in his department, and that responsibility for them rested on him. If he had attended strictly to his business the scandal would never have occurred. He preferred to give rein to his wife's social ambition and the consequence was that he devoted more time to social diversions than to government affairs. The Rathbones gave the most delightful receptions in Havana and extravagance was the cause of their downfall. Now the disgruntled official seeks to establish his innocence by attacks on General Wood. He has provided the press with a sensation, but he has not vindicated himself nor has he received any encouragement from the Administration.

John D. Rockefeller

Nothing that the dailies have said about that smug and oily plutocrat, Mr. John D. Rockefeller, since he came to California for rest and recreation, would indicate that he was held in anything but the highest esteem by his countrymen. His movements are reported in the dailies as though he were some great hero who had endeared himself to the hearts of people by his noble achievements. In the abstract men of the Rockefeller type are execrated by the press. They are denounced as the enemies of good government, sordid rascals who should be wearing stripes in a penitentiary. They are the men that exercise those sinister influences in the body politic which corrupts and demoralize, and which menace our most sacred institutions. There is no better way of discouraging the evil practices of such men than by holding them up to public obloquy on every possible occasion. Why should the feelings of such a sordid wretch as John D. Rockefeller be spared? A man with a daily income of ninety thousand dollars can afford to have the truth told about him without suffering much . He pretends to be interested in educational matters. Then he should not object to being held up to the youth of the country as an awful example of a slave of money-hunger, a man whose life has been one long disease —a remorseless, insatiable appetite for money. Being a philanthropist and a benevolent old gentleman he should not object to having the youth of the country enlightened on the subject of the disease that has prompted him to build up an income of over thirty millions a year by methods that every honest, decent citizen should be ashamed of. Mr. Rockefeller has donated meagre drippings from his income to the cause of education through the medium of the Chicago University. Far more beneficial to the country would it be to endow an institution for the promotion of civic virtue and the regeneration of the public conscience.

The New Man

The new woman, at least as the subject-matter of an essay, is now uninterestingly old. Not so the new man. He, even Solomon himself would be forced to admit, is something novel under the sun. Like the theory of evolution and other characteristically nineteenth century products, he may have long existed in embryo; but never until our day has he come to self-consciousness and a knowledge of his own significance.

Essentially modern is his method of settling, by means of sexual selection, the question of woman's equality, choosing her to be his equal, seeking as he does a mate not merely for the animal part but for the whole of him, his passion waiting upon spiritual appreciation, transfigured by far-reaching affinities; reluctant as he is that his truest and best and most human self—his mental and moral and esthetic self; his spiritual self, in short—should live in lonely bachelorhood and die desolate, his body alone being benedict.

The new man is not the male counterpart of the "new woman" of petty literature; not a being created by compensating Nature for the express purpose of undertaking the home duties left undone by the emancipated female. He is rather the long-looked-for mate of the "Eternal Womanly," the whole man a mate for the whole woman.

How common partial marriages have been in the past, or are at present, no man knows; for many a woman keeps well the secret that is killing her. Certain it is, however, that countless women have married, been so-called wives and mothers, and yet have died veritable virgins, their hearts husbandless to the last.

Now man is, in many important particulars, like to the lower animals; but with divine differences. The new man has come, after the lapse of tragic centuries, as a response to the demand of woman that she be the adored of the differentia. Woman longs to be mate, not merely to what in man is likest to the lower animals, but also to what is unlikest.

Much that passes with men as love is really nothing better than a more or less unlovely desire for exclusive personal possession. Into the love of the new man animal passion in its simple state cannot enter. It of necessity undergoes a transformation, a sublimation, entering only as a component part of a highly complex emotion which includes distinctly, or mainly, human feelings, artistic, ethical, religious, and other. And this emotion is sui generis and ceases to be this emotion when reduced to its elements (its lowest terms) even as water ceases to be water when resolved back into its original hydrogen and oxygen. On the part of such a man a purely animal passion for a woman is a spiritual impossibility. Moreover, it is as a matter of fact physically impossible for him to be guilty of cheap liaisons. He has imagination, insight, and the idea of tomorrow's disgust is ever vivid enough to dissipate today's passion, should that in an atavistic moment obtrude itself: the light of knowledge lays the ghost of ancestral sins. The man is a blend, and loves as a whole, to the last, least atom; he is not susceptible of any vile self-division into animal and human, by means of which the body finds an affinity, while the soul, loveless and lonely, cheated of its kisses, retires into its most secret self—in confusion lest it should unavoidably be present at another's love-making. To the new man such rank dualism is insufferable. If indeed he be made up of various selves, animal and spiritual and what not, at least they are inseparable. Mortal and immortal, inextricably mangled, in a miracle of monism, must together experience the ecstasies of love.

When a woman wins this new man as a husband, she does not necessarily lose him as a lover. For he knows that in love by no possibility may a privilege pass into a right. With a wise gallantry he gives a woman back to herself, puts her in a position to give herself again with gladness. Nor is he ignorant of how much in marriage men miss through ignorance; nor of the truth that ultimately a man can get nothing but what he deserves. So he sets about making himself love-worthy. He is not content to have a corpse to wife, or, still worse, a corpse galvanized by the will into a semblance of life. The thought of a woman's soul shrinking at his approach into inaccessible retreats his soul cannot abide. He believes that where the heart is, there the body should be also, or, at least, that where the heart is not, there the body should not be. The wife who is a mere mistress in whose behalf a man has made in advance the amend honorable, he will have none of. Having read Goethe's "Elective Affinities," or being on his own account conversant with the constitution of hidden things, he does not forget the fact that, appearances to the contrary, a wife's spirit may be elsewhere than in her husband's encircling arms.

The new man, far from demanding of woman immoral self-sacrifices in his favor, will not wittingly accept of gifts unless the heart go with them. Should some dear woman whose delight in him is dead, deceiving him through mistaken kindness of heart or a false sense of duty, kiss him with averted soul, leave her person to his pleasure and herself free, she will be but putting herself in the way of his resentment rather than of his gratitude. For to the new man's mind caresses should never be other than the outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual emotion; and he is loath to lend himself to an embrace that is a lie.

Although knowing full well that women are moved through the imagination, that their "affairs" are almost invariably affaires du coeur—for this particular man—and not as very frequently with men, affaires du corps—for woman in general—the new man none the less naturally makes love to the soul of his mate, seeks to be the husband of her heart, saying in the fine words of Stephen Phillips, "I love thee then Not only for thy body packed with all the sweet of all this world, . . . but Because Infinity upon thee broods; And thou art full of whispers and of shadows." How beautiful that "but" is, how beautiful, how new! And having thus sought first that kingdom of heaven, a woman's heart, all the things which in love a man may have need of are abundantly added unto him.

His it is to remove the stigma in this once consummate summing-up of his kind made by Mademoiselle de Maupin: "They are not monsters, if you will, but something, on my word, that is much worse! They are capital fellows of very jovial disposition, who eat and drink well, will do all kinds of services, are good painters and musicians, and are suitable for a thousand things, with, however, the single exception of that one for which they were created, namely, to be the male of the animal called woman, with which they have not the slightest affinity, physical or moral."

In the new man woman for the first time finds moral and physical affinity, and a freedom from a bondage in which ten thousand hearts have abominably broken. In this freedom will bloom in its full beauty the flower of new womanhood. Harry Cowell.

The Saunterer

Enemies Bury the Hatchet

How interesting and refreshing it is to observe the progress of those influences that are softening the asperities of the past, and uniting in the closest bonds of friendship men who but a short time ago were bitter and seemingly implacable foes! There was a time when California was preeminently the land of the "knocker," and envy challenged success on all sides. But there has been a change of sentiment, and recognition of the value of cooperation is now becoming widespread. The metamorphosis is most noticeable in political circles, and especially in the United Republican League, where the spirit of camaraderie is crystallized. All the conflicting elements of the Republican party have been harmonized in this organization. So thoroughly has the entente cordiale been restored that Mr. W. F. Herrin, Mr. J. D. Spreckels, Mr. M. H. de Young and Mr. Abe Ruef are all cooperating with a view of handling the Republican machine in the next municipal election. The foes of yesteryear are the cronies of today. There is no Pylades and Orestes bond between Mr. De Young and Mr. Herrin, but they have sequestered the hatchet. As for De Young and Spreckels, they are almost as sympathetic toward each other as were Nisus and Euryalus. And the wily Mr. Ruef with the Schmitz card up his sleeve is extending the glad hand all round.

The De Young-Spreckels Feud

De Young and Spreckels have worked in harmony ever since they united to beat Colonel Dan Burns. It was a combination that occasioned a deal of surprise because it was believed that a deadly feud existed between the De Young and Spreckels families. People recalled the Chronicle's attacks on Claus Spreckels, and they were incredulous. But the differences of the buried past were forgotten. There is no longer any ill feeling between the two families. Not only have John D. Spreckels and M. H. de Young become political friends, but their families are now united by social ties, and at the Mi-Careme ball given last week at the J. D. Spreckels mansion, Miss Helen de Young was one of the most picturesque and charming of the guests.

His Fine Italian Hand

To Mr. Abe Ruef is due much of the credit for having harmonized the conflicting factions in the Republican party. His purpose is, of course, to secure for his pliable protegee, Eugene Schmitz, the Republican nomination for Mayor. He wants the support of the Chronicle and the Call, and at present both these papers are friendly to the Schmitz administration. Both papers favored the anti-injunction bill which Ruef lobbied through the Legislature, it being understood that Schmitz would do the right thing with the patronage at his disposal in the event of his being permitted to remove everybody that opposed his political policy. Ruef has been nursing the Call's friendship ever since the sensational exposure by that paper of the looting of an estate which had been handled by Public Administrator Drinkhouse, for whom Ruef was acting as attorney. But it is only lately that he succeeded in enlisting the Chronicle's cooperation, for it was against the protest of that paper that the Mayor signed the Ingleside opening measure. It was a bit significant that the Citizens' Committee appointed by the Mayor selected Mr. de Young as its executive officer. No better choice could have been made, however, and I am glad that petty social jealousies and political animosities failed to operate against the selection of a man so preeminently qualified for the performance of the duties in connection with the reception and entertainment of Mr. Roosevelt.

Beloved by Spring Valley

To Mr. Ruef is due the credit for having won for his man Schmitz the support of the two Republican dailies and also of Mr. Herrin, who is generally recognized as the most important factor in Republican politics. But Mr. Herrin has never viewed with distrust the official conduct of Mr. Schmitz. It was Mayor Schmitz who introduced, immediately after he was inducted into office, the water ordinance under which the revenue of the Spring Valley Water Company grew apace. Last month the Supervisors made a seven per cent reduction in the existing rates as established by the Schmitz order, and the Mayor said not a word. The fact is that the Mayor doesn't know anything about the water question and I shouldn't be surprised to learn that the data upon which his rate-order was formulated came from the office of the Spring Valley Water Company. Mr. Charles Webb Howard is a very courteous gentleman, and I haven't the slightest doubt that Mr. Abe Ruef could arrange a meeting between the water magnate and the Mayor at a time when the latter was eager for enlightenment on the water question. Indeed so courteous is Mr. Howard that he wouldn't mind having an ordinance drawn up for an over-worked city official, just to save him the trouble, as it were. But the dailies that were once so skeptical on the subject of water orders refrained from criticism of the Schmitz measure which betokens the great generosity of that high-minded official. Their forbearance is due to the simple circumstance that they are all doing politics, and that Mr. Schmitz figures as a means to an end. In other words the Mayor is temporarily above newspaper criticism. He could raise both water and gas rates again, give away a few franchises, license faro-playing, and make this a wide-open town without running the risk of being censured by the press. Was there ever a Mayor who enjoyed such a soft snap? How fortunate that Mr. Schmitz isn't a boodler, and that Mr. Ruef is a conscientious, virtuous member of the legal profession! What dreadful things they would be suspected of if their reputation for probity and all the virtues were not so well established!

Legislation Against Competition

Not only did Mayor Schmitz escape criticism on the subject of the water rate-ordinance which he fathered, but also in the matter of the legislation relating to gas rates. No greater outrage was ever perpetrated, in the whole history of municipal misgovernment, than that of the Supervisors when they fixed the maximum rate which the lighting companies are permitted to charge at one dollar and twenty cents per thousand feet. The testimony taken by them when investigating the subject of rates was to the effect that the cost of manufacturing gas and supplying it in this city is seventy-five cents a thousand feet. All that is received over that amount is profit. Claus Spreckels admits that it costs him seventy-five cents to manufacture and supply gas, and the Equitable Company has never wanted more than one dollar for its gas, but the old companies asked that the rate be fixed at one dollar and twenty cents to enable them to meet competition, and the Supervisors kindly granted them the privilege of cinching the rate-payers in those districts where they have a monopoly so that they may sell gas at a loss wherever they are fighting competitors. In other words this glorious administration of the city government is kindly helping out the old gas monopoly which for so many years fattened off the gas consumers by charging exorbitant rates. And as a consequence people who are so unfortunate as to live in districts where there is no competition are compelled to pay exorbitant rates for gas so that the old companies may be enabled to battle against competition by selling gas at less than cost wherever the mains of their competitors have been laid. Did anybody ever hear of anything more extraordinary in statesmanship?

Schmitz Out-Gunsts Mose

Mose Gunst must take a back seat. Some years ago Mose copyrighted the expression, "I am glad I have came," and he has been duly credited with authorship of the famous utterance so often that one can no longer hear it quoted without thinking of him. But a man far more distinguished than our opulent cigar merchant took occasion the other day to assert his contempt for the rules of syntax in a manner more conspicuous than that in which Mr. Gunst achieved distinction. I refer to our bewhiskered Mayor. Since his elevation to public office Mr. Schmitz has demonstrated that he can ply his tongue as vigorously as his bow though not less dexterously, and that the music of his chin is as pleasing to his ear as is that of his fiddle. He was selected last Friday, by the members of the Mascagni orchestra, to present the Maestro with a gold watch, and the little ceremony took place on the stage of the Alhambra theatre in the presence of a few thousand people. The Mayor had evidently prepared a speech for the occasion which was probably quite a gem of oratory, but unfortunately his memory failed him, and he floundered pathetically. The climax was reached when he solemnly declared that Mr. Mascagni was "one of the greatest composers the world has ever saw." The audience tittered, but fortunately Mr. Mascagni doesn't understand a word of English.

The Huntingtons, Too

At the Spreckels Mi-Careme ball last week the Willard Huntingtons and Mrs. Jack Spreckels were the only representatives of the Huntington clan present. The H. E. Huntingtons accentuated their absence by giving a domino ball the same evening, and by that means diverting about seventy of the younger set from the more pretentious Spreckels affair. It is interesting to note the evidences of dissension in the families of our plutocrats. There is friction in the Huntington clan as well as in that of the Spreckels's.

The Spreckels' Ball

The Spreckels Mi-Careme ball has been voted the most successful private bal masque ever given in this city. It was gay, and though joy was unconfined the revels never threatened to reach the limit as they did on the occasion of the Hager Yellow Kid party. To give a masquerade ball, and encourage the gayety to its proper height, yet keeping it within its bounds, is a feat that few hosts know how to accomplish. The injury to her ankle which Miss Grace Spreckels sustained the day before in an automobile accident almost kept her away, but with the aid of a cane she appeared on the scene. Of course the event of the evening was the appearance of Miss Ethyl Hager, without whom no masquerade ball can be a success these days. And be it said that she came up to expectations. Her lighthouse on wheels was realistic but I preferred Miss Hager when she emerged therefrom scantily clad in a ravishing red bathing suit that revealed all the curves of her ample form. One of the loveliest women at the ball was Mrs. Latham McMullin in her Directoire costume, and quite the most daintily pretty was Mrs. Jack Spreckels, who stood the severe test of a Sis Hopkins make-up. Her soft brown hair was in two tight pigtails, and her gingham apron was uncompromisingly ugly. Mrs. Mabel Craft-Deering was a striking figure in a red costume with a short skirt, red gloves, red shoes and a big red picture hat. Since her marriage Mrs. Deering has been devoting a lot of time to social affairs, but she is not neglecting her literary work. Miss Helen de Young was very attractive in the costume of a Russian peasant. An amusing conceit was the bank with Frank Owen behind the cashier's window taking in everything that came his way.

An Atherton Bon Mot

The bon mots of Mrs. Gertrude Atherton are almost as famous as her books. One of the most recent is reported to me from New York on the occasion of a dinner recently given in her honor. The guests talked literature from fish to nuts, as they usually do when a literary lion is on the scene, and of course many familiar platitudes were rehashed. They wandered from Ruskin to Churchill, and then down into the realms of latest fiction, when one woman began to laud the famous "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch." "Almost a classic," said one woman. "But who is 'Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch,' my dear?" asked a deaf elderly lady, addressing Mrs. Atherton. "Haven't you heard of her?" said Mrs. Atherton, "why, Mrs. Wiggs is the wife of David Harum." Mrs. Atherton is much sought after in Eastern society these days. She is going to Canada soon, and she expects to be in London for the May season.

The Poetess of Passion

Great preparations are being made in women's club circles for the lionizing of Ella Wheeler Wilcox, the expoetess of passion. I hear that Mr. Wilcox is coming, too, and my curiosity concerning the husband of his wife is much greater than that inspired by the lady herself. Mrs. Wilcox wrote some very passionate verses before her marriage, but since then she has done nothing but grind out wearisome platitudes for the delectation of the feeble-minded readers of certain newspapers. If the drugging of her muse was due to an overdose of matrimony I should advise her to get a divorce for the sake of literature. Personally Mrs. Wilcox is a woman of gracious presence, great charm of manner and beauty of carriage, and she is very happily married. She wears a topaz ring on one thumb, and that is probably her only eccentricity. These facts may be of interest to those readers of the Examiner who are accustomed to overlook the Ella Wheeler educational column. Mrs. Wilcox is having quite a triumphal swing round the circle for she is greatly admired in the provinces.

Ella and Gertrude Won't Meet

It is a pity that Mrs. Wilcox did not come this way during Gertrude Atherton's visit. The sparring match of wits between the two authors amused newspaper readers on both sides of the continent some years ago. The trouble was all over their hair, both being blondes. Ella referred to Gertrude as "bleached" and Gertrude retaliated by dubbing Ella's locks "mouse-colored" and "ashen." There was a sequel to the war. It happened one day that Mrs. Atherton was in a publisher's office in New York when the office boy announced that Mrs. Wilcox waited without.

"Oh, my, I don't want to meet her," said the Californian author, "do hide me somewhere."

And one of the gentlemen present obligingly shielded her behind his desk, while Mrs. Wilcox concluded her interview with the publisher.

From Quarter Deck to Pulpit

Mrs. R. C. Foute, wife of the popular rector of Grace Episcopal church, is an indefatigable hostess, and during this Lenten season has been giving her best energies to a gathering of earnest workers who meet at her house every Tuesday to sew for charity. It is, perhaps, as a card hostess that Mrs. Foute most shines, and she is extremely fond of this kind of diversion. On one occasion she was taken to task for allowing her guests to play for prizes, it being suggested that such conduct on the part of a clergyman's wife was not proper. Mrs. Foute replied to the faultfinder that she married a navy officer and not a parson and that she had neither ambition nor desire to play the clergyman's wife. The Rev. Mr. Foute was in the navy before he was ordained in the Church, and sometimes to hear him in the pulpit one would think he was still delivering orders from the quarter deck of his ship.

A Card Playing Bishop

Apropos of clergymen and card playing, the Reverend William Hall Moreland, Bishop of Sacramento, is fond of a game of whist and plays it well, too. He tells a little anecdote of how his card playing enabled him to do a little missionary work. He was taking a trip on the cars in the northern part of his diocese when a man asked him to make up a party in a game of cards. He assented with the proviso that money should not be played for and notwithstanding the sensation created in the car by the spectacle of a churchman engaged in the worldly pastime he greatly enjoyed the game. The upshot was that before the party separated one of the card players had arranged with the Bishop to have three children baptized, another took a pew in the Bishop's church and the third engaged him to perform the ceremony at his approaching wedding. "All of which," adds the Bishop with a smile, "would not have occurred had I refused to join them in their game of cards."

Berkeley's Vicious Element

According to Editor Finley of the Daily Californian, the students' paper of the State University, there is an organization in that institution which should be suppressed. Editor Finley ought to know whereof he writes, and he evidently does know for he does not equivocate or mince matters, or hedge in the slightest degree. "We have often wished," he says, "that there might be some way of getting together the worst of the law-breaking, dissipated element in the university and ridding the community of it, and we do not know but that the Theta Nu Epsilon contains the very cream of what we want." It is strange that the faculty of the university have never taken cognizance of a society in the institution which, according to Editor Finley, is composed of a vicious element. He denounces its members as sneak thieves, cheats, gamblers and beats, and he states that they are individuals with an abundant supply of cash but no brains, who rarely pay their bills and who have a good time at the expense of the university. Rather severe strictures, and they should lead to a faculty investigation.

Not Sara But Her Sister

The announcement made by one of the dailies of the engagement of Sara Collier and Reginald Norris was incorrect. Miss Collier is still fancy free though probably she has had more flattering offers than any girl in society. The only engagement in the Collier family is that of Sara's sister Totty and Rex Norris is her fiancee.

The Page-Hoffacker Match

The marriage of Miss Louise Hoffacker and Mr. Charles Page is much talked of in society. The Pages have considerable social prestige, and the bride-to-be is therefore destined to achieve a very good position in the inner circles. The Pages are not wealthy as has been stated, but they are fairly well supplied with this world's goods. Their principal property is a ranch somewhere in the country. They are a very large family and they belong to the conservative fashionable set. They have intermarried with the Maillard, Hellman and Hammond families.

Miss Adams, who has an exhibition of miniatures at the Hopkins exhibition, exhibits a very pretty likeness of Mrs. Henry Crocker, and another of Mrs. Cutter, the mother of Downey Harvey.

The Deviltry of Burgess

So we are to lose another of our literary lights! One by one they are drifting Eastward to the literary capital of the country. The latest to decide upon a change of residence is Gelett Burgess who has surrendered his flat in Vallejo street preparatory to shaking the dust of unappreciative San Francisco from his feet. Mr. Burgess hasn't done anything lately to attract attention to his muse, but no doubt he will be heard from when he gets settled in the big metropolis which, by reason of its great accumulation of publishing houses, newspapers and periodicals, is known as the literary capital. Though Burgess has not made any valuable contributions to literature of late he has managed to get himself talked about, for he is always doing queer things. His favorite bit of deviltry consists in luring uncongenial spirits to his apartments, and watching developments with fiendish glee. Not long ago he arranged a party for Mrs. Isobel Strong, daughter of Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson, and among those invited was Mrs. Strong, widow of Captain Strong, the divorced husband of Isobel. Burgess chortled over the prospect, but he was disappointed for both ladies sent regrets.

Mrs. Pat. Campbell

Society will no doubt rush eagerly in to do the honors for Mrs. Patrick Campbell when she appears at the Columbia shortly, for Mrs. Pat, be it known, is an actress with social prestige and an unsullied 'scutcheon. Since the death of her husband in South Africa she lavishes her affection on a small dog known to fame as "Pinky, Panky, Poo." Mrs. Campbell has for many years been a lioness in London drawing-rooms. Her domestic life has been as irreproachable as that of Mrs. Kendal, and therefore she had the entree to the most conservative circles. Although she has achieved her greatest successes in portraying adventuresses, in real life she is most conventionally respectable. She was Pinero's original Mrs. Tanqueray and is without a rival in portraying unhappy ladies with a dubious past. Though the critics did not enthuse over Mrs. Campbell in New York, the people did, and prices were raised from two to three dollars during her season. Having seen her in one of her plays I am curious to know what impression she will make on local theatregoers, for she is an unusual woman. I never saw a more magnetic one. She is of a rare type of beauty upon whose classic face time has impressed the stamp of intellectuality. It is a face that proves that time does not always mar. Her figure is hopelessly old-fashioned, viewed from the kangaroo straight-front standpoint, but it is sinuous and graceful, a figure on which to hang Grecian draperies. Apparently she does not wear corsets. She is of English-Italian descent, and if she didn't persist in being Mrs. Patrick her friends would call her Beatrice.

His Dread of Accidents

Charles E. Hayes, whose sudden death in the midnight runaway accident in Golden Gate Park completely upset at least four households with consternation and horror, had a singular "hunch" at his elbow all his life to beware of accidents. Whether he got it from gypsy, crystal gazer or his sixth sense, he never explained, but certain it is that he frequently harped on that string, and had the favorite divinations of eminent soothsayers, wizards and seers at his fingers' ends to point his utterance. It was while in one of those moods that he took out the ten thousand dollar accident insurance policy in favor of his fiancee, Mrs. Elizabeth Messer. Hayes and Norman Rideout, son of the Northern California millionaire, were classmates at college and used to match tales anent unerring fate and "name and date written behind the veil." The case was indeed a singular one. Only a few years later young Rideout, while down underground inspecting one of his father's big mines, was suddenly killed by a piece of disjoined rock falling on his head. A moment sooner, the fraction of a second later, and the young man with all his brilliant prospects in life had been safe. And now his college mate, Charley Hayes, with his own big future in life just opening up before him, is carried away as suddenly, and—well, was it "chance"?

Hayes Was a Hustler

Hayes was never a gay fellow in his salad days. He inherited a healthy brain and a fine physique and he had a healthy man's love for good, solid mental effort. He stood well among his fellows, a stimulating lot, for they were all eager to score success in the world. Most of them were studying civil engineering. Storey, who ran the lines for the San Joaquin Valley Railroad and who afterwards moved to the headquarters of the Santa Fe system, was one of them. Young Storey and Hayes went out with a bunch of young colts and began service with the engineering department of the Southern Pacific. Hayes was shrewd enough to see that there was no great prize ahead in that company for a young surveyor, so at the first opportunity he had himself sidetracked into the Pacific Improvement Company. At once he began a special study of its many and varied investments. From that time he began to rise. Run over the important offices he held at the time of his death; that is the best commentary on his success from a business point of view.

With Gold Came Trouble

But the coup that added most to his success was his marriage with Miss Lucy May, daughter of the Oakland capitalist. Prior to that connection he had studied how to make money for others. Now he had an opportunity to swing capital for himself and he did it with gratifying results. As soon as the steadiness of the stream was assured he began to devote himself more to the things of life, that is the kind of life that led his wife to get a divorce on the "ostensible" grounds of desertion.

Fate's Singular Work

Not a handful of the intimate friends of Mrs. Messer and Charley Hayes dreamed that they were engaged. All along the friends of Mrs. Messer have been remarking on her complete change mentally since her daughter's sudden death; on her apparent utter lack of interest in worldly things. With the shock of Hayes's death comes the news that a forlorn little Cupid in trappings of woe has been treading her footsteps. And the rude awakening is emphasized by the fact of the engagement of her only son to the daughter of Judge Dibble. Did ever the shock of a sudden death hereabouts reach so many homes—homes outside that of Hayes's companion, whom the newspapers hunted so assiduously? The shuttlecock of Fate has recently been running some sombre threads through the lives of more families than the Tevises, the Breckenridges and the Fairs. Mrs. Messer's suffering antedates the death of her beloved daughter. Financially she is well provided for. Her father, capitalist Giffin, is still alive notwithstanding the three recent occasions in which the newspapers pronounced him dead. He it was who built the big mansion whose extensive grounds were lately utilized for the flats erected by the Fair estate. He was badly crippled financially in the Bank of California crash but since then he has recouped his fortune. Among his holdings now is the major section of Palomires in Southern California. He has three daughters, besides Mrs. Messer, all well dowered and well married.

Her Story Never Published

Unlike the recent accident all the strange stories that have their being among the drawn-blind resorts bordering the Park do not reach the public ear, by any means. One evening recently a prominent business man was enjoying his punch before the bar preparatory to driving back to the city when suddenly the door leading to a hallway opening on the private rooms was banged open and a white-faced man, well known about town, rushed anxiously up to the proprietor. "Come," he gasped, "come, quick. She's taken poison." The proprietor and the business man followed the excited young man. In one of the private rooms they found a young woman lying prostrate and unconscious on the floor. Her waist was loosened, her hair disheveled and her whole appearance indicated serious conditions ahead. The young man pointed to an empty bottle on the floor. "It's poison," he said, "I saw her swallow it. I've tried to make her eject it; I've tried to wake her up, but she seems to be getting worse."

"Call a doctor," ordered the proprietor.

Pale as the young man had been he visibly became paler. He became ashen.

"But the papers 'll get hold of it," he expostulated, "I'll be lost."

"You'll be lost if you don't," put in the proprietor, "the next thing you'll have to call up will be the morgue wagon."

The young man became frantic and dropping on his knees begged the woman to rouse herself. "Come," put in the proprietor, "call a doctor or I'll call the police. I'm not going to let the girl die in my place if I can help it."

"I'll call a doctor," said the young man, "I've got a friend I can trust."

Then all three men fell to working over the young woman and by the time the doctor arrived she had still enough life in her to answer to his ministrations. They bundled her up in blankets and sent her home with the physician, the young man flatly refusing to have any more to do with her once he saw her breathing safely in the physician's charge. He had frequented the place a good deal and after the doctor and the girl were gone, happy in his unexpected escape, he told the proprietor all about the case. That morning he had revealed to the girl his engagement to a well known belle of the smart set, to whom by the way he has not yet been married. The girl had blanched at the news, but apparently recovered. After some cajolery she asked him to take her driving in the Park that evening. As usual they stopped at the resort. Once she had him in a private room she produced a bottle of poison and gave him the choice of breaking with his affianced or seeing her drop dead from the poison. He thought it was a bluff and refused to break off the wedding. Down went the poison and the liveliest two hours in the life of that young man quickly followed. The business man never told the story to any one near authority because, like the married woman in the Hayes case, he didn't want to get his name in the papers.

Exhibition by Two Charles's

Only two of Charlie Dickman's pictures in the exhibition that opened Wednesday in the Bohemian Club jinks-room are of Californian scenes. The rest are the Brittany pictures that he painted in Monterey from sketches made in France. He shows again his big picture of the fishers in a stormy sea. There is a movement on foot, I hear, to purchase this for the club. Charlie Peters's purchasers, among them Fred Greenwood and Louis Sloss, loaned several pictures to fill out the exhibition. Peters shows his masterpiece, "The Camp by the Cross." By the way he demands five thousand dollars for this; when it was first shown he asked but five hundred dollars for it and found no purchasers. Now he daily refuses two thousand dollars for it. He has fifty of his newest pictures on the way to London, where they will be exhibited in July. Besides he has works being shown in New York, Chicago and Boston.

The Wagner Lecture

Mrs. Charles W. Rhodes's lecture on Wagner on last Wednesday evening awoke in the hearts of her hearers delightful musical memories—memories for the most part of Maurice Grau and the Grand Opera House, but, with a fortunate few, of Bayreuth itself. The not so fortunate many had Bayreuth brought to them steropticon-wise. The value of "views" is that they appeal to sight. The eye brings us into the very presence of the scenes represented. The most perfect description cannot produce so complete an illusion. The visible pictures on the screen, the invisible piano illustrations, and the melodious voice of the lecturer, making music of her thought, blended artistically; and the effect of the whole was at once pleasing and impressive, entertaining and instructive. That Mrs. Rhodes found here an audience on terms of friendly familiarity with the friend of Ludwig II, is due in large measure to the work of Mrs. Mary Fairweather, whose disinterested endeavor to learn and propagate the best that is known and thought in the world is deserving of more than passing mention.

Pauline's Latest Passion

The newspapers that only a few brief days ago had Pauline Astor and Jarlosov Kocian making that divine duet, that silent, vibrant singing of the soul that is sweeter and more moving than all the melodies of all the masters, are now hourly expecting the announcement of the betrothal of the young heiress to Jonel Bratiano, French minister of Roumania. Newspapermen may be innocent of Emerson, but they know that "all the world loves a lover," is tickled to death by a title, adores a dollar, and has pretensions to a passion for art. And so we have accounts by the column of Kubelik and his countess, and of Kocian and his heiress. But a bride in the hand is worth a harem in the Sunday supplement. Next to a divorce, an engagement seems to be the most diverting of news—perhaps because it holds out the hope of a divorce!

The Price of Prominence

Now all lovers hate the world—see a leer in its loving eyes and a sneer in its smiling lips. Instinctively they seek the sweet hospitality of solitude and the congratulations of the great Mother who alone will not misunderstand them. Moreover, the world is too idiotically sane, too foolishly wise for lovers—even those in high life. But publicity is the price of prominence. If Kubelik kisses his countess, or Kocian his Pauline, the smack resounds to the uttermost ends of the earth; the kiss goes hissing hot over the longest leased wire in the world. On the contrary, and by way of compensation, inconspicuous poverty may make love in appropriate privacy. Should a golden country lass by happy chance be kissed comin' thro' the rye, she need not cry because a busy newspaper body goes and tells. For royalty, the President, and other public-property persons, the omnipresent eye of the reporter must be more hateful than that of All-seeing Heaven Itself.

A Pastime of the Plutocrats

Accordingly, the rich have a delightful game—and one reserved for them alone—which may be called Playing at Poverty. They go into the country, God alone knows where—anywhere out of the way of reporters will do—live in tents or uncomfortable cottages, become for the time being hewers of wood and drawers of water, do their own cooking, dishwashing, etc., being moreover insufficiently supplied with money or commodities. There, free of cramping shoes and other joy-killing conventions, they foot the flower-sweet fields, miracles of gold and green in the morning sunshine, flattering themselves the merry while that they are now as near to the heart of Nature as the poet, the peasant, and the lover. On their return to polite society, they seek out their poor relations and friends, boast of bronzed faces and hands wealed by hard work, and expatiate on the blessings of poverty, and tell how they themselves suffer riches for their sins. Playing at Poverty and preaching to the poor is more fun than flirting and ping-pong.

Social Columns that Pay

It has been suggested that certain dailies, to be perfectly fair, should insert stars under the columns devoted to the recital of the doings of the people of the swim. Many of the paragraphs, I am told, are advertisements pure and simple. Sometimes they are paid for with social favors and sometimes with merchandise. I am assured that when a millinery opening is boomed as a social event the writer gets an imported hat, and that one lady engaged in picking up pin money by penning gush paragraphs about our provincial aristocracy is remunerated with free lunches at the fashionable grill which she so frequently mentions. However that may be only a joke suggested by her record as a strategist from a commercial standpoint. Perhaps she is writing under the direction of the business office. Yet there is no reason why she shouldn't turn her commercial opportunities to financial advantage, for being an interloper in journalism she probably has a contempt for the ethics of the profession. It is related that a prominent real estate dealer was approached at the opening of the social season by a gush writer belonging to the swell social push with an offer to boom his debutante daughter for a consideration. The proposition was rejected, and since then the girl's name has been omitted from the society woman's paragraphs, but the copy-reader, who really edits the social column, takes pains to insert it.

Died a Pauper

It has frequently been noted that a strange fatality dealt harshly with most of the people that figured in that cause celebre known as the Sharon case. One of the most conspicuous of them was William M. Neilson, who died on a pauper's bed in the County Hospital a few days ago. Neilson espoused the cause of Sarah Althea even before she went to court. He went into the case to force Senator Sharon to a settlement, and he was the plaintiff's confidential friend and adviser from the beginning. It was believed that he shaped the case and was instrumental in gathering most of the evidence. Neilson was an Australian and his right name was McCann. Sarah Althea still lives. She is a raving maniac and is confined in the Stockton asylum.

Success Has Met Him

Emil Bruguiere will soon go East to attend to the production of one of his operas. He is having better luck lately than when he first began to compose music. His songs were made popular by Mrs. Katharine Fiske, and now one of his operas is really to be produced. Once before he went to New York, with the expectation of seeing "Count Fiddlesticks" put on the stage, but found himself up against disappointment. That was the opera for which Dan O'Connell wrote the libretto and which was based upon the Festetics-Tolna voyage to the South Seas. Mr. Bruguiere wrote the music for Francis Powers' "Mother Earth" that was produced at the Alcazar but failed to make good. His marriage with Vesta Shortridge, by the way, is not to take place until late in the season. Miss Shortridge is convalescing from the illness that kept her in a hospital for some weeks. With a chaperon she has gone to Monterey to pass a month at her fiance's home.

Reminiscences of a Famous Boniface

It is to be hoped that Tony Oakes, before his death, confided to some one who would prize the recipe the secret of his famous preparation of terrapin. It was that delicacy that won name and money for Tony Oakes, in his prime, and the friendship of California's bons viveurs. And it was the advent of the trolley and the demand for nickel drinks and two-bit meals that ruined Oakes when he was at the height of his popularity at Haywards. When Oakes went to Haywards, his capital was a single bottle of liquor, one box of cigars, a guitar, a wife and four little children. Before this he had his little successes, but the flood of '61-'62 swept away the results and left him about where he started when W. C. Ralston became his patron in the late fifties. He had been Mayor of Sonoma, where he was the bon camarade of old General Vallejo, and he had been a notary public. In San Francisco, he was the first terrapin and oyster host, associated with Andy Hepburn. And in San Mateo he had enjoyed the confidence and friendship of the most prominent men of the State. They all patronized his Haywards resort. There seemed no reason why Tony should not get back the fortune he had lost. However, that was before the trolley came. His wife fell ill with brain trouble, and a string of mortgages on the place proved fatal. There was another little venture in Golden Gate that did not turn out well, for the class of patrons that had been willing to pay high for good meals no longer existed in that part of the world. It was another case of Cornelius Stagg and Ingleside after the car line extension.

Strategic Jim Keene

In his fight against President Harriman of the Southern Pacific Company, Jim Keene assumes the role of a public benefactor. He alleges that the Southern Pacific is being managed in the interest of another company, that diversion of its earnings is being made for the purpose of building up the Central Pacific Railroad, from which the Union Pacific will derive a great advantage. He contends that the Union Pacific's control of the Southern Pacific is in itself illegal. The answer to Mr. Keene's charges is that the traffic is so great over both the Southern Pacific and the Central Pacific that neither road is able to handle it. Mr. Keene's purpose is to compel Mr. Harriman to help out a pool in Southern Pacific stock, by paying dividends. Mr. Harriman prefers to put the dividends in improvements with a view of meeting the growth of traffic. This State is interested in seeing him carry out his policy. Mr. Keene is a speculator pure and simple, and he doesn't worry himself about the illegality of railroad deals. Indeed, men of the Keene type never concern themselves much about the right and wrong of financial transactions. They consider it perfectly fair to fleece a man by manipulating the stock market. There isn't a vast difference between their methods and those of the highwayman, but the latter takes a few chances. I was told the other day of a pool made in mining stock in this city, many years ago, in which Mr. Keene was interested. The pool collapsed and Keene made about three millions, after which he went East. Those that were associated with him in the pool say that after the collapse they learned that Keene had been selling them his stock.

Davis in Melodrama

Edwards Davis, the sensational preacher, who achieved notoriety some years ago, by giving an exhibition of dancing in the pulpit of the Christian church of Oakland, is now the leading man in a thrilling melodrama entitled "Over Niagara Falls," which was produced in Williamsburg last week. When Davis did his terpsichorean pulpit stunt, on a Sunday evening, attired in claw-hammer and white waistcoat, I suggested that he should go into vaudeville, and though he didn't exactly follow my advice it is evident that he had a yearning for the footlights. In "Over Niagara Falls" he is better able to point a moral and adorn a tale than he was when dancing in an Oakland pulpit. He now can give a practical demonstration of how virtue is its own reward and vice is punished. He says that acting beats preaching, and that he likes the engagement because his wife is in the company and he makes love to her in every performance. Acton Davies of the Sun, writing of the ex-preacher, says: "He is in Williamsburg on his way, no doubt, to Broadway. Like that other ambitious Californian, Nance O'Neil, whom Charles Frohman recently engaged for Lady Macbeth, in his forthcoming revival of Shakespeare, he may have to go round the world from Williamsburg to reach Broadway, for when Miss O'Neil was leading woman of the Murray Hill theatre in this city, although but a few blocks from the gay Rialto, she was miles away from Broadway in point of reputation."

Mrs. Robinson Reilly

One of the few women who are wearing earrings, in response to fashion's latest fancy, is Mrs. Robinson Reilly. They are becoming to her, too. Mrs. Reilly wears black a great deal, to which sombre shade she was always partial. She is stouter than she was before her little daughter's birth and looks more like her sister, Mrs. Osgood Hooker. She is wholly domesticated now and changed in many ways since her spinster days. When her baby was christened in the Cathedral about a fortnight ago Mrs. Downey Harvey was one of the godmothers. Mrs. Harvey is in a way related to the child, though in a roundabout route, as her half-brother, Andrew Martin, was Mrs. Reilly's first husband.

The Prosecution of Wright

The case of Mr. Whitaker Wright of the London & Globe Company and formerly of this city bids fair to prove decidedly embarrassing to high government officials in London before the prosecution is ended. Mr. Wright had a very shady reputation in this State years ago, the testimony of his former attorney to the contrary notwithstanding, and his financial operations in London were very suspicious. When he was arrested on his arrival in New York, he protested that there must have been some mistake, as the whole matter had been threshed out in the House of Commons. The fact is that the law officers of the Government had declined to prosecute, but that was because Lord Dufferin was involved in the scandal. The public was not satisfied. Hints had been dropped that certain persons of even higher rank and social importance than Lord Dufferin were mixed up in the affairs of the company, and it was evident that powerful influences had been brought to bear to hush the matter up. But subsequently a creditor of the company applied to the courts for an order directing the official receiver to prosecute Whitaker Wright, and in granting it Mr. Justice Buckley said that notwithstanding the refusal of the first law officer of the Crown to put the public prosecutor in motion, he was prepared to accept the responsibility of determining the question before him. Upon the facts as presented he believed that a crime had been committed, and therefore he directed that a criminal prosecution be started. Evidently the courts in England are not the ministers of the Crown.

"It's a sad spring that can't put a dollar in my pocket," said the funny writer.

And then he wrote this:

" 'My, but you're in clover,' said the dog, addressing the cow over the fence."

The Literary Harrisons

Mary Crocker-Harrison has adopted the "literary" pose and in view of the fact that she has a mother-in-law who writes, and a husband who is trying to write, it is not altogether surprising. But her friends who knew her before she was able to define the difference between "situation" and "setting" find it rather hard to adjust themselves to her new mental bias. Young Mrs. Harrison has no ambition to write but she has very decided opinions on literary values and the scoffers would be amused to see the deference with which her criticisms are received by most of the women. No one dares to pass judgment on a new book when Mrs. Harrison is around until her pulse has been taken on the matter. They wait until she gives a cue and then follow her lead with painstaking humility. One of the young matrons in the smart set who is always lamenting the fact that she was not born "poor and literary" thought to flatter Mr. Harrison the other day by telling him that she has read every story that his mother had published. "Indeed?" answered Sonny, "I can't say positively I've done as much myself."

Hot Times in Marin

San Rafael is writhing in the throes of a political spasm caused by the relative cheapness of whisky, the costliness of water and the building of a new town hall. Every block in that festive little burgh boasts its own vociferous candidate for town trustee, and what with extemporaneous stump speeches on train and boat and a peculiarly malevolent brand of campaign cigars, the commuter's lot is not a happy one. The clan of the "unco' guid," marshaled by Charles C. Stevenson Jr., the stormy petrel of Marin politics, and chaperoned by Dr. Arthur Crosby, the local Parkhurst, have unleashed a trio whose war cry is: "High License, and down with automobiling!" The gentlemen who have kindly consented to act as sacrificial victims on this ticket at the town election on April eleventh are Major Charles Christensen, well known in insurance circles, George Page and Robert J. Trumbull.

Personnel of the Candidates

Mr. Trumbull is the only simon pure, dyed-in-the-wool prohibitionist in the bunch and he also enjoys the distinction of being the only candidate out of fourteen who wears a wig. No barbers are included in his large personal following. Trumbull is classified as a low-water man, while Page is high water and Christensen is non-committal. Then there is David Duncan, another insurance man running on a low license ticket, and "Billy" Dreypolcher of the Examiner, on a high-ball ticket; whisky and high water. Smith, a local butcher, stands for low water, with whisky on the side, and Mr. Worden, a capitalist, politically speaking "takes whisky in his'n." A second Mr. Duncan, R. Lee by name, is running on general principles as an all-round good fellow and Fred Wright, a local hackman, is whooping it up for Wright, no automobiles and no Reform. Nearly all the candidates are in favor of low license; but as they agree on nothing else under heaven and as each packs an ax on his daily scoot to the city and wields it lustily whenever another candidate's name is mentioned, the shrieks of the victims drown the roar of the train.

Upper Thirteen to Lose a Prop

There is wailing and gnashing of teeth among the Uppers of the Upper Thirteen of San Rafael. It is rumored that the A. W. Fosters intend to dispose of "Red Gables," their San Rafael home, and move to town. Mrs. Foster has proved a fairy godmother to more than one member of the Upper Thirteen, for she is a gracious woman and likes to come to the relief of those suffering from social eclipse. The security of her social position is such that she is quite indifferent to the restrictions which sometimes govern and she has ventured so far as to invite to her functions in town some of the villagers who live within the shadow of "Red Gables." Of course they are highly respectable even to the point of stupidity but they are not the sort of people one knows if one is really in the swim. Mrs. Foster has been loyal to them, and whenever she gives a function the Upper Thirteen dons its shirt-waists and comes across the bay to be lorgnetted in amazement by the local dames of just a bit higher social degree.

Their Red Letter Day

When Miss Anna Foster made her debut at Century hall the rooms were crowded with many remarkable people bearing the unmistakable stamp of what Miss Hager, after a summer in San Rafael, dubbed the "small suburban snob." In other words the Upper Thirteen were there in all their glory, and they were so unusual as to be interesting to the urbanites. It is said that when the Fosters take up their permanent residence in their home in Jones street between Sacramento and Clay some charming entertainments will be given.

When the Williams Girls Were Married

By the way there threatens to be a general exodus from San Rafael. Among others Mr. and Mrs. Lilley are contemplating a move. They are making plans to shift their residence to Ross to be near the home of Mrs. Lilley's cousin, Mrs. Al Dibblee. Their going, however, depends entirely on the sale of the old Neil place where they now reside with that charming old lady, Mrs. Neil. But their going will not occasion any appreciable flutter in the ranks of the aristocratic Upper Thirteen. Mrs. Lilley was one of the Williams girls, who, though they always treated the village neighbors with courtesy, never encouraged cordial relations. Their only intimates were Mrs. Arthur Sewell who was Miss Josepha Crosby, and her sister, Louise, and even they received no cards when Walter Hobart espoused Hannah Williams with spectacular simplicity. The oversight caused the Upper Thirteen to sit up and take notice. They felt sure that Miss Juliette Williams would prove herself a more gracious bride when she went to the altar, but much to their amazement a solitary inhabitant of San Rafael was invited to the function, and that one was a meek little teacher in a private kindergarten.

To Marry in New York

Mrs. W. L. Oge, accompanied by Miss Marie, will soon cross to New York where the wedding of Miss Oge and Truxtun Beale will take place, instead of in San Francisco as was expected. Mr. and Mrs. Oge had planned a charming though quite small post-Lenten wedding, but very urgent business (affaires diplomatique, it is whispered) demanded Mr. Beale's presence in Washington and New York. He was extremely anxious to take his bride with him and pleaded hard, but Mrs. Oge, remembering the Apostolic Chase, her grandfather, could not reconcile herself to a Lenten wedding. When Mr. Beale reached Washington he found that the Administration looked to him for help in the Turkish affair, and that that would necessitate his going abroad immediately. Thus it seems that society is to be deprived of the pleasure of entertaining the charming Miss Oge as Mrs. Beale.

He Is a Good Business Man

Conried, the successor of Grau, is very unlike the magnificent Maurice in physique. He is small of stature and of slender build. But he has a big financial head. A San Franciscan who met him in New York tells me an instance of the Conried business sagacity that is not generally known. In one of his trips abroad to engage talent for his New York theatre Conried noticed that while a few of the first-class passengers brought their lounging chairs with them there were a good many others who had none, and felt the need. It occurred to him that here was a chance for some one to fill a long-felt want. He therefore made a contract with all the German steamship lines to be the exclusive furnisher of lounging chairs to their passengers. By this he adds much to his income, for there are many German liners and many first-class passengers who are delighted to pay for the privilege of a lounging chair during the voyage. When Conried first came to New York, by the way, he knew not one word of English. He was engaged to act in German plays such as "The Robbers" and other classics. In time he came to be stage manager of the theatre. Then he married for love a wealthy German girl. In the course of his nineteen years' residence in the metropolis he became sole manager of the Irving Place theatre, and now he has attained the eminence of impresario of the Metropolitan.

There was a pretty wedding at the Presidio last Saturday afternoon. The bride was Miss Elizabeth Bacon Wright, the groom Mr. Arthur R. Rule of Pittsburg, Pa. The ceremony which was performed by Army Chaplain Hunter of the Seventh Infantry, took place at the quarters of Captain W. K. Wright, the bride's step-father. The quarters were lavishly dressed with flowers appropriate to the occasion. Only a few relatives were present at the ceremony, but later everybody at the Post called to offer congratulations and at the same time express regret at the loss of the bride, who is a great favorite with them all. Her future home will be in Pittsburg.

The Staff at Department Headquarters gave a dinner at the Bohemian Club on Monday evening last in honor of General R. P. Hughes, U. S. A. It was a farewell to that distinguished officer, who will be relieved from his command of the Department of California by General Arthur McArthur next week.

Mascagni Was Perplexed

Though Pietro Mascagni was sorely oppressed with grievances against America when he arrived in this city, so ardent was the hospitality of the people of San Francisco and so profitable did their high appreciation of him prove that he fairly bubbled over with gratitude. Never was a man of genius more enthusiastically lionized by the hero-worshipers of this big-hearted community. They appeared to be anxious to prove that there was at least one city in this commercial country that appreciates art. It was a fine experience for the stalwart young Italian composer, and as he is to return to Italy with his pockets bulging with the receipts of his musical endeavors in San Francisco, and with the bravos and other glad-notes of approval in his ears, he is undoubtedly sincere in his resolve to return. But although Mascagni was glad to find so much musical enthusiasm in this town, there were many things that perplexed him, and he confessed on the quiet that he didn't quite understand how people that were apparently so musical were incapable of discriminating in some things. He was especially amazed over their tolerance and approval of voices that almost caused him to drop his baton and run. Moreover some of the musical criticisms that were translated for him were considered highly humorous.

The Composer's Strenuous Wife

Mrs. Mascagni furnished a good deal of amusement during her brief sojourn here. She never missed an opportunity to give public demonstration of the fact that the great composer was her personal property. She was always striving to make his triumphs family affairs, and it was refreshing to observe how graciously he acquiesced in her whims. Indeed he permitted her to boss the job at all times. It is related that at one of the concerts a violinist dropped his eye-glasses and they were shattered on the floor. As he could not read the music he was obliged to quit playing. Mrs. Mascagni noted the incident, and when the piece was over she complained of the failure of the violinist to play. It was explained that the loss of the eye-glasses made it impossible for him to play. "Then," said she, "he surely cannot expect to be paid!"

One of the Holluschickie Club members, Professor Setchell of Berkeley, will leave for Europe in May, to be gone a year. The club has a new president, Hiland L. Baggerly, and has a new club-house, the old E. J. Baldwin house in California street.

Smashing Her Alma Mater

Eleanor Gates, author of "The Biography of a Prairie Girl," said in an interview the other day that although she attended both Stanford and Berkeley universities she had to go into journalism to learn English. Rather a hard smash at our two big institutions of learning. Eleanor Gates did not distinguish herself for brilliant work at Berkeley but her husband, Mr. Tully, did. He has lately had a successful play produced in the East. He wrote farces for amateur production at college and acted in them. He wooed and won Miss Gates at Berkeley.

She Prefers the Horse

It was feared at first that Mrs. Gus Taylor was seriously injured in the deplorable accident that made the smart set hold its breath with both hands. But she was merely badly shaken up and bruised. Her family were frantic when they heard of the accident and the news of it was kept from her invalid mother until it was certain that no vital injuries had been received. Although the Sunday papers have listed Mrs. Taylor among the society chauffeurs her automobile has existed only in the space-writer's imagination. She has never owned one, and in fact is an ardent champion of the horse.

Costly Hosiery and Gifts

Edith McBean's trousseau had been long ready, and the repeated changes in the wedding date caused it to swell to much larger proportions than when first planned. Some of the silk stockings included in the trousseau were forty dollars a pair and correspondingly stunning. Her wedding gifts were beautiful, mostly silver as that ware is the popular thing to give brides nowadays. The bridegroom's mother gave a silver tea-set, and the bride's mother a silver dinner set. Mr. McBean's gift was the complete furnishing of the young people's residence. During the week Miss McBean gave a small tea to which she invited her friends for the purpose of exhibiting her wedding presents which were meritorious.

The Gossip on Engagements

The gossips of society have found the McBean-Kierstedt engagement a fruitful theme for discussion. An engagement is always a stimulus to frothy conversation in social circles, because it presents a large variety of questions which the gossips are always anxious to settle. Usually they question either the social or financial standing of one of the principals, and occasionally they want to know whether the social prestige of the man is sufficient to compel recognition of his bride. They are always deeply concerned about those little matters, and they invariably accept as true any story they hear about the past of either party. In the case of Edith McBean they were in doubt as to whether Dr. Kierstedt had robust lungs, and they were curious to know whether the young couple were to be expected to get along on the army doctor's little old one-thirty per. Evidently they haven't confidence in Dr. Kierstedt's medical lore for they don't credit him with knowing whether he is physically sound, and as for the financial question ,well, Miss McBean has money enough for two.

I hear that Mrs. Hobart is very much averse to her husband's taking over his stable to England but Walter is bent on showing off his ponies. Mrs. Hobart had her way about taking along the little girls and he will undoubtedly have his about the horses. "It wouldn't be a happy family party without the ponies," Mr. Hobart remarked the other day.

Mr. and Mrs. Asa R. Wells are at Byron Springs. Others at the hotel are Captain and Mrs. F. W. Wise of Victoria, B. C., Mr. B. R. Eberard of Fresno, Mr. and Mrs. R. R. Veale of Martinez and Mr. and Mrs. Adolph Hromada.

The Landers family has been thrown into mourning by the death of a relative and Miss Pearl Landers will be forced to forego the after Lenten gayeties. She may have the consolation, however, of knowing that her light mourning is very becoming.

Raphael Weill Was Host

The menu cards at the luncheon Mr. Weill gave to Miss Ida Conquest at the Bohemian Club last Friday were charming souvenirs and rather more original than any usually seen at club feasts. They were painted in water-colors by an artist who does not object to occasional pot-boiling of this nature. The sign showed the owl of Bohemia holding in his talons ribbons from which depended masks, and a beautiful miniature of the guest of honor as a finish. A bit of tulle, instead of the conventional cord or ribbon, completed the card. The luncheon was not a stiff affair but the guests were all genial and congenial. Every one was called upon for a speech, impromptu, and responded with very happy sentiments. The brightest speech of all was made by Mrs. Frank Deering.

THE BEST IS CHEAPEST.

There is an old story that tells how a spice merchant of Constantinople took a fine piece of cloth to a tailor.

"Tell me," he said, "if there is enough cloth here to make a tunic."

"There is plenty," answered the tailor, "and what did you give for the cloth?'

"Five sequins, and not at all dear, considering the quality."

"I am but a beginner in trade," said the tailor at length, "and money is an object with me. Give me two sequins, and I will show you how to save three in this affair."

The money was produced and paid.

"It is well," said the tailor, "I am a person of my word. This cloth has cost five sequins, and I have promised to save you three. Take it to some other tailor, and may Allah direct you to one of more experience, for I have never made such a costume as you wish. If I attempt it, it will be the last of your cloth."

How many San Francisco tailors or modistes would be as frank as this old Turk? Would not the majority take both your cloth and your money, and say nothing about their inability to make a proper garment? The only way to be sure of getting a well-fitting gown or coat is to go to a tailor who makes a specialty of turning out absolutely perfect fitting garments—such a one, for instance, as Baron, 738 Market street, whose reputation in sartorial matters is supreme.

Penitence and Prayer

Time and place, the Avenue after afternoon service, Lent, 1903.

Miss Prude: How ugly Miss Brown looks with that hat.

Miss Brown: Did you see that diamond ring Mrs. Millions wore? She took her glove off purposely to show it, I'm sure.

Miss Blue: That Saylor girl couldn't kneel—her gown was too tight. I nearly laughed out loud in the prayer.

Mrs. Swell: Disgusting how those common people insist on crowding to church—it should be reserved for us during Lent, at least.

Miss Pray: I was at early communion—had to go at that hour because I had a luncheon on at the Grill later.

Mrs. Green: I'm going to a dinner now at Mrs. Smartem's—am afraid I'll not have time to dress, but I couldn't leave before the benediction because our pew is right in front.

Miss Black: I don't care much for Mr. Breedem lately. His marriage spoiled him. Think I'll change and go to the Mission. There's always the chance of an unmarried curate there.

Miss Lee: Thank goodness, Lent will soon be over. Mamma insists on giving us eggs and I hate fasts.

Mrs. Scrimp (sotto voce): Gives 'em eggs to save money for summer suits, I guess.

Miss Flyrte: I don't think I'll attend service any more in the aft. No men there—dull.

Miss Gossip: Were you at the Mi-Careme dance? I had a fine time but it was shocking the way they acted. Some went to early communion after—disgusting hypocrisy!

At Mrs. Modern's, later.

Mrs. Modern: The bride was at church.

Lily Modern: What did she have on?

Jennie Modern: Who else was there?

Tiny Modern: Did you hear any news?

Grandmamma: In my day, a return from church brought the questions, from one deprived of the service, of "What was the text?" or "Was it a good sermon?"

The Moderns: Oh, nobody listens to the sermon, grandma! —The Sexton.

"Anything new?" asked the reporter, addressing the side-show spieler.

"Yes," was the reply, "the fat lady has raised a new chin."

The Joy of Living

Since Prosperity Struck San Francisco.

Lady applicant at Hightonia Apartments: So you won't take us, then?

Landlady: Not unless you kill off your children.

L. A.: Why, President Roosevelt says it's wicked to marry and have no children. We've only three, and they're very quiet.

Landlady: Can't help it. The rule 's no flat or else no children. If the President himself applied I'd be compelled to turn him down. Call again, when you can conform with the rules. Good-day. —The Bellboy.

THE BERLITZ SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES.

There has been for some time considerable interest shown in commercial circles for an improvement in practical education, especially in modern languages. The strongest obstacle in the way was the old-fashioned, obsolete system of teaching, slow and tiresome, which did not give satisfaction. It is quite different now since the discovery of new oral methods with which any foreign language can be mastered in a few months without drudgery or fatigue. Such a practical result is due to the unceasing efforts of the Berlitz Schools of Languages, which can now see the triumph of their principles officially acknowledged by two gold medals at the Paris Exposition of 1900, and the CROSS OF THE LEGION D'HONNEUR. No wonder that the Berlitz method should outgrow all others, the reason of its success lying in its simplicity and its logical development. In one word it is a common sense method, and the one we have been wanting for years.

Sine Qua Non

You may prate of the beauty of woman—her air,
Beaux yeux, regal carriage, complexion so fair!
But the undisguised, incontrovertible fact
That outweighs them all is the attribute—tact.

YOUNG MEN TO THE FRONT.

Young men are coming to the front in all the activities of commerce, and the old theory that great enterprises should be entrusted only to men of mature years is now tabu. All the large firms in this city are now putting young men to the front. An example is that of George L. Dealey, of the real estate firm of Easton, Eldridge & Co., who was recently appointed to take charge of all the auctions of that concern. He has been with the firm since boyhood, and he has proved himself a most capable and energetic man. His new position entails a great deal of responsibility.

A Simple Recipe

We're the happiest couple that ever existed;

Cause—We dwell in a flat of most tiny dimension.
Effect—There is really not room for contention.

The committee has already received notification from many of the local artists and those in interior towns of their intention to send posters for the exhibit and to compete for this prize.

Liquor Habit Cured in Three Days

No Dangerous Hypodermic Injections==No Blood Poisoning== No Loss of Time From Business

A Positive and Permanent Cure in the Reach of All. Fallacy of Home Treatment Exposed

It Clears the Brain, Strengthens the Nervous System, Restores Nerve Vitality and Gives a Strong and Vigorous Mind, as Well as Restoring the General System to Perfect Health

The moderate drinker belongs to a large class. That class includes persons of all kinds and degrees—of all professions and trades, of all ages and both sexes. It includes those who are poor, where the price of a drink means a meal for his family. It includes those who can easily afford the luxury of several drinks a day. It includes men and women, too, who have from long indulgence in a few drinks a day become slaves to the habit. The moderate drinker daily spends what seems a small amount of money, but in a few months it amounts to several hundred dollars. He feels the need of the stimulant and pays visits to the various saloons as regularly as he attends to the daily routine of his work. He wishes he could quit, but either because he is ashamed to admit that liquor is stronger than his will or because he is too proud to resort to the use of a cure, he continues to yield to his desire and lets his money go over the bar when it should be used to support the family and home. This man loves his family and the respect of his friends and resolves to prove his strength of will, but fails again and again. He is not to blame, and usually receives scant sympathy. Alcoholism is a disease. It is a curable one, but cannot be treated successfully at home, for the reason that each case requires a particular treatment. There is no remedy that can be prepared in a laboratory and sent out broadcast in response to requests by mail. There are as many stages in the disease of alcoholism as there are in typhoid, malaria or yellow fever. It can be cured more readily than these diseases.

We appeal to you, men and women afflicted with the liquor habit. We want you to come and see us. We can cure you of this worst of habits. We can cure the man who goes on periodical drunks, with his nerves and stomach all torn up from the excessive use of stimulants. We guarantee a cure in every case.

We do not administer hypodermic injections. No disease known to medical science is so treated, and the thousands of lives which have been wrecked by the use of hypodermic injections prove their danger.

Patients are not detained from business while undergoing our treatment. They report to us at stated intervals for three days and are their own masters the remainder of the time.

We are especially desirous of patients whom other treatments have failed to cure.

Please read the following indorsements. We have others if you care to see them:

KANSAS CITY (Mo.), February 2, 1903.—To Whom It May Interest: This certifies that Dr. E. A. Hawks has administered his "Three Day Cure" for the liquor habit to a number of men under our care and has been successful in every case. Some of these men had taken other treatments, but all agree that this is superior. We know, from close observation, that the "Cure" is all that he claims for it, as it places a man on his feet and enables him to go to work in three days.

Personally, the Doctor is a gentleman in every respect, and we take pleasure in commending him to the confidence of any who may require such service. Yours truly,

J. M. HANSON, Superintendent.

KANSAS CITY (Mo.), January 22, 1903.—To Whom It May Concern: We have had several men in our employ who have taken the liquor treatment as practiced by Dr. E. A. Hawks and we are more than satisfied. The treatment is something marvelous and does everything claimed for it.

We have found the Doctor to be an elegant gentleman and can be relied upon to do what he claims. He has just finished treating one of our men, Mr. John W. Spears. This man was a "boozer" in the full sense of the word and in our opinion one of the worst cases to be found. He is now cured and under no circumstances could he be persuaded to take another drink.

The Widower

Because it was his business to be on familiar terms with all the sordidness of the city, the Police Reporter fraternized with the Gambler and the Bartender, both of whom were intimately acquainted with it. The Bartender and the Gambler could not be shocked or surprised by anything in this world or the next, but the Police Reporter's efforts to become similarly blase occasionally fell flat. The three would repair to their rooms in a house situated in a neighborhood that is wide awake when the residence district slumbers.

One morning as they trailed through the lower hallway they scented the odor of gas. The Reporter traced it to one of the doors.

"Kit's room," whispered the Bartender. "Has she. Get the landlady."

"Wait; the keys are all the same," said the Reporter. He thrust his own into the lock and threw open the door. All three drew back coughing.

The Gambler recovered first, and, taking a full breath, rushed in, found the stop cock, closed it and opened one of the windows. Then he came out gasping and closed the door.

"Dead and cold," he said grimly. "No use to wake the house."

"Too late for the paper," said the Reporter, but he was rather pale and his voice shook.

"She said she'd do it if he left her, but I didn't think she'd call the bluff. Aint they puzzlers? The more I see of them the less I know. What will we do about it?" asked the Bartender.

"Wait awhile till the air clears," said the Gambler, leaning against the wall. They waited till the silence and the knowledge of what was in the room chilled them.

They entered close together. The Gambler lit the gas and hastily threw the coverings over the form on the bed. He picked up a bit of note paper from the table and handed it to the Reporter.

The young man read it and brushed his eyes—because the light hurt them. "It's to her mother," he announced, "telling her not to—oh, you know; same old story. I have deceived you, gone beyond the pale and don't weep for me, because I am not worth it."

The Gambler shrugged his shoulders and the Bartender was mute.

"Did she tell you about it? No? It's this way. She has parents up in a little country town, and they don't know what she is—or was. She concocted a most elaborate tale about herself being married and happy. She laughed when she told me—a laugh that I didn't like to hear. Whenever that —— beat her harder than usual she would amuse herself by writing a long letter to her mother telling and re-telling what a saint among men this faked husband of hers was. Crazy notion, but there was a little sense in it. Now it's going to be hell for those poor old innocents if—"

He drew a match from his vest pocket and quietly ignited the note and dropped it into the grate where it flickered a moment and burned to ashes.

"Accidental death," he explained. "I know the Coroner's Office." The other two nodded acquiescence.

"Can't you fix up some tale for the old folks?" inquired the Bartender. "They ought to be let down easy." "Sure," agreed the Gambler.

"I was thinking of that," said the Reporter. "It's this way. They'll have to be sent for. I know the address. And the broken-hearted husband will have to be on deck."

The other two looked puzzled. The Reporter became almost snappish with impatience.

"Oh, can't you catch on?" he exclaimed. "One of you will have to be the victim."

"Bright boy," said the Gambler, looking admiration out of his small eyes. The idea appealed to something in his makeup and his stolid face for once lit up with interest.

"That's all very well," said the Bartender, doubtfully. "But which one of us?"

No one spoke for a painful interval. The Gambler drew a pack of cards and began to shuffle them with the precision acquired by long practice. "We'll cut," he said.

The Bartender looked at him—a glance that was eloquent. "Oh, all right then, let the kid shuffle," said the man who knew his trade too well.

The Reporter fumbled with the cards for an instant. "Low is it," he said. The other cut and the Gambler held a deuce.

For the first time since he had known him the Reporter saw a worried look in the Gambler's face. He pocketed his cards with a heavy sigh. "I feel like squealing," he muttered. "I was never in a game like this."

"Oh, brace up. We'll fix it all right. Now about the expenses. I can raise—" began the Reporter.

"Hold on," said the Gambler firmly. "It's my deal and my ante. You two are out of the game. My last killing is plenty." And they knew it was useless to argue on that point.

"Very well," said the Reporter, "we shall telephone the Coroner people and get a drink. I need several. Jimmie will see the undertaker people, and after awhile I shall find some decent rooms where you and your wife have been living. No hurry about the telegram to break the news, and say, come along. The more sleep you lose the more sorrowful and red-eyed you'll look.

They perfected the details in the back room of a saloon, for they were three men almost omniscient in the wisdom of worldliness and in matters pertaining to human nature. No other kind would have sat calmly to plot such a thing. No others would have seen the necessity or the possibility. There came a chance for three men who held no particular moral code to do a certain amount of good in a—to say the least—original manner, and they took it. None of them could have told why.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

The night after the funeral the Reporter and the Bartender entered the saloon rendezvous to meet the Gambler. They found him in a dazed condition, sitting by the table with an untasted glass at his elbow. He looked up with an apathetic glance when he heard them and they looked in wonder. He was still clad in black and the heavy band of crepe still encircled his hat.

"Well," said the Reporter, "everything go off all right?"

The Gambler nodded and stared dreamily at the glass till the other two became impatient.

"Might tell about it," observed the Bartender.

"Nothing much to tell," said the Gambler, staring into vacancy. "Went off just as we planned. The old parties they were sorry for me, and they tried to bear up because mine was the greater loss. But I could see their poor old lips a-trembling and I tell you I felt like hell. Boys, I've been in places where my life was a lot more uncertain than the wheel, but, by God, the worst I've been through was peace and heaven to this."

"'Be brave, my boy,' says the old man, and he patted my shoulder and laid his head on it. The old lady she kissed me, and she says you have nothing to reproach yourself with. "Well, at any rate you have something you can say for yourself when you finish," said the Reporter, soothingly. "You know."

"Know," said the Gambler, irritably. "That's the trouble. We know too damned much, and sometimes we find that we don't know anything."

"Oh, quit the talking," said the Bartender, with great presence of mind. "What we all need just now is some drinks."

Anonyma

First, like an angel, she came unexpected,
And then her visits brief but frequent were;
Her name and station she had well protected,
For in three months I little learned of her;

She'd come at noon, at night, or in the morning,
And once she came at daybreak's earliest beam;
She said she loved me well, yet without warning
She vanished ever from me like a dream.

I was with grief and disappointment laden,
And thought, perhaps, that she had gone the way
That many a giddy girl and morbid maiden,
Love-lost, had gone before, I mean the Bay.

I read the accidents of field and ferry—
The suicides and deaths of every sort;
I searched the graves of many a cemetery,
And read the daily records of the court.

Then through the tenderloin I tried to trace her,
And wandered where the naughty nymphs are found,
I would have pawned a palace to embrace her,
And oftentimes my misery I drowned

In many a bowl of booze or mammoth schooner
Of frothy "steam" both north and south the "slot,"
And swore a thousand times that I would sooner
Be dead than thus deserted and forgot.

The churches and the theatres I haunted,
The race-track and the restaurants and dives,
And with devotion that remained undaunted
I went where fickle Phryne lives and thrives;

But still my searching soul was unrequited
And hope began to flicker in my breast,
Till to a banker's banquet board invited
I went one night, a sullen, gloomy guest;

Just as I heard them summon us to dinner,
I looked and saw the lovely renegade—
A dazzling dame of fashion and the sinner
Who to my rooms had often slyly strayed.

The Wonderful Basford Obtunder

The average individual who requires the attention of a dentist, thinks a long while before he finally surrenders, and when it is his turn to march to the chair does so with little grace, for among the many ills that man is heir to, teeth troubles are just a bit the most unpleasant, particularly because the cure is so strenuous, and even to see one of the buzzing drills in operation sends cold shivers down the back, to say nothing of the sensation when the dentist gets to work on a sensitive tooth. But dentistry like all professions, advances generally step by step, but the inevitable exception has now made its appearance and the whole profession is praising the young inventor who has finally succeeded, by the aid of his wonderful device, which eliminates pain during the operation. C. R. Basford, D. D. S., of San Francisco, is the inventor, and at his offices in the Callaghan Building practical demonstrations are made of his wonderful ability to aid suffering humanity without adding to their aches and pains.

Briefly describes, it relates to a new and useful dental obtunder for use in connection with an electrically-operated, or a foot-operated dental drill, the object of the invention being to enable the operator of the dental engine to eject an atomized anesthetic, or obtundent, into the cavity of the tooth being operated on, in order to render the nerves of the tooth insensible to pain during the drilling operation, thereby enabling the operator to continue the work of drilling, grinding or excavating without interruption.

In particular, the device consists of a tank for compressed air, a receptacle for liquid anesthetic, rubber tubes conducting the compressed air and the liquid to an atomizer tube, from which a continuous, fine spray is emitted through a tiny nozzle in juxtaposition to the drill, or burr. The application is purely local, the tooth, and not the patient, being anesthetized, the latter being in no wise affected other than enjoying absolute immunity from pain.

The anesthetic used is positively non-injurious to the teeth; large quantities may be inhaled into the lungs with no injury to their delicate tissue; it can be sprayed on the eyeball without injury or danger; in brief, advanced dentists have used it in a crude way, with hand atomizers, for a quarter of a century.

Hundreds of patients treated by the aid of the Basford Obtunder all testify to its ingenuity, and some of their statements make interesting reading, particularly as the cases treated embrace all possible conditions of dental work. We quote from two of these:

Eureka Tellurium Gold Mining Co.,
S. W. Powell, President.
San Francisco, Cal., October 30th, 1902.

To whom it may concern: I think it a duty to suffering humanity to acknowledge the painless dental operation performed upon one of my teeth by Dr. C. R. Basford with his new invention known as the "Basford Obtunder." I have been troubled for some time with a decayed tooth, but did not have courage to go to a dentist to have it treated for fear of the pain I thought I would have to undergo. But finally I called upon Dr. Basford at his office in the Callaghan Building. To my utmost surprise he performed the work absolutely without pain. Not knowing he was operating with a new device, I was wondering when he was going to clean out the cavity, as I expected to be hurt when that stage of the operation began, but to my astonishment he had drilled and filled it in a very short time without any pain whatever. I take great pleasure in recommending the little machine to the profession and to patients. S. W. POWELL, Marchioness Hotel, No. 160 Golden Gate Ave.

San Francisco, Cal., October 22d, 1902.

Dr. Basford has just filled six teeth for me. While drilling he used his patent spray. There was not the slightest pain, and as my teeth are very sensitive I cannot give it sufficient praise. I consider it a great blessing, as the ordinary drill used by other dentists is very painful, but with this the patient feels no pain.

ETHEL B. CAWLEY, 518 Larkin street.

Dr. Basford will exhibit his Obtunder at the World's Fair in St. Louis in 1904 and expects to be awarded the honors of a first prize and gold medal. Certain it is that he has banished pain in dentistry and can confidently proclaim the fact to the world.

STAGE

Without the Aid of Glasses

"When Knighthood was in Flower" is of course a romantic play, for it deals with the chivalry of the sixteenth century, and it is costumed and staged with due respect for the dramatic verities. It has the atmosphere of the period, and its dialogue is high-sounding and in keeping with the costumes in the picturesqueness of its phrase, but the characters are as modern as the people in the cast. And for that they should not be censured. The simple fact is that they are human, and that they have no inclination to become bombastic. The play is entertaining but not impressive. It amuses but does not thrill. It is refreshing, and its action is smooth and of sufficient interest to persuade you to devote your attention to the thread of the story. Yet it does not move you to enthusiasm. Miss Effie Ellsler plays the young heroine of the piece in a way that impels you to indulge in the computation of time, for though she was the original Hazel Kirke, without the aid of a pair of opera glasses you can see no reason why she shouldn't be the vivacious, spirited, dashing, coquettish and hot-tempered Mary Tudor. Opera glasses dispel illusions, and therefore should be barred from the theatre. However, Effie Ellsler is a graceful and effective Mary Tudor. She enters into the spirit of the character with much enthusiasm, and she arouses your interest in her affairs. She plays upon your feelings and invokes your sympathy. What more does a theatre-goer want? The company is an adequate one and most meritorious is the work of Walter Seymour, the Captain Brandon of the play.

A Harrowing Play

Who has ever forgotten Mark Twain's inimitable story of mediæval times, wherein he successfully arouses the interest of the reader to the highest pitch only to confess after a little ineffectual floundering that he is unable to continue, as he had involved his people in such hopeless complications that it would be impossible to extricate them? John Arthur Fraser, the author of "Robespierre," has a capital way of dodging such difficulties. When the threads of the plot seem to betray a tendency to tangle he allows Robespierre or any one else in authority to shriek out, "Officers, arrest that man!" and the offender is clapped on the shoulder and hurried off to durance vile. The action of the play at the Grand this week consists chiefly in the apprehension of the principal characters, and before the curtain has fallen on the second act nearly every one of consequence has been incarcerated, except one Victor de Valmont, a fashionable person who, evidently fearing that he will be slighted, politely requests that he may be put under arrest. This is obligingly done and he triumphantly walks off the stage escorted by a trusty squad of four. The third act opens with a scene at the Conciergerie and with new difficulties for the playwright. Here the cold hand of death is used as a more effectual method and those who die do so in a very harrowing manner. One very garrulous character, Lucille Desmoulin, is rudely silenced in a conversational stunt by being run through with a bayonet. She dies in agony in the centre of the stage. In the last act Robespierre is shot in the jaw and the audience sits through a long scene, watching his death struggle. The last tableau, in which the half-dead dictator is forced to mount the steps of the guillotine, is also quite harrowing. Emmett Corrigan by sheer force of personality holds the attention of the audience through four long acts in spite of the weakness of the lines. His impersonation of Robespierre is well poised and convincing. His perfection of technic is remarkable.

The French Farce

"The Husbands of Leontine" was just what Mr. Price claimed for it, a frothy French farce. The situations are amusing and just escape the risque. There is something unique in the idea of a woman asking her divorced husband to take her in for a few days, when she has been cruelly turned out of her own apartment by an unyielding landlady. There is much that is amusing in the fact that after getting a divorce on extreme cruelty grounds, the fair divorcee should love her husband more than ever. Juliet Crosby fits most cleverly into the part of the irresponsible featherhead, and loses not an accent of the witty lines that fall to her. She and Frank Bacon, the Baron, are indeed the whole show, the rest of the company making but a background for their scenes.

Juliet Crosby (in private life Mrs. Fred Belasco) studied her long and exacting part in "The Husbands of Leontine" while nursing her husband through a severe attack of the grip. Leontine is a character alien to her own modest and charming personality, but she plays it with volatility and vivacity and literally carries the piece to success. Her versatility is to find new illustration next week when she personates a rough slavey in "Lady Huntworth's Experiment," a part diametrically opposed to the frothy, frivolous feather-brain of French farce.

Alcazar's New Leading Lady

Bertha Creighton, the new leading lady, whom the Alcazar management has secured after three years' endeavor, is being brought in very quietly and with no fan-fare of trumpets, but it is an open secret that she is an actress of exceptional experience and equipment. Her repertoire of two hundred parts includes the leads in such plays as "Carmen," "Mrs. Dane's Defense," "The Charity Ball," "The Moth and the Flame," "The Crust of Society," "Lost Paradise," "Alabama," "Cyrano de Bergerac," "Moths," "Two Orphans," "Jane," "Prisoner of Zenda," "Sporting Duchess," "L'Aiglon," "Nell Gwynne," "The Little Minister," "Under Two Flags," "Madame Sans Gene" and "Blue Jeans"—everything, in fact, from problem play to modern comedy and farce, not to mention classic roles like Juliet, Rosalind and Parthenia. She has also starred in "A Colonial Girl," written for her by Grace Livingston Furniss.

There Was No Friction

When the word went out that Alice Treat Hunt had left the Alcazar and that Ernest Hastings was to return, the wiseacres immediately nodded and winked and said all sorts of things It certainly looked as if there had been a rumpus and it was a question of one or the other. But it wasn't. It is true the Alcazar's late leading lady left on Thursday morning for Tennessee, but the reason of her going was the simplest in the world. She is a married woman and she loves her husband, and they are to play together again after some months of separation. When Alice Treat Hunt came to the Alcazar, she kept it dark that in private life she was Mrs. Lester Lonergan. Of course a few knew it, and she told a few others, but the general public didn't have an idea but that she was a maiden fancy free. Even Ashton Stevens, in his famous interview, was fooled—for the first time in his life, he said afterward. But Miss Hunt knew that the public prefers maids to matrons, and so she didn't pose as Mrs. Lonergan. Her husband, by the way, is a San Francisco boy. He made his debut here and has appeared in legitimate and stock repertory since in nearly every city in the United States. He has been leading man with Nance O'Neil and in the support of Modjeska, and he adapted a play for Kathryn Kidder. He has written several plays, and there is a possibility that his wife will star in one next season under Frank Perley's management. He came out here a week or so ago to join his wife, and they have gone East together. After an eight weeks season in the South they go to Minneapolis.

May Be Lured From Vaudeville

Lillian Burkhart has made such a success during her present engagement at the Orpheum that the management has prevailed upon her to extend her stay another week, making four in all, though she had intended to play only two. She will wind up her engagement with her clever sketch, "A Strenuous Daisy." Though Miss Burkhart has been phenomenally successful in vaudeville, she is inclined to return to the legitimate drama. The other day a flattering offer was made her by a local manager and she seriously considered it. However she has found vaudeville very profitable for she is one of its high-priced stars. She has a beautiful villa at Bensonhurst, and also a flat in New York.

The Frawleys are expected back here soon. Though Frawley had planned to take the company to Australia from India, it is understood that poor business in India has dissuaded him. He found that touring the land of Mowgli was mighty expensive, the jumps very wide, and the patronage rather small. In Singapore and Rangoon the Frawleys did not do much and were bound for Calcutta when last heard from. Frawley writes that if things did not improve he would either return here with his entire company, or send most of them here, and go to Australia with only Mary Van Buren, Jack Amory, the Shaws, and the scenery, trusting to find plenty of others in Sydney to fill out his cast.

Features of Next Week's Bills

The most important engagement the California has had this season is that of Rose Coghlan, who will appear as Paula in "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," which the Kendals gave us during their last season here. As Pinero royalties are high, only high-priced stars can afford to indulge in his plays, therefore they will never become hackneyed. "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" is the drama in which Mrs. Pat Campbell made her first London success, and Olga Nethersole and Eleanora Duse also include it in their repertory. Rose Coghlan is said to wear some superb gowns in the play. She is sure to make Paula interesting, even were the character less virile than it is. Kate Claxton in "The Two Orphans" comes next.

"More than Queen," in which Blanche Walsh starred here, will be the play for the final week of Emmett Corrigan and Maude Odell at the Grand. The company has been augmented for the production, which promises to be a strong one.

"When Knighthood was in Flower" has another week at the Columbia, after which will come Mrs. Patrick Campbell in Edith Wharton's translation of the Sudermann drama, "The Joy of Living."

Ernest Hastings will return to the Alcazar in "Lady Huntworth's Experiment," the Carton comedy of the society woman masquerading as a Vicar's cook, this role to be taken by Bertha Creighton, the new leading woman. "An American Citizen," with Hastings in the Goodwin role, comes next.

Pursuant to the policy adopted by the management of Fischer's not to run any more of the Weber & Field burlesques for a longer period than six weeks, "Hoity Toity," that has been doing such an enormous business, will be taken off a fortnight hence to make room for "Helter Skelter." In "Helter Skelter" the comedians will introduce their new automobile specialty and the champagne dance. There will also be the latest ballet that director Harry James brought with him from Australia, where it was the hit of one of the holiday spectacular productions.

Beginning tomorrow night there will be a complete change of songs and jokes in the minstrel first part at the Republic. Richard Jose, William McDonald, Harry Sylvester and Sidney Harris will be heard in a new repertoire of pleasing ballads and Mack, Stine, Conlon and Ryder have a bunch of up-to-date gags to pass out. "Chop Suey" will be withdrawn after next week to make way for another of Wallace Irwin's travesties, "The Siege of Goat Island," a satire on army and navy life.

The Beaux and Belles Octette will reappear at the Orpheum with their pretty act entirely re-written and staged by Harry T. MacConnell, composer of the catchy music of "The Casino Girl," "Liberty Belles" and other musical productions. One of the features is an international song depicting the visit of the Octette to Germany, France, Japan and Spain and introducing the various dances of each country. Frank Gardiner and Lottie Vincent return with "An Idyl of the Golf Links." Kronau's White Tscherkess Trio hail from Russia and are said to possess splendid voices. They carry an elaborate stage setting showing an Arctic scene and worked out with the latest appliances, including an electric snowstorm, an aurora borealis effect and the shimmer of moonlight on a restless sea. Lillian Burkhart has postponed an Eastern date and will appear, by request, for an extra week in "A Strenuous Daisy." Milly Capell, Green and Werner, Esther Fee, the brothers French and the biograph will conclude the bill.

John E. Rome and Marguerite Ferguson will reappear in their cyclone of fun, entitled "The Amorous Tramp," at the Chutes. Mae Tunison, the eminent California soprano, and G. Herbert Mitchell, a renowned baritone direct from New York, Dacey, Chase and Ward in "Fun in a Gymnasium," Jessie Brown, and Farmer Jones and his educated musical pigs will finish the bill. "Down the Flume" is a great attraction and no one should miss the trip around the world.

Zelie de Lussan's "Carmen" will be the attraction at the Tivoli on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday nights with "Pinafore" on Tuesday night. The rest of the week will be apportioned among the Gilbert and Sullivan revivals that have proved so popular.

Anna Miller Wood's Latest Appearance

Of all the San Francisco girls who have won honors in the East and abroad, I can recall none whose success has been so assured as that of Anna Miller Wood. It is some seasons since Miss Wood visited us, for lately she has been spending all her summer vacations in London, but on her last visit here she was heard in two recitals. She is the contralto of the First Unitarian church in Boston, and is the favorite pupil of Arthur Foote, the composer, who wrote several songs for her. She was the pupil and assistant of Madame Julie Rosewald in this city, before she went to Boston. Recently Miss Wood gave a concert in Boston, in connection with Miss Alice Cummings, pianist, and Karl Ondricek, the violinist, of which the Boston papers speak very highly.

Charming ZELIE DE LUSSAN
Who will appear in "Carmen" at the Tivoli

The Transcript said: "Displaying her rich, well-trained voice, with its unusual emotional quality, to its greatest advantage, she sang with a regard for the character of each song. The languid droop of Paladilhe's 'Havanaise' she caught exactly, also the rush and swing of Augusta Holmes's 'Le Chevalier Belle-Etoile,' and Rubinstein's 'Good Night' she made very charming. In Tschaikowsky's strange 'War ich nicht ein Halm' Miss Wood displayed the long range and precisely the quality of voice that one would like to hear sing Amneris." And the Herald said: "Miss Wood brought to the songs noble vocality, fine phrasing, a free spirit, generous in emotion and tender in humor, and a refined and polished diction."

Teaching the Child

The name of the Burrowes Musical Kindergarten Method has been changed to the Burrowes Course of Music Study (Kindergarten and Primary). It was felt that the word kindergarten scarcely covered the course of study, suggesting as it did limitations that did not exist, since the method is as well adapted to children of twelve as to those of five years of age. The merits of the Burrowes method have been demonstrated in this city for two years past by Mrs. Frances B. Williams and by several other teachers to whom, as Miss Burrowes's normal teacher, she has taught the system. Mrs. Williams has been most successful here with the method of Miss Katherine Burrowes, who evolved her system after long special study of child life and music abroad and in this country. It includes games, apparatus, songs and exercises of an effective and original nature.

The Hambourg Recitals

The Mark Hambourg concerts will take place on the afternoons of next Tuesday and Wednesday, at three o'clock, at Fischer's. The distinguished Russian pianist will then play for the last time to an American audience as he will leave on April second for Australia. Since October Hambourg has given over a hundred concerts in the East and in Canada, appeared as soloist with all the great American orchestras and performed at the White House before the President and a brilliant assemblage, the only musical artist thus honored in a year. On each of these occasions he aroused unbounded enthusiasm, his playing being described as wonderful, fascinating and sometimes terrible in force. His concerts here should be well patronized. The programs are of rare quality, the prices popular, and the sale of seats at Kohler & Chase's music store is now progressing.

The Saturday Club Recital

Wenzel Kopta, the violinist, gave a recital before the Saturday Club of Sacramento last week and duplicated the favorable impression he made in this city. His technic was pronounced marvelous. His program was: Air Hongroise, Ernst; Cascade (caprice de concert), de Kontski; Eklage, Nesvera; Perpetuo mobile, Ries; Danse des Socieres, Paganini. He was compelled to play several encores, one of which was the violin arrangement of the "Lucia" sextet, rendered without piano accompaniment. Cantor E. J. Stark was the vocalist of the concert, and his artistic singing made a tremendous hit. He sang in Italian, French, English and German, and some of the club members were puzzled to determine his nationality as his accent in all was so good. The fact is, the Cantor is a Tyrolian and is naturally familiar with all the languages. He sang the Prologue from "I'Pagliacci,"

"Homesickness," "J'etends ton pas" and other favorites, but the Schumann song, "The Two Grenadiers," was perhaps the number that pleased the best. The audience made him sing it twice and then come out again with another selection. Gyula Ormay accompanied in his usual efficient manner.

The Tenor Famine

At the time of writing there are not more than four available church choir tenors in San Francisco, that is tenors of capacity who can read music at sight, preserve a good tempo and sing fairly near the correct key. A new tenor came here from St. Louis recently to sing in Trinity church and at Temple Emanu-El, but his wife's illness called him home again. It is to be hoped he will return here to stay permanently, for we need tenors of voice and experience, and Mr. Vincent had had several years of church work. Mr. Rowan is probably the best church tenor here now, though there is a Mr. Homan who is also considered excellent. Mr. Veaco sings well, but his tempo is not always correct, and his high notes are nasal. However he is regarded as a strong church singer, and he did admirably in the "Stabat Mater" sung under Mascagni's baton. We also need a new tenor at the Tivoli, and the Loring Club has a standing invitation for more tenors to come and join them.

The song recital given by four pupils of Edward Xavier Rolker on Tuesday evening was a most successful affair. The participants were Miss Hedwig Pohlmann, Miss Bessie Sutro Rosenbaum, Mr. Fred Hotaling and Mr. Bert Georges. The program was an interesting one, and its rendition was characterized by that refinement and delicacy of nuance which is always a characteristic of Mr. Rolker's pupils. All four are fortunate in being endowed with admirable voices. Miss Pohlmann's is a mezzo as smooth as cream and full of a beautiful emotional quality. Her program numbers were "Nicht Worete, Geliebter" (Tschaikowsky), "Songs My Mother Taught Me" (Dvorak) and the old Haydn one, "My mother bids me bind my hair," which last showed to perfection the fine capabilities of her voice. Later in the evening she had a suite of Fielitz songs, "Schon Gretlein," which were most beautifully rendered. Miss Rosenbaum was in the opening number, a trio from "The Magic Flute," but her true opportunity occurred in Liszt's "Mignon," and in the closing duets with Miss Pohlmann. Her voice is lyric in quality and shows the effect of careful training. Mr. Hotaling's best number was MacDowell's "Thy Beaming Eyes" and the Gounod selection, and he was very good in the excerpt from "Martha" which he gave as an encore. His voice is full and sweet, but his platform manner is marred by self-consciousness. Mr. Georges has not sung in public since his return from Europe. He was in good voice and gave a most acceptable rendition of his four songs, "The Horn" (Fliegier), "Spring Song" (White), and later on the program Bemberg's "Hindu Song" and Tosti's "Good-bye." Mr. Rolker himself also contributed a song group, Grieg's "Fruhling," the Godard "Lullaby" and a romance from the "Postillion de Longumeau." Fred Maurer was the accompanist, and when I say that, to add more would be like gilding refined gold.

Mascagni is regarded among the musicians here as the best of good fellows. He is not at all "stand-offish" nor has his wonderful success made him conceited or egotistic.

At the second Hopkins musicale, given on Thursday evening under Henry Heyman's direction, the program was contributed by Mrs. Marian E. B. Robinson, contralto, Miss Grace Marshall, soprano, and Miss Mary Bumstead, organist, with Mrs. Gerard Barton and Miss Aimee Daviese as accompanists. Mrs. Robinson was down on the program, among other numbers, for two of Gerard Barton's songs, "Blow, Blow Thou Winter Wind" and "A Lover and His Lass."

At Miss Gussie Mast's recital next Thursday evening in Steinway hall the singer will have Benjamin Tuttle, violinist, to assist in the program and Fred Maurer as accompanist. Miss Mast will give an almost entirely new program. She will give numbers by Donizetti, Clough-Leighter, Schumann and Liszt. She will also accompany herself in two numbers, one being a Mazurka by Chopin, "Aime Moi."

Miss Dorothy Goodsell sang recently at a concert given by the Stanford University Orchestra at the college, and was very warmly received, double encores being demanded after her numbers. By special desire one of her songs was Nevin's "Rosary." Harry Barnhart also sang at the concert. —The Music Critic.

THE BOWIE ESTATE.

Big Auction Sale of Splendid Lots to take place soon

One of the best opportunities ever offered the citizens of San Mateo to purchase desirable building sites of 50-foot frontages will be presented to the public early next month, when the heirs of the Bowie estate will put up at auction 350 lots in San Mateo. Easton, Eldridge & Co., who have charge of the auction, say that the inquiry in San Francisco for San Mateo property is extraordinary; and that the effect of the electric road will be to build up San Mateo into an important business as well as residential city within a comparatively short time. The owners have instructed that the coming sale be made without reserve, and they claim that no land has ever yet been offered by them in San Mateo which combines so many attractive features—proximity to the railroad station and street car line, good elevation, good drainage, bounded by poplar and other trees, superb view from each lot, sewer and water connections obtainable, electric light, liquid fuel and telephone service at command. The easy terms (1-3 cash and the balance in one or two years at 6 per cent) place the property within the reach of any person in San Mateo. This will probably be the last auction sale ever held here, as property is fast becoming so much in demand that private sales are readily made.—From San Mateo Times, March 21, 1903.

A Story of Mountaineers

"A Tar Heel Baron" is a remarkably good book for a first novel. If the mountaineer and moonshiner had not already become familiar figures to us in the work of Charles Egbert Craddock, John Fox Jr., and some other of the older writers, this would be a novel to command the attention of critics and readers alike. As it is, the older portion of the book world will not object to being reminded of earlier pleasures, while at a time when a book six months old is forgotten, the younger generation may find it as fresh as "The Despot of Broomsedge Cove" and "The Prophet of the Great Smoky Mountain" were in their time. The mountaineers in a "Tar-Heel Baron" are not so wild and unkempt as those of an earlier day. They live within a few hours' travel of Ashville, North Carolina, and they have all seen, if not ridden on the railroad. The long rifle is replaced by the revolver, but in the main they are the same race, shiftless and somewhat improvident, with a natural leaning towards "moonshining." The character which gives title to the story is unique. Baron Frederich Johann Ludwig von Rittenheim, brave, gentle and most courteous, has been supplanted in affection by his younger brother. Like a true knight he yields to the lady's choice, and knowing that Max cannot live in the style which his position demands, he resigns also his income, and comes to the new world to begin a life for himself, by tilling the soil with his hands. His proud German title becomes simply "Mr. Baron" amongst his humble neighbors, with whom he fraternizes, and whose soft drawl and strange venacular form an excellent contrast to the precise and formal English of the foreigner. There are also the "Neighborhood" families, people of position and education, who, after being impoverished by the war, have come to reside permanently on what were once but farms of their estate, and are at once a contrast to the mountain folk and to the Baron. Besides the "moonshining" and the home life of the varying strata of society, we are permitted to be present at some of the sports and amusements of the people. There is a "gander-pulling," which is conducted on more humane principles than those of the more inaccessible sections, since it is decreed by law that the bird must be a dead one, but yet quite difficult enough to test the skill of the contestants. The "poke party," an amusement which sorely puzzles Mr. Baron, is like many another innovation, an old friend under a strange name. When the same scheme is utilized by church societies, they modify the rules somewhat and call it a "basket social." There is, of course, a love interest, love and waiting, deception and misunderstanding, but the elements which are brought together are unusual. Just what they are, or how the happy ending is brought about, it would be unfair to both reader and author to disclose. The rather dramatic manner in which the Baron is led into breaking the law is a trick which no stranger could compass with a mountaineer, though the confiding foreigner fell a ready victim, but the records of the United States Courts will show more than one instance of such treachery and breach of hospitality. The characters, with the exception of Hilda, appear to have been sketched from life, and the incidents are equally convincing. There are five illustrations by Edward Stratton Holloway which deserve special consideration, since they are not the usual pictures of anything bound up between printed pages, but real illustrations of the text, and well reproduced. The cover design, autumn leaves in colors on a background of cream, is rather too delicate for a novel. It is also by Holloway. The author's name, Mabel Shippie Clarke Pelton, appears for the first time on a title page, but it will be welcome again. The book is from the press of J. B. Lippincott.

An Uncanny Novel

An anxious inquirer is besieging Current Literature for enlightenment concerning the "allegorical significance," or the "hidden meaning" concealed in Bram Stoker's novel "Dracula." Goodness knows there is enough not hidden to cause the average reader a sleepless night or two and a resolution to stay indoors after dark. The story deals with vampires, "revenants," and other uncanny creatures, and would seem like the outcome of a steady diet of Arabian Nights unexpurgated, were it not for the fact that a belief in such supernatural happenings is current amongst the peasants of Roumania and Lithuania. It is only within the past few weeks that a youth was arrested and brought into court for desecrating the grave of his own father, removing the corpse, burning the body, pulverizing the bones and scattering the ashes.

His defence, and he was upheld by his mother and the relatives and neighbors of the family, was that his father was a vampire, and that it was necessary for him to do as he did in order to prevent his continuing to reappear at night and cause death and disaster to both human beings and brutes. Owen Wister says he has come across a community in the Connecticut Valley of our own Puritanical New England, where the people have the same primitive belief, and it is his intention to incorporate it in a story. So far as any hidden meaning to be discovered in "Dracula" is concerned, some people can find one in anything, but the one which is on the surface and patent to everybody is to keep that particular book out of the hands of children and women of susceptible nerves. As to "allegorical significance" perhaps as good a one as any is for people to make up their minds to live while they are alive, and when they die, stay dead. If ghosts could read the book they might take it as a warning not to try living in two worlds at the same time. These people who want to delve under the surface of "Dracula" must be the same ones who wrote to Du Maurier, after the publication of "Peter Ibbetson" for some explicit directions about "dreaming true."

When one looks at the beautiful covers lavished upon trashy books one is constrained to the belief that the publishers have lost their sense of fitness. Many of the volumes tastefully and attractively gotten up are not worth the trouble unless in the way of advertisement for the binders, and they remind one of the ancient tale that filled space in the old reading books, of that conscientious carpenter who carefully planed the hidden side of a fence and later on was given a contract for more important work on the strength of the quality of his wasted labor. A large number of the worthless volumes which are issued from the presses nowadays will be preserved for no other reason than their pretty covers, and be permitted to take up space on the bookshelves which rightly belongs to something else, whereas in proper course they would not survive the season. It would be a good thing if publishers would go back a bit and bring out a certain class of books in the only style to which they are entitled, that of paper covers. Then when reviewers mentioned them at all the statement "Paper only" would set them at once into the rank where they belong, and it would be understood that whatever words of commendation were written concerning them were meant to be taken as comparing them not to the best of books, but to others of their own class.

Mary Moss is one of the new writers whom it will be well to keep an eye upon. Several months ago the Lippincott Monthly Magazine published one of her stories entitled "Fruit out of Season." It was off the beaten track and though not a remarkable novel, it showed more evidence of originality than nine out ten of the present day products. The March number of the same magazine gives another story, "Julian Meldolha," which confirms the good impression made by "Fruit out of Season." To be sure Julian is reminiscent in places of "Daniel Deronda," but Miss Moss disarms criticism when she makes her hero refer to himself, in one of his spasms of self-criticism, as having "behaved like a Daniel Deronda in petticoats." Moreover, "Daniel Deronda" is a very good book to be reminded of, and Daniel, barring his priggishness, not an undesirable acquaintance. Miss Moss has not done anything astonishing yet, but she shows promise and originality. Hard work will do the rest.

Richard Henry Stoddard has donated to the Authors' Club of New York all his valuable collection of autographs, photographs, manuscripts, bookplates, first editions and other books. There are some notable possessions amongst them, which would have, in all probability, brought large prices from either auction or private sale. Since the death of the author's only son Lorrimer Stoddard, the playwright, and his wife, there were no direct heirs to keep the collection intact, and it is far more satisfactory to know that it is in the possession of the Authors' Club than to have it scattered over two continents. E. C. Stedman, the poet, is engaged in making an exhaustive catalogue of the Stoddard collection.

The indefatigable Corelli has another book ready to hurl at our heads. At the present moment, Marie has taken to speech-making, a new form of bidding for notice, for her. Heretofore she has affected to condemn the talking sisterhood.

With the Money Makers

Southern Pacific Pool

My New York correspondent forwards me the following interesting material relative to the Keene-Harriman contest in Southern Pacific shares and Wall street gossip in reference to it: "The position of the Southern Pacific pool has been the main topic of discussion during the entire week. It is undoubtedly true that the conservative banking interests in the financial district, while regretting the contest which has arisen between the rival parties in Southern Pacific, have not looked upon the matter very seriously. The opinion has been very general that the entire affair has received more advertisement than its importance justified. The extension of the Southern Pacific pool, if it is to be taken as meaning the opening of an extended legal contest, is to be generally regretted, irrespective of whatever justice there may be for such action. In view of the present contest for control of the Southern Pacific it is interesting to note that the Harriman interests, in the management of the company, are simply carrying out the same policy which was laid down by C. P. Huntngton. When the late C. P. Huntington was in control of Southern Pacific it was his opinion that the road should be brought up to the highest state of efficiency before dividend payments were begun. When Mr. Huntington died he had plans of improving the Southern Pacific system, which were estimated to require about $20,000,000, all of which were to be paid for out of the earnings. The present management of the corporation in spending practically all of the surplus earnings of the company on betterments and improvements, is apparently only carrying out on broader lines the policy laid down by the late C. P. Huntington. During the last four years the Southern Pacific has spent nearly $35,000,000 of earnings on betterments and improvements. This is shown by the figures. It appears that the Southern Pacific has earned during the last four fiscal years a total net divisible income over fixed charges of nearly $35,000,000. Out of this no dividends whatever have been paid. About $25,000,000 was specially appropriated for betterments and improvements, while the remainder was spent in the same manner. It is expected that an additional $25,000,000, making a total of $60,000,000 since 1898, will be spent out of the earnings on improvements and betterments before dividend payments on Southern Pacific are begun.

Gathered on 'Change

Investment securities have been rather neglected during the week although sales have been of comparatively fair volume. This statement though seemingly contradictory is accounted for by the fact that transactions have been confined to a few of the leading stocks. Probably the chief feature of the week has been the sharp advance in the price of San Francisco Gas & Electric shares. The cause of this advance does not appear to be very clearly understood, if the street talk counts for anything, for there are numerous rumors in circulation concerning prospective combinations and reorganizations, with an occasional hint that a sale of the plant is on the tapis. As far as can be learned the only tangible reason for this advance is the pooling of the stock of the company in escrow with the Mercantile Trust Company. A few days ago the Stock and Bond Exchange forwarded an inquiry requesting information as to how many shares of the company's stock had been deposited with the Trust company in answer to the appeal made in the circular letter of the Board of Directors. In reply the officials of the Gas & Electric Company are reported to have said that as soon as some expected replies were received from a number of stockholders, some of whom are non-resident, there would be 75,000 shares deposited in escrow. The total number of outstanding shares of the company is 130,000, so that if 75,000 shares are in escrow, subject to the order of the board of directors, it means that the board has control of a majority of the stock for voting purposes and can do as they please with the corporation's affairs and property. It is a notable fact, however, that a direct answer was not made to the inquiry and that the 75,000 block of shares is contingent upon getting in some stock, which is already not in hand. How much short of the 75,000 is a matter that no one knows, outside of the Gas company's officials. It is considered significant that the Stock and Bond Exchange took the trouble to make the inquiry. It is argued by some of those who pretend to know that it was made for the purpose of drawing out the answer that the pooling operation was a success. However, admitting that it was a success, it would seem to constitute a very unstable foundation on which to force the price of shares up to $65 a share. If this was the ob-

This is a bona fide mining proposition, and as such is open to a searching investigation. The directors are well and favorably known in San Francisco, and can be relied upon to give the company an honest administration. We want business men and men open to a safe, legitimate mining investment, in which speculation is reduced to a minimum, to communicate with, and investigate the merits of this company. ject in view it certainly has been a pronounced success, because for a long term of months the stock was dull at about $42 a share, which made an aggregate of $5,460,000 as the value of all the stock issued, while at $65 a share the total value is $8,450,000, thus showing an increase of $2,990,000. The price of $65 per share, however, was evidently regarded as a little unsettled for it fluctuated downward to $63.75, and Trustees' Certificates were obtainable at $62. Of course nothing is known as yet as to what action may be taken by the board of directors in utilizing this aggregation of stock, but they have an abundance of time as the power of attorney signed by stockholders provides that the stock shall remain in escrow for one year, and during this time there will be opportunity either to sell, or in case competitive business conditions should become more pressing, either a reorganization plan or some scheme of coalition can be promptly adopted to meet the new requirements. The sales of the stock during the week have been quite large and the bulk of transactions have been at figures in excess of $58 per share. The activity in Gas & Electric shares has caused a stronger tone in the stock of the Pacific Gas Improvement Company, which has also been selling quite freely and is now held with $42.50 as the asking price. Equitable Gas shares are about steady at $4.62 1-2 while Mutual Electric is in demand at $7 with scarcely any stock to be had. Considering all things there has been more interest in gas and electric shares during the last few weeks than for a number of years past. Trading in water stocks has been rather light with fluctuations in prices mostly confined to Spring Valley. The recent announcement that the company would pass the April dividend has had a depressing effect upon the value for shares, so that the price dropped to $83.50. Port Costa is steady at $64 and Contra Costa is in demand at $62.25 with sellers generally demanding $63. In Bank stocks the general tendency still appears to be upward. Bank of California shares are now in active demand at $500, with sellers generally demanding $501 and some more than that. Giant Powder shares remained steady at $66.50 and few holders were willing to sell at that, notwithstanding the statements that have been published to the effect that the company is not earning sufficient to pay its usual monthly dividend. Sugar shares remained quite steady with transactions light. Generally speaking holders are not anxious to sell, the impression being very general that this class of security will make some sharp advances in the near future. Alaska Packers is steady and the recent advance in the price for California Wine Association's shares is well sustained. —The Financier.

The Pacific States Investor for April is just out, and is a noteworthy issue, if only for the ample space given to reading matter, original and selected, of interest to all classes of readers as well as to those seeking openings for investment. This last feature is, of course, a specialty, and some notes of special value to investors in Mexico and Alaska are furnished. The editorials and original articles cover all the important economic questions of the day. The story of "Walker in Nicaragua" will be eagerly read by old-timers, who can remember the "gray-eyed man of Destiny."

NATURE'S HEALTH RESORT.

It is curious that so many rhematics and sufferers from gout, sciatica and chronic malaria will fly off to Europe as soon as a symptom of their disease asserts itself. If they would do better and cure their disease in less time and at less expense, they should substitute for the foreign spa our own Byron Hot Springs. Clubmen found out long ago the efficacy of the springs and two or three times a year they take a trip to Byron, returning refreshed and rejuvenated. Lately a new hotel was built to take the place of the old one, which was burned down. It is splendidly equipped and supplies all city comforts to guests.

A DAINTY SOUVENIR.

The second one of the series of booklets issued by the California Northwestern Railway is most artistic. On the cover is one of Mrs. Hudson's inimitable Indian children, and within are beautiful half-tones showing scenes along the roadway. There are a dairy scene in Marin county, a peach orchard near Novato, a chicken ranch in Petaluma, a shearing scene in the Ukiah valley and other views. It is a charming souvenir of the State to send to Eastern friends.

„Will you join me?" "Well, yes, in a drink of Chapin & Gore."

Other People's Ideas

From "Roden's Corner," by Henry Seton Merriman:

It is a strange fact that intimacy with anyone who has made for himself a great name leads to the inevitable conclusion that he is worthy of it.

The world will take a man and make a hero of him without pausing to inquire of what stuff he may be. Nay, more, it will take a man's name and glorify it without so much as inquiring to what manner of person the name belongs.

The way to rule the world is to make it want something, and keep it wanting.

At thirty-five it is perhaps not well to wait too patiently for those things that make a woman's life worth living.

Those who are assured of their position are not always thinking about it. Men who stand much upon their dignity have not, as a rule, much else to stand upon.

None of us may know when the echo of a careless word will cease vibrating in the hearts of some that hear.

The world nearly always mistakes intelligence for cleverness, just as it nearly always mistakes laughter for happiness.

Mrs. Vansittart: The young man who expects something of himself is usually disappointed.

That greatest of all drags on a successful career—a soft heart.

If plain-speaking be a sign of friendship, then women are assuredly capable of higher flights than men. A life-long friendship between two women usually means that they quarreled at school, and have retained in later days the privilege of mutual plain speaking.

Charity, above all virtues, to be practiced well must be practiced without too much reflecting. He who lets wisdom guide his bounty too closely will end by giving nothing at all.

He had the power of holding his cards and only playing them at the right moment. Which is perhaps the greatest secret in life—namely, to hold one's cards, and, if the right moment does not present itself, never to play them at all, but to hold them to the end of the game, contenting oneself with the knowledge one has had, after all, the making of a fine game that might have been worth the playing.

There are many who obtain a vast deal of information without ever asking a question, just as there are some—and they are mostly women—who ask many questions and are told many lies.

It is unwise to enter into war or friendship without seeing to the reserves.

Tony: It does not do to think that the world is blind. It is better not to care whether it sees or not.

Who of us has not a few friends and relatives who can only have been created as a solemn warning?

There is no intoxication so dangerous as that of success, and none that leaves so bitter a taste behind it.

Stories Old and New

Supremacy of French Art

General Von Manteuffel, the great German military governor of conquered Alsace, who hated all that was French, once at a public dinner engaged in a dispute with a French diplomat, who maintained the supremacy of the French workmen over the artisans of all other nations.

"A thing so ugly does not exist that the skill and genius of a Frenchman cannot make of it a thing of beauty," he said. Angered by the contradiction, the old soldier pulled a hair from his bristly, gray mustache, and, handing it to the Frenchman said curtly:

"Let him make a thing of beauty out of that, then, and prove your claim."

The Frenchman took the hair and sent it in a letter to a well-known Parisian jeweler, with a statement of the case and an appeal to his patriotic pride, giving him no limit of expense in executing the order. A week later the mail from Paris brought a neat little box for the General. It was a handsome scarf pin, made like a Prussian eagle, that held in its talons a stiff, gray bristle, from either end of which dangled a tiny golden ball. One was inscribed Alsace, the other Lorraine, and on the eagle's perch were the words, "You hold them, but by a hair."

A Hotel Story

The late "Larry" Jerome, when traveling in Florida once upon a time, stayed at a hotel, the proprietor of which asked him, when he was about to depart, to sign his name in a book not quite like an ordinary hotel register, but one used, after the fashion of an old English custom, for the purpose of obtaining the names of distinguished guests. When Mr. Jerome was about to place his signature with the others, he saw that the writer just before him had inscribed the comment:

"I came here for change and rest and got it."

Quick as thought the witty clubman penned beneath it, "I also came here for change and rest, but the waiters got the change and the landlord got the rest."

It Smacks of Blackmail

Ever since Eugene Schmitz became Mayor of this city Town Talk has consistently and persistently protested against the domination of the Ruef personality in the city government. From the very beginning, when Mayor Schmitz in an open letter to the public announced that he was "grateful" to this pestiferous political boss, we felt that Abe Ruef was to wield great and unusual power and influence in municipal affairs, and that he would avail himself of his pull with Schmitz to further his own selfish interests. That there was occasion for our forebodings was evidenced by subsequent developments. Mr. Ruef's has been the guiding hand of this Administration, and Mr. Ruef is not a man that we should care to have for Mayor of this city. His are the ways of the practical politician—ways that are dark. He has capitalized the Schmitz friendship and ingeniously exploited it for large profits. If Schmitz had no intermediary perhaps we would never have had a water-rate ordinance that yielded unreasonable profits to the water company; perhaps the gas consumers in a few districts would not have been cinched to enable the erstwhile gas monopoly to discourage competition. The copartnership between Abraham and Eugene has been most brazenly conducted, but the climax of effrontery was capped several days ago, in the curtained room of a Market street saloon, when the Mayor's fidus Achates took part in a controversy between two prize-fight promoters. One of the controversialists, representing a club that has a lease of the Mechanics' Pavilion, claimed an interest in the profits of a fight that was to take place a few days later. He asserted that unless a certain agreement was kept the Pavilion doors would be barred on the date set for the fight. Thereupon, according to a morning paper, Mr. Ruef announced that if the doors were closed he would see that the club having the lease would never be granted another permit and moreover, that the doors would be battered down with clubs. He spoke as the representative of the manager of the impending prize-fight, and probably in the hope of earning a fee. There was no likelihood of Mr. Ruef's threat being misconstrued. It savored pretty pungently of blackmail. Mr. Ruef knows, as a lawyer, that such differences as existed between the two prize-fight promoters should either be arbitrated or litigated. To attempt to force one to surrender what he conceived to be his rights by threats of persecution backed by implied power to invoke the executive and police aid of this municipality, is nothing less than an attempt to blackmail. Does Mayor Schmitz contenance the exercise of a pull with him to that extent?

To Be Consistent

It would be absurd to contend that William J. Bryan no longer exercises a powerful influence in Democratic politics, but to argue that the party's nominee in 1904 cannot win without Mr. Bryan's support is tantamount to discrediting the party itself. The supposition appears to be that Mr. Bryan will oppose any man who did not profess faith in free silver in the campaigns of 1896 and 1900. Should he oppose the party's nominee on such a ground he would be merely seeking to wreak revenge and he would prove that he was unworthy of ever having the confidence of the party reposed in him. According to Mr. Bryan's way of thinking he would have no right to oppose the party nominee even though the latter were nominated on a platform that repudiated the doctrine of free silver. Bryan was twice defeated because the people lost faith in a party that proposed a financial policy which they believed might lead to the destruction of the national credit. He has put the blame on Democrats who resisted what they regarded as a fatuous policy. In other words it is his theory that they had no right to vote according to their own convictions, and he virtually argues that a political party can never be wrong. It is all right for Mr. Bryan to try to cram the Kansas City platform down the throat of the suffragist, but if he should fail to do so, to be consistent he would have to support the nominee even though Grover Cleveland were the choice of the convention. But probably Mr. Bryan is consistent only on the subject of free silver.

Squeezing the Consumer

Though prosperity continues, and wages are being raised while hours are being shortened, the restiveness of labor is becoming more ominous every day in all parts of the country. Moreover there is another element and a very large one which is also growing restless. It is that element which is composed of the consumers, that great middle class which is representative of neither labor nor capital. It has about reached the conclusion that it has troubles of its own, and that its troubles are the result of industrial agitation. The prices of all the necessaries of life have risen to such an extent that the material conditions of the average man today are worse than they were in 1897, before the wave of prosperity began to sweep over the country. This prosperity about which there is so much talk is more imaginary than real. The financial syndicates have received the lion's share of it, and the remainder went to the workingmen. But there are wage-earners who have received no benefits, and there are men engaged in small enterprises who have not enjoyed any material gains. They are not organized but they are so numerous that their murmurings of discontent are easily heard. They are gradually reaching the conclusion that the labor problem is not the only factor in our political life. If every raise of wages is to be met by a corresponding increase in the price of commodities, the great and powerful element that gravitates between the labor trust and the capitalistic trust will continue to be squeezed, and it is that prospect that is now worrying many people in this community.

That Dewey Interview

Admiral Dewey is an exceptional man in more than one respect. He proved himself an exceptional fighter in Manila bay, and he has also proved that he is a statesman of exceptional judgment and tact. Again did his unusual individuality assert itself when called upon by President Roosevelt the other day for an explanation regarding a published interview in which he was represented as having said that the recent manoeuvres of his fleet were intended as an object lesson to Emperor William. It was an indiscreet remark for Admiral Dewey to make, especially at this time, for the press of both the United States and Germany has been saying many things of late that indicated that popular sentiment in both countries was decidedly antithetic. It was generally believed that Admiral Dewey would repudiate the interview. That is what most public men do when they find that they have expressed themselves indiscreetly. It is easy to repudiate an interview, and it is hard for the interviewer to prove the man he has interviewed a liar. However Admiral Dewey is not of the flinching variety. He admitted that he had been correctly quoted, but explained that when he spoke he did not know his remarks were to be published. It was a case of the ubiquitous reporter being a friend of the man to whom Admiral Dewey had made the statement. There was nothing in the remark which could be construed as an insult to the German Emperor, but it set the Berlin editors by the ears.

Beware of Basketball

Miss Lucille Hill, director of physical training at Wellesley College, where young ladies engage in boat races and field sports and where gymnasium exercise is compulsory, has come to the conclusion that all college athletics cannot be indulged in by girls with impunity. She has placed basketball on the blacklist. She says that the Wellesley freshman classes, recruited from the secondary schools, are physically damaged and imperfect. Ankles and wrists are swollen, arms sprained, legs not what they should be and the curve of beauty marred. All of which is distressing. The athletic feminine cult has been making great strides in the last few years, and many of the colleges were turning out young women who gave promise of becoming mothers of a race of gladiators. It was supposed that the physical culture fad was conducive to the development of the fair ones from the ground up, and that the fostering of brawn was leading to grand results. In some of the colleges they have track meets, and though girls are not built for jumping they have achieved some wonderful triumphs both in the broad and the high. As the amateur female athlete with a glowing countenance and a love of outdoor exercise is far more interesting than the flat-chested, academical prodigy with the polished spectacles and a passion for the classics, it is indeed sad to learn that basketball is too strenuous a game for the frail and gentle creatures.

Degeneracy in New England

A few weeks ago Reverend Henry J. Hutchins took occasion to denounce the degeneracy of some Connecticut villages, in which he found all the vices running riot; polygamy was practiced, and sins both nameable and unnameable were more common than virtues. The descendants of the original colonists had neither church, mass nor meeting, and their children were declared to be both illiterate and untamed. Very shortly after the diatribe the reverend gentleman met with a sudden death, and now the rural inhabitants of the maligned section are loud in their exultation at the "vindication." They declare that the sudden end of the cleric's life was a direct visitation of the Almighty as a punishment for his untruthfulness, and call upon all who will to visit them and learn from ocular demonstration the falsity of the accusations against them. Sunday supp. contributors have taken advantage of the subject, and the Eastern papers are supplied with illustrated articles showing homes, schools, churches, the oldest inhabitant, and typical specimens of the younger generation, and interviews and signed articles are thick as dead leaves in autumn. It seems that this is one of the sections of which so much has been written concerning abandoned farms, and of late there has been active inquiry for sites for summer homes which the residents fear will cease by reason of the Hutchins denunciation. They turn the tables by declaring that they do not attend church because of the quality of the clergymen sent to minister to them, and altogether it is quite an interesting little family dispute. From the facts that have come to light it is evident that godly preachers have been letting their vineyards run to decay while millions of dollars have been spent in "Christianizing" Chinese, Hindoos, Samoans, and other peoples at the ends of the earth.

Demoralizing the Indian

A vigorous protest is being made against the establishment of "Indian Villages" at future fairs and expositions. The argument against them is common-sense and logical. After the government has gone to the expense of educating the Indian youth and initiating him into the ways of civilization, with the reasonable hope and expectation that he will become a decent, self-supporting man, earning his way by some trade or other reputable employment, along comes the agent of some of those Wild West shows and offers inducements to him to join the troupe and revert to savagery, donning breech-clout and blanket, and giving exhibitions of primitive customs. The salary offered for the brief engagement is large enough to prove a temptation, and the result is that the young bucks go off to exhibit themselves. When they return they are completely spoiled. They are idle, often dissolute, and with no inclination to exert themselves in farming or handicrafts. Frequently they become altogether useless, and with their natural vanity catered to, they become dependents and nuisances. A few years ago the Department of the Interior found it necessary to positively forbid the recruiting of Indians for private show enterprises. It was found that the aborigines were induced to leave the reservations and were taken across the continent, and frequently across the Atlantic, and when the Indian feature was abandoned or the concern disbanded, they were turned adrift. The object of all these affairs is to show the savage as nearly as possible in his original condition. They offer a premium for reversion, but they amuse and entertain the crowds. If the progress and improvement of the Indians were exhibited, no one could object and no harm could result. While the subject is before us, it is not amiss to call attention to another aspect of Indian education. One of the features of magazine and periodical literature is the depicting of the Indian at school, but if the illustrations are an index to the school curriculum, the athletic branch of their education is as prominent as it is in the rest of the scholastic world. We are regaled with the Indian basket ball team in bloomers and sweaters, the foot ball team, the base ball nine, the tennis and golf champions, but where is the plow team, the dairy maid, the laundress, the blacksmith, or the champion in any useful occupation? The sprinter and the hammer-thrower and the shot-putter and the high-jumper are there to speak for themselves. Who has heard of the horse-shoer, the carpenter, the plumber or the painter? There would be no violent protest against the such unessentials. From the founding of our government to the year 1890, a period of one hundred and fourteen years, there was appropriated for the use of our "wards," in round numbers, a billion dollars. Making liberal deductions for the dishonesty of agents and the expenses of administration, there still remains a goodly amount to be accounted for. We are entitled to something more for our money than Indian Villages, Wild West shows and athletic champions.

The Hotel Chaplain

The growth of hotels and boarding houses with their hosts of individuals and families who have no associations outside of the buildings in which they live is responsible for a new functionary in the person of the "hotel chaplain," a minister whose views are so liberal as to include all and sundry. As yet the hotel chapel has not been provided for, but it is only a question of time. The probabilities are that the next huge caravansary that is erected will include either a properly equipped chapel or a hall or parlor which can be set apart for the purpose. The hotel chaplain is ready to officiate at baptisms or burials, to perform the marriage ceremony at short notice, to admonish the wicked or comfort the afflicted. When the banker's favorite daughter elopes with the family coachman there will now be no necessity for rousing the aged minister from his first sound sleep, and the pathetic figure in worn and threadbare coat, picking his painful way through the snowdrifts to attend the bedside of some dying millionaire, rich in all but the priceless gems of faith and charity, will have to disappear. It will soon be a case of "you press the button, we do the rest." The baby unbaptized and the great sinner unshriven will be no more. The preacher will be as available as the bell boy. A new field will be opened for the "younger sons," who are averse to manual work and have not the capacity for law or medicine. It ought not to take a great quantity of theology to fit one for the place. A good social presence would seem to be more to the purpose, and "livings" in the gift of proprietors or owners would be no more out of place than those owned by English squires. One can imagine the appearance of advertisements in the "want" columns, setting forth the qualications of the applicants for employment:

Tall, gray-haired clergyman of benevolent appearance wishes situation in first-class family hotel. Formerly rector of church in fashionable parish of large city. Well acquainted in society.

Young man, athletic build, dark hair and eyes, wishes engagement as chaplain in first-class family hotel. Recent graduate of theological seminary. Good tenor voice. Unmarried.

Cowboy preacher from out West would like to try his hand roping in metropolitan sinners. Will dress in character. Sure to draw crowds.

Liberal gentleman of refined tastes would like to officiate as chaplain in a fashionable hotel. No objection to card parties, theatres, balls, or other amusements of the smart set.

Widower without encumbrance would like to preside as chaplain. Marriage a specialty. References.

A clergyman of undenominational views would like to preside over the religious welfare of a first-class hotel. Is connected both by blood and marriage with the highest society. Irreproachable manners and appearance. Has had experience in this line of work. Best of references.

The theological seminaries might undertake to train students especially, and it ought to provide an opening for at least a portion of the college output who have neither the energy for manual work, the brains for intellectual employment, the capital for business nor the pull for politics.

What Others Say

The testimony of a newspaper as to the growth of its own popularity is not always to be relied upon, for publishers usually entertain an exalted opinion of their own achievements. When a newspaper has abundant space for the exploitation of its self-esteem it should be viewed with suspicion. Town Talk has never been addicted to the practice of calling attention to its own merits, being quite convinced that if a newspaper has merit it is bound to win recognition, a conviction that has been satisfactorily demonstrated. Some weeks ago we published a paragraph from a Canadian journal pronouncing Town Talk the best paper of its kind on the American continent. Now we are pleased to publish the following from the Santa Clara News, being a sample of the complimentary allusions made from time to time by the interior press:

Trite things are being said by "The Saunterer" in San Francisco Town Talk each week. Whether one is familiar with the whirl in the Bay City or not, there is genuine interest in each issue of this excellent journal. It contains more of value than all the daily papers of the week. Town Talk goes straight at questions and treats them fearlessly, intelligently and with precision that gives evidence of familiarity with conditions. Society, art, business and all the varied interests of the metropolis are considered its marks for comment. That it generally hits the mark is probably the reason that it is the most read publication in San Francisco at this time. People over the State are now reading it every week and in the best homes it is welcomed and given the attention that the excellence of its literary qualities commands.

An Appreciation of Appreciation

Artistic creation presupposes appreciation. The one is male, generative; the other female, receptive. A work of art is incomplete, enjoys as it were but a potential existence until it wins adequate recognition. In the marriage of a masterpiece and the public there is something sadly amiss when the bridegroom is received with indifference instead of delight. The longing of genius for fame, for appreciation, is as natural as the desire of a man for a maid. When Balzac through one of his characters confesses his own lifelong hunger to be loved and to be famous, it is but the genius in him and the man, each in its own way, expressing the selfsame ambition. The artist, not for himself but for his work, would have the world to wife.

Now with the single exception of having the creative faculty itself, there is no greater mark of distinction, no more delightful natural endowment, than the possession of an innate preference for "the best that is known and thought in the world"; and, I might add, artistically done in the world. This preference, like all other "born gifts," comes to perfection only by means of the most careful culture. Taste, that is, a genuine—not a pretended—preference for the best, is the sign of nobility; he who has it is of God's own peerage.

Appreciation of the best, no less than production of the best, requires superabundant energy—physical, mental, sexual. The preference for the mediocre, now prevalent, is evidence, not only of vulgarity, but also of invirility. So is the vaudeville vogue. We are a nation of nerves. The pace at which we are going is killing out art among us. Art is produced "without haste, without rest." And we are all hustlers. We have no repose. We do not know the meaning of leisure. We even (oh, horror!) make love in a hurry! The "stunt" idea dominates our art products. We will have entertainment at any price. As a matter of fact, we pay perfection for it. The artist must adopt the method of the street speaker who, in order to attract the passing crowd, opens his exordium in tones appropriate to a peroration only. We are a vaudeville audience—brain fagged, physically depleted, impotent of appreciation. Every now and then attention nods without perpetual prodding, we should fall asleep. We are as indifferent as drowsy drudges. Our irresponsiveness calls for cantharides. Everything must be over-done, obvious; and the obvious is ever the inartistic. There must be no demand upon our understanding. The artist must not pay us the compliment of taking for granted in us a "kindred art." Not finesse, nor subtlety, nor suggestion delights us, but the facile feat, the trite trick. Emphasis that is an insult, calls forth applause; and as for action—art seems to be engaged in solving the problem of perpetual motion. We have no time to wait for the working up of a mood, for the psychological moment. Climaxes, it seems, may occur without any leading up whatever. Leisure for fine approaches, time in which to be wooed with delicacy, apparently is not at our disposal. Like coarse country wenches, we allow ourselves to be rudely caught and kissed, and let go again about our business. The few virtuous avoid libraries, picture galleries and concert rooms, lest they fall victims to criminal assaults.

The public, far from resenting the insults everywhere offered her, seems rather to invite them. There is even from many self-styled cultured quarters a forestalling of criticism by a frank avowal of Philistinism. "I thank God," says the inverted Pharisee, "for a human depravity of taste. Beethoven is, I must confess, above me; but ragtime is all right; I feel it in my feet. George Ade and his jokes I enjoy, but Walter Pater and his perfection—nit! As for your Mona Lisa, she isn't in it with this chromo of a ballet-dancer! Yes, I thank God that I am as other men; not like this here saint of the senses." Such tunes are very popular; people will dance to them and—pay the piper well. Culture, too, has its demagogues.

Similarly, a man may gain not a little reputation for wisdom, and make quite a pretty penny besides, by setting out upon an alleged impartial examination of the facts of existence, and then after all coming by roundabout roads to commonplace conclusions. Such an one seems to set the seal of philosophical approval upon public opinion. A truly pleasant and profitable philosophy is that which affords every fool an opportunity of declaring: "That's just exactly what I've always thought myself, and as good as said so a dozen times or more!"

Abroad things are no better. "Do you know in this Paris, which is so great, one single house in which literature is talked about?" Thus writes the flawless artist, Flaubert, to George Sand. And again, on the occasion of the death of Gautier, writing in the same vein to the same "dear master," he asks: "Whom shall I see now when I go to Paris? with whom talk of what interests me? I know some thinkers, at least people who are styled such, but an artist! Where is there one?"

No wonder La Bruyere gives vent to his feelings in this sad sarcasm: "After the spirit of discernment, the rarest things in the world are diamonds and pearls!"

In San Francisco, as in Paris, the houses are few and far between in which literature, music, or painting—art, in a word—is talked about. "When it is approached," as Flaubert further complains to his friend, "it is always by its subaltern and exterior sides, the question of success, morality, utility, etc."

Meanwhile artists everywhere and their kindred deplore the paucity of those who have an indubitable preference for the best, who know a good thing when they see it, who recognize the Goddess of Beauty, veiled or unveiled, in whatsoever guise or disguise it pleases her to appear, who do not ask of her to advertise her charms like a wanton, to solicit, to importune, with provocative speech and gesture the preoccupied passers-by. Harry Cowell.

Phelan Backs Lane Again

The story is rife in political circles that Mr. James D. Phelan has put twenty-five thousand dollars into a campaign fund to be used in the interest of Franklin K. Lane, who is already glad-handing his way towards the mayoralty. The supposition is that they have entered into a compact by which it is agreed that in the event of Lane's election Mr. Phelan shall be permitted to handle the greater part of the patronage of the city government. Mr. Lane is a unique campaigner, and a very active one. He has opened the present campaign in Washington, whence have come some exclusive and amusing despatches to the Bulletin, which has always been a consistent supporter of Mr. Phelan. The booming of Lane began with a despatch about his being entertained at the White House by President Roosevelt. They had lunch together according to the despatch, and it was hinted that they had a heart to heart talk. But Teddy must have lunched twice that day for it was the day on which he had lunch with some distinguished diplomats. It is customary for all provincial statesmen to visit the White House when in Washington, and refreshments are always on tap on such occasions. Perhaps Mr. Lane imagined that the refreshments on that particular day were in his honor.

Lane's Wonderful Achievements

In another despatch the readers of the Bulletin were told that Mr. Lane had acted as mediator between the Shipbuilders' Trust and the employes of the Union Iron Works. He had hypnotized Mr. Nixon, the President of the Trust, and the latter, at his solicitation, had kindly agreed to grant them a raise of wages. If Mr. Lane had gone East a little earlier he might have settled the Pennsylvania coal strike. If he had been in Washington when Senator Morgan stopped talking against the Panama canal project he could have claimed the credit for having persuaded the old gentleman to take his seat. There is a whole lot of glory awaiting him in the East, for many important problems requiring solution will arise before the primary election. But probably his most important mission is to convince Mr. Hearst that the Examiner should support him. And that may not be difficult of achievement, for Mr. Hearst is a candidate himself. He is anxious for Democratic harmony all over the country, and if he believed that the local Democracy wanted Lane for Mayor he would probably be for him, too.

Why Lane Sought Nixon

Mr. Lane's interview with Mr. Nixon, according to private reports that have reached this city, was more in the interest of the candidate for Mayor than of the employes of the Union Iron Works. Mr. Nixon is an influential Democrat and takes a great interest in national politics. He is on very friendly terms with Mr. Hearst, and was one of the latter's most enthusiastic supporters in his recent Congressional campaign. Lane went East ostensibly on legal business for the city, but in reality to invoke the influence of Nixon with a view of having William R. Hearst persuaded to harmonize the local Democracy by espousing the Lane cause. Lane believes that there can be no harmony until the Examiner agrees to boom him for Mayor, and though his friends throughout the State are abusing Hearst for not having supported the head of the ticket in the late gubernatorial campaign, he is striving to win the Hearst favor. It will be interesting to watch developments.

The Tables are Turned

The evolution of the domestic troubles of Police Commissioner Hutton will be watched with more than ordinary interest by those who recall the fact that he was the attorney for the Baroness Turkheim. That notorious individual, it will be remembered, was the nemesis of D. M. Delmas during an exciting period in his life. She was formerly a coryphee in a visiting spectacular show, and her real name was Young. She made such a pleasing impression on some of the fast young men about town that she retired from the stage to plunge into the tenderloin whirl. She found it both profitable and congenial, and in the course of time she was installed in a sumptuous residence, and then she posed as a married woman. To give verisimilitude to the role she became a mother and then she began to take herself seriously. At the same time she developed a feeling of deep resentment toward Mr. Delmas, and she sought to enforce claims against him that were of a very embarrassing nature. Her most cordial supporter was one H. W. Hutton who was then an obscure lawyer, but who is now a police commissioner of this city.

Hutton Destined to Squirm

Very few attorneys could have been induced to cooperate with a woman of the character of Miss Young in an effort to disgrace a fellow-member of the bar. Hutton is one of the few. He did succeed in making Mr. Delmas very uneasy, but the woman was finally lured into a trip abroad by a persuasive individual who posed as the Baron Turkheim, a German nobleman, but who was none other than a private hawkshaw. Now Mr. Delmas is having his inning for he is the attorney for Mr. Hutton's wife, and he may be depended upon to give the police commissioner more than one unpleasant quarter of an hour when they meet in court. Delmas is in a position to make Hutton squirm, and I am quite sure that he will show him no mercy. Recall the experience of Baron von Schroeder in a San Rafael court room on a certain memorable occasion, and then it will be easier to picture the fate of Police Commissioner Hutton.

The Horner Case

All sorts of sensational developments may be looked for when the Huttons begin to lave the family linen in court. Mrs. Hutton is a woman with quite an interesting past. She inherited her property from Dr. Horner, who, I believe, was her second husband. He kept a drug store at the corner of Sutter and Hyde streets, and they lived over the store. There one morning he was found dead, and upon investigation it was found that his death resulted from an overdose of choloroform. The case excited a great deal of interest at the time. It appeared that the doctor was a victim of insomnia and that he was in the habit of administering chloroform to himself by means of a sponge attached to a cord on a pulley with a weight at the other end. There was some question at the time as to whether the present Mrs. Hutton was the bona fide widow of the deceased, but she produced a marriage certificate, and I believe that Hutton was her attorney in all matters pertaining to the estate. A few years after the death of Dr. Horner his widow was sued by a Mrs. Kendall for five thousand dollars for services rendered in connection with the settlement of the estate. She produced a written agreement with Mrs. Horner but it was pronounced a forgery. Mrs. Kendall was a woman with a picturesque past, and she had been involved in some very unsavory litigation.

Sequel to a Love Story

The Jarboe divorce occasioned no surprise among the acquaintances of the young people. Young Jarboe inherited the physical features but none of the talents of his father, who was a most successful office lawyer. He made a reputation in real estate and banking circles by finding fly-specks on land titles. The marriage of Eleanor Dimond and Paul Jarboe was a love-match, but the young wife soon lost interest in a husband whose chief ambition was to play golf and lawn tennis. He is a lawyer but he never practiced. The Jarboes are of ultra blue-blooded stock, and the probability is that the red corpuscles in Paul's veins were crowded out by the blue ones. Mrs. Jarboe Sr. is one of the literary cult. She wrote that much talked of atavistic novel, "Robert Atterbury," the hero of which inherited consumption while the heroine inherited insanity. Kathryn Jarboe has written many bright things, and her marriage with Jerome Case Bull of Munsey's secured for her entree to the New York literary swim. The Bulls left magazining for ranching, a few years ago, but they still devote time to literature. Mrs. Paul Jarboe also has a talent for writing. She has had several charming little love stories published, though not over her own name.

The Literary Itch

The literary microbe has become very active in California. Never before were so many people afflicted with cacoethes scribendi. Almost everybody who knows how to work a typewriter has developed symptoms that are diagnosed by their friends as "literary genius." Over in Berkeley Lawrence Rising, the nineteen year old son of Professor Rising, is at work on a novel, the scenes of which are laid in Europe. During a recent trip to Europe he wrote letters to the Chronicle that attracted some attention. In Berkeley he is thought to be a genius because he didn't graduate from the University. To graduate from Berkeley is a commonplace achievement. Joseph T. Goodman, the famous decipherer of the Mazan hieroglyphics of Central America, who used to own the Virginia City Enterprise and who discovered Mark Twain, has gone to work on a novel. Years ago he wrote poetry and short stories, but he became wealthy and took up the Mazan mysteries. Having made a reputation in the scientific world he now hopes to cut a swath in the fiction field. He resides in a beautiful home in Alameda and seldom comes to the city. From Paris comes the news that Mrs. Alice Rix O'Leary is at work on a book.

Her Work in Demand

Mabel Craft Deering is becoming the most prolific of our short story writers, and from the East comes the report that there is a demand for her work in all the high-class magazine offices. Another of her stories has been accepted by Munsey's and one appeared in the April Everybody's.

A Girl That Does Things

News comes to me from the East that Miss Grace Bailey of this city has a novel in the hands of a publisher. Miss Bailey has been writing short stories for years, but as she always publishes them modestly under a nom de plume her intimate friends only are aware of her success in the literary world. Few society girls possess her varied accomplishments, and she is one of the few that do things worth doing. She devotes little of her time to the frivolous diversions that absorb the attention of most girl in society, and consequently she is not made notorious by the Bavardes of the local press. She is one of five charming sisters, only two of whom are married though there have been suitors galore. Miss Grace Bailey is a crack shot with either rifle or pistol, a daring horsewoman and a clever angler. In her den she has many trophies of the chase, one of them being the skin of one of the biggest wildcats ever shot in California. It was brought down by her with a single bullet. I hear that her chief ambition is to shoot a tiger. The Bailey girls are all native daughters, and received their early education in Paris, whither they went after the death of their father.

The Pursuit of a Plum

The Legislature at its recent session appropriated one hundred and thirty thousand dollars for a California State exhibit at the St. Louis exposition and the selection of a commissioner to represent California is now in the hands of Governor Pardee. One J. Aubrey Jones of Oakland is an applicant for the job. His qualifications are unknown outside of Oakland, and the supposition is that he became an applicant merely for the reason that he resides in Oakland. Since the election of Pardee it is the theory of the politicans across the bay that for every job in the gift of the Governor there should be at least one applicant from Oakland. Hence, J. Aubrey Jones. However it is believed that Mr. M. H. de Young will get the commissionership. During the World's Fair in Chicago Mr. De Young secured more substantial recognition for this State than was ever vouchsafed it before or since.

Going Abroad to Live

Miss O'Sullivan, who is going abroad to remain indefinitely, is one of our society women of whom one rarely reads in the "doings of the smart set." Yet she belongs to the real inner circle here, and is invited everywhere though she does not always go. One does see her at the concerts and occasional lectures, and at church, for she is a very devout Catholic. During her mother's long illness, the cares of keeping up the big house, lately sold and torn down to make room for a new apartment house, at the corner of Bush and Leavenworth streets, fell upon her shoulders. She entertained her friends in a quiet way, more especially after her brother Denis married and during his rare visits home. She is a slender, refined looking girl with classic features. Miss O'Sullivan expects to stay in Paris for some time, and when her brother Joe marries she will be at the wedding. She will also spend some time in London when the Denis O'Sullivans go there for Mr. O'Sullivan's concert engagements. Jack O'Sullivan has been away from San Francisco for some years; he is a mining engineer and married.

The Campbell Family

Now that the Campbells are coming—Mrs. Pat and Nanky, Panky Pooh—theatre-goers are beginning to sit up and take notice. It having been announced by the Columbia management that Mrs. Campbell would not play on Good Friday night, some people imagined that that was one way of advertising. But Mrs. Campbell never did play on Good Friday, and she doesn't have to advertise in that way. That she is a woman of strong individuality is evidenced in a measure by her fidelity to her real name, a most unromantic cognomen for a fashionable actress. "Mrs. Pat," as she is familiarly called in London, acquired that name, when she was barely seventeen by a runaway marriage with Patrick Campbell, the nineteen-year old son of a London banker. Forced to part from her a little later, to seek employment in South Africa, it was seven years before he was able to join his wife again. Meanwhile she had become an actress, and had achieved her great success in "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray." He returned, by the way, in Holy Week, and Mrs. Campbell retired from the stage so that they could spend their Easter in a cottage at Rottingdean. When the war broke out in South Africa Mr. Campbell volunteered in the Imperial Yeomanry and one day his name was included in Lord Methuen's list of dead at Rietfontein. Few that read the name, "4810, Sgt. Patrick Campbell," knew that the deceased was the husband of the famous actress.

In the Days of Our Youth

Our local theatrical magnates appear to be intent on reminding us that we are growing old. Or perhaps they have merely developed a penchant for the renaissance in dramatic art. First our recollections of the long ago were revived by the appearance of Effie Ellsler at the Columbia, the same Effie that thrilled us in "Hazel Kirke" and later on in "Called Back." Then came that popular leading lady of a bygone generation, Rose Coghlan, who first revealed her superb art to us when she came out with Osmond Tearle in "The Silver King." And next we are to see the perennial Kate Claxton, who played "The Two Orphans" at the Baldwin about the year 1881. It is over twenty years since the venerable Katherine visited us, and she had been playing "The Two Orphans" fully a decade before her appearance here. She was playing it in the Brooklyn theatre the night of the fire that destroyed the building in which many lives were lost. Yea, long before then Kate Claxton was playing leading roles, one of them being in "Mazeppa." Such maturity has she attained that it is no longer indelicate to discuss her age. One of the few surviving contemporaries of her youth is that century plant of the operatic stage, Adelina Patti, who is soon to bloom again on the concert stage, and who is coming this way to complete the list of immortals. The lives of great actresses serve to remind us that those of the matinee heroes are somewhat evanescent. The matinee hero leads such a strenuous life that he is cut off in the prime of it, leaving nary a footprint in the sands of time, but the dashing leading lady bobs up perennially, radiant in the full blush of an artistic make-up.

ourt Adjourned for a Fight

Justice of the Peace Brown of Santa Rosa is, I should judge from a recent incident, one of the old school of magistrates, a school that is now almost extinct. During the preliminary examination of a man charged with bribery before him last week, attorney Francis Heney, of this city, who represented the defendant, engaged in a very sultry discussion with a witness named Holmes, an ex-chief of police of Santa Rosa. Heney is a very aggressive attorney and his ire was aroused by the curt replies of the witness. Just as it was threatening to become a case of verbis ad verbera, Justice Brown interposed with the courteous suggestion that if the gentlemen really desired to have a little scrap he would adjourn court on his own motion for their accommodation.

"Adjourn court, then," said Heney.

"Court's adjourned," said Justice Brown, and all hands repaired just beyond the portals of the temple of justice. There Heney faced Holmes and denounced him in very severe terms. Citizens stepped between them, and then Holmes proceeded to reply. But no fight was permitted, though Justice Brown was on hand to see fair play.

The Lowry Will

This incident, by the way, grew out of an interesting will contest concerning which very meagre news has been published. Forged wills have become so common in this State that they no longer excite much interest unless many millions of dollars are involved. The document in question purported to be the last will of Mrs. Lowry, wife of Dr. J. W. Lowry. She was formerly the widow of a man named Farmer, a Santa Rosa banker, from whom she inherited an estate valued at eighty thousand dollars. She had three children by her first husband, a son and two daughters, and as no will was found immediately after her death, her husband proceeded to administer on her estate. Several months passed by and just as Dr. Lowry was about to wind up his administration, a document, purporting to be the last will of Mrs. Lowry, was sent through the mail to the county clerk. According to its terms the entire estate was bequeathed to the three children, and the son, Charles Farmer, was appointed executor. He then applied for probate of the will.

Palpable Perjury

The case never came to trial, but while preparing for it both sides engaged in crimination and recrimination, and as a consequence an attorney, L. P. Schlotterbach, was indicted for bribery, and indictments for perjury were presented against two of the men who testified against him. Schlotterbach was associated with Heney as counsel for Dr. Lowry, and it appears that they suspected a man named Underhill of having forged the will, and it was for negotiating with him to induce him to expose the whole plot that Schlotterbach was indicted for bribery. On his examination Holmes testified to having heard the defendant offering to bribe Underhill, but his description of the scene of the incident and of his position on that occasion was such that it became apparent that it was an impossibility for him to have heard the alleged conversation. He was therefore indicted for perjury. Meanwhile the will contest was compromised. Dr. Lowry is to receive sixteen thousand dollars, which is about all that he would have been entitled to had no will been filed. It is said that the two daughters of the deceased were so well satisfied that the will was a forgery that they declined to join their brother in pressing the application for probate.

Why the Pope Stood

An interesting story is told by a local clergyman who recently returned from Rome, explanatory of the action of Pope Leo on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of his election, in standing on the platform of his chair of state, the "Sedia Gestatoria," as he was borne into the nave of St. Peter's, and then rising again as he left the Basilica after blessing the assembled thousands. To be able to stand steadily on that moving chair is no trifling feat for a man of ninety-three. The famous conveyance is nothing more than a flooring about six feet long and four wide, upon which is fixed a gorgeous throne encrusted with ivory and gold. Long poles like those of an Indian palanquin project from the four corners, and four footmen of the Papal household carry these high on their shoulders. It required extraordinary pluck in a man of ninety-three years to stand on a moving, narrow floor, five feet above ground. The effort was made because of rumors that the white-robed figure borne on the gilded throne on state occasions was not the real Pontiff but a clever waxwork figure, made to move automatically and bless with uplifted hand. It is easy for those who have seen the Pope so borne to understand how such a report came to be credited by the ignorant. The colorless face, the marble, mask-like features, the slow, almost mechanical movements, might well be those of a mere automaton.

Absurd as the rumor was it was believed by many who persisted that Leo XIII had long been dead, and that the Cardinals to subserve their own purposes concealed the truth. The hundreds of people who are received annually by the Pope, know that he is very much alive, for they have marveled at the keenness of intellect, the abounding energy and shrewd insight of the wonderful nonagenarian But the ignorant had to be convinced, and so the indomitable old man stood erect on his gliding throne, spreading out his hands to bless his kneeling people.

Lionizing the Wilcox Family

It was a picturesque and wonderful aggregation that paid homage to Ella Wheeler Wilcox in the maple room of the Palace on Friday night of last week. And Ella herself, the industrious purveyor of oracular platitudes for the enlightenment of backstairs femininity, was the most picturesque and wonderful of all the throng, barring, perhaps, Mr. Ella Wheeler Wilcox. She is a nervous little woman with abrupt and jerky movements suggestive of the feline being rubbed toward the tail. And Gertrude was right—the Wilcox locks are "mouse-colored" and "ashen." Mrs. Wilcox was tired, and had a cold in the head, and of course it didn't improve her appearance. Mr. Wilcox was the object of much interest. He is a short, fat man with a hooked nose. He did not turn up until quite late, and when he did put in an appearance Mrs. Wilcox jumped up and uttered a little ejaculation of delight that punctured the compliments of a gentleman in a white vest of brocaded satin. Mr. Wilcox spent most of the evening in the supper room. The gowns worn by the ladies were a study in the evolution of feminine fashions during the last quarter of a century. One middle-aged dame looked like an amiable old Turkish chair with sky-blue upholstery and tassels, and there was one in a shirt-waist with a nervous manner who asked Mrs. Wilcox for a rose from her corsage and received a spray of maiden-hair and a faint smile.

Why Ella Is So Popular

Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox is interested in many things, especially in public morality; and that she herself is interesting to all sorts and conditions of men and women is proved by the newspaper fact that she receives weekly no less than an average of three hundred letters. But what, if any, interest does the reformed poetess of passion take in literature? If we are to judge from her recent writings—none at all. (It is now Lent, and for my own literary sins I have been foregoing Flaubert and reading her.) As all the world knows to its cost, it is easier to preach than to write poetry; it is also much easier to preach than to write artistic prose; and that any one who could be an artist would be a preacher and nothing more is explicable not otherwise than by having recourse to the doctrine of natural depravity. Moreover, the only permanent sermons are those that are preserved by style. There is nothing so ephemeral as ugliness. The Immorality of Ugliness! there, if you will, is a theme for a petticoated preacher. "What is beautiful is moral—there is the whole thing." But the public, as the greatest of stylists goes on to declare, hates one who writes well, "because style forces it to think, obliges it to work." On the other hand it adores—Ella Wheeler Wilcox!

A Dabbler In Words

"Truth," says Marcus Aurelius, "is my business, and it never hurt any one." "Beauty," boasts the artist, "is my business, and it has helped millions." Goodness is I suppose the business of the priest, laic or cleric as the case may be, but the most perfect priests are never goody-good, never preachy. They are ever exquisite artists and know better than to teach the dismal doctrine that goodness is gray, ugly, repellant. On the contrary, they make her look like Beauty's self. Read Cardinal Newman, artist-priest. To be really a reformer of things that need reforming is noble, but not nobler than to be an artist, a joy-maker. Rarely is a person both. The reformer as a rule succeeds in silencing the artist, though Ruskin was an artist to the last. "Man, the reformer," is one thing; man, the joy-master, another. Both use words as means to their several ends. Indeed we all use words to express our commonplace wants and opinions; we are all dabblers in the difficult art of making ourselves understood. And words form the material for a piece of literature. Hence arise confusion and no end of errors. Here we come to the conclusion of the whole matter—the cause of the style-detesting public's persistence in treating Ella Wheeler Wilcox as a literary personage, a literary lioness, even. She, too, makes use of words.

Why She Turned Reformer

Far be it from me for an uncritical moment to infer that Mrs. Wilcox was ever an artist or could become one under any circumstances. The author of "Poems of Passion" is, I believe, an excellent woman, but the majority of excellent persons can write neither poetry nor the prose that has "that other beauty" proper to it as an art. However she is popularly considered to be a poet who gave up her divine calling to be a high priestess of the cult of the New Thought. To be the exponent of thought that is new, true, and significant, is one of the most difficult things in the world; to be the exponent of the New Thought is very different and much less difficult. Had Mrs. Wilcox been indeed a poet, would she have been wise to turn preacher of platitudes? She would not. There is now living a man who had in him the making of an artist; but he repudiated the rare vocation in favor of that of reformer. His name is Tolstoi, the author of "Anna Karenina," the one-time friend of Ivan Turgenev. Time alone can tell which of these two great Russians chose the better part; which did the more for his country and for humankind. When Tolstoi's now prominent place knows him no more, will any artist, I wonder, be ready to write for him a prose-poem to match Renan's matchless "Farewell to Turgenev"? Will any stylist preserve the styleless reformer from the writer's second death? Then must he die indeed; for style is the one thing that Time spares. Alas, for the makers of paper coffins!

By a pen-slip last week I made Miss Adams the artist who exhibits miniatures of Mrs. Henry Crocker and Mrs. Cutter at the Hopkins. The miniatures were done by Miss Laura Prather.

They Are Loyal Little Germans

The return of the Baroness von Schroeder to the Hotel Rafael caused very little commotion in the suburban village. The gossips in San Rafael imagine that the baroness has become quite continental in her manners and habits, and they say that she has lived so long in Germany that she prefers it above all other countries as a place of residence. It is recalled that when the Von Schroeder children were at the Hotel Rafael a few years ago they were very ardent in their expression of Prussian sentiment, and it was evident that they were devoted to the fatherland. One day they had a quarrel with other children in the hotel over the relative merits of the German and American flags. Mrs. Warfield was called upon to smooth matters and she explained to the Baroness von Schroeder that the children who had quarreled with her offspring meant no harm, and that they should be excused because "they're such thoroughly loyal little Americans."

"And," said the baroness, "my children are just as thoroughly loyal little Germans." They are the grandchildren, by the way, of the late Peter Donahue.

The Spreckels Baby

The Rudolph Spreckels's have imported a trained nurse from the East to take care of the most recent of the Spreckels children. So great was the shock caused by the death of their son that they have been filled with great anxiety over the health of the baby. The child is weighed every day, and its temperature is taken regularly. Its food is analyzed, and there is no precaution that is not exercised. The nurse feels that there is a great responsibility on her shoulders, and she takes her situation very seriously. She is perhaps the highest priced nurse on the coast. And by the way she looks very much like the Joliffe girls.

The Wagner Baby

Helen Wagner has now a little half-brother, her step-mamma having presented Mr. Wagner with an olive branch. Mr. Wagner's marriage immediately after that of his daughter, Lilian McCarthy, with Mr. J. J. Moore, was as much of a surprise to his daughters as to the world and his spouse. I hear that young Huntington's fancy still strays to Miss Wagner and there are those who have faith in the outcome. At present he spends most of his time in Los Angeles and his engaging, democratic ways have made him a tremendous favorite.

The Fashionable Cake-Walk

An odd Lenten diversion of half a dozen society girls was a course of "cake-walking." They met at each other's houses and had an instructor who is the real thing from the cut of his pigeon wings to his chocolate-colored skin. They have been pronounced expert gyrators in the art by their drill master. Cake-walks will be indulged in at the house parties which everybody who has a country home will give. Bids are already being given for these house parties so that the guests can make their plans dove-tail. There are several people in Napa county who like to have people up with them to help incarnadine the country lanes and the people who own big "ranches" down south have promised fiesta times, so the summer forecast for house-parties is very gay and cake-walks will count more than crops.

Though the end cannot justify the means many people are praised for their achievements, who if their methods were considered would be universally execrated.

A Critic Barred

An occasional correspondent writes me from London that there has been a great commotion over the refusal of the management of the Garrick theatre to give the Times critic, Mr. Walkley, a seat at the first-night performance of Henry Arthur Jones's new play, "Whitewashing Julia." Instead of buying a seat the critic went to his office and inserted a plaintive note to the effect that he could not review the play because he had been refused admission! Imagine an American newspaper man doing such a thing! Mr. Jones explains that the Times always stoops to personalities in criticising his plays. The quarrel has brought to light the fact that critics are expected to "slop over" by the London theatres. The trouble with the Jones play is that he attempts as usual to portray life in the upper circles, about which he knows nothing. Up to six years ago his career was laid in another sphere. He began life as a commercial traveler, an individual who is known in London as a "bagman." His calling did not conduce to contact with peeresses, literary lights and smart people generally.

Mrs. Ward Blunders

"Mrs. Humphrey Ward," writes the same correspondent, "has also contributed to the gayety of the season by publishing a new novel, 'Lady Rose's Daughter.' She knows as little about the upper circles as Mr. Jones, yet nothing gives her greater pleasure than to write about the people of whose lives, habits and mannerisms she is profoundly ignorant. Her book is a mass of blunders wound round a collection of dukes. Everybody is vastly amused but everybody is reading the book just to poke fun at it and the publishers are happy."

The Magnetism of Mrs. Martin

The fame of Mrs. Eleanor Martin as a social leader has spread to Los Angeles, whither she went last week on a pleasure trip, and her presence in the city caused a deal of excitement in the newspaper offices. If Mrs. Astor herself had come to town she could not have excited so much interest. One of the dailies—the Herald—devoted half a column of space to a panegyric on the famous hostess. It was worth at least a dollar a line. Neither Madame Bavarde nor Dorothy Pepys ever penned anything quite so fulsome, but those eminent gushers lack a sense of humor. The affected naivete of the Herald scribe in his apotheosis of Mrs. Martin is deliciously droll. "Mrs. Martin, by her intrinsic charm and native wit, and by her rarely large soul, draws men and women to her in a most magnetic way." Isn't that exquisite? "Even the stubbornest recluse and the most silent misogynist are bound to pay homage at her court. Her invitations are regarded as almost royal commands, and her wishes are law. When she beckons a friend to her side and says, 'Now, Mr. Man, you have got to talk to me and amuse me,' Mr. Man however disinclined to be voluble finds himself eloquent and entertaining without being conscious of cause or effect." Isn't that well sustained humor? The hint that Mrs. Martin exercises an hypnotic influence is most delicately veiled.

More Charming Than Ever

The Herald man with delicious sarcasm hinted at that Lenten dinner which Mrs. Martin gave to Catholic church dignitaries but which Archbishop Riordan and Bishop Montgomery failed to attend. "Although," he said, "she is not doing much in a social way, owing to the exigencies of Lent, she could not refrain from upholding a little her reputation for hospitality, and last night invited a few friends to dine quietly." Mrs. Martin always does those things quietly in Lent because she is a very strict Catholic, socially. Incidentally the Herald humorist dwelt upon Mrs. Martin's wonderful powers of recuperation. "In spite of having gone through a San Francisco season strenuous enough to banish the strongest debutante to a rest cure, Mrs. Martin does not even look fagged, but on the contrary appears to be more beaming than ever."

Since writing the foregoing paragraphs I was greatly amused to find the whole article reprinted in the Post by Dorothy Pepys, who is Mrs. Martin's most enthusiastic boomer, and who evidently regarded it as serious. The launching of a joke unlabeled is often a case of love's labor lost.

At Scott's Expense

Mr. Henry T. Scott has stolen a march on the Citizens' Committee and arranged to entertain President Roosevelt at lunch down at Burlingame. However it is not to be a case of Scott hospitality, for the thrifty shipbuilder is not to have access this time to the treasury of the committee. He will pay for the lunch out of his own pocket.

During the month of March an exhibit of the photographic work of Mr. F. O. Bratton and Mr. E. J. Kemp has adorned the walls of the Camera Club rooms. Mr. Bratton's work consists of cat pictures, showing Tabby in all her moods. Mr. Kemp displays some fine landscapes, some local, some English, and still others illustrating life in the Moqui country. A silhouette of Alcatraz challenges immediate attention, and many of the Indian scenes are exceedingly interesting both as phases of life and as triumphs of photographic art. During the coming month Mr. Albert J. Le Breton and Mr. D. H. Wulzen Jr. will give a joint exhibition of their work.

Theodore Wores is having an exhibition of his Japan, Samoa and Hawaii canvases at the Noe gallery in New York, and the critics speak well of them. The Hawaiian Fisher Boy appears to be the particular favorite, though the "Ponciana," that brilliant splash of red foliage which was so liked when shown at his Bohemian Club exhibition, also comes in for a share of praise.

The Mrs. Astor of Marin

The Upper Thirteen of San Rafael has been suffering from chaos ever since the departure of that sprightly leader, Mrs. W. B. Bradford, who with her husband, formerly secretary of the Alaska Packers' Association, has been touring Europe with one of those innumerable excursions which are sent broadcast over the earth by the Cook company. Mrs. Bradford is the Mrs. Astor of the Upper Thirteen, but that envious position was not achieved without a struggle. For a time her leadership was hotly disputed by a Mrs. Whittimore whose husband is an attorney, and who had two charming daughters, both fond of social diversions. Matters came to a climax when the eldest daughter, Julia, married Harry Wise. Mrs. Whittimore gave a reception in their honor and issued some two hundred and fifty invitations. There was a division of sentiment over it, and a little later the Wises closed their San Rafael home. After that the sway of Mrs. Bradford was easy. There is nothing more amusing than the seriousness of the socially pretentious of San Rafael.

The Hollow to Stay "Open"

Dick Hotaling's friends who are used to dropping in at odd hours for short stays, in and out of season, at Sleepy Hollow, are glad to learn that the Hotaling place is not to be closed up this summer as was first planned. The change in date of the St. Louis fair caused the Hotalings to postpone their projected trip East. They had intended to locate this summer somewhere near the Fair grounds. Sleepy Hollow is the most hospitable country-place in California, and John Housman and Dick Hotaling, as alternating hosts, have no equals in their line. Sleepy Hollow is Liberty Hall and to be ami de maison there is considered an honor without compare. Jennie Blair, when at home, is particularly fond of running over for a Saturday to Monday visit at the Marin county home of the Hotalings; the De Youngs frequently take a run down from Meadowlands, their San Rafael place, and the Frank Deerings can always be counted on. Indeed it was at Sleepy Hollow that Mabel Craft first met her husband.

Gossip from Los Angeles

With railroad maps and copies of surveys bulging from his pockets, writes a correspondent, Henry E. Huntington managed last Saturday to snatch enough time from his scramble to secure franchises for street and suburban railways covering about all the territory in Southern California, to attend the laying of the corner-stone of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce. Los Angeles business men concede that Henry E. is the busiest man and the hardest worker among them. Like Roosevelt, Huntington believes in the strenuous life. He works from twelve to fourteen hours a day and seven days a week. And Huntington really works; he does not loll in a luxurious office, ordering other people about, but gets out and sets them a good example. It is a familiar sight to see him walking down Spring street at a rate that makes even the coppers sidestep. As he walks he has a habit of tossing his cane high, as was the fashion many years ago. He however finds some time for relaxation, and was a guest at a quiet little dinner given at the Van Nuys a few nights ago by Mrs. Eleanor Martin. According to those who ought to know young Howard Huntington is following closely the example of his pater and is devoting much time to the duties involved in his position as assistant to Epes Randolph, general manager of the Pacific Electric Railway system. So far, society damsels of the angel city have smiled in vain on young Huntington who, however, has shown no inclination to allow himself to be lionized. He evidently prefers business to society.

Why Mrs. Grundy Is Happy

The social world in Los Angeles is in mourning. By enactment of the City Council druggists must cease catering to the thirsty 400. There are no cafes in the silk stocking district and the invigorating Martini and thirst-quenching bock are no longer forthcoming in response to the wink given the soda fountain artists. In consequence the down-town wine houses are doing a land office business in drinkables concealed in cracker and soap boxes. Since the soda fountain ordinance went into effect the soap box scheme has been worked to the undoing of at least one blue blooded dame on West Adams street. Her whist parties and pink teas have made her famous in the smart set. Rumor has it that the amiable hostess has resorted to the hand laundry as a profit bearing enterprise. The juicy bit of scandal is based on the fact that Pyle's O. K. is regularly delivered at the kitchen entrance in box lots, as often as twice a week. If the lady of the house explains society will be shocked, while if she denies she will not be believed. Mrs. Grundy is happy and the ordinance still lives.

Walter S. Maxwell, society leader, Beau Brummel and mining expert, of Los Angeles, has struck it rich down in Baja California. His "Lunnun" haberdasher has received a cable order for ten suits of Edward Seventh masterpieces of latest Hyde Park mode. Guy Barham has been dethroned and is in retirement on his Antelope Valley ranch, pending the departure of the new fashion plate for London.

Rockefeller's Caddie Surprised

John D. Rockefeller is reputed in Chicago to be a philanthropist, but Los Angeles views him in another light. The other day when the skies were overcast he played golf as usual, but a shower forced him to quit. His caddie expected generous compensation for his services, for he was aware of the fact that Mr. Rockefeller's income grows so fast that he hardly knows what to do with it. He was therefore not surprised when the oil magnate handed him a dollar, but as he is usually paid only twenty-five cents from ordinary individuals he was duly appreciative. He beamed gratefully on Mr. Rockefeller until the multi-millionaire caused his spirits to droop by saying, "Hurry along, little boy, and get the change!"

For Monday in Easter Week

Easter week will open brilliantly with a classical vaudeville entertainment by the Papyrus Club in Golden Gate hall. The Papyrus is a little club of clever women who do things somewhat as they are done in the Bohemian Club. For instance one of the rules is that at every meeting each member must tell a good story. The idea originated with Mrs. W. P. Buckingham, who is the vice-president. She is one of California Club's most active workers. The vaudeville affair will be something out of the ordinary, one of the bits on the program being a sketch written by a prominent clubman.

The Ide girls have been favorites ever since they came to town. They are the daughters of Judge Ide, formerly of Samoa, now of the Philippine Commission. Miss Ide has a beautiful skin while her sister is noted for her lovely hair of red-gold.

The Smith Trio

Three weeks ago Town Talk made exclusive announcement of the fact that the William Tiffanys had separated and were about to be divorced. The other day the news that the divorce decree had been granted the husband was published in the despatches. As I have heretofore stated Mrs. Tiffany is one of the three Smith sisters of Mobile, all of whom have figured in the divorce court and have been prominent socially. The other night I met in one of the after-theatre cafes the woman who was reputed to be the co-respondent in the Vanderbilt divorce suit. It will be remembered that to give his wife ground for divorce, and to shoulder all the blame, William K. Vanderbilt, who married Alma Smith, carried on a liaison publicly with a woman in Paris. It was said that she was formerly a resident of San Francisco, and the one referred to has returned to her old home. Mrs. Vanderbilt was married to Ollie Belmont shortly after being freed from her husband, and her sister Mary, who first married Fernando Yznaga, married William Tiffany within a few months after her first divorce. The divorce of the youngest sister "Mimi" from Baron Gaston de Fontenilliat took place recently in Paris.

A Woman of Interesting Experiences

If Ella Wheeler Wilcox's presence had not exhausted the entertaining energies of the clubwomen, they would have paid more attention to Ellen Stone. She was in the city this week and though her lecture at the Alhambra Tuesday night drew many church people and some of the society element, the ransomed missionary was not lionized by the women's clubs. Yet just a few months ago her name was in every mouth, and few women can tell of more exciting experiences. Judging from her power of graphic expression and evident culture displayed in her discourse on Tuesday night, Ellen Stone is worthy of her ransom. If all missionaries sent abroad by religious societies to convert the heathen were of the character of Miss Stone much more effective work would be done. Ellen Stone is a woman of about fifty, pleasing looking, with a motherly air and manner.

Too Many Graces

I hear that the engagement of Frank Grace and Theodosia Cook Martin is not such a brilliant one from a financial standpoint, for while John Grace, the father of the young man, is wealthy, he has so many children that none will inherit a very large fortune. At the wedding in Washington the brothers of the groom will be out in force, all acting as ushers. John D. Crimmins Jr., brother of Martin Crimmins, who married Miss Cole, will be the only usher not a member of the Grace family. The Graces and Mrs. McLean Martin are great friends and there is rejoicing on both sides over the prospective union. Theodosia Martin is possessed of a handsome fortune and will inherit more from her grandmother, Mrs. Colton.

The Bride's Presents

The wedding gown of Mrs. Kierstedt was very pretty. It was garnished with the familiar grape design which evidently has not lost its popularity, and also with yards of real lace. Dr. Kierstedt's present to his bride was a beautiful diamond ring and a large diamond brooch. Mrs. George Gibbs gave a silver vase, and the bride received many pieces of chinaware, among them being a plate of very fine quality from Mrs. Salisbury, to be hung on the wall. Harry Stetson's offering was a dozen silver plates, and the Hopkins girls all gave beautiful presents in silver.

Appendicitis in Society

Mr. Hewitt, the fiance of Katherine Clement, was recently operated upon for appendicitis. Miss Clement was very much alarmed about him, but he is greatly improved. She has become as demure as a little lamb since her engagement and never goes anywhere unless Mr. Hewitt is along. All of their friends have been entertaining them and they had a very jolly time until Mr. Hewitt fell ill. It was at Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels's theatre party in their honor that Mr. Hewitt was seized with appendicitis. And by the way, Mr. Rudolph Spreckels has been very ill for several weeks. He has recurring appendicitis, and is sadly in need of an operation, but the medical men think his heart is too weak to react after an anæsthetic.

Corsets for Men

Feminine fashions come from Paris, but the male of the species traces the changes of style in the products of the sartorial art to London. Therefore we should be prepared for the coming of the corset. The following is from the Tailor and Cutter, the principal authority on the sartorial art in the British metropolis: "A walk round the West End today will convince the most sceptical of the satirists who hurled their shafts of ridicule at this fashion a few months ago that they have wasted their energies, and they will do well to learn that fashion's follies have never been, nor ever will be, cured by these invectives. Today the most popular overcoat is the D. B. Frock: the newest lounge is close-fitting at the waist, and if the large number of inquiries we have had during the past week or two for the names and addresses of men's corset manufacturers is any guide to the taste of the smart dressed young man of today, then the wearing of these effeminate articles of attire is on the increase." So, it is bound to come. Tom Magee and Joe Tobin will have no trouble in adopting the new style, but Willie O'Connor and the other young men distinguished for embonpoint will fight shy of it. The corset as an article of masculine wear has long been a feature of wardrobes in military circles, for there are some uniforms in which a fat man looks absurd. Many corpulent gentlemen in cavalry regiments have found it necessary to squeeze into corsets to improve their figures, but public sentiment has never approved the borrowing by men of articles of feminine wearing apparel. If a narrow waist is to be essential to the make-up of a well dressed man, it will not be long before padded hips are as common as stuffed shoulders.

A Female Philanthropist Coming

Mrs. Anderson, who has just given a million dollars to Barnard College, is on her way to San Francisco, and no doubt she will study the ways of Berkeley's fairy godmother and the magnificent monument of Mrs. Stanford's generosity. Mrs. Anderson has said that it was the noble example of these women that suggested her munificent gift to Barnard. Mrs. Anderson's visit may mean much to the local artists, for she is famous for her generosity to young men that paint and draw. Her own husband is an artist and his New York studio is the handsomest in the United States. The Anderson wealth came originally from condensed milk and is rated at over ten millions. Mrs. Anderson has built public baths for the poor in New York and is known as one of the most generous women in the city. Her gift to Barnard places her among the great women educational philanthropists of the country. So her visit to California is of especial interest to the college world.

The Problem Solved

Gwendoline Stewart, who is a California girl and well known among the "settlement" workers in San Francisco, is lecturing in England. Her remarks will interest the local housewives for Miss Stewart has informed the English cousins that California women have solved the servant problem and she is going to point the golden way for them. According to Gwendoline the California housewife has solved the problem by doing her own work. That is true in many cases but the mere housewife who thinks she is doing her work because she cannot get a suitable domestic is unknown to Miss Stewart. According to her, Californian women have discovered that their superior intellect accomplishes tasks so easily, quickly and thoroughly that there is no need of being a slave to a domestic or a domestic slave. Miss Stewart advocates a system of hiring servants to come at certain hours every day, the same as though they worked in a factory, and says that the experiment has proved successful here. Miss Stewart may know what she is talking about but there are some discouraged housekeepers who differ from her.

Brawn vs. Brain

The first of the Rhodes scholarships has been awarded to Eugene Lehman, of the University of Colorado, and later of Yale. The announcement is published in an English periodical under the head of athletics, where a note of rejoicing is sounded, not because young Lehman is a scholar of whom creditable work is to be expected but because "he will be heard of in the football field." If this is the chief qualification to which the young man can lay claim, we should like to know by what right he received his award. Cecil Rhodes was not in any way interested in the advancement of the athletic side of college training and there is nothing in that clause of his will which looks, on the surface, as if he were particularly anxious to have the breed of brawn encouraged. If athletics were made subsidiary to intellect, no one could object to that branch of college education, but intellect is about the last thing thought of in these days. If a youth can uphold the college honors on the cinder path or the foot ball field, he will be hiked along somehow. If circumstances compel his withdrawal before the end of his course every newspaper in the community is filled with regrets, but let him be only a first-class student, and he is easily spared. Can one imagine a more ridiculous spectacle than that of professor of elocution drilling a band of students in "yelling," for their foot ball game? And what does the champion amount to after his college days are over? He will not engage in any manual occupation by which his trained muscles can be of use. He did not go to college with the idea of spending his life in work. Not a bit of it. For awhile he may tide along as a coach, later he will become a trainer of professionals, and eventually a saloon keeper. Isn't the tax for maintaining "institutions of higher education" somewhat exorbitant for the training of bar tenders?

Mr. and Mrs. George Toy and their daughter, who are now in Santa Barbara, will with the Henry Sonntags be among the first to go to San Rafael in May. The Walter Deans and Miss Dean and the Baron and Baroness von Schroeder will be among the San Rafael sojourners this season.

The Grants Are Here

Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Grant have come up from San Diego, and have taken apartments in the Western Addition. Their daughter, Miss Nellie Grant, is visiting friends in the East. In Chicago she will be entertained by all the Mrs. Potter Palmer connection. Mrs. Palmer's sister is Mrs. Frederick Grant, the mother of the Princess Cantacuzene. Though Miss Grant has frequently visited friends in this city, she has never been given the prominence socially to which the prestige of her family entitles her. She has visited chiefly the Masons of Alameda. Miss Florence Mason, who has been abroad for some time, is her cousin.

She Wanted to Know

At a recent fashionable dinner in this city there was singing by a professional vocalist, and during the evening when the guests were thanking the singer for the pleasure she had given them, she remarked to one of them, the most energetic of our matrons and a woman who is always in the forefront of the social activities. "This is the first time I ever sang that song in English. I always sing it in French."

"What was the matter?" inquired the fashionable matron. Then, pointing to the accompanist, she added, "Couldn't he play it in French?"

The Latest Thing in Mourning

Gibson's drawing in last week's Collier's of the young girl in half-mourning, even to her pug with a black eye, reminds me of the limit reached in that by a woman in Alameda. Her brother died a short time ago, and now she appears in public with her dog wearing a huge purple bow on its collar. This is the same woman who believes her dog contains the spirit of her dead child. She now puts the transmigrated soul into mourning for its uncle.

Protect the Wild Flowers

Though local clubwomen have done much for the protection of our forests they have not yet exerted themselves to any extent in the interest of the wildflower. They are so successful in promoting desirable legislation that I should like to see them espouse the cause of the wildflower. I was reminded of this matter the other day by the action of a London magistrate in fining a collector of ferns and flowers three pounds for digging up fern and flower roots. The Audubon societies all over the world have kept up a persistent crusade against the practice of killing birds in the interest of the millinery business, but few are the voices that are raised against the destruction of plant life. It is said that hardly a specimen of the primrose is now to be found in England. Owing to the rapacity of professional flower gatherers in this country the trailing arbutus has become very rare, and the marigold has disappeared in many States. The native flora of California has been the wonder of the whole world, but we have vandals among us who are doing their best to exterminate it. Every day during spring and summer they come back from their outings arm-laden with uprooted ferns and flowers dedicated to speedy, withering death. The decorative craze which demands thousands of buttercups and poppies to produce an "effect" is responsible for much of this destruction, but unchecked thoughtlessness and wantonness far more. Not many years ago all the hillsides and bare spaces of our peninsula were glorious with hundreds of species of wild flowers; where are they now? All but the hardiest have disappeared. I have not heard as yet of the professional flower gatherer among us, but in the East he has become a nuisance demanding repression. He collects for the decorators and, worse yet, to fulfill the demands made by nature study and flower drawing in the public schools.

Vandalism Fostered in School

Nature study should teach children to love nature and protect her wild and innocent things, but as pursued in the schools it demands the destruction of thousands of specimens so that each child may have one to dissect and analyze. In the school systems of Eastern cities there are men who make it their business to collect and deliver the specimens by wholesale. And yet the public tolerates such a mockery! Some years ago I visited a school in the redwood district of California. The grounds were disfigured by great stumps of what had once been trees, every bit of wild vegetable life on the place, tree or flower, had been made away with. And yet on the hard hillside soil, adapted to none but nature's sturdy growths, an ineffectual attempt was made to cultivate a garden, a poor, sickly thing, out of place and despairingly struggling against conditions. Indoors was a collection of house and window plants, dusty, drooping, insect-devoured things, which nobody about the place had time to care for properly. This was explained as an effort at nature study and school decoration. Save the mark! The whole thing struck me as pretentious, demoralizing, and false, and as a sad instance of the power of cant in things educational.

The Fair Case

The report from the East that the Fair heirs have settled once more with the Nelsons is without foundation. There has been no compromise. The attorneys on both sides are eager for the fray, and anxious for a hot contest. A contest is what they like for it puts money in their purses. Though the attorneys for the Nelsons started proceedings in New York, they must come to this city if it is to be a fight to a finish. The only question to be determined by the New York suit is whether the Nelsons are entitled to an annulment of the agreement entered into in San Francisco by which they abandoned all claim to the estate of Charley Fair. If they obtain a judgment annulling the agreement then they will be in the same position that they occupied before they came to California to settle. They may then sue to recover the estate of Mrs. Charley Fair but as she was a resident of this city they must start the contest in the local courts.

The Glassy Eye of Blingum

The teapot tempests are sizzling down Burlingame way and a battle-royal between several of the dames is scheduled. The danger signals are not confined to the division lines of Blingum but extend all the way down to Menlo. There is one handsome matron in the neighborhood who found the temperature rather frigid though she moved down in the balmy days of last summer. This winter she came up to town, but the ice-man kept on her trail and society, or that clique residing in Blingum, turned a frozen shoulder on her attempts to thaw the smart set. She sent out cards for a tea and the decorations and "spread" were really deserving of the adjectives usually spilled on that part of the performance. But unhappily only a dozen people came, which was rather dreary for the guests and depressing for the hostess. And there doesn't seem to be any sufficient reason for the attitude of society except that such attitudinizing now and then, and drawing of hair lines, have a tendency to inspire the polloi with awe. In spite of the fact that the lady's name has been blue-penciled from a good many calling lists she has her sympathizers and they are steadily growing in number.

A little girl was heard talking to her rabbit.

"Five times five," she said. "Six times six," "Seven times seven." Between times she shook the rabbit violently.

"Dorothy," said her mother, "what are you doing to your rabbit?"

"Well, papa says," replied the child, "that rabbits multiply rapidly and Bunny won't do it."

Is Major Morrow Eligible?

To be an Army officer has always meant to be the adored of civilian belles. Yet the latter have grown wary in showing openly their adoration of the brass buttons since various defections in the service. They label their flirtations "nothing serious," to ward off the matchmaking tabbies. But it is but another version of the fox and the grapes that were sour. At least it has been like that since the case of Major Hull, late Judge Advocate at army headquarters here. The Major was petted to death in our swim, and everybody thought he might make a choice of a bride in San Francisco. But he had no sooner become established in favor when he went East and brought back a charming bride to whom he had been engaged before coming here. Major Morrow, Hull's successor as Judge Advocate, is rumored a bachelor, but the girls intend to be careful about rejoicing over the fact. They must know first if there are any strings to his spurs.

Gossip of the Service

Major Guy L. Edie, who has been stationed at Columbus Barracks, Ohio, has been ordered to succeed Major Stephenson as surgeon at Monterey. Mrs. Edie was "Clemmie" Kip, and her friends here will be very glad to have her located within visiting distance.

The local Army set boasts a new beauty, in General Graham's daughter-in-law. She is tall, with black hair, beautiful eyes and a creamy, ivory complexion. She was a Miss Kent and her marriage with Lieutenant Graham occurred about a year ago in the East.

There was a delightful little hop at the Presidio last Monday evening, given as a good-bye to the officers and ladies of the Eighteenth Infantry who sailed for the Philippines last Wednesday. The large mess room of the Nineteenth Infantry was adorned and decked with flags and military trappings and the hosts of the occasion were Captain Whitworth, Captain McBroom, Captain Walton and Lieutenant Martin Crimmins.

Wednesday evening, April fifteenth, will occur the marriage of Miss Katherine White, daughter of Captain J. L. White, and Lieutenant George I. Feeter of the Nineteenth Infantry, in the little chapel of the Post. Lieutenant Edward Croft will attend his brother officer.

Among the army officers who will be promoted and retired on the eleventh of April is Colonel Stephen W. Groesbeck, who was stationed here for two years as Judge Advocate on General Shafter's staff. Mrs. Groesbeck is remembered as a great lover of music and a fine pianist.

Reginald H. Kelly, who has just been appointed second-lieutenant in the army by the President, is a son of the Reverend Douglas Kelly, formerly rector of the Episcopal church at Fresno, but now of San Francisco. The young officer is a Californian by birth.

Miss Koehler gave a tea at her brother Captain B. J. Koehler's quarters at the Presidio last Wednesday, at which the Misses Moore were guests of honor.

Good Health Determines Morals

OUR PREFACE:

It is folly for an animal to play the god too often.

Bertrot kneeled in the marble basin and squeezed the water over his fevered skin. God, but it was good! His blue eyes laughed upward at the Italian mosaics and his teeth shone like a glimmer of sunlight. He placed his two hands together against his back, and he appeared like a white, inverted image praying to the invisible nymph of the pool. So pure was his skin, that it seemed one with the translucent lights of the Bath. Eugene Bertrot was enjoying existence in his father's Long Island palace.

He had always enjoyed existence—as men believe they enjoy when playing with the pleasure they are ever ready to exchange. We never wish for a duplicate of our keenest bliss. We are greedy about the money and about the mysteries which we have not.

Eugene, today, may be termed experienced. He had suffered. But of what use is wisdom? The loss of inexperience is often like the loss of virginity.

Wisdom did not help Eugene in the quest for happiness. The first is proverbially crying in the streets, while raw youth revels indoors.

Young, strong, naked, sparkling in the spring water, Eugene's spirit this morning fled upward as life divinely throbbed, aglow with the sentiment that on the spot he stood the world whirled.

Only at this moment he ascended to a conscious content from a dark nightmare in which happiness existed only by its dregs. Eleanor, a loved woman, had sent him from her, and turning away, he steeped himself in wine. Unable to obtain a noble gratification, he sought satisfaction in a debased pleasure.

For the nerves of youth have an appetite. They feed on the apples of love, but may exist on serpents' poison. Out of one comes the dawn-color from the other, a breed of horror.

He had tasted in this experience the hard realism of life, which exists in contrasts and makes our senses conscious of their reality.

How had he come out of it? He did not know, except that he was such an excellent animal, his physical being rebelled against the debasement.

Eugene, almost laughing with the glory of his bath, leaped into a white cashmere robe, that made him look like a Dominican in a cassock. Boldly, for exuberance spurred daring, he opened an outer door that led to daylight, and folded his arms on the world. From the terrace a wonderful view of country was obtained—a land of green, glittering in the golden sun! He ceased to believe that yesterday had life. Today was eternity. His form was the universe. Suddenly a mist of dreams enveloped him. He was on Broadway, a path of pleasure, night, glorying in the divine, scenic realism which surrounded him. He was uplifted by a Circus of People, merrymakers clothed in gold, an orchestra of human voices, and within the playhouses, conscious of the taste bizarre, the palpitating chorus, the jest in semi-virtue, a mirage of splendor, life and limb.

Between which two prospects lay happiness? He sighed, not in regret, but over the gorgeousness of the choice. And in the midst of his visions, before him, stood Eleanor.

A woman had stepped out of a theatre box to the terrace.

He smiled cynically—he had deserted the gods of wine, she was a married woman. He was strong, she was vulnerable.

And she was amused to see a man of the world, who looked like a monk, standing before her in cassock and sandals. Her smile revealed her to him—the sarcasm of smart folk, satirizing everything but herself, familiarity with French, and the talk of a husband's friends.

So from that morning, between the visions of sunlight and night, Eleanor and Eugene stepped into a new existence, as through the ante-room of the Bath.

For a marriage service does not determine the absolute relations of life, which are amenable to a Force called personality.

Eugene went over the river again to New York, a new Eugene, a sensualist but a philosopher, who compels every day's business to conduce towards the ends of pleasure, and in whose imperturbable features when he left Eleanor's house of afternoons, no man read the ay or nay of his existence.

He had life upon the hip. That is a thing of which we must get the better, even in pleasure. Eleanor was his—the clever man who wins after defeat. Vanity lives in every cloak-of-disaster, which we soon are made to wear inside out.

What was he going to do with her husband? He was at once the pride of his prowess and the bitterness of his victory. Husbands are ethical qualities. They are apologies for the Seventh Commandment, and an elementary cause of the daring of romantic Don Juans. Taken positively, their consolation is in the folly of their role.

Fate turns up for the husband the Trump Card when he secures his Judgment of Divorce. Then he is a man. The anxiety becomes the lover's, that creature who once walked through his halls with immutable face. The game of guess is now played by the deceiver. To play the watch-dog robs the actor of his esprit.

Such was the shadow falling over Eugene. He was unconscious about it and disdained the fear. He even induced Eleanor to follow him whenever he went out of town for business.

"I have been so careful, so careful," she pleaded on one of these occasions; and that was the complaint of a heart of love, the pitiful realism appealing to all beings but a man. Eleanor had surrendered her personality to a more inclusive Force.

"I know," he answered; that false acknowledgment which was the accent of goodness; an extenuation effecting a denial; apology clothing a lie. He had lost apprehension of those sacred reservations—a secrecy which makes the cradle of a guilty love the shrine of loving truth.

He overlooked the wonderful feminine paradox, or understanding it, refused to allow for the incrimination of a spirituelle.

He won the battle. She gained happiness, and the divorce papers.

What would these count while she possessed Eugene? They were myths of misery, while he was by. Eugene was strength. But how strengthening is a stimulant which does not feed muscle but gnaws one's nerves? Nerves are the criterion, the sensitive evidence of life's fluctuations, stocks, the weather, clothes, friends, and love. Nerves are index, sense, and soul.

And then she lost her husband—by divorce. But love still donned his ribbons, without regret.

And then she gained a new sweetness—love which could be technically construed under the law. That is an achievement. It is one of those things that incidentally happen to Love—not a triumph for the law. She had her lover, an ardent devotee—the treasurer of her nerves.

They rejected marriage—the testimony of love was in a mutual embrace. We will defy all laws except those which preserve the integrity of our sensate selves.

She loved him beyond all distant dreams, failing of absolute happiness till she finds the master love. She experienced delightful and crucial sensations when a voice, sweet and strong, uttered consciously its "I will's." Alas! Eleanor's feeling was not for one. It was for the sex!

She redeemed the slavery she could not prevent by making the conqueror unhappy. Jealousy is the golden sceptre of the slave.

When opportunity was tempted by chance she loved another, then, more than one other. To Eugene it became apparent that Eleanor was not ruled by affection but by passion.

All of his subtlety found a reward in bitterness. He was minded to end where he had started—drowned in wine. But the purpose lacked eccentricity. Love now was no more unique. Nerves vainly craved a sensation.

Resolving to resign himself to being bored, Eugene traveled away with his grief, a cynical soul and barren heart. He went—he came back.

First for him to seek was Eleanor. He loved her as he did of old. She was more beautiful to him, more wondrous, now that the Queen of Passion had become the Empress of Fickleness. How we love a soul able to play us false!

She was in her boudoir when he found her. Glorious in person, radiant with life and folly, she was a temptress in whom is oblivion. To love her one forgets forever. She was no longer a woman—she was a being tempered and gilded in flame. She was blameless—being Blame. What a love to love!—one granting her own indulgences. She was beyond reproach for she was forsaken. And also for this he more madly loved her.

A spell was cast over the new Eleanor. A lamp amber, golden, revolved with a flame reflecting gold. Luminously, it bathed her matchless beauty.

He had solved the question of old: Where was life?

He kissed her madly to seal the sensation—then he leaped back.

Where was life?

A Modern Fairy Tale

The Far-Sighted Poet.

A King lay at the point of death. There was mourning in the Kingdom. The Poet Laureate, who had been deposed from his office a fortnight previous for making "love" rhyme with "cove" saw a chance to reinstate himself in public favor, at the expense of his late master.

He therefore sat himself down to compose an exquisite eulogy in ambidextrous pentameters upon his Monarch. The Requiem took him several days to write, and when finished was a marvelous work. He read it over and then took it to the Palace to get the Grand Vizier's opinion as to its merits.

But when he entered the courtyard he found flags flying from the towers, and from the windows floated sounds of rejoicing. The King had fooled them all. He had recovered.

But while all else was joy, and every heart was glad, the Poet Laureate crept home with saddened feelings, his Requiem in his suit-case. The verses that he felt were his masterpiece and would place him among the great poets of the day were useless. Instead he must compose a Sonnet of Joy on the King's recovery or else remain in retirement forever.

Cast down in mind, and with joyless heart, he was just about to shut himself up in his room to nurse his grief, when a courier from the adjoining Kingdom passed his door.

"What news?" asked the Poet Laureate, though he did not care in the least what was happening in the other Kingdom.

"Our King lies at the point of death," was the answer.

With ill-concealed joy the Poet Laureate ordered his horse saddled, and with his suit-case strapped on his back he journeyed to the neighboring Kingdom. Before the day was done he had himself appointed Poet Laureate to the sick Monarch, who died three days later.

The Requiem caused a great sensation, and the Poet's former Master, regretting that he had ever deposed such a Genius, sent him post-haste a command to return to his old post at a tripled salary.

Thus was quickness of wit rewarded and out of one's misfortune another's fortune re-made.

—The Philosopher.

His Answer

Do I love you? I do, if distrust can be love;
If the fear that I feel when I press your warm hand
That you'd grant the same favor to some other man
Were the time but auspicious, and I out of sight;
If the certainty, here, in my heart, that your glance
Would caress me, then turn to some other, perchance
Who has merited less what I deem as my right;
If the madness that throbs when I feel your embrace,
And despair that o'erpowers when I look in your face,
Irresponsible, weak, vacillating, untrue—
If a certain contempt that steals into my breast
When the overwrought senses are stilled and at rest,
Can be love, then, I answer you, yes, that I do.

A Wonderful Discovery

The average individual who requires the attention of a dentist thinks a long while before he finally surrenders to the inevitable. He puts off the evil day so long, sometimes, that when he does muster up courage to visit the dentist, it is too late for anything but a set of false teeth. Even the most expert dentist cannot perform the impossible. The average individual, when it is his turn to march to the dentist's chair, does so with little grace. For, among all the ills that man is heir to, teeth troubles are the most disagreeable because the cure is so strenuous. Even to see one of the buzzing drills in operation sends cold shivers down the spinal vertebræ of the neurotic, and how immeasurably worse is the sensation when the operator gets to work on an ulcerated tooth. There is no use in attempting to palliate the painful matters that hinge about our "thirty white horses on a red hill." To keep them in good condition means, or has meant, until the Basford Obtunder was invented, the most intense pain even to the phlegmatic patient.

As dentistry, with the other professions, has advanced step by step, the inevitable exception made its appearance. The whole dental profession united in the friendliest praise for the young inventor who has finally succeeded by the aid of his wonderful device in eliminating pain during a dental operation. C. R. Basford, D. D. S., of San Francisco, is the inventor.

It was not mere luck or chance that discovered the invention to Dr. Basford. Other dentists had worked toward such an instrument for years, and Dr. Basford himself had spent years of study upon his Obtunder. Its perfection was a matter of time, but now it is in perfect working order.

Anæsthetics were for a long time considered the only way to help the patient endure the pain of having his teeth extracted or filled. For pulling, the anæsthetic worked all right, because the pain was only momentary. But in filling, after the drill entered the tooth the anæsthetic served only to dull the pain, never to stifle it entirely. With very sensitive patients, the agony was not lessened at all. But the Obtunder has changed all this. Instead of the anæsthetic being applied before the operation, the Obtunder permits the anæsthetic spray to be ejected upon the tooth and nerve while the drill is forced through its rubber tubing, a tiny tube projecting by the side of the drill. The tiny spray of anæsthetic is ejected by a simple adjustment while the drill is in operation. It can be regulated by the mere pressure of the operator's finger, and before the drill has touched the tooth the spray has completely deadened it to pain.

Dr. Basford, in demonstrating the uses of his invention at his offices in the Callaghan building, shows how simple it is, yet how efficacious. He explains the anæsthetic used, which does not injure the teeth as many others have done in the old way of applying them. To enjoy absolute immunity from pain will seem a paradise to the average individual who shrinks from the dental chair as from a chamber of torture. Even the thick-skinned person who goes to his dentist without fear, and takes his agony as he would his after dinner coffee, is glad to know that he will no longer have the agony to suffer. This device for doing dental work without pain, the Basford Obtunder, is certainly the most beneficent invention of the age. That it is the invention of a San Franciscan reflects honor upon our city.

CORRECT TAILORING FOR MEN.

It is a popular fallacy that there are no well-dressed men outside of New York. But look around the streets of San Francisco and make your own observations, and you will find that this impression is not a correct one. There are well-dressed men here, men who need fear no comparison with those of London and New York. There are men who, possessing natural good taste and good carriage, have their clothes built by a tailor who is worthy the name. This is the season of the year when man looks his best. The spring is the season when he replenishes his wardrobe. To be strictly up-to-date in the respect of raiment he must have a new spring suit, for it is impossible to fool the people with a last fall's suit and spring it on as a new spring style. Fashions for men change as well as those for women. A modern tailor must be as on the alert as a modern milliner. He must read up on styles, keep abreast of the fashion-plates and cut for his customers garments that will suit their several styles. A visit to the establishment of Charles Bliss, 407-411 Claus Spreckels building, gives one an excellent idea of the correct tailoring for men this spring. He shows a very fine line of suitings and trouserings of styles the very latest.

Townsend, manufacturer of glace fruits and choicest of candies, will remove on Monday, April sixth, 1903, from the Palace hotel building to 715 Market street, three doors from the Call building, and two minutes' walk from the Palace Hotel. THE MACHINE FOR FAMILIES.

There is no sewing-machine so universally liked, and which stands so well against all competitors, as the Domestic. It is the light-running machine that makes sewing a pleasure, and the Domestic is pre-eminently for family use. J. W. Evans, 1021 Market street, is the local agent.

Mr. George Q. Chase, Vice-President of the firm of Kohler & Chase, who has been on a business trip throughout the East for the past three and one-half months, returned home last Saturday morning.

STAGE

Comparison That Jars

The provincialism of San Francisco is best exemplified by its stubborn loyalty to those whom it is pleased to regard as its own by right of discovery. Occasionally we have heralded a new genius to the world, and thereafter we have declined absolutely to concede superiority in any other that came with the brand of approval from foreign critics. Hence it is not surprising that our local critics should be reluctant to enthuse over Zelie de Lussan in the role of Carmen. Collamarini is ours by right of discovery, and therefore we are constrained to judge others by the standard set by the untutored, crude little Italian woman. Collamarini is a Tivoli favorite and de Lussan is an interloper. Fortunately Zelie de Lussan never saw Collamarini. Not having seen the rough-house Carmen of the strenuous Italian, her feelings have been spared. To compare the Carmen of Collamarini with that of Zelie de Lussan is to rank a pot-boiler with a chef d'oeuvre. The Carmen of Prosper Merimee was an illiterate factory girl of loose morals, a dissolute young woman, whimsical in her amours but eager for revenue, passionate but sensible of the commercial value of her charms. Skilled in the art of love, she had certain graces and she was fascinating in her deviltry and in her abandon. Collamarini's Carmen is of the type presented in the story, but it is not alluring. Collamarini coquetted after the soggy fashion of a washerwoman. She flirted frowsily. Hers were not the methods that inspire ardent passion. She was never piquant, and she exhibited none of the insinuating arts that captivate. To borrow from the argot of the curbstone, "her work was coarse." The Carmen of Zelie de Lussan is that of the bewitching, fervid and fetching peasant girl, conscious from experience of the wiles that win. She walks with the rakish, hip-flaunting stride so suggestive of the energy that passion invokes in amorous dalliance. Her smile is roguish and full of hints of lascivious yearnings. The glance of her eye is eloquent of desire. In a word, Zelie de Lussan is alluring. When you see her flirting with Don Jose you feel that there is reason for the ready response. As you witness the consummate art with which she shades her various emotions in the several scenes you readily understand why this woman is regarded in London as the greatest Carmen on the stage. Calve fails to approximate her in the role either histrionically or vocally. Zelie de Lussan's vocal art is without a flaw, and her voice is of superb quality. Yet here in San Francisco she is brought into comparison with Collamarini, a woman whose voice from lack of training has lost its natural color, and whose singing is less artistic than her acting. Collamarini is not impossible on a dull night. She is pleasing to lovers of Zolaesque types, and she is not an uninteresting study, but Zelie de Lussan should be spared comparison with her. It was remarkable condescension on the part of this great artist to appear with such a cast as that now interpreting Bizet's charming opera at the Tivoli, and we should be grateful to her. It was moreover remarkable that she was able to put so much enthusiasm into her work, especially when singing with the imported Don Jose, who is said to have come from the Castle Square company of Boston. That company surely never had a worse tenor. It was odd that Marie Welch was not permitted to repeat her success as Michela, for Miss Davis was unequal to the vocal demands of the role.

Rose Coghlan in Pinero's Great Play

"The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" has been called the greatest play of the nineteenth century. Certainly there is no finer example of precise dramatic technique in the English drama. There is not a superfluous word in it, not a line or an episode, nor even a scene, which does not have its exact bearing on the development of the story. However it makes no departure in the art of dramatic writing. The materials which it employs are as old as the hills, and the moral which it exemplifies is one of the oldest known in the history of dramatic literature. Pinero sets forth the miserable tale with the most uncompromising plainness of speech and action. Having chosen the conditions he works them by a rational process to the only possible conclusion—complete catastrophe. The piece is wholesome, for the whole tendency of it is to illustrate the folly and danger of defying the laws of society. In the last act Paula says, "The future is only the past again, entered through another gate." Pinero could have chosen no better motto for his play than this sad reflection. It is the keynote to the whole tragedy. Rose Coghlan gives us a Paula that it would be difficult to excel. Of course Pinero imagined a younger and more beautiful woman as his heroine, and although Miss Coghlan is not always in the picture her magnetism and graceful manner more than compensate for her shortcomings. She showed the gradual development of the lower instincts in Paula Tanquaray's nature with remarkable skill and power, and her advance toward the ruin of all her own and all her infatuated husband's hopes was as cunning a study as we could wish for. She was fully equal to the great climax of the play where she recognizes in the accepted suitor of her step-daughter a man with whom she had lived in her wilder days. Miss Coghlan's support is not a remarkable one and a few are temperamentally unfitted for their parts. The most unfortunate in this respect is probably the Captain Ardale.

Her First Lines

Though Rose Coghlan has appeared in many important productions, she was never really nervous except upon the occasion of her debut. She has told the story more than once. It was in Edinburgh, Scotland, and the play was "A Pretty Horsebreaker." She was so nervous that she continually mixed her lines. The men in the piece were always making up boating and riding parties, and Rose Coghlan in her excitement would speak of the "starboard" side of her horse and the "near" side of her boat. Indeed she says she made a botch of her part and even her continual successes later on cannot make her forget her bungling debut.

Carton Comedy Alcazared

You never know who is going to be the star of a production when it is locally stocked. Sometimes it is one of the minor characters that makes the piece go. In the Carton comedy, "Lady Huntworth's Experiment," at the Alcazar, the hit on Monday night was not made by Captain Dorvaston, notwithstanding his trick laugh, nor by the lady-cook, played by the new leading woman, but by Ganby, the Vicar's man-servant. George Osbourne had the role. He managed his loaded tray in the first act as if he had been born to "stand and wait," and throughout the three acts which dragged along until twenty-five minutes to twelve had the audience with him. He also had a basket of flowers given him, which he seemed less able to dispose of than his arduous role. Though the lady-cook comedy goes on in undertones for the most part, a neat English drawl, it has a few strenuous moments and these the company made the most of. Charles Francis Bryant was the dipsomaniac Earl in disguise and nothing could be more thrilling than the scene where Ernest Hastings throws him over his shoulders and carts him out of the kitchen away from the presence of the charming lady-cook, his Countess in disguise. It was a display of muscle that the audience appreciated. The play as a whole was given an all-star cast. Juliet Crosby had a character part such as she enjoys, in the slatternly slavey, far removed from the dainty Leontine of last week. Bacon is delightful as the Vicar and young Morrison as the Curate, Miss Howe as the maiden sister and Miss Waldrop as her pretty niece are all well cast.

"Will you join me?" "Well, yes, in a drink of Chapin & Gore."

Miss Creighton Made Friends at Once

A new leading woman is always worth a paragraph to herself. Bertha Creighton affords an object lesson for slipshod players. After a five days' ride across the continent she walked into rehearsal dead letter perfect within forty-eight hours of the time that she was handed one of the most exacting of parts, one that she had never seen and never played. The titled lady-cook has few long speeches, but the part bristles with stage business, and Miss Creighton handled it as reposefully and resourcefully as if she had played nothing else for six months. It was a clever thing to introduce her in a role which suggests much higher achievement and which inspires the desire to see her called upon for greater sweep of passion.

It is not generally known that Ernest Hastings, the Alcazar's popular leading man, is an attorney-at-law, licensed to practice in the courts of Canada. He is a graduate of an Ontario law college and his father is a very wealthy resident of that province. Hastings Sr., by the way, is a mining man, who delved in the mines of this State in early days. He has two sons on the stage, one of them being Cuyler Hastings, who is starring in Australia in the title role of "Sherlock Holmes."

The Russian Singers

There have been other Russians at the Orpheum, the Princess Dolgorouky and her violin, and the singer with six feet of beauty and a title who sang marching songs, not to speak of dancers, acrobats and contortionists. What comes out of Russia is generally good. The Russian trio that are singing in this week's bill are the best yet. There is one man with two women who, against a picturesque changing background sing the grand national hymn of the Russians, "God the All-merciful," and an odd folk-song before they launch into American rag-time. They give the untraveled almost as good an insight into Russian ways as a Tolstoi or Jokai novel.

Lillian's Collection

Lillian Burkhart has the finest collection of "tributes" of any vaudevillian star. Every season she involuntarily increases her assortment of verses and prose poems. But I think the most charming thing ever written to, or about her, was Adachi Kinnosuki's "The Night I Saw Her," in which he apostrophizes the Burkhart eyes in language that reaches the heights of poesy. Even Arthur MacDonald Dole's poem, "To Dorothy in 'Fifty Years Ago,'" cannot approach the Japanese writer's tribute.

An Actress Dies From Smallpox

The Janet Waldorf company, which comes here in a fortnight from Honolulu, where it is now playing a three weeks' engagement, is minus a leading lady. Miss Yorke, who had been taking the most important female parts under the star, Janet Waldorf, died of the smallpox in Shanghai a few weeks ago. The company had great success in Hongkong and Shanghai, and Miss Yorke was a decided favorite in the latter city. Just before they were to take ship for Hawaii, Miss Yorke and the comedian rickshawed to the Chinese section of Shanghai to buy some trinkets. One can buy things much cheaper in the frowzy dens of the Asiatic purlieus than in the handsome English and German stores of the European quarter. Miss Yorke and the funny man poked into delightfully picturesque hovels and picked up unheard of bargains. They also picked up the black smallpox, and after two days in the pesthouse the unfortunate actress died, while the comedian recovered with a memory not soon to be effaced. The company has made money in the Orient, and intends to play here if it can get a theatre. Most of its members are Australians, it being an antipodal organization. Pearl Snyder, of the Frawley company, who returned with her husband, John T. Wade, from Manila ten days ago, was offered the place made vacant by Miss Yorke's death, but refused it.

From a New York corerspondent I hear of the engagement of Ailene Anglin, a sister of the great Margaret, to Bertram Harrison, a member of the Henry Miller company. The engagement has not yet been formally announced, but the wedding is expected to come off early in the summer, just before Margaret leaves for her European trip. Mr. Harrison has long been a friend of the Anglin family and it is due to Margaret's influence that he has risen so rapidly in his profession since leaving the dramatic school a year ago.

Gottlob Gets Big Attractions

During his latest visit to New York, Mr. Gottlob of the Columbia succeeded in booking some exceptionally fine attractions for the Powell street playhouse. Perhaps the most important is "The Darling of the Gods," which is said to be the most notable of all David Belasco's achievements. This is the play in which Blanche Bates has made her greatest hit. Mr. Gottlob arranged for the opening of the company at the Columbia in October. The company will come on a special train direct to this city. It is also reported that Mr. Gottlob has secured the original "Ben Hur" company for a brief engagement in the latter part of the year. Owing to the elaborate character of the production the management of the Columbia will arrange for the presentation of the play at the Grand Opera House.

George Ade has turned his attention to writing a comedy dealing with life in Indiana. He is at work on a comedy called "The Circuit Judge." The first act has already been finished. The successful opening of "Checkers," the play written by Henry M. Blossom Jr. caused Mr. Henry W. Savage to decide to produce the opera "Lieutenant Commander," written by Mr. Blossom and Alfred Robyn, at an early date.

It must warm Dick Jose's heart, when he rises to do his stunt at the Republic, so enthusiastically does the audience greet him. He is truly a beloved singer. The audience's heart beats as one when Jose sings. But how the big, good-natured singer must hate "Dolly Gray"!

Elbert Hubbard, editor of the Philistine and head of the Roycrofters of East Aurora, N. Y., will lecture on Tuesday evening, April twenty-eighth, in Steinway hall, under Will Greenbaum's direction.

William Lamp, who left the Alcazar company to join the Neills, is now with Nance O'Neil's company on the northern circuit.

Features of Next Week's Bills

The coming of Mrs. Patrick Campbell to the Columbia is to be made more noteworthy, if such a thing can be, by her appearance in Sudermann's "The Joy of Living," a play that has never been seen here though it long since made a great success in Europe and New York, where it was given in English. The play is written on a high plane, treating of a vital, moral question, and Mrs. Campbell is said in Countess Beata to have a very strong role. She is supported by her London company. During her second week she will appear in repertoire. There will be a Wednesday matinee next week but no Good Friday performance.

Next Monday evening will see "Helter Skelter" at Fischer's. This was one of Weber & Field's earlier successes and ran for an entire season varied with new skits and travesties. The scenario has been changed to Burlingame from the original Tuxedo. Kolb and Dill as Germans, with Bernard as a Jew old-clo' man, appear as circus grafters, beer slingers and amateur actors, Winfield Blake as Polington Shetland, a clubman, and George de Long as a society reporter, who is also an agent for a European Titled Marriage Syndicate which places poor noblemen as husbands for rich American women. The first act shows the railroad station at Blingum, the second act is in Shetland's conservatory and the third at a bal masque given by the clubman. Sub-plots contain all the elements for laughter continuous, with a substituted circus queen, burglaries and all sorts of excitements. Olive Vail has the role of a society bud.

It will be interesting to see what Ernest Hastings will do with the title role of "An American Citizen," which has never been given in San Francisco before save by little red-headed, always American Nat C. Goodwin. Miss Creighton seems to possess just the right kind of material for the part of the English beauty, which Maxine Elliott invested with attraction but not magnetism. After this play "Her Majesty" will be revived. "Lover's Lane" is to be given an early production at the Alcazar with Hastings in the part he created in the New York performance.

Connoisseurs of perfect goods appreciate "Jesse Moore" Whiskey for its purity and delightful flavor. It is without a peer.

When Odette Tyler married the rich R. D. MacLean she said she would retire from the stage. And so she did for a time, but she returned and brought Mr. MacLean with her. They will appear in "Richard III" to open their Grand engagement. Mr. MacLean is said to give a most striking performance of "Rchard III" and Miss Tyler, who is well known here for her charming work in "Shenandoah' 'and other Frohman productions, will be Prince Arthur, the king's ill-fated kinsman and victim. The play will be splendidly staged.

At the California Kate Claxton is to be welcomed back after an absence of twenty years. And she is still playing the part she played then, Louise, the blind girl in "The Two Orphans." Since the original production, a quarter of a century ago, Kate Claxton and "The Two Orphans" have become inseparable. No actress on the stage today has been as faithful to one part as Kate Claxton has to Louise, having appeared in that role over four thousand times. An elaborate scenic production is promised, also an exceptionally strong supporting company. Henrietta will be played by Ethelynne Palmer, who was out here last season as leading lady with S. Miller Kent in "The Cowboy and the Lady."

Zelie de Lussan as Arline in "The Bohemian Girl" will be one of the strongest cards the Tivoli has played this year. It is long since the pretty Balfe opera has been sung here. The cast will include Carrie Roma as the gypsy queen, the part usually assigned to contraltos, Cunningham as the Count and Tennery as Thaddeus. The opera will be given Monday, Wednesday and Saturday nights with "The Mikado" to alternate. On April thirteenth "The Daughter of the Regiment" will be given.

New business will be given during the last week of "Chop Suey" at the Republic. On Sunday afternoon, April twelfth, "The Siege of Goat Island," Wallace Irwin's latest burlesque, will be presented. In this Stine will have a laughter-provoking part as General Lafter and Mack will have a character suited to his capabilities in that of Stiffington Hearse, president of the Undertakers' Trust. McDonald will be Admiral Sly and Conlon Sergeant Kilkenny, who drills an awkward squad. For one week only Young Corbett will act as interlocutor.

The Colby family will be a novelty at the Orpheum. They are father, mother, son and daughter. Little Byrle, a seven-year-old wonder, sings, dances and plays on any number of musical instruments, while her brother Frank gives imitations of Creatore and Sousa that have won unstinted praise. In "Hooked by Crook," presented by the Mason-Keeler company of farceurs, a most amusing comedietta is promised; it is dramatized from Gelett Burgess's story that appeared in The Smart Set. McCue and Cahill, high class vocalists, will also be new to this city. Joseph LaFleur, who presents the greatest single acrobatic act on the stage, employs a silver ladder and table for drop somersaults and his swings of tumbling are said to be remarkable. The Beaux and Belles Octette, Frank Gardiner and Lottie Vincent in new specialties, Kronau's Russian trio in new selections, Milly Capell and her trained horse and hunting dogs will remain.

Montague's Cockatoo Circus, birds that do everything but talk, and some of them do that, Carroll and Nealey, knockabout singing and dancing comedians, the Kobers, aerial artists, and little Irene, a juvenile contortionist who ties herself into seemingly inextricable knots, will be Chutes novelties. Rome and Ferguson will introduce new specialties in their skit, and Miss Tunison, the soprano, and G. Herbert Mitchell, the baritone, will change their selections. The animatoscope will show new moving pictures. LaMont will make his daring "slide for life" on a silver wire from the top of the Chutes to the foot of the lake every afternoon and evening. —The Playgoer.

The First Law of Nature

The automobile crashed against something. The shock was terrific and the man and woman, the occupants, were thrown heavily to the ground. She was the first to recover her senses. The man lay, with the blood flowing from a wound in his head. It stained her white gown, as she lay close to him. The smell of the fresh blood sickened her, and she pulled herself, with an effort, away.

What a terrible end to an evening's pleasure! They had started out gayly enough, after their dinner, for a spin. There had been a little supper, at midnight, and then they had started toward town. But the man's head and hands were both weakened after the last stop, and he lost his control of the motor.

They automobiled at the machine's will, not their own, and now they lay, he with his life-blood ebbing away, and she faint from the fall and the sight.

What was to be done? It was cruel, bitterly cruel, to place her in such a predicament. What would the world say, what would her friends not whisper, if they heard? If they heard! What else could happen?

And there was her husband! They had come together from their far home to this Eastern city, on a business trip, and he had left her for a few days in the large city while he went South. She had enjoyed herself, as best she could, in his absence. This automobile ride was to have been the last outing before her husband's return.

She wrung her hands as she thought of the consequences, so unforeseen. She stole a glance, full of horror, at the still figure lying beside the overturned machine. Then she placed her hand, timidly, over his heart. It was beating.

Then she thought of her predicament. What would become of her? The fog closed in about her white-gowned, fur-coated figure, and shed a gray light over the unconscious man. Her nerves were paralyzed. Her brain refused to act. There was only one thing to do—to get away, to conceal her error of judgment, to keep from her husband the knowledge of her folly. It had only been folly, thank God! But what a folly!

She struggled to her feet and with an inarticulate cry moved swiftly from the spot, just as she heard voices approaching. She could do nothing for him. The strangers would take care of him, but he could not live. But she, she must live. Her husband would return tomorrow. She must be in the hotel where he had left her. She must greet him with a smile. She must tell him she had missed him. She must act, act, act!

Swiftly she moved toward the city. She, a delicate woman, a stranger in a strange city, found her way through the silent, deserted streets, toward her hotel.

Entering her room she threw off her clothes and settled herself in bed, but there was no sleep for her. Her fevered brain was too busy with the tragedy in which she had figured, and with speculation as to developments. Presently she arose and sought balm for her nerves in a cold bath deliciously perfumed. In the morning she eagerly sought the paper and read the account of the Park tragedy and of the mystery surrounding the dead man and his missing companion.

The reporters were on her trail but they could never learn. If they did, perhaps they would be charitable.

Her conscience stung her as she thought of the man she had left dying on the lonely road, but she argued that it was a duty she owed both herself and husband.

Later in the day, when she had recovered her composure in a measure, she was joined by her husband.

"Wasn't it dreadful?" he asked as they sat down to lunch.

"What?" she asked in a tone of surprise.

"Why, that tragic death of our friend in the Park."

"Yes," she assented, "it was dreadful."

"They say that he was accompanied by a woman and that she deserted him. Just like a woman's selfishness."

"Yes, she was a selfish wretch."

M. M.: Oh, that is all right. My daughter has a very dashing present, and I think it would count as a past with your mother.

Five reasons have been given by a famous scholar, in a clever verse, for drinking wine. There's only one reason necessary to state why one drinks Rainier beer above all others. Rainier is the best beer ever put on the market. It has absolutely no peer.

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

The Strenuous Hambourg

Mark Hambourg may not be the most delicate of pianists; he certainly is not "precious" like Paderewski; but he has much of the magnificence of the savage, and a primitive power that is able to possess us—at times, it is true, in spite of our more critical selves. Kipling should delight in him. Our strenuous President heard him, it is said, with gladness. Unlike his countryman, Gabrilowitsch, who has infinite seductiveness and knows how to make musical love, Hambourg tries to take his audience by storm. He plays precisely as he looks. In places his playing is almost grotesque, but then grotesques before now have been great art. To enjoy Hambourg, one must grant him his "peculiar difference," and give one's faculty of appreciation a new liberty, almost a license. He is not a pedant of the piano, and the pedant of the pen who writes him down a ploughman is very far from the mark. In music, as in literature (and, for that matter, in life), the Russians are themselves; and that in these days of imitation is no little merit. Mark Hambourg is himself. He is no poet; but he has in him Walt Whitman notes that are wonderful, that sound an awakening. He gives you peeps into hidden places of the human heart. His reading of Chopin was not felicitous, and Chopin calls for felicity; and his Beethoven "Apassionata" was a revelation of the goat foot of the god Pan, not pleasing, but impressive and thought-provoking. "Hambourg has no soul"—for the over-civilized critic who seeks it on his sleeve.

Mr. Henry Holmes, San Francisco's grand old master of the violin, announces a series of four chamber music concerts, to be held in Heine hall, 237 Geary street, on Tuesday evenings, April seventh, fourteenth, twenty-first and twenty-eighth. Mr. Holmes's programs are invariably works of art, and give us evidence of being prepared by one well versed in the psychology of music. There will be five Beethoven numbers. And the visits of musicians who know their Beethoven better than Henry Holmes, and interpret him more nobly, are as short and far between as are those of the angels of the Choir Invisible itself. Kathleen Parlow, who bids fair to be the Kocian of California, will be heard in violin solos, and the impeccable Fred Maurer will be the accompanist. The "evenings" will be musical events.

At the Hopkins musicale on Thursday evening a feature was the violin solo by Henry Heyman, the composition being a new one, in manuscript, by Gerard Barton. Beside the charming "Album Leaf" of the Californian composer the violinist rendered a Jadassohn "Romanze." Miss Bessie Rosenbaum and Mrs. Harry Arnold were the vocalists of the evening and Mr. Gerard Barton the organist.

Mrs. Anna von Meyerinck will shortly issue invitations for a concert and operatic recital, to be given at the Alhambra on the twenty-first of the month. The affair promises to be of special interest as the program includes some numbers never given before in this city, such as the cantata "God Thou art Great" by Spohr, for soli and chorus, and some French dance songs.

At the Adelphian Club of Alameda's union meeting this afternoon the program will be given by Mr. Hugo Mansfeldt, pianist, Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup, soprano, Mr. Fletcher Husband, accompanist. Mr. Mansfeldt will play numbers by Beethoven, Bach, Schumann, Raff, Strauss-Tausig, Chopin and Weber-Tausig, and Mrs. Northrup will sing songs by Hadley, J. A. Stewart and Coguard.

Mrs. Alfred Abbey, whose husband sued her for divorce last week in Santa Rosa, was formerly well-known in musical circles here. She first made her appearance as a society amateur, but later she went to New York and became a professional singer. She sang at the Waldorf-Astoria musicales, and was a great favorite. When she returned to California she gave recitals in San Francisco. She is a very handsome woman, and sings with a charming method, though her voice is not large.

Of the newest papers the Linen Bonds displayed by COOPER & Co. are most effective.

Our Impresario

Before an ungrateful sanity succeeds our Mascagni madness, it might not be amiss to say a word or two expressive of our musical indebtedness to Mr. Will L. Greenbaum. In a manager's life there may be a beer or two, but the rest of it is not all skittles by any means. The man who has to deal with touchy artists often feels pretty sore; nor has he always in his pocket some box-office salve to soothe himself withal. Whether the halfpence come his way or not, the kicks are sure to come. Moreover, a manager has to combine artistic sense with business ability—no easy matter. To freight your bark with beauty and yet to steer clear of bankruptcy requires nice calculations. Had San Francisco to forfeit all she owes directly or indirectly to Mr. Greenbaum, she would be very much poorer musically than she is at present. When we recall Gabrilowitsch, Kocian, Mascagni—to mention only names fresh in memory—let us not forget that of Will Greenbaum.

Several of Grace Hibbard's poems contained in her volume entitled "California Violets" have been set to music. Flaxington Harker, the organist of All Soul's Church at Biltmore, N. C., wrote to the publisher, A. M. Robertson, for the privilege, and J. H. Metcalfe of Oakland and Mr. True of Boston have also composed music for some of the poems.

Return of Mrs. Mason

A song recital is announced for Monday evening, April thirteenth, at Steinway hall by Mrs. Caroline McLaine Mason, with Dr. Stewart and Nathan Landsberger assisting the singer. Mrs. Mason, better known as Carrie McLaine, is a daughter of the late Laughlin McLaine, and a niece of Mrs. Henry J. Crocker. Prior to her marriage seven years ago she was a great social favorite and prominent in musical circles in this city. For the past seven years she has resided in Pittsburg and has appeared in concert and oratorio in several Eastern cities. Her voice is a dramatic mezzo soprano of unusual range and rare quality. The program will consist of selections from Grieg, Wagner and Liszt, Mac Dowell, Chadwick and other modern American composers.

An Insane Choir

Mrs. Hughes, widow of the late resident physician of Philadelphia's insane asylum, has launched a novel choir into the Quaker city's church swim. It is composed of lunatics and beside the choir there is an orchestra, also of lunatics. The choir will sing on Easter and the program includes solos, duets, quartets and sextets from the classics. One man imagines he is the Saviour; another thinks he is Rockefeller; one has the suicidal mania; a woman, the best of the singers, has a fancy for eating pins, needles and tacks. The material looked unpromising but Mrs. Hughes, so writes a correspondent, has done great things with her lunatics.

The Un-Moral in Music

Music, per se, remarks a recent writer, is not always and necessarily a good thing. Indeed, it may be, even it often is, distinctly evil. In itself, music may be elevating and noble; in itself it may be degrading and vile; moreover, in itself music may be of an indeterminate character, and in that case its beneficial or its harmful effects depend upon the hearer's moral attitude, or upon determining environment. For example, certain florid styles of music may be used in the Mass; the devout auditors hear the jubilation of angelic hymns. Precisely the same style of music rendered under non-religious conditions presents to the listeners visions of gay, wholly mundane revels. Like strains provike one person to holy contemplation of the Blessed Virgin, another to thoughts of wanton luxuries. The bells beat madly their carillon of joy to the crowds on a festival of mirth; the same tones are a fierce jangle of alarm to those who listen in terror when the bells warn that an enemy is near.

Seats for the last of the Zech symphony concerts, which will take place on the afternoon of April sixteenth, will be on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s on Monday, April thirteenth, at nine o'clock a. m.

Madame Eugenia Mantelli, the famous grand opera singer, will make a tour of the coast next May and give operatic concerts.

THE BERLITZ SCHOOLS OF LANGUAGES.

The Berlitz method needs no introduction. It is a natural method, accustoming the student from the start to speak and think in the foreign language. This is accomplished by strictly avoiding translation and even assonance, teaching everything through direct perception (object teaching) and the association of ideas. The meaning of all expressions is made perfectly clear and the grammar is taught by striking examples instead of dry, abstract rules. During school hours the pupil hears and speaks nothing but the language he is acquiring and his teachers are natives of the country whose language they teach. The first of these institutions was established in May, 1878, and there are now over two hundred schools in the principal cities of Europe and America. They are under the personal supervision of Professor M. D. Berlitz, seconded by most capable directors, themselves experienced teachers of languages. The schools in California are located at 121 Geary street, San Francisco, and in Los Angeles in the Trust Building. Interrupted courses of lessons may be transferred to a later period or to any other branch, even to those established in foreign countries. In recognition of the great services rendered to linguistic science by Professor M. D. Berlitz, President Loubet of France bestowed upon him the cross of the Legion of Honor and the Academy Dante Aligheri of Italy elected him honorary president.

Feminine Wage Earners

"The Woman Who Toils" is a remarkable volume. It contains the records of the experiences of two women accustomed to luxurious living, who actually took up the life of factory and mill hands, living, working and associating with them on equal terms. The narrative is plain and straightforward, without any attempt at philanthropic deductions or exaggerations, on the side of either employer or employe. Some of the chapters incorporated in this volume appeared in Everybody's, and it is in connection with it that the letter of President Roosevelt on the subject of marriage and the propagation of the species was called forth. Incidentally it may be worth while to mention that that much-quoted document is like an isolated text of the scripture, a very different matter when taken in its proper connection to what it is made to appear when garbled and distorted by editors and philanthropists who quote one from the other, without having recourse to the original document. Mrs. John Van Vorst took for her field of observation a pickle factory in Pittsburg, a shirt factory in a New York town and tailoring in Chicago, with brief turns in a picture frame factory and a printing establishment. She worked for ten hours a day or more, subsisted on what she earned, and learned for herself what it means to be a part of a machine, driven like a machine, treated like a machine and subjected to such wear and tear as is never given to any machine. While one cannot question the facts learned by experience, some of the deductions, one cannot but feel, are inadequate. For example, many of the girls who drudge for ten and twelve hours a day every day in the week, and are fortunate if they make as much as $7 in that time, assert that their fathers and brothers are willing to support them without their going into the factory, and others boast that all they earn is spent in dress. It is preposterous to believe that girls will bind themselves to such slavery if there is an open choice. Mrs. Van Vorst does not appear to comprehend the love of romancing which would lead them to brag to the new hand. Undoubtedly there are many girls who would not be taken bodily by the shoulders and turned into the street if they did not work, and there are many fathers who would prefer to keep their daughters at home, and brothers who do not like to see their sisters "join the innumerable caravan" which leaves home in the morning twilight, to return after dark. But there are other forms of compulsion than the physical, and these girls know only too well the self-sacrifice on one side and the selfishness on the other, which would make it possible for them to be supported without effort on their own part. Again, when girls assert that all they earn is spent for dress it does not follow that the dress is entirely for their own adornment. If the needs of mothers and little brothers and sisters are supplied from the daughter's purse she is in her way contributing towards the expenses of the household. In instances where the girls turn all their earnings into the family purse and are boarded and clothed therefrom, parents frequently assert that they "support" the household. One needs some acquaintance with the meaning of words as used by the class represented to be certain that the right idea has taken hold. That girls talk of anything but housekeeping and home-making is not to be wondered at when they know so little of house or home. It would be as wise to expect young men to discuss the intricacies of dressmaking or millinery. While it is deplorably true that the American working girl spends a disproportionate amount of her hard-earned wages on foolish adornment and taudry trinkets, both the Mesdames Van Vorst unconsciously place their fingers on the pulse of the matter. Apart from the innate love of finery, a well-dressed woman receives consideration which is withheld from her less fortunate sister. Can the factory girl be blamed for wanting to be "treated like a lady," and when she sees only the external difference, is she at fault for doing her poor best to try to look like one? When Mrs. Van Vorst divested herself of her fashionable raiment and donned her working garb she made her way to the depot from which her train was to leave. She had displayed no ignorance, asked no question, showed no hesitation, but: "I get no further than the depot when I observe that I am being treated as though I were ignorant and lacking in experience. As a rule, the gateman says a respectable 'To the right,' or 'To the left,' and trusts to his well-dressed hearer's intelligence. A word is all that a moment's hesitation calls forth. To the working girl he explains as follows: 'Now, you take your ticket, do you understand? and I'll pick up your money for you; you don't need to pay anything for your ferry—just put those three cents back in your pocket-book and go down there to where that gentleman is standing and he'll direct you to your train.'" Miss Van Vorst tells in her experience how the Pullman porter treated her. "Although I called him first and purposely give him my order in time, he viewed me askance and served me the last of all. As I watched my companions in their furs and handsome attire eat, whilst I sat and waited, my woolen gloves folded in my lap, I wondered if any one of the favored was as hungry, as famished as the presser from Parson's, the cleaner from Marches'." Miss Marie Van Vorst confined her operations to Lynn shoe factories and Southern cotton mills. What she relates of the cotton mills, more especially of the child labor employed therein, is disheartening, but in no way different from the accounts of other investigators. This is the worst feature of it, that she merely confirms the worst that has been said before. As to home life, if such a travesty can be called either home or life, with dirt, insanitation, and not a vestige of morality, it cannot be laid altogether to the mills, for some things seem ingrained in the nature of the po' white. Here, in California, where they have settled in the foothills in many places and own large farms, they are still the same gaunt, sallow race, living on "hawg meat" and hominy by preference, going barefoot the year round, wearing but a single shapeless garment, day and night, and regarding such "slickin' up" functions as washings and combings as only called for on high-days and holidays. They build their cabins without windows, and dip water for all purposes from the "branch" or an unprotected spring, yet they are under no coercion from soulless mill owners. The conclusion which is reached, with regard to the improvement of the wages of women, which Mrs. Van Vorst sees is affected by the competition of two classes, the woman who must toil and she who need not, is that the more favored class should be drawn off from mill and factory life and taught industrial arts, such as lace-making, hand-weaving, embroidery, goldsmithing, bookbinding, rug weaving, wood carving and inlaying, but it is difficult to see how this will help the situation. Why should these, who have the less need for work, be taught the lighter grades of work, and what is to be gained in the long run, by removing the pressure from the factories, if it is to be applied elsewhere? Goldsmiths, bookbinders and wood carvers also have their livings to earn, and there is no reason why they should be subjected to a wage-cutting competition more than the factory hands. Incidentally the root of the domestic service problem is dug up, in this book, though the subject is never mentioned or hinted at. The companionship of the many makes it possible for each to do more than she would alone. "Once more I make the observation that men are more agreeable bosses than women. The woman, when she is not exceptionally disagreeable, is always annoying. She bothers and nags; things must be done her way; she enjoys the legitimate minding of other people's business. Aiming at results only, the masculine mind is more tranquil. Provided you get your work done, the man boss doesn't care what methods you take in doing it. For the woman boss, whether you get your work done or not, you must do it her way." "The forelady at Parsons' didn't know whether I worked well or not. She never came to see. The foreman at Marches' taught me himself." There is the whole situation in a nutshell, from preface to appendix. One cannot but admire the courage and perseverance of the Mesdames Van Vorst in making their experiment. They have added a valuable contribution to the subject of the woman at work, and written an absorbing book besides. It is one that must be read to be appreciated, and cannot be ignored by any one interested in the question. Doubleday, Page & Company are the publishers of the volume, which is profusely illustrated from photographs.

Elder & Shepard have issued for Easter "An Easter Song" by Grace Hibbard, in Easter card shape with a beautiful design of irises by Gordon Ross. It is a dainty thing to send to some "shut in" friend. The price is seventy-five cents. They have also issued a compilation of quotations on "Happiness," made up of the sayings on that subject by eminent writers. The price in pasteboard cover is fifty cents; leather, one dollar and a quarter. The Impressions Quarterly is out, and contains many interesting articles and verses.

A novel from the pen of Charles Warren Stoddard is the welcome promise of one of our local publishers. It is to be called "For the Sake of His Company: a Tale of a Misty City." Apart from the plot, one can always look forward to any book of Mr. Stoddard's as a treat. The charm of his style is unique, and he is one of the few writers left to us whom we can turn to for the beauty of his diction. —The Bookworm

Sugar Trust Invasion

The sale of the 13,500 shares of the total of 27,121 in the Alameda Sugar Company, to Eastern capital through Sutro & Company, has been the chief topic of interest in financial circles during the past week. After a month's work on the part of the brokers the climax was reached, but who the real buyers are is still a mystery. While it has been reported that Charles J. Welsh, of New York, was behind the deal, it is not positively known who is back of Welsh, although it has been commonly intimated that the Sugar Trust, or more definitely the American Sugar Company, is the purchaser, with previously secured stock enough to have a controlling interest since the transfer of this block of 13,500 shares. In response to a letter sent out to the shareholders of the company, throughout the week the brokers have been receiving numerous small parcels and the aggregate number of shares now in their hands, to be turned over to the new controlling interests of the refinery, with the original block of stock secured, is now well up to 20,000 shares. All stockholders of record on the books of the company on March 26, 1903, will, upon delivery of their stock, receive at the rate of $30 a share for one-half of their respective holdings, and a receipt for the remaining one-half on the stock so delivered. New stock will be delivered in exchange for these receipts on or after April 3, 1903, upon return of said receipts. The balance, namely, $1.50 a share, will be accounted for when the 1902 crop of the company has been entirely sold, as the exact amount is contingent upon the price obtained for this crop.

Since its inception the Alameda Sugar Company has paid more than 51 per cent in dividends. It has paid 15 per cent on its stock this year, and on April 14th the directors are to meet and it is believed that they will declare another dividend. During the last year the company's sales aggregated between $900,000 and $1,000,000. The enterprise has done remarkably well in the face of opposition, and now, with the Crockett refinery closed, it may be expected to do better. The buying of the shares at $31.50 is regarded as a comparatively low rate, and certainly seems a good investment for the purchasers. Wherever the Sugar Trust has absorbed beet refineries in Michigan, Utah, Colorado and elsewhere, it has continued operating all paying plants, and it is quite likely that the two refineries at Alvarado, which it is believed it has acquired, will continue to run, giving employment to some 200 men.

'Change Echoes

Speculation in investment securities was fairly extensive during the week and fluctuations in prices on some of the leading stocks showed a little wider margin than usual. The lighting stocks, which have been receiving so much attention during the past few weeks, have quieted down, but the speculative influences of the street have been so well maintained that there is no doubt that many buyers at the high prices, which for a time prevailed, are now less enthusiastic over their purchases. For the holders of San Francisco Gas & Electric shares who secured their stock under $45, and sold out to the eager buyers of a week ago, quite a handsome profit resulted. Considering all the facts in connection with these lighting stocks it seems rather remarkable that the prices could be bolstered up and appear to be so well maintained. Now that the excitement has comparatively cooled down it is easily discernible that the speculative element of the street has been about the sole beneficiary. The chief stock involved in this advance in price was the San Francisco Gas and Electric and as far as known the only reason for the advance was the pooling of the stock with the Mercantile Trust Company, subject to the disposition and order of the board of directors. A careful study of the situation fails to reveal any substantial reason why the price of shares should be so suddenly advanced from $42 to $65, particularly when it is known that the board of directors has not yet developed an opportunity for realizing the suggested $90 a share for all stockholders who chose to turn over their stock and accept in lieu thereof a Trustee's certificate. Furthermore, these facts are now substantiated by the steadily declining prices ever since the speculative interests realized a substantial cash returns on their operations. The prices of shares in the other lighting companies were involved to some little extent in a sympathetic way, but the one on which there was a definite option and a settled price was comparatively unaffected. This only tends to show, however, how the speculative interests of the street have been playing upon the public with rumors and points and at the same time doling out the shares and pocketing the proceeds. The option on the Equitable Gaslight stock of $5 per share is tangible of itself and the intent and good faith of the buyers is shown by the fact that they have already put in coin their first payment as promised. The Equitable stock has been largely placed in escrow and now that the buyers are showing their reliability by making their advance payments it is more than probable that all holders who have not already deposited their stock will be glad to do so. The outcome of these deals in lighting stocks will be productive of one good feature, and that is that consumers of gas in this city for both fuel and lighting purposes will be benefited by lower rates, which will not be temporary for cut-throat purposes. This will benefit the city at large, particularly the small consumers. In water stocks there has been comparatively little movement. The usual speculative operations in Spring Valley shares which always occur about the time the Supervisors are called upon to fix rates has quieted down and the price of shares has got back to normal figures. Sugar shares have been held quite steady although prices all along the line are a trifle below the standard of two weeks ago. Hawaiian Commercial readily brings $46, but sellers usually are demanding $47.50, with buyers very backward and not disposed to meet that figure except perhaps in very small parcels. Paauhau sells readily at $18 and Hutchison brings $15 equally well. Makaweli has been dull and it is now offered at $27.50 with no bids. All the other sugar stocks remain fairly steady with transactions small in volume. Giant Powder shows scarcely any change. At present $65.75 may be considered a full price although occasionally a buyer can be found at $66. Vigorit Powder is very easy and $2.50 per share is the best bidding price. Oceanic Steamship shares drag along slowly and $14 is the best bid. California Wine Association while a fraction lower than a week ago is firmly held at $104.50. Bank shares are still the strongest on the list. For Bank of California stock there is a standing bid of $500 with no offers to sell, and the same may be said of Mercantile Trust Company, for which $220 is being freely bid. Several lots of bonds have changed hands, but there has been very little fluctuation in price.

Financial Notes

The United States Steel Corporation paid its seventh dividend on the common stock March 30th, and checks for the total amount, aggregating $5,000,000, were mailed to over 27,000 holders of common stock. When the first dividend on the common stock was paid in September, 1901, tnere were on the books of the corporation 13,918 common shareholders.

The coinage at the United States Mint in San Francisco for the month of March, 1903, amounted to $5,132,386, and included $3,940,000 in double eagles, $960,000 in half eagles, and $232,386 in half-dollars.

The Bank Clearing at the San Francisco Clearing House for the month of March, 1903, aggregated $129,046,292.19, an increase of $8,248,356.91 over the clearances of the corresponding month of 1902. —The Financier.

THE NEW CURE FOR INTEMPERATES.

De Quincey, from the viewpoint of a victim, wrote of the evil fascination of opium. Dr. E. A. Hawks, at his Three Day Liquor Cure Institute at 295 Geary street, shows living examples of the evil fascination liquor exerts on the weak. Side by side with the victim, however, he shows his prototype, cured, sane, after three days' treatment in the Institute. Dr. Hawks has studied his subject from the ground up. He has testimonials to prove what he has done. Best of all he has these living examples of the system by which he cures. In nine cases out of ten the man or woman victim of the liquor habit contracted it from the wish to be social. But the habit grew with the result that it became impossible to root out. Dr. Hawks has made the impossible possible. In three days under his care, the liquor habit is eradicated, root and branch.

Other People's Ideas

From "Senator North," by Gertrude Atherton:

"Corruption" is the father of more platitudes than any word in the American language.

It is only the woman with a certain masculine fibre in her brain who ever really understands men, and when these women have coquetry also they convince the sex born to admire that they are even more feminine than their weaker sisters.

Life is serious only for women with babies and bills. As for charities, they were specially invented to give old maids an occupation in life.

Women make a god out of what they cannot understand in a man. If he has a bad temper they think of him as a "dominant personality." If he is unfaithful to his wife, he is romantic in the eyes of a woman who has given no man a chance to be unfaithful to her. If he comes to your dinner with an attack of dyspepsia, you compare him sentimentally with the brutes that eat. (Sally Carter.)

If you only knew what the censors said about the old ideals when they were alive! If Time will be as kind to us, we can swallow our own dose with a reasonable amount of philosophy. John Quincy Adams arraigned the politics of his day in the bitterest phrases he could create; but today we are asked to remember the glorious past and hide our heads. (Senator Burleigh.)

There is no problem in plain duty. Problems exist principally in works of fiction and in the minds of unoccupied women. If you meet each development of every question in the most natural and reasonable manner—presupposing that you possess that highest attribute of civilization, common sense—no question will ever resolve itself into a problem. And difficulties usually disappear as the range of vision contracts. If your house takes fire you save what you can, not what you have elaborately planned to save in case of fire. Train your common sense, and let the windy analysis pertaining to problems alone. (Senator North.)

Europe will console an American woman for every ill in life. (North.)

All of us possess every good and bad instinct in the whole book of human nature, but few of us have imagination enough to find it out. And the less we know of ourselves the better.

The egotism of love reduces scenery to a setting and the splendors of sunset to a background.

Any woman who has a secret on her mind is bound to become secretive, not to say deceitful, in other ways.

In dealing with methodical scoundrels, you know, at least, where you are.

How wonderfully well people behave whose common secret would set the world by the ears.

arguments in any brain, and after they have been reiterated a sufficient number of times they pall.

Breeding has carried many a woman over the plowshares of life.

People capable of the deepest and most enduring impressions often receive these impressions upon apparently shallow waters. They feel the blow, but it skims the surface at the moment, to choose its place and sink slowly, surely, into the thinking brain.

There is no position in the world so unenviable as that of a girl who gets herself talked about with a married man. Men lose interest in her and raise their eyebrows at the clubs when her name is mentioned, and women gradually drop her. Money and position will cover up a good many indiscretions in a married woman or a widow, but the world always has demanded that a girl shall be immaculate, and if she permits Society to think she is not, it punishes her for violating one of its pet standards. (Mrs. Madison.)

One of life's compensations is that there is always something ahead, some trifling event or interest or pleasure upon which one may fix one's eye and endeavor to forget the dreary tissue of monotony and commonplace between.

—The Gleaner.

Clyde Fitch's Wit

From "The Way of the World":

Mrs Cake (speaking of Mr. Nevill): She's the sort of woman who would do anything—throw vitriol; why, she dyes her hair mahogany one season and straw color the next, and she wears blue veils.

Mrs. Croyden (to Mr. Lake, referring to her "platonic" flirtation with Jack Nevill): Two childlike canaries couldn't carry on a more innocent affair. (To which Mrs. Lake retorts: Well, you may be a canary, but Nevill is too old a bird for the little bill you're making out for him.)

Mrs. Croyden (as her husband prepares to leave her, carrying her pet dog in his arms): Good-by, darling.

Mr. Croyden: Were you speaking to me?

Mrs. Croyden: No, no, no, to the little dog.

Mrs. Croyden: I don't know how Catherine Bowker manages to spread gossip as fast as she does. I think she has learned the Marconi system and carries a cylinder in her pocket.

Mrs. Lake (who dislikes politics): I think the snake breaking up Adam and Eve's happiness was only a figure of speech, for the "general election" in Eden.

Mrs. Lake (in the last act, referring to Mrs. Nevill): Her way of thinking is all wrong, but her soul's right. All that peroxide she pours into her head hasn't eaten its way into her heart yet.

The Easter Festival

The Lenten season has drawn to a close and tomorrow, throughout the civilized world, festivities and ceremonies will be held in commemoration of the resurrection of Christ. Easter is the one day in the year that is of distinctly religious significance to all Christians. Christmas has become a day of festivity to Jews and Gentiles, and to many people it has no religious significance, but to the Christian mind Easter is symbolical of the resurrection, of the glorious triumph of the Victim of the greatest tragedy in the world's history. Various are the customs observed in Christian countries in commemoration of the event that so signally exemplified the doctrine of immortality, and all are more or less of a religious character. In Catholic countries especially are the religious customs most strictly observed, and Easter is the day on which even the most lukewarm Catholics renew allegiance to their church. In far-away Palestine pilgrims from all parts of the world assemble at Eastertide and make the rounds of the holy places. In the most remote regions of South America, the natives devote themselves to religious exercises throughout Holy Week, and on the day before Easter they consign effigies of Judas to the flames. Then they are all prepared for the festivities of the succeeding Sabbath. The observance of Easter in this country is becoming more widespread every year, for even the indifferent are beginning to have their interest aroused in a festival that marks the close of a period in which there is a general manifestation of respect for Christian customs. Church pews will be occupied tomorrow by people who pass through the portals of a sacred edifice but once a year. Many are lured by the elaborate character of the services and the promise of exceptionally refreshing musical features, but they cannot fail to receive invigorating inspiration, and to feel when they once more pass into the open air that the diversion was wholesome, and that more of such experience would conduce to the leading of a better life.

Compounding a Felony

Some interesting revelations were made in the Police Court the other day when the case of Edith Bernard was called and the defendant failed to appear. Edith Bernard is a chronic swindler who has been embezzling money from local merchants by means of fictitious checks. She has been arrested more than once on complaint of her victims, but nobody has ever prosecuted her. It appears that they prefer to force her to reimburse them in the small sums of which they have been defrauded than to punish her for her crimes. It is through no spirit of mercy or leniency that they withdraw from the prosecution. The criminal proceedings started by them are a species of blackmail, their only purpose being to force the swindler to disgorge. Their conduct is as reprehensible from the standpoint of public morals as that of the criminal with whom they compromised, thereby committing an offense known to the law as "compounding a felony." It is a question whether their conniving at the defeat of justice isn't even a more serious and degrading offense than that of the chronic swindler herself, for they were neither subjected to temptation nor actuated by necessity. Moreover as prosperous citizens of this community, enjoying its patronage, it is their duty to assist in the suppression of crime and the banishment of swindlers that prey upon the unwary. It appears that the proprietors of the City of Paris and Armand Cailleau were the chief offenders. No doubt they regard themselves as upright citizens and would become highly indignant if told that they were no better than the common embezzler with whom they entered into a criminal compromise. Not only did Mr. Cailleau refrain from prosecuting Miss Bernard after she had swindled him on a worthless check, but he actually employed her as a saleswoman in his store. Perhaps she was reimbursing him by rendering service to the extent of the sum that he lost. It probably never occurred to him that he was giving her an opportunity to win the confidence of his patrons and swindle them, too. And perhaps he didn't care. Altogether the case is a sad commentary on the selfishness of some of our so-called leading citizens who pose as exemplars of propriety.

Police Corruption

The police have ceased temporarily from levying blackmail in Chinatown. A police commissioner who obviously was not sharing in the corruption fund raised by the Chinese for the purchase of police protection, having protested against the maintenance of such cordial financial relations between the authorities and the gamblers, all parties concerned resolved to be virtuous for awhile. Of course there will be a resumption of the traffic in the near future. The authorities are reluctant to let so much good money go to waste in the purlieus of Chinatown. There will always be gambling in Chinatown for the Chinese are inveterate gamblers, and they will always find a way. The corruption fund way has always been regarded as the most expedient. It has been demonstrated many times that the police can drive the Chinese gamblers out of business, and it is therefore obvious that when all the gambling houses are doing business openly the police are not performing their duties. And when the police become apathetic in Chinatown it is because they regard activity as unprofitable. The president of the Board of Police Commissioners pretends to believe that the police are powerless because the Chinese are guaranteed immunity in the police courts. He either knows that such is not the fact or else he is a fool. It is ridiculous to seek to "pass the buck" up to the magistrates when it is so notorious a fact that the police can close every gambling house in Chinatown merely by harassing the gamblers without securing a single conviction. The defence of the police by the commissioners is so surprising as to excite suspicion. It has a tendency to stimulate speculation as to the extent of the corruption in the police department. It does not seem likely that a sergeant of police would incur the risk of losing his position by so flagrant a neglect of duty as that of which the head of the Chinatown squad was guilty. The probability is that he relied for protection on a higher authority. The white lottery dealers of this city do not rely for protection on the patrolmen or the sergeants. Nobody ever hears of their being molested, and yet they carry on their business as openly as though it had the sanction of the laws of the State. Are Mr. Newhall and his confreres unaware of the fact that the white lottery dealers raise a corruption fund with which they purchase protection?

Faulty Educational Methods

Notwithstanding all the tinkering to which our educational systems have been subjected in the last quarter of a century they appear to be as remote from perfection as ever. Some of the brightest of our university presidents admit that the methods of the day are a failure. Scarcely a month passes without some university president or professor discovering a flaw in the course of study which he proceeds to discuss for the enlightenment of magazine readers. President Nicholas Murray Butler, in a recent issue of the Columbia Literary Monthly, utters a wail of sorrow over the colleges which within the past twenty-one years have changed into universities, and he longs for the old-fashioned institutions. Perhaps, after all, it would be better to return to first or at least earlier principles. President Butler says that the course of study in vogue in many of the leading colleges is not worth spending four years on. We are pleased to have President Butler agree with what Town Talk has said many times. He discusses the subject as though he has been a close reader of this paper, for in the same article he deplores the fact that the college student has been deprived of the benefit of character-building, which was the main feature of the educational systems of long ago, but to which attention is no longer given except in religious institutions. "That the love of letters and polite learning and the knowledge of the older humanities have declined," says President Butler, "is made evident in a hundred ways. Too early specialization is at the root of some of these evils, and the modern passion for being in a hurry and for spelling success m-o-n-e-y is at the root of the rest of them." President Butler should guess again. The weakness of our modern system of education lies in the fact that too much effort is spent in cramming the mind and too little in training it. Instead of the student being taught how to think, how to reason and how to apply himself to thought and research, he is forced to absorb knowledge already prepared for his mental nourishment. Knowledge injected into the brain through the ear does not always remain in the cells in which it is deposited, but if the student is taught how to acquire knowledge he becomes able to perfect his own education after he leaves college.

Demoralized by Legislatures

It is said that many of the members of the recently adjourned Missouri Legislature fled in haste from the capital to escape being interviewed by the Grand Jury of the county. From the opening of the legislature until its close the air of the capital was laden not only with charges but with evidence of corruption, and the Grand Jury is now on the trail of the boodlers. During the recent session of our legislature the Sacramento ozone was heavily charged with rumors of corruption, but nobody heard of any investigation or inquiry by the Grand Jury. It would have been most astonishing if the law officers of Sacramento county took cognizance of the biennial boodling of the Solons with the itching palms. The fact is that boodling has been a profitable pastime in Sacramento so many years that it has had a demoralizing effect on the community. The people of Sacramento listen to the stories of corruption as they do to current news, and take no great interest in them. They know a cinch bill when they see it and they know the dishonest legislators, but they never complain about corruption. Almost everybody in Sacramento, even the waiters in the hotels, the bootblacks, the car conductors and the barkeepers know the exact sums that were paid one Assemblyman who represents a district not a thousand miles from the geographical centre of the town, but the Grand Jury took not the slightest interest in his activities. It is estimated that he cleaned up twenty thousand dollars during the session, but he is at large, and within easy reach of the Sacramento Grand Jury. Mr. Arthur Fisk, the Speaker of the Assembly, finished the session with great credit to himself, and it is said that the only enemy he made was an Assemblyman whom he threatened with exposure if he accepted money to vote against a certain measure. The man had been negotiating with a lobbyist and was about to accept a bribe when the Speaker interposed. An honest, energetic Grand Jury could have made a great record during the late session, but the people of Sacramento would discourage interference on the part of their law officers for they fear that if they attempted to jeopardize the "graft" of the hungry politicians of the State, the capital would be removed to San Jose by way of rebuke. But the people of Sacramento are of the same temperament as those of other State capitals and probably they are not more complaisant. The fact is that legislatures are demoralizing to the communities in which they hold their sessions.

The Burden of a Name

The subject of names in fiction is one of more than passing interest. But the most unusual and far-fetched amongst them—those which seem to be the outcome of some nightmare dream of the author—are no worse than names foisted upon innocent children by romantic and ill-balanced parents. The Cecils and Montmorencis who stalk through the pages of sentimental novels would not be there if the readers of such literature had not a penchant for the high-sounding names. A rector in Australia is rapping his congregation over the knuckles for their tendency toward the hifalutin and their neglect of the staple article which did good service to former generations, but he may as well economize his breath. If Mrs. Mulcahy thinks Montmorenci the only name suitable for her darling, Montmorenci he will be, in spite of baptismal registers and three generations of Patricks to precede him, until he is old enough to join a juvenile football team, and then he will be transformed speedily into Micky. If Mrs. O'Brien, oblivious to red hair and the pug nose of her infant daughter, sets her heart on Gwendolyne Gertrude, in vain is the argument that she should be content with Mary Ann or Bridget. And keeping within reasonable bounds, parents are not to be blamed if they avoid names with which the association is not agreeable. It is a positive hardship for a little girl to be sent out to face the world with such a name as Bridget, notwithstanding all the virtues of the saint who bore it, or the agreeable sound of the name itself. Little Patrick or Michael or Jeremiah has enough to face on his first day at school without the onus of an unusual name. Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes protested against the fashion of using children to hang old names upon, as we hang old clothes upon pegs, and expecting an inoffensive urchin to rejoice in being named Peleg because some curmudgeon relative, supposed to have a fortune stowed away, might be induced to liberality by the subtle flattery of having a namesake. But at the other extreme is the idiocy which invents such appellations as Blossom, Dearestine, Treasure, Berrita, Birdilena, Goldina and Lillita. Are they any better than the Morleena which Mrs. Kenwigs concocted for her earliest treasure, or the Jurilda of Mrs. Matchin in "The Breadwinners"? Many a child has carried a lifelong burden as the result of the mental aberration of its parents. "Garaphelia Mohalba" might as well have had smallpox as such a name, and "Abcdilla," which perpetuated the folly of an earlier generation in giving to twins nothing but AB and CD to distinguish them, had a heavy handicap to contend against. Names which are appropriate enough in one country are silly or worse when transplanted. It is one of the rules of the Catholic church that infants shall receive in baptism the name of some saint. This would seem, at first sight, to offer an insurmountable obstacle to the romantically inclined, but a study of the saints' calendar soon suggests Jacqueline, Imalda, Elodie, Leocadia, and innumerable others. When people want romance they will get it, and "Pishy" Bines is not the only instance in which the selected appellation proved too much for the selectors. If people cannot see the incongruity of the combination which James G. Blaine described as a "Queen Anne front and a Mary Anne back," nothing that can be said on the subject will have any effect. As Miss Braddon said of the gorgeous dress and surroundings with which she supplied her characters, "It doesn't cost anything," and if high-sounding names give their owners any satisfaction at least they are in no danger of meeting with trusts and combines to limit their chances of enjoyment.

The Exuberance of Youth

Chicago is swinging into line on the subject of "race suicide." They have a proposition on foot there to fine landlords who object to children, but many an enthusiast who is ready to cast his vote in favor of some such measure would quickly swing to the other end of the arc if he should himself become a property owner. Landlords have real grievances, and parents are themselves to blame that children are indiscriminately barred. There are well-behaved children, but they are few and far between. The well-bred child is such an exception in the world today that it needs ocular demonstration to prove its existence. Parents appear to have simply abdicated, and since they will not, or cannot, or in any event, do not make their children amenable to discipline, the rest of the world is forced, in self-defense, to object to the presence of the little savages. Some of the most lenient to the shortcomings of their own brood are loudest in their condemnation of others. The modern custom of living in layers one above another has much to do with the objection to children in flats and apartment houses. Besides the noise of their boots tramping and dancing overhead there is apt to be a procession of boys following each other down the balustrade of the back stairs, to the imminent danger of life and limb, while entrance to the front door, or the use of a common stairway, is bought at the expense of sprained ankles and broken bones as a result of marbles, blocks and other impedimenta. Tenants will not remain where they are subject to such annoyance, and the result is, idle apartments, which must be whitened every few months or so, for a new occupant. Parents who have never owned their own homes, and have only a vague idea of the current rate of carpenters' and painters' wages, will calmly look on while Johnny tries his new pocket knife on the window sill or Mary practices free-hand drawing on walls and wood work, or the youngest darling lets his heels fly through the door panels in an outburst of temper. Plumbing is damaged and bricks dug from foundations, and the one attraction of a flower garden is the joy of uprooting it. In spite of all that is written against the rapacity of the landlord, it not infrequently happens that at the end of the year, between bad tenants and idle months, in addition to repairs, the owner is actually out of pocket. While no one expects children to have adult sense in infant years, there is no gainsaying the fact that the present generation is allowed to grow up inconsiderate of any rights and conveniences but its own. If parents really feel aggrieved because children are barred from eligible residences it behooves them to look at the other side of the question and see why.

Titles and Tomfoolery

Doctor Dose may reasonably be expected to have a fair knowledge of medicine. The title tells us something about the man—something sufficiently definite to be of use. Quite useless, however, in this regard, is, for instance, the title Duke. It indicates nothing. From it we may not reasonably infer any particular qualities in a man; any special ability, beauty, grace, or the like. To think that any nincompoop who, through a concatenation of circumstances that would make very pretty effects in fiction, falls heir to a dukedom, is a natural born leader of men and should be put to work at that business, is to trifle with thought. It is a last straw of absurdity and breaks the back of the doctrine of design; a bit of etymological mummery, and should be left for exploitation by mute, inglorious Carlyles. Nevertheless the word is used as a mark of great social distinction. In what wonderful way a duke differs from a man is not very evident. It takes a nice courtier to discover a prince in disguise. I remember as a boy chatting with a then to me incognito duke—no less a one than the Duke of Connaught. When informed afterwards of the rank of my chance acquaintance and reproved for the straightness of my knee, I remarked that his royal highness conversed but indifferently well, and could never pass for Apollo.

Let opportune Death cut a convenient path for Everyday John Doe, poor relation of the Duke de Dicout. Forthwith Everyday's commonplace opinions on all possible and some impossible subjects pass as pronunciamentos of authoritative value. A word, mere air, adds weight to his lightest utterances. The confirmation of a ducal coronet is strong as proofs of holy writ. Hitherto Everyday John Doe's repute as a philosopher had been no greater than his name. And yet this disguise of a dukedom is so thin that any child should, and no doubt would, recognize Everyday beneath it. But a brow adorned with strawberry leaves has no need to become "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought."

A duke may be a wise man. In such happy case, it is to Wisdom, not to a worthless word, that our respect is due. But the merits of princes find ready appreciation. When the king cracks a joke, courtiers show pleasant teeth. If, on the contrary, his grace be but Everyday John Doe in dazzling disguise, I see no reason why the tinsel of a title should be good to buy him golden opinions of all men and save him from the fate of a fool.

Call Everyday any nonsense-name you will—"Fluke," let us say, instead of "Duke." Does not the new dignity leave him the identical indifferent fellow he is in himself? Did not the old? I do not mean to say that a title has no psychological effect upon the possessor of it; but I do mean to say that this effect is not always deserving of our respectful admiration—insufferable ill-mannered condescension, it may be; exasperating expectancy of homage due—due to God knows what. When the author of "In Memoriam" was made Lord Tennyson, was anything thereby added to the poem? Did the disconsolate friend of Hallam thereafter deserve additional regard? Does the word Laureate make Alfred Austin a greater poet than Swinburne?

To behave naturally in the presence of a prince; to speak fair, without fawning, is to be accused of insolence; while common courtesy on his part is accounted supererogatory graciousness. The ease with which a prince wins applause is death to his development; to get honor without earning it paralyzes effort.

A short while ago Prince Henry of Germany pronounced a certain woman the most beautiful he had seen in America. The praise of a prince was considered such a compliment that the pictures of fair competitors for it appeared weekly in the papers. No one thought of asking: "Has Henry a finer æsthetic sense than is common; or else, uncommon culture in matters of art?" I know nothing of the prince's accomplishments, but it is probable that the first garret portrait painter fallen in with would make a more competent Paris. Beauty is his (the artist's) business.

In my youth I once got into a discussion with an earl on a sociological question. His lordship, poor fellow, was lame of both feet; so was his argument; and it is without a taint of vanity that I assure the discerning reader that I had the better of the debate. My father chid me, a crownless child, for daring to have more brains than an aged earl. I asked my learned sire (he is a gold medallist) if he thought that the science of mathematics would alter to suit an aged earl who contended that twice two makes five; or chemistry—would it change should he assert that water is composed of nitrogen and oxygen? Age and title, I held, had as little to do with the case as the flowers that bloom in the spring; and I added a defiant tra-la-la-la or two. The Constitution of things did not (so I declared) care a—any more than I did for age and title.

That was long ago, in aristocracy-ridden Europe. In America, Democracy—which consists in large part in giving to every man his due—no more, no less—is supposed to have cut many a gap through "the divinity that doth hedge a king." There are few more subtle fallacies than that of fondly believing that a change of name denotes a change of nature. The word mephitis stinks less than does the word skunk, but the animal—! Because we do not confer titles upon any one, it is inferred that we do not defer to any one upon absurdly inadequate, merely nominal grounds, as do the Johnnies overseas.

What of the Anglo-American mesalliances made in notoriously open marriage markets? what of our bestowing golden crutches for gouty toes to get along with? of our supporting tottering titles with our sweetness, our beauty, and our strength? What of the thousand and one evidences that Herbert Spencer spoke our need as well as that of his native land, when he exclaimed: "Were the honor now given to wealth and title given exclusively to high achievement and intrinsic worth, how immense would be the stimulus to progress!" ?

The drone of the sea
Lulled me to sleep and I dreamt of thee;—
The light of thy mightiest love enwound thee
And lay like the mantle of Mary around thee!

Love enwound thee
And lay like the Virtue of Mary around thee.
The winds through the sails with low choruses rang
And bore to me songs that thy lips once sang.

Their choruses rang
Sweet with the songs that thy lips once sang.
And he, the good dæmon that guarded my breast,
Caught up the strain and my fancy the rest.

The heart in my breast
Thrilled with the strain—Fancy brought me the rest:
I felt every throb of thy blest heart repeating:
Our love is eternal,—the world it is fleeting!

Thy wild heart repeating:
Our love is eternal,—though all things be fleeting!
I felt this—I felt all thy kisses as warm
As when my swift arms had encinctured thy form.

Thy kisses were warm
As when thy soft arms had encircled my form,—
Thou was't mine!—O, all changed to embraces as cold
As those the sea hath for her lovers untold!

Embraces how cold,
When she clips to her bosom her lovers untold!
Down to the floor of the floods sank the ship
And I with the sound of thy name on my lip.

Down, down with the ship,—
My prayer was the sound of thy name from my lip!
Now, God's Heaven is Heaven the more at thy side:
This is the tale how I loved thee and died!

The Saunterer

The Folger Boom

Great and unusual interest is being taken in the approaching Bohemian Club election, all because of the shelving of Dr. J. Dennis Arnold and the resurrection of J. Duval Phelan. During the week there has been talk of running Athearn Folger on an opposition ticket, and for a time it appeared as though the resentment of Dr. Arnold's friends was so bitter against the powers that control the politics of the club, that Mr. Folger would snow Mr. Phelan under should he care to make the effort. A strong sentiment in favor of Folger was being worked up when somebody dropped the hint that he was the choice of the seceders who were responsible for the organization of The Family. Now the little coterie of disgruntled Bohemians who organized The Family Club are objects of intense hatred in Bohemia. They are referred to as soreheads, and it is said that they quit the Bohemian Club in a pique because they were not permitted to "run things." Louis Sloss and a few of his cronies are said to have been the chief conspirators in a scheme to entice members away from the Bohemian Club by representing that they would establish a more exclusive organization; one in which good-fellowship predominated, and the flames of conviviality would be fanned by the wings of friendship. It was to be an ideal club, bohemian in its atmosphere and free from the taint of commercialism.

They're Sore on Sloss

So indignant are the members of the Bohemian Club over the organization of The Family by the disloyal and disgruntled element, that when it was suggested that those who had retained their membership in the parent organization were trying to put an opposition ticket headed by Athearn Folger into the field, they became positively profane in their utterances. It was the consensus of opinion that Dr. Arnold could beat millionaire Jimmy with ease if he cared to head the opposition ticket, but Athearn Folger as the representative of the conspirators of The Family was impossible. How cordially those club men hate one another! And how accomplished they are in the feminine art of picking one another to pieces. When Louis Sloss was a member of the Bohemian Club before the days of The Family, he was regarded as a very popular gentleman. The name of Sloss has always been highly respected in this community, but now he is denounced for all sorts of shortcomings. "Imagine Louis Sloss kicking about the commercial spirit," said one Bohemian, "why, he typifies commercialism, and yet he never inherited any of the commercial ability of his father. The firm had to recall him from Alaska." Another Bohemian declared that Sloss was sore because he couldn't get some of his relatives into the Bohemian Club. The hammer was being swung at a terrific pace, and all sorts of sneers at the personnel of "The Family" were indulged. "It's a spite club," said one Bohemian, "and it isn't worthy of our notice. When Joe Redding was out here they tried to induce him to join but he roasted those that asked him for trying to disrupt the Bohemian Club." Meanwhile The Family is becoming prosperous, though it is conducted on a modest scale, and its members are taking a keen interest in the resurrection of Phelan, the millionaire Bohemian.

Startling Doings in Hawaii

All Hawaii is in ferment over the seemingly never-ending disclosures of official dishonesty, writes a correspondent. The epidemic of rottenness among employes of the Dole administration has created a panic in official and commercial circles, to say nothing of the social upheavals.

Bondsmen are hastening to free themselves from the risk of loss, and there are few office-holders not looked at askant. Investigation of all bureaus is being clamored for, and the very suggestion of illness or absence from duty of an official is enough to excite suspicion. The manner of living of these men is being pried into, and the unwise employe who drinks wine in public or appears behind a fast horse may consider himself in line for examination as to his accounts. The absconding of Wray Taylor was the severest shock to the Doleites. Taylor had been in office under the Dole oligarchy—Republican and Territorial—for nearly ten years, and was looked on as a war-horse of the Missionary party He was the head of the Agricultural Bureau, and a special pet of Dole. He was promoted when Hawaii was made a Territory, and was pointed to with pride by the psalm-singing adherents of the venerable Dole. Taylor never drank in public but had a nose which was the ensign of a bottle-lifter if ever nose was. He was the leader of the choir in the Episcopal church, and lectured at the Young Men's Christian Association. Like fifty others, he had early in his residence in the islands sold his heart to a Kanaka girl, and lived in the slipshod fashion of all who take the brown to wife. He was the very model of the missionary crowd which controls all things official and financial in Hawaii, and when after a month's unaccounted for absence in California a hint of something wrong was mooted, the missionary forces proclaimed it a libel.

The Hypocritical Missionaries

But revelations soon followed. He had been crooked for years. Where he spent his stealings is only known to that grave, sardonic crew who rule the Paradise of the Pacific, and take their pleasures under the rose. The aisles of the churches echo to their tread whenever their chosen pulpiteers call them together, but their voices, eloquent then in song and praise of their Redeemer, know well the lilt of the forbidden chants, and their feet the wild rhythm of the hula-hula. Decrying all things immoral, and ever ready to throw the lava at the public sinner, these lecherous, bearded Sybarites are no strangers to the midnight orgie under the palms, where dusky sirens woo their hypocritical souls, and the clinking of glasses and sound of seducing songs are drowned by the boom of the surf. The gilded dens of vice here and in other cities they visit on their journeys from their island homes are familiar to these strong men, under whose beneficent rule the kanaka is being wiped out and the gospel spread. Among the effects of a former tenderloin queen who died in her gilded cage not long ago, were signed photographs of some of these devotees which, had they been published in Honolulu, with the heated sentiments of their donors and signers, would have caused the very pews to creak. Now and then some scandal does break out openly, and then the leprous life of a missionary is disclosed, but for every such one there are two score whose silent licentiousness gives forth no echo to the world.

They Saw Bugs

Jack Wilson and Billy Barton, the author of "The Lay of the Lingering Lung," are back from Honolulu, where they augmented their repertoire of post-prandial stories. They report that they saw all that was worth seeing in the islands, and that they had experiences both exciting and ravishing. Wilson says that a trip to Honolulu is more effective than a course of treatment in a Keeley institute. During the first few days in the islands a man sees so many crawling and creeping things that he becomes convinced that he "has 'em sure." They saw hordes of black spiders as big as silver dollars, and were very much afraid of them until they heard that the spiders grew fat on mosquitoes and cared for no other diet. One night Wilson was greatly alarmed owing to the presence of an uninvited bedfellow. He was seized round the ankle, and in his fright he jumped out of bed. He found that his ankle was in the embrace of a centipede, but he had fortunately crushed its head before it had time to plunge its poisonous fangs into him.

Canny Fra Albertus

According to those who profess to have found him out, Elbert Hubbard, the editor of the Philistine, who is to lecture here this month, is a fakir of fakirs. Far from being the Fra Elbertus he pictures himself in his little monthly—the careless, pelf-despising Bohemian whose gods are of no clay—Hubbard is painted by those who know him well as a shrewd, cold business man, affecting the litterateur who loves his fellows for money's sake alone. He has made heaps of money in the past ten years in his East Aurora workshop, though it must be said that he started in there with a fair-sized pile. He built this pile of soap. He was a soap drummer when one day in Chicago, washing his hands, he thought out an invention to revolutionize the making of a certain kind of soap, and finally sold his ideas to a firm for a hundred thousand or more.

His Aurora Community

Then he began his East Aurora colony scheme. He gathered about him a score of artistic and literary geniuses, and by a clever use of their output he made quite a reputation for the Roycroft Shop. Pretending to be the mere guide, philosopher and friend in a delightful, Utopian community in which all worked for the joy of working, and where all profits were divided among the dwellers therein Hubbard catered to that peculiar anarchistic instinct in the soul of most people which makes them secretly to admire any one bold enough to cry out against the things that are. In his Philistine he said that he was but the leader in a plan to ameliorate the condition of handicraftsmen, to aid in the search for the Beautiful, and to lift the American from the inartistic woes of antimacassars, drapes and chromos. Hubbard did this very well. He has built up a cult of worshipers who take his fiat in all matters of books, manners, morals and art, and he has gradually trained them to buy his high-priced bindings and his hand-wrought andirons at fancy prices, believing that they list to the pronouncements of a generous, marvelously original genius, and that their money goes to help on the good work of art education at East Aurora.

What His Critics Say

Hubbard's success has been phenomenal, and whatever may be thought of his sincerity or lack of it, it is certain that he is a thinker, that he expresses his thoughts in an entertaining way, and that his essays are read. The first that attracted widespread attention was his "Message to Garcia." Since attaining prominence he has been the object of some very bitter attacks. People who know him, and who regard him as a poseur, say that he is a skinflint; that he has worked and does work a gang of miserably paid dreamers and toilers to their utmost limit, and that he takes all the gate receipts himself. He has made a half-million dollars, become a celebrity, and now lectures on a guarantee of two hundred dollars and expenses, about altruism, art and Aurora. He wears slouch hats, flannel shirts, trousers tucked in high boots, and uses all the other friend-of-man gullery. His wife lately got a divorce from him, and Fra Elbertus has to dig for alimony.

Quoted Against Himself

His divorce suit, by the way, excited much interest, and some of the details were wired all over the country. During the trial of the case some of his magazine articles were quoted against him. He once wrote that he had been inspired and helped by half a dozen women with whom he had been in love, one at a time. The article was produced as evidence of his unfitness for the marital state, but a more specific charge was that one of the women from whom he had received inspiration lived in his home for more than a year, and that she was the mother of one of his children.

Hobson's Choice Is the Limelight

In strong contrast to the free-loving Roycrofter is Lieutenant Hobson, but only in the matter of temperament. He too betrays some of the mannerisms of the poseur. Having decided to capitalize the fame he achieved by a vain but spectacular heroism, he resigned from the navy to take the lecture platform. He appears to have undertaken the task of stimulating a national sentiment in favor of a greater navy, and therefore he should be on the payroll of the Shipbuilders' Trust. If he neglected to persuade Mr. Nixon to put him on the payroll then he is lacking in financial sagacity. In quitting the navy to become a public speaker Lieutenant Hobson showed that he was sensible of the cash value of the advertising that he had been receiving ever since he availed himself of the opportunity to emerge from obscurity. If he had never sunk the Merrimac and been kissed into fame he would not be worth while as an experiment on the lecture platform. But now he deprecates that kissing episode. His manager declares that the lieutenant was never kissed except in public, and that he is not of an amatory nature. On the contrary he has always been cold to the fair sex. In other words he prefers to pose as a misogynist than as a passionate lothario. If he really wishes to have that kissing episode forgotten, why, I should like to know, does he talk so much about it?

Lionized by the Ladies

Confirmed lion-hunters in Los Angeles, writes a correspondent, have been worshiping at the shrine of Hobson who, if he objects to large chunks of adoration, makes such faint indication that "you couldn't hardly notice it at all." He has persistently placed himself where the limelight of publicity could not by any chance miss him and has then proceeded to pose, to the delight of the admiring women and the disgust of the men. While in Los Angeles he visited the Friday Morning Club and after allowing three or four hundred women to gush over him in the reception hall accepted an invitation to say a few words. His few words were the usual spread-eagleism with which he usually favors the public. He was followed on the program by Professor Henry Morse Stevens of Berkeley who, although he is sometimes blunt in his speech, not veiling what he means, by sugared words, probably knows more in a minute than the young naval hero does in a week. Prof. Stevens's subject was Kipling and he naturally talked of India. In the course of his address he told how three million natives are kept in hand by only twelve hundred young British soldiers. Then followed details of acts of heroism of these same soldiers, the speaker closing that portion of his address by saying, "And instances might be multiplied of such unrecorded heroism." As the professor laid especial stress on the "unrecorded" the inference was that he wished to contrast the persistent posing of Hobson. The young officer left a few minutes later.

that of clever people. Before her marriage Mrs. Borden lived in San Francisco. She was Margery Frances Burnett, a granddaughter of General Alexander S. Burnett. Her husband used to write very bright stories.

His Feelings Must Be Spared

An attache of the American legation in Vienna sent me an amusing story the other day anent the preparations being made for the visit of King George of Saxony to the Emperor Francis Joseph, set for some time this month. As usual it was decided to hold a gala performance at the Opera House, and for such occasions it is customary to choose such operas and ballets, or fragments of the same as present a thoroughly new mise-en-scene, including costumes and decorations. The choice of a suitable opera in this instance was a perplexing matter because it was necessary to avoid all subjects which could in any way remind the royal spectator of the recent embarrassing drama at his own Court. The newest opera in Vienna is Tschaikowsky's "Queen of Clubs." But it could not be considered because it involves the story of a bride who deceives her future husband on the very day of their engagement. Attention was therefore turned to Charpentier's "Louise," and the painters and decorators were set to work to portray the Seine and Montmartre, with a wonderful sunrise as Paris awakens, when presently along came the Court functionary with despair on his face. "It won't do! Think of the program: Gala performance in honor of His Majesty the King of Saxony—'Louise,' a musical romance by Charpentier. Louise, who runs away from her parents for love of a young fop. It will never do." It was finally decided to give a performance of an extract from the new ballet, "Der Fraule Hans."

An Emperor's Past

According to one of the dailies Washington V. Plise, teacher of the piano and of voice culture at 1641 Howard street, is emperor and sole lord of the island of Pedro Gonzales, lying near the western outlet of the proposed Panama canal. It was stated that back in the forties Victor Plise was one of the wealthiest pearl fishers of Panama, and that he acquired the island by right of settlement. He bequeathed it to his son who is now willing to sell it for a mere quarter of a million dollars. I first heard of Washington V. Plise and his island in the early seventies. He was then something of a lion in Vallejo society, and was taken under the wing of General Frisbie. He was engaged in teaching music and while doing so captured the heart of one of Vallejo's daughters, a Miss Murphy, who became his bride. She was the daughter of poor but honest parents who felt that they had annexed a Monte Cristo for a son-in-law, so much were they dazzled by visions of tropic islands and pearl fisheries. I believe the young couple went to Panama on their treacle moon trip, and returned disenchanted. The marriage proved a failure and in the course of time the inevitable divorce took place. I believe that Plise has been twice married since. I never pass the modest Howard street flat and read his sign without thinking of those romantic tales of the island kingdom and the rich pearl fisheries.

The Papyrus Ladies Were Shocked

The Papyrus Club is composed of some of the cleverest women in town, and the object of the organization is to encourage and foster wit among its members. Their meetings are devoted to story telling and it has already been demonstrated that while they have a sense of humor and an appreciation of wit, the spirit of tolerance lacks development. There is only one Jewish member of the club, and at a recent meeting her feelings were lacerated by a story that reflected on the idiosyncrasies of her race. She followed it with one that involved some shocking allusions to Irish Catholics, and the meeting almost broke up in a row.

Mrs. "Pat" Was Shocked

Acton Davies, the brilliant dramatic critic of the New York Evening Sun, has been telling a good story on Mrs. Patrick Campbell and it has followed her to this city. It is the story of a contretemps which occurred during Mrs. Campbell's engagement in Philadelphia. It happened at a large supper party given in Mrs. Campbell's honor at the Bellevue hotel, by a dashing and well-groomed society man. Somebody started a conundrum contest and Mrs. Campbell herself gave a very amusing riddle. When it came to the society man's turn two or three of the women who knew his reputation for risque wit grew apprehensive and urged him to be "good." The host frowned as though his feelings had been hurt, and as he turned to Mrs. "Pat" to ask the momentous question he looked as innocent as a babe.

"What is it that a cow has four of and a woman only two?" was the riddle.

A hush fell upon the assemblage. It was a silence that throbbed. Then Mrs. Campbell drew herself together in a most frigid manner, and fixed upon her host a withering look.

"Really, sir—I think you forget yourself. I'm not accustomed—"

"Oh, it's all right," he hurriedly exclaimed, "it's all right; the answer 's feet—f-e-e-t, feet."

But the feeling of relief was palpably artificial.

The Kipling of Germany

Now that Mrs. Patrick Campbell has revealed to us the charms of Hermann Suderman's play, "The Joy of Living," a deeper interest will probably be taken by local literary people in the works of the distinguished German author. Sudermann has done such wonderful work in the last few years that some knowledge of both his novels and his plays is necessary to those who wish to be well informed in literary matters. Sudermann is best known by his dramas, one of which, "Magda," we have been familiar with for many years, but he thinks that his novels possess more merit than his plays. He is a writer of facile pen and active imagination. He produces successful plays with one hand and successful dramas with the other. Sudermann broke through the traditions of German literature in his first novel, "Frau Sorge," for he made his studies from life in an original manner, and ignored the sentimentality which had previously been utilized as a factor in the plots of the most revered of German authors. He has been styled the Kipling of Germany, but his methods are a compound of Rousseau and De Maupassant, and he has the delicate touch of Sardou and the constructive skill of Pinero. In appearance he is a blue-eyed, golden-haired, muscular giant. He is a man of the world, well poised and calm, without any of the eccentricities of genius. He is the son of a brewer and in his youth he served in turn as apothecary's clerk, university student, tutor in a private family and journalist on a Berlin paper. When he gets a novel or play under way he leaves his wife and children and buries himself in Paris until his manuscript is completed.

Newton's Silent Exit

It is an ominous silence that the Rev. R. Heber Newton preserves concerning his alleged resignation, or whatever it may be, from the pastorate of Stanford Memorial church. But a few months ago, with a great flourish of newspaper trumpets, Dr. Newton came here from the East. Now he must needs leave California for his health! Did any Native Son (or Daughter) ever hear the like? The work, of course, is not particularly healthful. Efficiently to supply the spiritual demands (if any there be) of a modern university audience, composed of scientists, scholars, students of every creed and of every no-creed in the calendar, and a charming variety of visitors, is no sinecure. Not infrequently does the student of today fret and strut through the four ages of the college man (the freshman, etc., etc.) without experiencing any special spiritual need. The unhappy cure must provide souls before he has many, or even any, to take care of. Im-"morality touched with emotion" is the best definition of the religion of the eds, and the cult of some Apollo of the chair, of that of the co-eds. It is easy for the Roman Catholic priest to exhort the faithful. For the Episcopal minister, the Methodist preacher, to do likewise is likewise easy. Each has a place to stand on, ready to foot, as it were. But the college clergyman has to make a foothold for himself. The very man for this difficult position seemed to be Dr. R. Heber Newton. And now—!

The Procession Moves On

Of late Stanford University seems to have lost its one-time heart-hold on its faculty. What, through death and dismissal (resignation, I mean), its glory is with that of Greece. Dollars do not make a university, but rather your inspiring Agassiz on one end of a log and your inspired student on the other end. When Dr. Thoburn died, President Jordan was tear-choked as he quoted, "The gap in our loved and chosen The long years may not fill." And the gap is there to this day. Heaven had need also of Amos Warner, whose noble lay sermons were wont to fill the old chapel lecture-room to overflowing. When Dr. Warner was sick unto death, some curious fool wondered aloud why the university kept him on as a paid professor. To him (the fool) the wise Head of Stanford made answer, That Warner would more than earn his salary by showing himself once a day on the campus. And Mary Sheldon Barnes, of exquisite memory, who exhaled culture as a flower its fragrance—Heaven had need of her. "Hers was a white soul." Thus Professor Howard at the memorial service. Where now is Dr. Howard himself, that great historian? where her husband, Professor Earl Barnes, also one of the "big ones"? where Dr. Edward E. Ross, whose work, "Social Control," has given him a place among the world's great sociologists? where Edward Howard Griggs? Gone, but not by death! Here also be gaps the long years may not fill. When Dr. Jordan now talks to the baby class of "the freedom of teaching and the freedom of learning" enjoyed at Stanford, somehow the voice of the great educator does not ring in such rightwise as it did in "the days of old, the days of gold, the days of '94."

HENRY RATHJEN RE-ENTERS BUSINESS.

A new establishment which will prove a boon to well conducted homes and people who delight in high class wines is the new store opened this week at 46 Ellis street by Henry Rathjen. Mr. Rathjen, well known as the former president of the firm of Rathjen Bros., grocers, and quoted as an authority on wines by hotel men, has established the new store. He will appeal to the best class of buyers, to ladies particularly, and will have no bar in connection with the place, nor sell by the glass. He will sell in bulk, by the case or in broken lots at prices much lower than will be quoted elsewhere. Nothing but the finest wines, liquors and cordials will be sold. Mr. Rathjen is one of the best-known connoisseurs in liquids on the Coast, and his stock is sure to be of the very best. The average householder who likes a good wine with his dinner does not know what brand to buy, but puts his trust in a dealer who often fails to make good. Mr. Rathjen's store comes as a long-felt want to such buyers, who will be able to get just what they want without any worry or trouble.

The McAllister Pearls Missing

Judge Ward McAllister will not be among the summer attractions at Baron von Schroeder's San Rafael hotel this year. He has decided to withdraw his patronage, for he has a grievance against the hotel. He spent several months there last year, and contributed materially to the gayety of the season while touting for a champagne firm. The hotel regained much of its lost prestige during the sojourn of the scion of the house of McAllister, for the proprieties that had been so rudely violated a few seasons before were observed strictly. Nobody's reputation was damaged in the slightest degree. But now it appears that virtue is not the only thing that may be lost in San Rafael. After his return to this city McAllister became ill, and he sent over to the Hotel Rafael for his goods and chattels. And now he declares that he has been despoiled of his family jewels. Among the missing articles are his Marlborough pearls which were presented by the Duke of Marlborough to Ward McAllister pere upon the occasion of the Duke's marriage with Miss Hammersley. There are other McAllister treasures missing but the Marlborough pin he values more than all else. He intends to sue for the recovery of the stolen articles.

Baldwin's Proverbial Luck

"Lucky" Baldwin appears to have taken a new lease of life physically and financially. He is about to close a deal with an Eastern syndicate for the purchase of a part of the Santa Ana ranch for over a million dollars. Not long ago the tottering millionaire was suffering from cancers on his lips and in his throat. With his usual shrewdness he went in cognito to the hospital of a specialist, fearing that if his identity were revealed the medical man would charge for his services in proportion to the wealth of his patient. The cancers were extirpated and the millionaire was charged only three hundred dollars.

Merely a Contretemps

During her brief sojourn here Ella Wheeler Wilcox has made it apparent that she has a penchant for matchmaking. On several occasions she has expressed the opinion that certain young people she had met for the first time were of congenial temperament, and that it would be a blessing to mate them. At an evening party given in her honor she whispered to one of the ladies seated by her side, "I think that tall, handsome man over in the corner there would be an ideal husband for that beautiful little Miss. Don't you?"

"I am afraid," was the reply, "it would be more ideal than possible; that gentleman is my husband."

Grant's Grandson Quits the Army

Algernon Sartoris, the well known grandson of the late Ulysses S. Grant, is no longer in the United States Army. Some weeks ago I told of Sartoris's efforts to get release from Uncle Sam's fighting force, and how he invoked the influence of his relatives to procure the acceptance of his resignation. Uncle Fred, the Brigadier, would not help his nephew out of the Army. Fred Grant was glad enough to get his own commission and rank a few years ago, and finds the service most congenial. Ulysses Grant, Sartoris's California uncle, said he wouldn't put his finger in the pie. "Algernon was wild to get his shoulder straps and must wear them," said Ulysses. Jesse Grant thought his nephew changeable. Nellie Grant Sartoris, Algernon's mother, implored him to remain with his regiment in the Philippines. "The discipline is what you need," she wrote. Lieutenant Sartoris wrote and wrote. Then he cabled and cabled. Finally he sat down in his island quarters and indited a letter which did the work. The Secretary of War has accepted his resignation. Just what Algy said to Mamma Sartoris is not known, but from his previous threats to desert from the Army and flee to England, and there to assert that he was a British citizen unlawfully detained by the Yankees, it may be guessed that he put the matter very forcibly.

The Matter-of-Course Kiss

A certain "Humdrumite" of my acquaintance was once spontaneously kissed by his wife on the morning of a holiday. Now this was a dear and surprising thing, for the good lady's kisses (for her husband, at least) had long since become unconscious, custom-cold. But the man could not rise to the occasion, was dead to the delight of it, indifferent to the divine distinction between the kiss that is a matter of emotion and that which is merely matter-of-fact. "Good-bye, dear," he drawled, and mechanically sought his hat and overcoat and proceeded to go down town to his "work," being set in motion to do so by what seemed to him the customary parting kiss. Before going far, however, he ran into a reminder that it was a day of rest (or, rather, the reminded ran into him), and it then dawned upon his dullness that his wife had actually kissed him. He returned home with a little less lead than usual in his shoes and a faint flutter in the nameless organ that stood him instead of a heart. Knowing my interest in such matters, he underwent the exertion of telling me the story. Would it a were a new one.

Hall Has a Past

William Hammond Hall, who is trying to prevent this city from diverting water from the Tuolumne river within the confines of the Yosemite Park, poses as a public spirited citizen who has only the interests of the people at heart. His reputation for sincerity, however, is not flawless. He is known in Oakland, where he figured in the water rate suit. He first volunteered his services as an expert to the water company, and when they were declined with thanks he appeared as an expert witness for the city. Perhaps his motives are not so disinterested as he would wish people to believe. Mr. Charles Webb Howard believes with

Fighting for the Limelight

It would not be in consonance with tradition for the prominent cits who are to "do the honors" when President Roosevelt comes over the border, to get along harmoniously. Our prominent cits have from time immemorial behaved with most unbecoming indecorum whenever they were expected to comport themselves with the dignity that bespeaks polite breeding. Therefore it is not surprising that envy, jealousy and politics should threaten to disrupt the committees engaged in preparing for the Roosevelt reception. The first evidence of friction was developed in the legislative joint committee of Senators and Assemblymen. The Senators wanted to elect Dr. Chester Rowell of Fresno, chairman of the joint committee. He happens to be Senator Bard's choice for Panama Canal Commissioner, but Bard and Perkins have had a row, and the Perkins men stoutly objected to putting Rowell in a position in which he would have an opportunity to get "close up" to the President. As a consequence there was considerable manœuvring with the result that Arthur Fisk was elected chairman, much to the disgust of Rowell, who has been sulking ever since. Efforts are being made to achieve both social and political capital out of the President's visit, and the probability is that many sores will be opened before he swings around this arc of the circle.

The Prolific Brady

One of the inducements for readers to give their attention to the new novel by Cyrus Townsend Brady is the announcement that he has spent more time on the composition of "The Southerner" than he usually does. Cyrus Townsend Brady is one of the most prolific of the modern class of lightning-speed producers. His press agent has furnished tabulated statements of the number of novels, short stories, boys' books, and sermons he turns out weekly, in addition to the necessary reading in preparation, the revising and correcting and even re-writing, and the addresses delivered, and social and civic duties performed. Just how much time Mr. Brady usually devotes to the preparation of a book no one can justly state, but apparently he runs typewriters with both hands and feet simultaneously, and dictates to half a dozen secretaries and stenographers at the same time. If Edward Everett Hale's over-worked minister, Frederick Ingham, was in need of a double to lighten his labors, Cyrus Townsend Brady must have agents abroad buying them up in carload lots. And the worst of it is that Mr. Brady is not doing anything at all that is worth while. In spite of his abnormal activity it is a question whether anyone, taken unawares, could give the name of three of his books. He is the gentleman who gave up his pulpit to devote himself to "literature" because it would pay him better. If his preaching did not stay with his congregation any better than his books do with readers, he was no loss to the church.

Fair Californians in the Orient

Miss Lola Davis and her friend and chaperon, Mrs. Bertha Rogers, are still abroad. When last heard from by San Francisco intimates they were far up in the Himalayas, peering into esoteric mysteries through the delightful clairvoyance of the handsome Indian yogis. Miss Davis has been a revelation in dash and buoyancy to the wearied dwellers in the far East. To them the merry spirit and ceaseless energy of the fair San Franciscon have been cause for wonderment, and in India, where she and her companion were extensively entertained, she was named "The Electric Blonde" on account of her rare personal charms and her seeming possession of an inexhaustible storage battery. In India Miss Davis won the Allahabad ping pong tourney, which is open to all comers. Although pressed by many suitors, she is said to be still disengaged. D. E. Brown, general manager of the Canadian Pacific Steamship Company in the Orient, was most ardent in his devotion to Miss Davis, but his suit was in vain. He is wealthy and has an income of forty or fifty thousand dollars a year. He is one of the best known transportation men in China, and has a handsome home in Hongkong. At the recent St. Andrew's ball, the annual social event of the foreign colony in Hongkong, Miss Davis and Mrs. Rogers were the guests of Brown and were the centre of attraction for the American men present.

'Rah for the Schmitz Brothers

It appears that Mayor Schmitz has been sadly handicapped by a lack of brothers, and other near relatives. It it is a most unfortunate predicament to be in. Here he is, the Mayor of a great city, with more jobs on his hands than brothers to fill them with. In consequence one brother has to resign a position as secretary of the Park Commission, a vacancy having occurred in the Board of Public Works. The secretary's salary was raised fifty dollars a month for that brother, who unfortunately is barred by law from drawing two salaries. Of course he preferred the higher salary paid members of the Board of Public Works and besides, the job to which he has just been appointed is to be of four years' duration. So the Schmitz family is to be perpetuated in municipal politics long after Eugene takes down his fiddle and his bow. However it was tough to have to resign a good job just because the Schmitz progenitors had neglected to anticipate the demand for Schmitz freres.

Feathering the Schmitz Nest

That the spirit of fraternity is strong in the Schmitz family is certainly to the credit of the loving brothers. And nobody should criticise Eugene for keeping as much public patronage as possible in his own household. The salaries are there to be drawn and why shouldn't the Schmitz brothers pocket them? However it may be interesting to know that they aggregate sixteen thousand dollars annually. Quite a tidy sum for one family to take from the pockets of the taxpayers! There's Eugene, whose salary is six thousand a year. In addition he draws three hundred a month out of the contingent fund provided for by the charter for secret service work, and for which he is not required to present any voucher. He is presumed not to use it except in the interest of the public, but I have not the faintest idea for what purpose the Mayor has spent it. But it appears that he needed it even when he was in New York, for he drew while away. Perhaps he was trying to get track of the Chinese corruption fund in the Waldorf-Astoria. The salary of the brother appointed Public Works Commissioner is four thousand a year, and that of the Superintendent of Public Buildings is twenty-four hundred. This last named position is a civil service job but 'Gene's brother never took the examination. Being one of the family, he didn't have to.

Bombarding With Drugs

A crisis is approaching in the retail drug war, that very lively commercial scrap of which Town Talk was the first to give notice. All the small dealers have come in under the union trust banner except three, and the shops of this trio of independents are being bombarded with cut-rate prices as any person may see who cares to walk down Market street. The fight is directed mainly against Dick Miller of the Owl and there's nothing he likes better than a scrap. Never in the town's history have the valetudinarian, the anæmic, the dyspeptic and the distempered had such a glorious opportunity to get panaceas and cure-alls at bedrock prices. Months ago the manufacturers and wholesalers of drugs promised the petitioning retailers to sell no stock to cut-rate shops, providing the retailers could get seventy per cent of their brethren to stand together to maintain prices. The original promoters of the idea have been working unremittingly ever since and all have come under the trust flag except the defiant three who still valiantly flaunt the cut-rate banner over their portals.

Called Out the Union Clerks

Last week the united retailers made a deadly flank movement on the strongholds of the three stalwarts by getting the drug clerks' union to call out all the salesmen behind their counters. In one shop over a dozen clerks walked out on short notice and the surprised manager had to use his women bookkeepers to dispense drugs till he could summon salesmen to help him out. And now the "called out" union clerks are each putting up twenty-five cents a week and helping in a way to swell the fund that is being used by the united retail druggists to hammer the three stubborn independent dealers into line. The plea of the independents is that they want to buy as cheap as they can, sell as cheap as they can, do business on the lines that they wish and not be hampered and controlled by any union or combination that is trying to succeed by pinioning the enterprise of wide awake business competitors. If these three independents are forced to surrender the combination druggists will certainly put up the prices of their wares and thus make the public pay for this costly war and a lot of other things not down in the prescriptions.

brought back with her all her well known, beautiful voice, plus that indefinable something, not quite covered by the word technique, that comes of continental culture. As for style, the singer was born with that. The program was artistically arranged—"infinitely various"—including more than one delightful but difficult number seldom sung except by the big professionals. To choose for special mention, never an easy matter, is here harder than ever; but it is probable that the "Stances de Sapho" of Gounod, Saint-Saens' "Amour—Viens Aider" and "Ich Lieben Dich" (Grieg), will linger longest in the memory of those who heard them. Mr. Will King's accompanying had the artistic reserve and the sympathy that are so essential and, alas, so rare.

"He writes poetry that will live."
"But it doesn't enable him to live, poor fellow."

And Now Vesta, Too

Nearly every member of the Shortridge family has dabbled more or less in literature. Now the literary mania has fallen upon Vesta, the pretty fiancee of Emil Bruguiere. While in Monterey she has been engaged upon a work that is said to be promising. Not so long ago, Miss Shortridge had stage aspirations. She is a clever girl and does well everything she undertakes. Her fiance is soon to leave with his mother for New York, so the marriage of Miss Shortridge and Emil Bruguiere will not take place for months yet. Mrs. Bruguiere intends to storm Newport this summer, and by virtue of the success there of her son Louis during the last two seasons she will not find society there difficult to enter.

"Dr Smart has been urging us all Lent to pray for light from above," observed Mrs. Pacific Avenue, with a gentle pressure of her silver-mounted prayer-book.

"How absurd!" exclaimed Miss Beauty Spot, "he ought to know how unbecoming to our make-up that would be!"

A Bunten Mot

The commercial element has not driven all the wit from the Bohemian Club to The Family. One still hears an occasional mot in the green room. The other day Colonel Laurie Bunten was guilty of one. Colonel Bunten, by the way, although a Scotchman, was brought up in Germany and he likes to speak the German language. Orrin Peck was rallying him because he spoke so much German, and finished with:

"Colonel, you don't care for English, do you? I never heard you speak English."

Returned the Colonel: "You wouldn't understand me if I did."

What the Colonel Could Do

Colonel Henry J. Kowalsky, the attorney who is reputed to have an incubator for the development of illegitimate heirs to large estates, returned home this week after a long absence in New York, where he tried to break into the contest over the Fair estate. The Colonel betrays no evidence of his disappointment over his failure. He is as breezy and buoyant as ever. It is said that his failure to foist his services on the relatives of Mrs. Charley Fair was due to the fact that they had already retained a New York lawyer whose specialty is the digging up of positive proofs. He is one of the craftiest case-builders in the country. He happened to be in Paris at the time of the Fair tragedy, so he had a great advantage over other members of the legal fraternity. He succeeded in rounding up witnesses who were not heard of at the inquest, and upon whom he relies to prove that Charley Fair died first. However, it is believed that the Nelsons erred in not hiring Kowalsky. I have heard it suggested that even yet Colonel Kowalsky could go over to France and pick evidence off the branches of the tree against which Charley Fair was hurled. So wonderful is his ingenuity that he might be able to find a statement in Charley Fair's handwriting that he entered eternity just a few seconds ahead of his wife.

Mrs. Lakeside Drive: Oh, of course. For four years I've never failed to have an Easter wedding.

Not Until Autumn

The marriage of Miss Aline Ford and Lewis Pierce is not to take place until some time in the fall. Mr. Ford considers his daughter too young to marry, and indeed would prefer to postpone the wedding for a few years. The Fords are a very devoted family and Aline is the only child. But the young people are very much in love, and if they had their way would be married much sooner than the date set. Their engagement, which I exclusively announced some weeks ago, has now been formally confirmed. One of the dailies had a picture of the bride-to-be, but it was not a good one, as she has not sat for the camera in years. She is such a pretty girl that the portrait published was the basest of libels.

A Thief in Society

Petty larceny is rife in Oakland social circles, and there's a terrible storm brewing. Oakland has had many social scandals, for Oakland society is painfully bourgeois and its blood has been sadly mixed, but the one that is imminent will have the distinction of being the worst yet. The petty peculation has been going on somewhat systematically at little gatherings held for the purpose of playing cards. Purses left carelessly about were rifled of small sums. At first it was thought that there was some mistake, but repeated losses by different women soon banished all doubt. The servants in one house were suspected by the guests, but the hostess was most emphatic in her assertion of their innocence. About that time suspicion began to centre on one woman, and though there has been a good deal of unpleasant gossip about her nobody has the courage to launch an accusation. To make matters worse, there has been cheating at cards, and there has been talk of inflicting the penalty of social ostracism on more than one woman in Oakland's smartest set.

The Folly and Immorality of Gambling

The fact is that Oakland is having the experience of other communities in which rein is given to the passion of gambling. Society is being demoralized wherever bridge-whist is the fashionable diversion. Bridge, as many a youngster now learning his lesson of that high-priced teacher, Experience, knows to his cost, is the pons asinorum of polite society. The animal that brays cannot get over it. Yet the thing is as thistles to him; has the fascination of a favorite fodder. So he nibbles at the dainty and damns the expense. In less parliamentary speech, the man who allows himself to be fleeced because the shearing is done by a fashionable woman, is a fool; the woman is a knave. Cheating itself is no greater knavery than taking advantage of an unwritten law of lightning society to the effect that a man must either lose to a woman or win but nominally, not economically. This means a man's giving a woman money under the guise of gambling. And many a woman who would be outraged by a man's offering her an overt present of ten dollars seems more than willing to accept in this way a covert present of ten thousand. How darling a thing, ladies, is self-deception! How convenient, how profitable, the lack of a little logic! Concerning the man, the question arises: Why does he do it, the fool? —or does he think to get his money's worth, the rogue? Why? In any case, because he's an ass.

Also the Vulgarity of It

The ruinous immorality of ungodly gambling in high places I leave to the protest of the pulpit. It is enough for me to consider its vulgarity. Modern commerce-cursed society has no greater spiritual need than rooms full of art suggestion where brain-fagged business men may withdraw from the sight and sound and smell of money. To obtrude the purse in private; to turn a with-drawingroom into a "den," and a hostess into a "steerer" of social "hayseeds," or even into a tactful "bully" for compelling "victims" to pay up—it is not only vice, it is vulgarity, and a stench in nice nostrils. The man who does not at dusk, when the day's work is done, leave business behind him in the office, but must needs bring it home with him, is a boor. Dollars-and-Cents may be chief of our public deities, their religion recognized by the government; but they make poor Lares and Penates. It is not in good taste to make a "hell" of the hearth. Gambling of all kinds would better be done downtown. The home is not nowadays, as once in "the grandeur that was Rome," a house of prayer, but that is no reason for making it a den of thieves. . . . Well, if I'm not a-preachin', after all. See what comes of reading Ella Wheeler Wilcox!

Don't Know Harrison Is Dead

Carter Harrison, who has just been elected Mayor of Chicago for the fourth time, is a very lucky young man. He has had so much political success that outside of Illinois he is regarded as a coming statesman. It is believed in some parts of the country that he would lend strength to a national ticket. The fact is that Harrison is not taken seriously at home. I took occasion to make inquiries concerning him during a visit to Chicago a year ago. From what I could learn I should judge him to be of the type made familiar to us by the late Judge Campbell. His father was his prototype and the first Carter Harrison was one of the most successful political fakirs the country has ever seen. Like Judge Campbell he was a capital campaigner and he practiced the same wiles that won votes for our irrepressible Police magistrate. Chicago is the most cosmopolitan city in the country, and half its population is made up of a heterogeneous aggregation of foreigners representing every country in Europe. Socialists predominate among them. The elder Harrison won their confidence by attending their meetings, their picnics and their dances. He familiarized himself with a phrase or two in almost every language and patois and whatever gathering he addressed he was able to use a few idioms that won applause, and he never failed to intimate that he could trace his ancestry back to their country. It is said that many of the foreign element in Chicago are ignorant of the fact that Carter Harrison Sr. is dead, and that they are still voting for the son under the impression that it is his father they are supporting.

Not "In Society"

One of the newspaper comments made apropos of Jere Lynch's entertainment of the Earl and Countess of Carnarvon was that it was surprising because Jere is "not in society." It is true, the millionaire who prefers to pose as a literary man is not often seen in society in his own town. But when he goes abroad he is invited to the most exclusive houses. When he was last in Egypt he had several titles among his house-boat guests, and titles are an everyday matter with him. In Dawson he would have been made socially much of had he been willing, but during his stay in the Frozen North he was somewhat of a recluse and only one family could boast that he enjoyed dining with them. As a matter of fact, when Jere Lynch is at home he doesn't bother about the swim. He prefers to keep his literary reputation intact by associating only with his Bohemian Club friends. But his dinner to the Carnarvons was a delightful function, and those invited included only women and men of brains.

Mrs. Martin's Protege

Now that Lieutenant Harry Howland is to leave for Manila, rumors are afloat as to the result of his social campaigning in this city. It is said that the lieutenant was not manœuvreing aimlessly; that he was not frittering away his time merely through love of social diversion, but was ever on the qui vive for signals familiar only to those versed in Cupid's code. He was the protege of Mrs. Eleanor Martin, who took a great interest in him and made his ascent of the treacherous social ladder very easy. She was credited with the desire to marry him to an heiress, and it is vaguely hinted that she was not unsuccessful. Indeed it is said that the match has been made.

Presents for Miss Oge

Miss Marie Oge who, as I announced exclusively two weeks ago, is to marry Truxtun Beale in New York, has been receiving many handsome things from the relatives of her fiance. One of the most beautiful of the presents is a stunning sunburst of unusual size and with stones of exceptional purity, worth several thousands of dollars. It was the gift of Mr. Beale's sister, Mrs. John R. McLean of Washington. It was John R. McLean's sister, by the way, who married Admiral Dewey, and received for a wedding present the residence presented to the hero of Manila bay by the people.

The Henry Breedons have returned from their tour of the Southern part of the State. They intend to join the colony of society people at the Hotel Rafael this summer. Mrs. Breedon is the possessor of a large fortune, and the prospective heiress to another. She is one of the best dressed women in society, and entertains a great deal in her pretty home in Broadway.

Airy, Fairy Ethyl

Ethyl Hager's reputation for originality in designing novel costume for mask balls has spread far and wide, and as a consequence she is the recipient of suggestions from all parts of the world. Several costumers in New York have offered to supply her with material for freak displays, and they have furnished her with elaborate descriptions and pictures. One costumer has agreed to rig her out as the battleship Oregon with a complicated device for the shooting of confetti from miniature cannon. Another suggests an aeronaut's costume and has elaborate plans for a sensational descent from a parachute to be cleverly arranged as a ceiling decoration. Fancy the airy, fairy Ethyl doing the star drop without wings! But watch her when the next ball is pulled off.

"Did your wife forgive you for missing that theatre-date with her?"

"Yes, she forgave me—and showed me the bill for a thirty-nine dollar Easter hat."

Maurer-Robinson Marriage

That rare and beautiful thing, a real marriage, took place at high noon last Wednesday between Mr. Oscar Maurer, "the poet of photography," as Gabrilowitsch, the poet of the piano, calls him, and Mrs. Margaret Fenn Robinson, the poet's choice. The wedding was private; the ceremony being performed by the Rev. Mr. Hosmer, pastor of the Unitarian church, at Weltevreden, Berkeley, the artistic home of Mrs. Volney D. Moody, mother of the bride. After their return from some Eden in Southern California, Mr. and Mrs. Maurer will spend the summer in the college town.

A Bard-Otis Compact

My Los Angeles correspondent writes that since the return of Senator Bard, an endless chain of pink teas and angel cake debauches has been started in his honor by R. N. Bulla, A. W. Kinney, Thomas Hughes and R. D. Wade. The news has leaked out that Bard has grown ambitious, and that he thinks he has a chance of becoming the Republican candidate for Vice-President. Indeed his boom has already been started, and he told a newspaperman the other day that he was sure that the next Vice-President would be a Western man. It is said that his ambition has been fanned by General Harrison Gray Otis who is eager to wear his uniforms and medals in Washington, and who has had visions of himself as a cabinet officer. "I'll make you Vice-President if you'll make me Secretary of War," is said to be the Otis proposition.

Why Club Women Are Weary

For more than a year the club women of Los Angeles have shown signs of brain-fag. Pink teas have taken on a salmon hue, whist parties have dragged and even the latest in lingerie has failed to attract the usual attention. The girl just out of her teens and the ancient Miss, both have had the same weary look. Their one time admirers could not account for the fading of feminine beauty, but their case has been diagnosed since the publication of the doings at a meeting of the Monday Morning Club. Some of the subjects discussed were, "Liquid Air," "Bacteria of Laziness," "Religious Liberty in Russia," "The Social Evil," "The Work of the Legislature," "The Tobacco Habit," "Situation in China," "Reform in Afghanistan" and "Hopeful Signs in South America." And these were discussed only by the Monday Morning Club. There is a Wednesday Morning Club and also a Friday Morning Club. Ponder the mental effort indulged by the women of Los Angeles, ye masculine clubmen who burn the midnight oil in consideration of such trivial problems as the exact quantity of sugar that should enter into a cocktail!

Northam's Great Achievement

Colonel Bob Northam, epicure, millionaire, politician and tinsel-soldier of ease, is now posing in Los Angeles as the friend of overworked cooks and housewives. He has invented a cooking machine, guaranteed to cook bacon, beans, onions and even cabbage without fuel or odor. He has organized a company with himself as President and Dr. J. De Barth Shorb as Vice-President, to manufacture and market the patent odorless, fuelless hashmaker. If he has really solved the problem of how to prepare a boiled dinner without taking the neighborhood into the family confidence, he has surely conferred a boon on his species.

The Rev. Father Goode of the Church where the Angels Rest paused by a tiny girl in one of the south-of-the-slot districts.

"Why do you weep, child?" he asked.

"'Cause my mudder makes me wear dis dress," returned the infant, "an' it ain't no fit."

The Rev. Goode turned away. He had no consolation to offer. The garment had been sewed by the Society Lenten Sewing Class of the Church where the Angels Rest.

Deserting San Rafael

The summer throng in San Rafael threatens to be smaller than usual this year. The Pinckards have already opened up their pretty home, and the John F. Boyds are expected soon, but it is said that this will be their last season in San Rafael. The Sidney M. Smiths will be missed from their colonial house in Irwin street. Mrs. Smith, the Misses Smith and Mrs. Lansdale intend leaving for Europe shortly. The Gerstles will not occupy their cottages, intending to summer elsewhere.

The Temperance Issue in Politics

The politicians of San Rafael are growing feverish as the election approaches. The Good Government, otherwise the Commuters' Contention Club, is almost to a man for a high license and the town faction is opposed to it. Major Charles Christiansen is one of the commuters who is not an enthusiastic high license man. He is opposed to the extermination of the saloon. One of the most earnest workers in the cause of temperance is C. C. Stevenson who received his first taste of political intrigue in the Presbyterian church of which he is a deacon. He has proved a great strategist in church circles and is now eager for broader fields to exploit.

her wit, sprung her latest bon mot. It was during a discussion about a certain young man whose efforts to break through the Upper Thirteen's brass-bound exclusiveness have been crowned with success.

"He's English, ain't he?" asked one matron as she surveyed him through her lorgnette.

"Dear, no," said Mrs. Francis, "only English-speaking."

Gossip of the Service

It is probable that ere long Fort Mason will be the scene of gayeties to which it has long been a stranger, for General and Mrs. McArthur have a reputation for cordial hospitality to sustain. Mrs. McArthur is said to be an accomplished hostess by those who have met her. The fact that one of the General's aides is a bachelor is another thing that pleases civilian buds and their mothers. Captain Parker West, beside being eligible for matrimony, is a Californian by birth.

Captain and Mrs. Amos W. Kimball will sail on the twentieth of April for Manila on the Sumner. Captain Kimball has for two years been Quartermaster at the Presidio.

One of the jokes on Hobson that passed current in the Navy, shortly after his great kissing exploit:

"Hobson made his fame on a collier and lost it on a smack."

Edith McBean's Home

The home of the Kierstedts is far more luxurious than most army residences. Money can do anything, even make over an old house into a little palace. In this instance the old rooms were made over, new rooms added and hardwood floors put in. The furniture, which was Mr. McBean's gift, is magnificent and quite up to that of the smartest civilian dwelling. The dining-room is entirely in mahogany. The young couple have a full staff of servants, and they will undoubtedly take the lead in army hospitality.

"My fish-dealer is a very nice man. I call him Robinson Crusoe."

"Why, because he lives on an island?"

"No, because he depends so much on Friday."

Young Palmer's Wife Known Here

Miss Mabel Jacobs, whose marriage to Jose Estrada Palma, son of the President of Cuba, was recently reported, was formerly a resident of this city. She is a niece of Lee Lash, who is well known in local art circles. Lash, by the way, located in Philadelphia after studying about ten years in Paris. Finding that legitimate art work was not profitable he took up scene painting in theatres. At present he has a studio in New York and is very successful.

Mrs. Willis G. Dodd left for the East last Wednesday. She intends visiting several friends on the Atlantic coast, and her sojourn there will be a protracted one.

THE PRESIDENT'S WINE.

The news comes from Chicago that at the first banquet tendered President Roosevelt on his Western trip, by the citizens of Chicago at the Auditorium hotel on April second, the only wine used was Ruinart Brut '93—the President's wine.

The Tiger-Lily

A great bank of lilies, tall, slender-stemmed St. Joseph's lilies, almost concealed the altar. Palms surrounded the chancel rail. Lilies pointed the entrance to each pew, and a wide white satin ribbon divided the space within which the guests invited to the breakfast were distinguished from those bidden but to the church. It was a regulation wedding but the sumptuousness of the decorations was eloquent of wealth and the Easter lilies predominated because of its being a post-Lenten ceremony.

The church was sparsely filled when the Tiger-Lily entered. It was early and she had no card, but she walked with such assurance by the pompous darkey who guarded the portal that he had not the temerity to oppose her entrance. She was a warm-hued brunette, faultlessly gowned, and her face wore an expression of recklessness that ill-conformed with the character of the occasion.

The Tiger-Lily had come to the wedding with a purpose. She had announced it beforehand, but the Man had not believed she would dare carry it out. For years she had said that if he ever went to the altar with another woman, he would never approach nearer the ceremony than the prie-dieu. But he had no inclination in those days to test the sincerity of her threat. He was of a domestic temperament, but he had no yearnings, for was he not playing at domesticity in a most realistic fashion? The Tiger-Lily was a wife in everything but the name, and though at times the Man was oppressed with a sense of the unconventionality of the situation, he did not permit it to agitate him to any great extent. He had drifted into the relationship without a thought of its becoming a permanent companionship, and he had a vague notion that he would drift out of it some day. However, he enjoyed it so much that it would probably have continued to the end of his life had not the Tiger-Lily begun to repeat her threat at short intervals. As a consequence it suddenly occurred to the Man that he was being subjected to coercion. Then his proud spirit rebelled.

Each repetition of the threat induced serious reflection. And sober thought has a chastening effect. Meditation is a stimulus to conscience, and an active conscience is fatal to pleasure when it is achieved by infraction of the moral laws.

In the course of his meditations the Man suddenly felt that he owed a great debt to society. Moreover, he argued that a woman who would insist on living with a man who had ceased to love her was not worthy of even a passionate embrace. The Tiger-Lily was such a one, for had she not declared that she would never permit him to marry? To heed such a threat would be to confess himself a poltroon.

About that time he met the Calla Lily, and he felt a thrill. She was a pure woman, and though he had never pictured to himself any special type of woman upon whom he would be eager to lavish his affection, he was suddenly persuaded that he had an ideal, and that the Calla-Lily was its incarnation.

When the wedding day was set he thought of the Tiger-Lily, and his enthusiasm was chilled for a brief space, during which he permitted himself to reflect that perhaps she really loved him; perhaps if they had started their blissful relationship under other circumstances, his whole life would have been different. But she was only a scarlet passion-flower.

"I will shoot you if you marry another," said the Tiger-Lily.

It was a silly threat. It angered him. He had heard of other men that had been restrained from marriage by such a threat and he pitied them. He would rather die than live to feel that he was the companion of a woman who would have him against his will.

On his wedding-day he did not give the matter a thought. The Calla Lily, pure and white as she was, was not wholly ignorant of the existence of her more gorgeous sister. She had heard rumors, but then one always heard those things of the men in her set. One could not expect them to be like women. They never were. Her fiance was not different from his friends. She would not have him otherwise.

In her bridal robes she looked more like a lily than ever. She was all white, except the bit of traditional blue that was invisible, the narrow ribbon that was woven into the lace of her corset. The bridesmaids were in white, too, for was it not an Easter wedding?

The organist entered and began to play softly classic selections that were the prelude to the bridal chorus. The church was full now, with many standing at the back as if it were a standing-room-only matinee at the theatre. Murmurs reached the ears of the Tiger-Lily.

"She's very rich," said one.

"And a beauty, too," was the whispered retort, "one of the favorites of fortune."

"He's a lucky man," in a masculine voice.

"She's a lucky woman," in a feminine tone, "why, he is quite the most popular man in our set."

"Never a wedding without its scandal accompaniment," breathed a reporter from one of the daily papers, "if all were told this is like all the others."

The Tiger-Lily heard that, and opened her ears for the rest.

"The usual woman, the other woman, you know. One reason he didn't marry before. Fancy if there were to be a scene."

"There never are, though, except on the stage. They settle it out of church."

"For a good round sum," laughed the first reporter.

The Tiger-Lily clenched her white-gloved hands.

"So that is what they think," she said to herself, "well, they'll see."

"Hush—sh—sh."

The strains from "Lohengrin" began. The wedding-party entered, as wedding-parties always do at regulation marriages in church. The ushers, then the white-frocked maids two and two, then the maid-of-honor, preceding the tall blonde bride, on her brother's arm. She was an orphan as well as an heiress. Truly, the Man was lucky, thought his friends who were blessed with parents-in-law not too agreeable.

The Tiger-Lily craned her graceful neck. So this was she who had won from her the stake of her life, this pale Calla Lily. How coarse her own warm coloring seemed beside that delicate blondeness. She lost herself in thoughts of her girlhood, and was not recalled to the present until the Bishop had begun the solemn ceremony.

The Man was standing with his lily bride before the Bishop.

"I require and charge you both, as ye will answer at the dreadful day of judgment when the secrets of all hearts shall be disclosed, that if either of you know any impediment, why ye may not be lawfully joined together in Matrimony, ye do now confess it. For be ye well assured, that if any persons are joined together otherwise than as God's Word doth allow, their marriage is not lawful."

The Tiger-Lily had seen a play once where a woman had thrust herself forward at this stage of a marriage ceremony. She had intended to reproduce the scene herself. But the Bishop made but a short, conventional pause. He had never officiated except at well-bred weddings. He knew nothing of the Tiger-Lily.

The Man was embarrassed and nervous, as bridegrooms always are, but he too had forgotten the Tiger-Lily. Neither he, nor the Calla Lily who was not ignorant of his past, knew any lawful impediment to bid their union pause.

The ceremony went on. There was no interruption. The fateful moment had passed.

"She's a lovely bride," said one of the spectators, as the Man and his wife passed up the aisle, "there hasn't been such a charming wedding in ages."

The Tiger-Lily was the last to leave the church. She was faint after the tension. Her mind had been keyed up to action, but her will refused to act. She fell on her knees with her eyes fixed on the lily-decked altar. Above was the silver crucifix. It had no significance for her, though she, too, was a martyr—to the social law.

The sexton touched her on the shoulder.

"Madam," he said, "we are going to close the church now. It will be opened in an hour—there's going to be a funeral."

He wondered at her laugh, so out of place in a church.

"A funeral after a wedding," she exclaimed, "how appropriate!"

It was like the burial of her own hopes. —The Tragedian.

On Easter Morn

I THOUGHT:

That we gave as much Time to our Souls during Lent as we give to our Clothes,
That a marvel, indeed, to our eyes, to the world, Easter day would disclose
As we sit in our soft, cushioned pews, near the aisle, with our eyes on the Flowers,
But comparing that Hat on the left, Draped in White, or that Red One, with Ours,
While the organ throbs on and, our thoughts gentler grown, to ourselves we confess
Mrs. Ryche, who was fagged for awhile, looks quite well in that gray, clinging dress.

I THOUGHT:

That, instead of the Gowns of the Flesh, we could see all about, shining through Like an aura, bright Raiment of Souls, corresponding to Deeds Good and True;
And the gray, clinging gown, trimmed in white, Mrs. Ryche so becomingly wore,
Was of Charity woven, embroidered in Love shown to Friendless and Poor;
That the Flowers on her hat were a bunch of Kind Thoughts sent each day to a friend,
And the Book which she bore were the Prayers Which She Lived from year's end to year's end.

I THOUGHT:

That a Sinner, a Magdalene, came, blind with tears, and Choice, Forward Seat,
And they Welcomed her there, Moving Up with a Smile that was winning and sweet.—
For the Robe which they saw was of White, made by hand, of Much Toil Bravely Borne,
And the Glow round her head showed the Cheer her Smiles brought to hearts lonely, forlorn;
And the preacher stepped down from his place in Great Haste when the service was o'er
To Shake Hands IN HIS NAME with the Least of HIS Flock ere she reached the front door.

I THOUGHT:

That a Sinner, a Magdalene, came, blind with tears, and knelt silently down;
And they Gathered About Her and said, "Stay with Us; GOD is Love; Wear HIS Gown;"
Then I heard all the voices burst forth into song—The LORD Stood at the Door!
But in Rags, Bruised with Thorns, Bare of Feet; Thin, Old-Fashioned the Cloak which HE wore.
"Will the People receive him in Rags?" was my thought—then I woke with a lurch—
And the answer 's unknown. The long service was done; I'd been dreaming in church.

As to my fitness for eternity,
I'll say you loved me, and when that is done

STAGE

Sudermann's Powerful Sermon

Inability to enthuse over such a play as "The Joy of Living"; not only to enthuse but to rhapsodize, is to betray symptoms of mental atrophy. To discern in such a play an unwholesome philosophy or to deprecate the motif is rank pharisaism. It is the only play I have ever seen in which adultery is discussed without salacity. Indeed Hermann Sudermann has achieved a wonderful paradox in "The Joy of Living"—a play with adultery as the stimulus to its action, and not the faintest suggestion to indecency in its five acts. The whole tone of the play is edifying and elevating. It is a poetic sermon that thrillingly pictures the awful, harrowing consequences of wrongdoing. Why argue against such a play, and yet approve of discussion of the Commandments in the pulpit? There is nothing Ibsenesque in this play. Sudermann's choice of material is a matter that belongs to his own artistic conscience: to find fault with it would be a critical impertinence. His manipulation of his material is as unlike that of Pinero and Wilde as Mrs. Campbell is unlike Mrs. Langtry. Nobody needs fear contamination from any of his characters. The sin responsible for the play took place fifteen years before the first act opened. The unfaithful wife and her lover, overcome by conscientious scruples, had ceased their criminal intimacy, and though the affection of neither had cooled, there is no prospect of their resuming the criminal relationship. They lived to regret and to suffer the pangs of remorse, pangs that were made poignant by the nobility of the husband's character and his kindness to the man who had wronged him. There is no attempt, as in "The Gay Lord Quex," to picture with sculptural distinctness and in the colors of enamel, the social modes of a demoralized smart set. Sudermann makes no exposition of indecency, nor does he set his situations in an atmosphere that reeks of immorality. He points a moral, poses a problem, and preaches the most powerful and convincing sermon that has been written by any modern playwright, without ever hinting that people of high station may lead lecherous lives, and enjoy immunity from criticism or conscience. His argument is pitiless in its severity and he holds no brief for free love. He aims at effects, as does Sardou, and he accomplishes them with sonorous rhetoric, and with human souls exposed, naked and unvisited by the consolations of a sympathetic creator. He is given much to dialogue in the first act, but Sudermann demonstrates that in its talky stages a play may be of absorbing interest so long as the dialogue is devoted to development of the plot, rather than to plausible epigram. He begins to play on your emotions from the beginning, and there is not a moment in which you are not interested in the fate of Beata and Baron Richard. To create character is the summum bonum of the dramatist's art, and both Beata and Richard are wonderful studies. Beata is a wife who loves two men. She loves her husband because he is a man of fine character and because he is the father of her children. Her love for him is the love that proceeds from sympathy. Her love for Richard is the passion that proceeds from the emotions. Richard is that paradoxical character—the man of honor who stoops to dishonor through his passion for a woman. And dearly does he pay the penalty! There are some exquisite touches in the handling of these characters, and at all times there is apparent a masterly unity of ideas revolving around one central idea, and that being the sufferings of the sinners. Could anything be more exquisite than the scene in which the son of Richard reveals to the wronged husband the fact that his wife's honor had been aspersed? Throughout the play the son is used with telling effect. He is even called into requisition to decree the penalty that his father should suffer. Sudermann has a wonderful faculty for devising situations and all so natural. As witness the one in which the wife reveals her own infamy and the final great climax at the supper table when, after taking poison, she proposes the toast, "To the joy of living." The play is the most powerful tragic drama that has been presented in this city in many a day. And as for Mrs. Pat Campbell—well, Sudermann could not find a more capable woman for the character of Beata, or one who could more thoroughly merge herself into the creature of the playwright's fancy. Press notices could give us no exaggerated notion of the art of this weird yet womanly woman. Hers is the art that conceals. When she is acting her very best she convinces you that she isn't acting at all; that she is actually experiencing the emotions she portrays and that she is oblivious of the audience. There are moments when the tension produced by her superb art is painful. Like a responsive instrument, every key of the mood she touched sounded. Perhaps it is an intellectual impersonation that she gives. I should call it intensely emotional. Perhaps, as Ella Wheeler says, she must have had experience, but I prefer to credit her with the imagination and the intellect essential to grasp the purpose of the author. And by the bye, Mrs. Campbell has a splendid company with her. Wright Kramer is a capable foil for her and the Norbet of Charles Bryant is refreshing in its naivete. There is not a weak one in the company.

There is no more refreshing drink at this season than a high ball of Chapin & Gore.

She Is Still Youthful

It is rather hard to believe that Kate Claxton has been playing Louise in "The Two Orphans" for twenty-five years. Effie Ellsler, charming as she still is in manner, and Rose Coghlan, with all her magnetism and brilliant art, "show their age"; Kate Claxton does not. She is a sweet little woman and she has "grown up" with the part of Louise, so that she has positively assimilated the personality of the blind girl. "The Two Orphans," verbose and antique as it is, can still wring the hearts of sentimental women. It is given an admirable production by Miss Claxton's company. On Tuesday night Ethelyn Palmer, the Henrietta of the cast, was unable to appear by reason of illness, and her part was assumed by Mary Stewart Cone. As Miss Cone was already cast for two parts, Marianne and Julie, her assumption on short notice of a third role, and a principal at that, is deserving of commendation.

At the Alcazar

It always detracts from one's enjoyment in a repetition of a play when one happened to see it first by the original company. Especially is this so when the play was first produced by the star for whom it was written. You would like to leave out invidious comparison, but you can't. Now, "An American Citizen" is such a play. Nat Goodwin put so much of himself into the character of Beresford Cruger that any one else in the role seems an intrusion. But "An American Citizen" has gone into stock. It is one of the happenings that can't be helped. Ernest Hastings gives a very sympathetic performance of the title role, and George Osbourne as the senior partner is rather better than the original impersonator of the part. Miss Creighton appears again in a role giving her small chance to show her capability. That she acts it without obtruding herself further than the playwright intended is a second proof, after last week, that she is an actress worthy of the name. Oza Waldrop is charming as Georgia Chapin and Miss Van Reynegom makes the little French maid most attractive. Frank Bacon has a servant's role this week, the English valet, which is well done. There must be a demand for servants' parts in the company, judging by George Osbourne's in last week's play and Frank Bacon's in this.

Their Original Roles

When William A. Brady selected "Her Majesty" for the stellar exploitation of his pretty blonde wife (Grace George) at the Manhattan theatre, New York, in October, 1900, he got together the strongest company that money could obtain. Ernest Hastings had just declined the leading support of Blanche Walsh, in a new play suggested by the siege of Quebec, and very wisely, for the piece was a complete failure. Having the choice of two parts in "Her Majesty" he selected that of a half-crazy degenerate German prince, in preference to that of the "lead," a dreamy, namby-pamby sort of a hero. His performance caught the blase town because of its virility and novelty, and created quite a stir. George Osbourne, whose many-faceted art is even more highly appreciated in New York than in San Francisco—which is saying a great deal—scored very heavily as a bearded and bloodthirsty revolutionist. During the run he also personated with Mansfieldian skill a blase, battered and burned-out old roue, with acute diplomatic craftiness. In the Alcazar revival Hastings will be seen here for the first time as Casimir and Osbourne as sanguinary Papa Schmidt. When "Lover's Lane" follows, early next month, Hastings and Osbourne will personate their original characters—the broad-minded clergyman and the amiable, hen-pecked storekeeper. They created these at the Manhattan, New York, and played them for months including an all-summer run of the Clyde Fitch pastoral, at McVicker's, Chicago, two years ago.

The Latest Weberfieldian Burlesque

Burlingame was chosen as the locale for "Helter Skelter," described on the programs as a dramatic conundrum in three guesses. If life at the exclusive little suburb were half so attractive as it is pictured by the clever comedians and pretty girls at Fischer's the rural resorts would lose half their patronage and there would be a mad stampede for tickets at the Townsend street station. The latest offering at the O'Farrell street playhouse bids fair to become the most popular production since "Fiddle Dee Dee." The lines are racy and scintillating, the situations ludicrously funny, the music catchy and the girls are radiant in the smartest and most artistic gowns that were ever flaunted over the little stage. Kolb and Dill do not appear until the second act but Barney Bernard as Isidore Nosenstine, an old-clothes man, and Harry Hermsen as Funius T. Barnum, proprietor of the World's Greatest Show, keep the audience in such rollicking good humor that the German dialect comedians are scarcely missed. Kolb and Dill as the two grafters, Meyer Longman and Mike Shortman, have their usual difficulties with the English language. Kolb is the same supercilious pessimist with his old disposition to snub Mike on every occasion and to vent his spleen on his partner's rotund body in the most unexpected bursts of passion. Mike is as timorous and wary as ever and still retains a cheerful composure under the most trying circumstances. Maude Amber is ponderously piquant as Mlle. Celestine Maloni, the equestrienne, for the shapely singer is not in the featherweight class of circus riders. What a sensation she would make jumping through a hoop! She sports some very becoming new gowns and has several good scenes with Winfield Blake, who plays the part of a debonair club man and does it successfully. Flossie Hope and Gertie Emerson dance with more than the customary abandon. As usual George Lask achieves with his chorus those kaleidoscopic effects that are a tribute to his genius.

Shakespeare Again

So few managers are willing nowadays to risk money in Shakespearean revivals that there is danger of the younger generation knowing its Shakespeare only through elocutionists, dramatic readers and Shakespeare clubs. There are no Booths and Barretts nowadays, and Warde and James are getting on in years and will be retired before we know it. Occasionally a Mansfield comes along and produces a Shakespearean play but his desire is only to give his conception of one of the characters, in nine cases out of ten a freak conception. Many actors, stars in comedy-dramas, have yearned to play "Hamlet." Several "Macbeths" are under way for next season. And syndicate managers who run to big things have sent spectacular Shakespearean productions on the road. There's not much money in Shakespeare these days, though, and the financial point of view is that of most managers. It is therefore noteworthy that R. D. MacLean has essayed a Shakespearean revival of that erstwhile familiar play, "Richard III," in which Edwin Booth starred for many years, but which has seldom been produced since except by Tom Keene. Mr. MacLean gives a very scholarly reading of his Richard. He is a fine-looking man with mobile features and a good command of facial expression. His voice is not agreeable, being hoarse and strident at times, but he never rants. He is especially good in the scenes where Richard's diplomacy is in play. I should fancy he would give a strong Richelieu. Odette Tyler has so little to do as the Prince of Wales that one wonders why she should do it at all. One of the most charming comediennes on the American stage was lost when Odette Tyler married; her return in the legitimate is by no means satisfactory. Can it be that Miss Tyler always had a hankering to do boy parts in Shakespearean plays? She is to give another next week in "King John," when she plays Prince Arthur. The stock company at the Grand seems to enjoy the return to the legitimate. Fred Butler gives a forceful impersonation of the King and Miss Stoddard's Lady Anne is a fine piece of work. Herschel Mayall is always strong in Shakespeare. As the Earl of Richmond he is a manly and handsome figure, and in the final act has his audience's sympathies well with him.

"Are You a Mason?" will open on Sunday night, April nineteenth, at the Columbia. John C. Rice, Thomas A. Wise and Edward Abeles are in the cast.

Features of Next Week's Bills

Mrs. Pat Campbell's second and last week at the Columbia will be devoted to repertory—Monday and Tuesday nights and Wednesday matinee, "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," in which Mrs. Campbell first made fame; Wednesday and Saturday night and Thursday matinee, "Magda"; Thursday night and Saturday matinee, "Aunt Jeannie," which is new here; "The Joy of Living," Friday night. Mrs. Campbell will appear at three matinees.

At the California tomorrow night the biggest novelty of the season is promised by Manager Ackerman. This is Denman Thompson's successor to "The Old Homestead," "Our New Minister," which is claimed by the Eastern critics to be one of the greatest pastoral comedies ever written. The original cast in its entirety will be seen here, including John Barker, who played Josh Whitcomb in this city five years ago. Joseph Conyers, village detective, was the original constable in "Old Jed Prouty" when that famous comedy was in its prime. Henry R. Scott, storekeeper, created the part of Seth Perkins in "The Old Homestead" eighteen years ago. John W. Brawn was the original whistling boy in Hoyt's "A Trip to Chinatown," playing the part for five seasons. Charles Stedman was the villain in the original Frohman production in New York of "The Fatal Card." John Terriss, who plays the title role, is a protege of Denman Thompson and an actor of acknowledged ability. The feminine members of the company include Ethel Brooke Ferguson, Phila May and Clara Rainford.

"Helter Skelter" will continue to pack Fischer's to the doors.

R. D. MacLean and Odette Tyler offer "King John" as the attraction at the Grand. During the past four seasons, Mr. MacLean has made this drama the chief attraction in his Shakespearean repertoire and in the name role has scored triumphs. Miss Tyler as Prince Arthur in "King John" will undoubtedly show to still greater advantage than as the Prince of Wales in "Richard III."

Wallace Irwin's "The Siege of Goat Island" will have its first production at the Republic tomorrow afternoon, and will depict amusing phases of the army and navy. Charlie Stine will be General Lafter, William McDonald, Admiral Sly, William Keller Mack, Stiffington Hearse, president of the Undertakers' Trust, Peurl Wilkerson, Don Mocha de Java, Harry Conlon, Sergeant Kilkenny, Olive Evans, Evelina Hearse and Claudia Rogers, Bessie Brass. There will be a patriotic American first part entitled "The Deck of the Battleship Oregon," in which new songs and jokes will be presented by the clever vocalists and comedians of the company. Mack, Stine, Conlon and Ryder will be able seamen and Sylvester, McDonald, Guise and Epperly will be attired as Captains in the U. S. Navy with Wilkerson as an Admiral.

"Her Majesty," while not new here will have an almost entirely new cast in the Alcazar production. It is a pretty play and will be a springlike Easter week attraction. "The Dancing Girl" comes next.

W. C. Fields, kingpin of eccentric jugglers, heads the Orpheum's new bill. He was here a few years ago with the Orpheum Road Show and made a hit then. Chris Bruno and Mabel Russell, modern singers and dancers, in "Tricks of the Trade," will be new. The former is a clever mimic and the latter an adept in grotesque dancing. Lizzie Wilson, who Phil Hastings says is "piquant and pleasing," is a German comedienne also a novelty. Frank Aumann, an athlete who punches bags retail and wholesale, is another new to us. The Colbys, Mason-Keeler company, McCue and Cahill and Lafleur will be the holdovers.

By overwhelming desire Zelie de Lussan will sing "Carmen" on two more occasions at the Tivoli—next Tuesday and Thursday nights, and these will positively be her last two appearances on the coast. Monday night and for the remainder of the week "La Fille du Regiment" will be the bill. This opera made a hit in New York during the last Grau season, when revived with Sembrich as the Daughter, but it has not been sung in San Francisco since Pauline l'Allemand gave it as one of the Hess opera company's bills at the Orpheum. Bertha Davis will have the title role and Caro Roma will be the Countess and Cunningham the Sergeant.

Chutes attractions will include Martin and Ridgeway in a bright character sketch; Leff and Carr ("Max and Jake") in an amusing Hebrew act; George and Laura Lewis, the "two Rubes"; Baroness Von Tilse, balladist, in the latest popular selections; Carita, the girl conjuror; the Kobers, little Irene, and the animatoscope. LaMont will make his daring "slide for life" hanging by his teeth to a wire seven hundred feet long, stretched from the top of the chutes to the foot of the lake. —The Playgoer.

MUSIC

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

A Genius in Our Midst

I wonder if San Francisco, that goes mad over Mascagni and wild over the wonderful Kocian, discerning, appreciative San Francisco, is aware of the fact that for years a great, but modest (and modest, rather) master of the violin has been living in her midst. In Europe there is hardly a musical centre where the name of Henry Holmes is heard without emotion. A. Ehrlich, author of a German book, "Famous Violinists of the Past and Present," is of the opinion that Mr. Holmes belongs to "the best contemporary English virtuosos," and further informs us that, after making, in company with his brother, Alfred, another famous violinist who died in Paris in 1876, concert tours through Belgium, Germany, Austria, Sweden and France, he "settled permanently in London, where he became teacher of the violin at the Royal College of Music, and as such, and as soloist and quartet player, gained a high repute. He wrote a violin concerto, two string quartets, several violin solos, four symphonies, one concert overture, two cantatas, and revised the violin sonatas of Corelli, Tartini, Bach, and Handel. The brothers Holmes were for a short time pupils of Spohr, who dedicated to them one of his last violin duets, which circumstance alone is proof of their extraordinary ability." The Germans do not love the English, but they do love music and know a master when they hear him.

At the Von Meyerinck School

The first public appearance of the members of class four (1901-'02) took place in the recital hall of the Von Meyerinck School of Music last Thursday evening. The affair was quite "en famille," the audience being composed mainly of friends of the graduates. The participants were Miss C. Ehrenpfort, Miss Alma Holm, Miss A. Horton, Miss H. McGuire, Miss Angelita Strauch, Miss Edna Wilcox and Mr. L. H. Strauss. Miss Edna Wilcox easily bore off the honors of the evening by her two solos and the Mendelssohn duet with Miss Ehrenpfort. Miss Wilcox has a good stage presence, marked individuality, and a voice with a strong dramatic note in it, all of which qualifications for success were at once apparent in her first number, "Gretchen am Spinnrad" (Schubert). Miss Angelita Strauch gave a good rendition of her double number, "An die Musik" (Schubert), and a Chopin Folksong. Mr. Strauss, the sole gentleman among the graduates, followed with five songs from the Cycle, "Poet's Love." Mr. Strauss has an agreeable delivery and a sincere and modest manner, and made a most favorable impression on his hearers. Miss Holm's voice was hardly equal to the exigencies of her two songs, Taubert's "In Exile" and Schubert's "Hark, Hark the Lark." The recital closed with a scene and ballad from the "Flying Dutchman." The full strength of the class, reinforced by members of classes one, two and three, was heard in the Spinning Song with fine effect. Miss Helen Heath took the part of Senta and delivered her ballad in her own inimitable manner. Miss Feldheim made the most of the small part of Mary. Refreshments were served at the close of the program, and the graduates received the congratulations of their friends and relatives.

Miss Gussie Mast's recital was one of the musical happenings of last week, and drew a large and appreciative audience. Miss Mast has a voice which is at once sweet, strong and sympathetic, and there is no doubt that she can fit herself to be a valuable church singer. The fact of her blindness precludes, of course, any hope of a stage career. Miss Mast expects to go East soon and hopes to go to Europe some day.

There will be but one more of the Hopkins musicales during the present spring exhibition. It will be given next Thursday evening, and Henry Heyman has arranged a most interesting program for the occasion. At this week's musicale those taking part were Miss May Lippitt, soprano, Miss Alfreda Tibbitts, contralto, Mr. Lloyd R. Wertheimer, violoncello, Mrs. Gerard Barton, accompanist, Mr. Gerard Barton, organist.

The Zech Symphony Concert

Frederick Zech Jr. will give the last of his series of symphony concerts at Fischer's on Thursday afternoon, when the following excellent program will be rendered: Rustic Wedding, Goldmark; The Raven, Symphonic Poem, first time here, Zech; Serenade for strings, Volkmann; Suite (first time here), Von Der Mehden; Slavonic Dance, Dvorak. The sale of seats will open at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s on Monday morning.

The Pasmores—Mary, Susan and Dorothy—will give a concert in the assembly hall of Stanford University next Thursday. Mrs. Florence Wyman Gardner, soprano, Miss Anne Moore, mezzo soprano, A. E. Nowlan, tenor, and Miss Zueletta Geery, accompanist, will assist.

A little boy, a pupil of Nathan Landsberger, made a favorable impression at the Press Club jinks last week. He could not have been more than eleven years old, but he played with intelligence and expression far beyond his years.

The program at St. Dominic's church tomorrow at 11 a. m. will be: Organ prelude, Paques Fleures, Mailly; Vidi Aquam, Dettner; Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sanctus, Benedictus and Agnes Dei, from Hummel's Mass in E flat; Veni Creator, Lejeal; offer-

AT BAB'S, THE ORIGINAL.

Have you been to Bab's lately, the charming little restaurant in Larkin street, and seen the new rooms? There's a cork room that suggests all sorts of delightful treats, a log cabin room, a horse room decorated with saddles and harness, an Indian room, a Chinese room, a Prison room where you are waited on by men in stripes, and an Inferno where the future state of the wicked is suggested. Bab's is the most unique restaurant in San Francisco.

"I never have any trouble in keeping my wife contented."

"How do you do it?"

"I coax her into an argument every day, and I always let her win out."

AT BYRON SPRINGS.

The weather is now beautiful at Byron Springs. Plans are being made for establishing a camping-ground for the night on Mt. Diablo. The stable is being re-fitted with riding horses and busses and an orchestra will soon be an additional attraction at the hotel. Among the recent arrivals were George Spencer, H. C. Kohler, Col. H. W. Brady and Jasper N. Toler from San Francisco, with many from other cities and States.

Answers to Correspondents

When Without a Servant.

Mrs. Poor Swell writes me: "I have no servant and it is very hard for me to do all my housework and attend the door for callers. What would you advise me to do if I am engaged in making a mayonnaise and some smart friend of mine rings the door bell?

That is easy. If you can't do a lightning change act, don't go to the door. Let your smart friend ring until she gets tired, and then she'll go away.

When Without a New Hat.

Miss Impecunious Fashionplate writes: "If I don't wear a new hat to church Easter my friends will think me hopelessly out of date. I have no money to buy one and have no way of getting one on credit. What would you advise?

If you can't do a millinery stunt yourself, with a new ribbon on your last year's hat, stay away from church. Your friends may think you are visiting at some country-house and they'll be more envious than if you appeared in a forty-dollar Paris hat.

The Children Problem.

Mrs. Youngwife writes: "I am anxious to live in town, my husband being tired of commuting, but we have two children. We have tried to rent a flat but no one will rent us one on account of the children. Can you suggest any way so that we can accomplish our desire? The children are too young to put at boarding-school.

Try a baby-farm, or treat them as if they were unwelcome kittens. Drown 'em. Aunt Prudence.

LETTERS

A Village Love Story

"In the Garden of Charity" is the second novel of Basil King (Rev. W. B. King), whose "Let Not Man Put Asunder" attracted so much comment last year. The new book bears no resemblance to its predecessor. It is a story of the simple folk and the simple life of a Nova Scotia village, and the title may be taken literally as referring to the material garden of Charity Pennland, the heroine of the novel, or it may have a metaphorical significance, in the great virtue of charity which she possessed and developed. The plot is the world-old story of the love of two good women for one worthless man, but the treatment and development are novel. The village of Fisher's Grant is an odd little settlement whose original inhabitants were French refugees after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, but whose descendants have but a vague and garbled tradition of their origin. Charity Byfleet belongs to a different stock. She is one of a family of Massachusetts Tories who left the "Boston States" in order to remain loyal subjects of their king, but they, like their Huguenot neighbors, have lost trace of their history. Charity is an exalted personage. She "lives on money in the bank," dresses in bright muslins, and has a garden which is as much of a pride to the village as to its owner. Charity also has a romance. Eleven years before the opening of the story, while on a visit to Halifax, she was married to a gay artilleryman who, three months later, sailed to the West Indies with his regiment. As his term of enlistment had nearly expired, his young wife did not accompany him, but returned to her own home to await him. William Pennland, possessed of all the virtues but the moral ones, has no intention of tying himself down. He interprets literally the sailor's license of "a wife in every port," and while Charity burnishes her copper saucepans and arranges her best tea cups, works in her garden, and "dresses every day for company," the gay William gives her no further thought until, worn out by dissipation and disease, it comes to him that he "needs to be taken care of," and he steers a course for home. But he never reaches it. He halts by the wayside for one more blossom, and there begins the tragedy of the women. Charity and Hagar, the two principal characters, are as different as day and night, and though the Fates have tangled their threads of life so that they are fain to live together, one cannot feel that it will ever be more than tolerance on one hand and indifference on the other, with the child between, on whom to lavish all their affection. There is an abundance of humor in the story, but of the kind which is imperceptible to the humorists themselves. Jonas Boutilier's fear of his letter, because "there's ginerally bad luck in them things," and Long Tom Jolimoeur's" dread of being "had up" for a witness presented no amusing side to them or their neighbors. Sam Boutilier's Henny's hooking frolic was a veritable event to Fisher's Grant, and whatever incongruity may be presented to readers in a green rose with blue leaves trailing over a yellow background, be sure the vividness of the coloring made up for it amongst the villagers, for although one of the workers expressed her opinion that the like was not to be found outside of a hooked rug or the better land, it is not to be supposed for a moment that mere conformity to nature in the matter of coloring is a virtue in a hooked rug. "In the Garden of Charity" is an interesting story, but it is not to be set down as a tract or a problem novel. The problem which was presented to Charity was for her own solution. It is an unusual one, and what course she pursued, and whether it was the wisest, or the only one open to her, readers must find out for themselves. Mr. King appears to be more at home amongst his characters here than he was in his other novel. He has not created a masterpiece, but humanity would starve if there were nothing but masterpieces. This is a healthy, homely, plain story, well worth the attention of readers.

A Home Library

The Mercantile Library Association has made another new departure in the interests of its patrons. In addition to the usual library privileges they have arranged a delivery system under which a conveyance, under the charge of an assistant librarian, will call for and deliver books weekly at the homes of subscribers who wish to avail themselves of the additional privilege. A catalogue of new books with press notices concerning them will be mailed monthly, so that members will be kept in touch with literary matters. The fee for this extra and special service is placed at the nominal rate of fifty cents per quarter, or two dollars a year in addition to the regular library dues. It just about covers the price of car fare and obviates the necessity for carrying books back and forth, not to take into consideration the saving of time. When the proposition to consolidate the Mercantile with the Mechanics' Library was voted down by an overwhelming majority a few weeks ago, it was promised that plans then under consideration would, when put into execution, materially increase the efficiency of the institution. This is one of several, and practically amounts to giving each subscriber a home library. When one can command the use of eighty thousand volumes without going from under one's roof tree there is not even the shadow of an excuse for not reading—old books or new, fiction, science, or anything else.

Roland Molyneux has taken to literature. His volume, "The Room with the Little Door," is favorably commented on.

Sugar Stock Pool

From the action of the directors of the Union Sugar Company issuing a notice to the shareholders of the company calling their attention to the agreement for the exchange of their stock for trustee certificates, the report has become current in local financial circles that the sugar trust has completed its invasion of California, finally capturing the last of the independent plants. At the offices of the company this, however, is strenuously denied, it being stated there that the agreement for the turning over of the stock to John L. Howard, E. R. Lilienthal and John F. Merrill as trustees, was made in June, 1902 and was signed by the holders of 21,000 shares, but the exchange of trustee certificates was not accomplished then. This is a rather flimsy explanation for last year the stock was worth but $10 a share, while now it is held strongly at $25. Another feature which gives street talk support is the fact that the Union Company is officered by the same officials as the Alameda Sugar Company, which last week passed into the control of the new owner, presumably the sugar trust, and it occupied the same office. The close connection of the two companies is a strong reason for the supposition that the trust is to gather in the Union as well as the Alameda company. The Union Sugar Company is capitalized with 40,000 shares of which 30,000 have been issued. The stock of the company has cost the shareholders $32.50 a share. The first cost was $25 a share and there have been three assessments of $2.50 each. The company has a large plant at Santa Maria in the northern part of Santa Barbara county, where some 4,200 acres are under cultivation. For the past few years conditions have not been favorable to large crops from lack of rain, but this season it has been estimated that the output would be some 9,000 tons, nearly double that of last year.

Quiet Trading on 'Change

Quietness has ruled the local market for stocks and bonds and the sales of the week have been comparatively light. Investors have been very backward and the buying orders have been confined mostly to small parcels. While the situation has been dull there has been no material falling off in valuations, in fact, considering all the depressing influences prices have been remarkably well sustained. Unlike the preceding three or four weeks the sales of the past week have not been so largely confined to two or three of the leading stocks. The interest in lighting stock appears to have almost completely subsided as far as general speculation is concerned, and the volume of sales of this class of securities has about got back to its normal state. San Francisco Gas & Electric shares have fluctuated but little, but the price holds up very well in comparison with the low figures at which it ruled for so many months. During the last few days it has fluctuated from $57 to $60, but these changes were unimportant and only incident to usual trade influences. The stock of the company is gradually being placed in escrow but the total deposited is not known outside the officials of the company. Whether any action towards changing the status of the present corporation either by sale or consolidation is in progress or not cannot be said, but stockholders have great expectations that the directors will be able to accomplish something along this line, so that the prospective $90 per share will become a reality. This explains the real cause why the present prices for the stock are maintained. The Pacific Gas Improvement Company is a sort of side partner of the San Francisco Gas & Electric and the price of shares in the former corporation have been advanced in a sympathetic way, probably for the reason, or hope, that in the event of the San Francisco Gas & Electric being absorbed or rehabilitated the Pacific Gas Improvement plant can also be worked into the deal. Equitable Gas shares remain about steady, the price averaging from $4.50 and $4.75 per share. But few shares are changing hands, however, because most of the stock has been placed in escrow. Central Light and Power shares are steady at $3.87 1-2, but the majority of holders are asking $4.25 with little disposition to shade that price. Pacific Lighting Company shares are offered at $58.50 with no buyers. Water stocks have shown but little change during the week with the exception of Spring Valley, which has eased off a trifle, bidders being inclined not to offer more than $83.25 or $83.37 1-2 for round lots. The holding interests, however, are quite firm and while some shares might be picked up at $83.75, there is not much disposition to sell. Port Costa Water continued neglected with $64 the best bid. As both buyers and sellers are very firm in their ideas there are practically no transactions. Powder stocks remain about the same, the sales being small but price steady. Giant shares are a trifle firmer than during the last week, some transactions being recorded at $67. Bank stocks remain very firm. The buying orders as a rule are in excess of the offers to sell. There is a standing bid of $500 for Bank of California shares and $220 for Mercantile Trust stock, but holders are loath to sell. Anglo-California shares are in demand at $99 to $99.50 with nothing obtainable under $101. Sugar stocks have all been quiet and steady. Hawaiian Commercial is offered in a small way at $46, but the best bidding price is $44.25. Hutchison remains firm at about $15 and Makaweli is likewise at $25. There has been some inquiry for Paauhau and some few offerings at $18, a portion of which were subsequently transferred at $17.50. Hana remains steady at $4 and the same may be said of Honokaa at $14 and $14.25. Oceanic Steamship shares are very dull, with $15 the asking price and $13.50 the best bid. California Wine Association shares are offered in a small way at $106, although some days ago some moderate-sized parcels changed hands at $105. Alaska Packers stock is a trifle stronger. The question of wages which has interfered materially with operations at the North has now been adjusted and preparations are in progress for a very large pack. The outlook for this corporation was never more propitious for everything looks very favorable for a successful year's business. The sales of bonds have been moderate and prices very steady, fluctuations as a rule being merely fractional and unimportant.

Fifty brokers of this city have organized the San Francisco and Tonopah Mining Exchange, to deal in Tonopah mining stocks, and predictions are made that there will be a big boom in the business. The officers of the organization are Henry C. Cutting, president; Emile E. Kahn, vice-president; Louis Hagan, secretary, and J. L. Ewen, treasurer. —The Financier.

A Roman Easter

In Rome Easter Sunday is the climax to the beautiful, solemn rites of Holy Wee. Formerly there was a service in St. Peter's in which the Pope took part, attended by the aristocracy and the populace, the women all dressed in black and the men in evening dress or handsome uniforms. At dusk St. Peter's was illuminated by four thousand four hundred lamps and was a magnificent sight. The great cross on the big bronze ball at the top of the large dome looked like a cross of fire. Then, when the lamps were shining all at once they were transformed to flaming torches. Travelers from all parts of the world used to assemble in Rome to see the great spectacle of St. Peter's, as it were, on fire. But the old custom of illuminating St. Peter's fell into disuse after Pio Nono's death. —The Traveler.

O, she dances such a way
No sun upon an Easter day
Is half so fine a sight.

Other People's Ideas

From "Glass and Gold," by James O. G. Duffy:

Miranda: A man's heart recovers easily from the damage inflicted by a woman unless his head is weak. Then he finds his way to a madhouse or kills himself. In either case the world is the gainer, since only the fittest should be permitted to survive.

Elizabeth: A secret love is a girlish folly. To do something that will kill it is a kindness that appears only superficially cruel. Your Dobbins of romance are never flesh and blood realities. The more I see of life and love and marriage the more I am convinced that Max Nordau is not a cynic, but a philosopher when he says mutual attraction is only a matter of sex. One whole sex has a general attraction for the whole other sex, and it is quite immaterial to the man as well as the woman which man or woman becomes the other's companion.

Easter Thoughts

Easter: A church festival commemorating Christ's resurrection, and occurring on Sunday, the second day after Good Friday. It corresponds to the pascha or passover of the Jews, and most nations still give it this name under the various forms of pascha, pasque, paque, or pask. Webster.

Easter-day, on which the rest of the movable feasts depend, is always the first Sunday after the fourteenth day of the calendar moon which happens upon or next after the twenty-first of March, according to the rules laid down for the construction of the calendar; so that if the fourteenth day happens on a Sunday, Easter day is the Sunday after. Eng. Cyc.

Therefore let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth. —I Cor. v: 7.

Origin of Easter Eggs

The custom of coloring eggs for Easter originated in Germany, where in no other corner of the earth is the festival kept in quite such an elaborate way. A story is told of a noble lady who was obliged during a cruel war to flee with her family to a mountain retreat. No fowls had ever found their way to this benighted region. As Easter approached, the noble lady sent her servant to the far-off town whence he returned with some fowls. The lady saved up their eggs and, desiring to give the village children an Easter treat she colored the eggs by boiling them with mosses and roots. Then she made nests of moss which she divided among the children, bidding each look on Easter Sunday and see what would happen. After a simple feast the children sought their nests, and in each found five bright-colored eggs with a pretty verse printed on one. They were delighted and could not imagine what hen had laid such beautiful eggs.

"It was not a hen," said one little girl, "but it must have been the little hare that I saw when I placed my nest by the tree."

And afterwards the children believed that it was the hares that were responsible for the pretty eggs, which explains why the hare figures in the candy-stores at this season.

When the noble lady returned to her home she left a sum of money to be expended in giving the mountain children a feast every Easter. That was many hundred years ago, but Easter eggs are now a part of the festival not only in the Fatherland but all over Europe and America. In Germany servants are also given presents at this season, and there are games of egg-throwing with prizes that are an annual custom.

His Policy and His Finish

Mayor Schmitz is engaged these days in patching up his tattered political prestige. But Mayor Schmitz has too long deferred the work of repair. If he had been guided by the old proverb that a stitch in time saves nine his prestige would not now be irreparably perforated. The fact is that Mayor Schmitz has lost the confidence of the people of San Francisco and if he were nominated tomorrow by the Union Labor party and endorsed by the Republicans and Democrats, a good strong independent candidate could be found to defeat him. His case is more hopeless than was that of James D. Phelan at the end of his term, for though the people were eager to repudiate Phelan they could not deny him the credit for his notable achievements in municipal reform, whereas Schmitz has accomplished nothing. He has devoted himself exclusively to machine politics, the interests of the Schmitz family and the enrichment of Ruef. The resurrection of Phelan is not impossible. There can never be a pretext for infusing life into the Schmitz cadaver. The Schmitz political policy affords an interesting study. Though in strong contrast to that of Phelan it was equally fatuous and disastrous. Phelan antagonized the press and was crushed by it. Schmitz courted the influence of the press by catering to the wishes of the proprietors of the dailies, all of whom have irons in the political fire. He won what he sought—approval of his Administration and immunity from criticism—and the consequence was that he became reckless in the furtherance of his own ends, deluding himself after the manner of the unsophisticated bird who sequesters merely his head to conceal his whole body. If Mayor Schmitz had not ingratiated himself into the good will of the newspaper proprietors he would have been more cautious in his official conduct. There never was a Mayor of San Francisco who gave more occasion for adverse criticism and received less than Schmitz, and yet though Town Talk is the only paper that has kept the public posted regarding his preposterous pretensions and his transparent hypocrisies, it is evident that he has lost the confidence of the people, and that he is no longer accepted at anything approximating his own appraisement. However the Mayor is not despondent. He made a star "gallery play" when he called attention to the Chinatown corruption fund, but if he really objects to that sort of thing he should seek to uncover other funds that are used for corrupting public officials. After all, gambling in Chinatown is not a menace to the morals of this community. The Chinese constitute a separate and distinct element of the community, and their manners and customs interest us only when they concern our health. Their Oriental morals cannot be Occidentalized. Gambling is a legitimate pastime with them. The only gamblers that menace the morals of this community are the white lottery dealers and the several proprietors of pool-rooms conducted with feigned surreptition in cigar stores and saloons. They are receiving protection from the authorities of this city, and Mayor Schmitz is surely not so optimistic as to believe that they are not assessed for immunity. Why are the white gamblers unmolested? It is surely not an impertinence to ask if Mayor Schmitz knows if there is a corruption fund collected in the interest of the white gamblers, and if so whether he knows how many officials of the city government share in its distribution.

Collins on Dunne

When Judge Frank H. Dunne was a candidate for reelection last year Town Talk called attention to his unfitness for the bench. We stated that he was worse than incompetent; that he proved himself a dangerous man when, in furtherance of the ends of designing tricksters of the bar, he exercised his temporary authority as Presiding Judge to divert the probate business of the court from Judge Coffey's department. We asserted that saloon influence was largely responsible for Judge Dunne but that he owed much to his activity and that of his family in fraternal and religious societies. We were sincere in our protest against the re-election of Judge Dunne because we regarded him as a mountebank, but he secured the requisite number of votes. That we were not wrong in our estimate of Judge Dunne, and that we did him no injustice in our enumeration of his shortcomings, everybody must be convinced who has devoted attention to the Call's exposure of the looseness of the records in his court. Those records are an eloquent commentary on his incompetency, and the exposure of them should have humiliated this fledgling jurist. But it appears that he lacks the capacity to appreciate the seriousness of his manifest misfeasance. The scandal is said to have amused him. However, if his risibles were excited by the scandal there must have been speedy reaction, after the verbal castigation he received at the tongue of George D. Collins, the attorney, who is recognized as one of the most experienced practitioners in criminal law. Never in the history of the bench in this State was a Judge subjected to such a severe denunciation. Lawyers usually conceal their contempt for the court. Seldom have they the courage or the candor to publicly censure, much less excoriate, a judicial officer. Therefore the fulmination of Collins against Dunne was most surprising. "I always thought," said the attorney, "that Dunne was an imbecile, but I did not know he was so far along as this." That's pretty plain language. "He has never been credited with knowing any too much law." Indeed he hasn't. In the last campaign we stated that he was being educated in the law at the expense of the taxpayers, who were not only supplying him with instruction but were also paying him a salary. But if he is an imbecile, as Collins thinks, the instruction is being wasted.

Credit Where Credit is Due

President Roosevelt has touched on a great variety of subjects since he began his series of speeches on his western trip, and they are not all political. He has discussed the Monroe Doctrine, the expediency of a naval armament in the highest degree efficient, our Cuban and Philippine policies, and trust repression, but the topic that appears to be nearest his heart is the fundamental importance of steadfast attention to the propagation of the American species. That has risen to the dignity of a Presidential hobby, and Mr. Roosevelt is riding it with that ardor that characterizes his devotion to everything that smacks of reform. He is convinced that there should be reform in the family circle; that married people should ever be sensible of the highest of their obligations in society, and he has therefore resolved to impress others with the importance of the subject. On the evening before his departure from Washington he took occasion, despite the fact that he was exceedingly busy, to address, as President, a letter of warm approval to a father of triplets, all boys, in Gloucester city, New Jersey. Of course a personal letter from the President to an humble citizen is inspiring and encouraging, but probably if he had not been so busy, and had given the matter more mature consideration, he would have addressed the letter to the mother of the triplets instead of to the father. It was the old Roman notion that the father should be encouraged in such matters, but nowadays we are more inclined than formerly to acknowledge the part played by woman in every sphere of activity which she has invaded, and surely there is none in which her importance as a factor is more deserving of consideration than that in which she contributes to the propagation of the species. The father of triplets is entitled to no more approval than that given to the father of a single child. The mother is the one that should be felicitated and encouraged. So great is the conceit of man that he usually does the posing and the chest expanding in such cases, and he is as ridiculous as the clown who acknowledges the applause given to the skilled acrobats. In seeking to discourage race suicide nothing is to be gained by preaching to the male of the species.

Critics and Authors

"Humility becomes critics more than Hectoring," is the oracular utterance of a contemporary, and forthwith he proceeds to act the critic in anything but an humble spirit, but plies his quarterstaff right lustily about the sconces of those whom he feels have offended him. "A good deal," says he, "has been written about standards or rules for literary criticism, but there has been no noticeable improvement in the methods, manners and decisions of critics," which statement goes to show how very little this castigator knows of the history and literature of criticism. It is the constant practice of a certain class of writers to deplore those "good old times," when the giants did not disdain reviewing, entirely losing sight of the truth that the giants of those days seized upon reviewing as a means to pillory their opponents by deriding and sneering at their books. Criticism was for the few, a battle of wits, and was most frequently unjust. The critic of today who would be guilty of deliberately venting his spite on an author would not find employment on any reputable publication. It is absurd for a publisher to complain that critics disdain to gratify writers by furnishing categorical reasons for their conclusions. Let him take the case home to himself. How much time would he have, or space for other purposes, if he were to enter into an argument pro and con with every contributor whose wares he rejected? Does he not consider it sufficient that the merchandise is not what he wants, and does not that end the matter? The one fault of the average book, which is a concentration of all faults, is that it is weak. Why should the critic demand more space for some poor, trashy novel than is given to the most important events of the day, in order that he may try to show the author what ought to have been apparent to him; that his production is but a lump of fat with neither bones nor muscles, and so like a hundred thousand others of the same variety that nothing but the title differentiates it? Where is the advantage in pummeling a feather bolster? What authors want is indiscriminating praise, not honest opinion. The one great fault of critics is that they are too lenient. They honestly try to find something good to say of even the poorest books, for they realize that by the time the thing is in print and on sale it is too late to do any good by pointing out blemishes. The feeling is akin to that which restrains people from castigating in public ill behaved children, especially when the children are not their own. What is sadly needed in every community is a stoical censor who will kill in the embryo all the trash which for any reason should not be printed. All the poor, weak imitations, realistic horrors, and inept and disagreeable things should be rooted out like noxious weeds, before they ripen and go to seed. As to pedantry in the critic, calling to his aid little scraps of specialized knowledge and obscure bits of information, that is more often the fault of the writer. Nine-tenths of all the biographies, histories, works on art and popular science, in which the popularity is so great that the science is lost sight of, are rehashes of the works of earlier authors, who, in all likelihood, also "lifted" their material. When the author knows a great deal more about the subject than the critic does he is in neither fear nor danger of being abused. His difficulty is in convincing the public that it needs to know what he knows and to buy his book. When it comes to judging works of fiction, exactly what the reviewer ought not to do is to "approach with humility and modesty," or to judge it leniently. At the present moment cacoethes scribendi is a more fashionable disease than appendicitis. The inky forefinger is cultivated in society as a beauty spot, and since it is considered clever to write, every one must write, whether there is the bacillus of an idea back of it or not. One woman marries into literature by espousing the far-off descendant of the original Vox Populi; another saturates herself with Ouida, Duchess and Rose Nouchette Cary, and like a luminous dial or match safe, she is capable of giving out a faint and feeble imitation of what she has been absorbing all her life; still another, gaining an inkling of how the trick is done, exclaims like the Cornish giant in the old fairy tale, after witnessing the exploit of the valiant Jack in ripping open the sack where he had stowed his hasty pudding, "Odds, splutter hur nails! Hur can do that hurself," and forthwith proceeds to do it. Whether the success is apparent to every one else as to the performer is another matter. Literature is fairly cursed with amateurs, and it is the first duty of the critic to discourage them. If they can be discouraged they have no business to try literature. If John Keats had had sufficient stamina for the ordinary purposes of life the critics would not have prevented him from being a poet. We do not trust our bodies to the amateur physician nor our business to the amateur lawyer. Why should our brains be at the mercy of the amateur scribbler? When the society woman is suffering from stage fever she engineers some charitable scheme which gives her the opportunity to appear in a leading role with a company recruited from her own rank, and carefully chosen with a view to cast no shadow on her greatness. A small hall, an audience composed chiefly of admiring friends, and curtain calls and flowers galore are apt to strengthen her opinion of her own merits. When she essays even a minor role in a company of professionals she comes face to face with another kind of criticism. The general public pays for seats in order to see a play, not a beautiful young lady whom it is the height of impoliteness to criticise. When the society woman scribbles a story, it is the envy and admiration of her associates. If she were wise she would limit the circulation of her work to her own circle. When she puts herself into print, places her wares on the market and demands of the book-buying world the same price for her apprentice work that is asked by the masters of literature, she has nothing to complain of when she finds that society standards are not commercial standards. Book-buyers have good cause for complaint when, misled by the plaudits of some unwise critic, they are bunkoed into giving as much for some piece of trash as they are asked for "Vanity Fair" or "Mill on the Floss." When these society writers send out autographed copies of their twaddle to personal friends, and receive in return most glowing tributes to their genius, they are not obtaining fair and unprejudiced opinions. On the contrary, it is a case of not examining the teeth of the gift horse. The professional critic is in no such position. To him the author is nothing, the book everything, and when he views his table piled ten-deep with poor, anæmic imitations of poor models, and thinks of his neglected Hardys, Thackerays and Eliots, the wonder is not that he is occasionally severe but that he is ever anything else. If critics were governed by the rule that "a book is good if he likes it and bad if he does not," it would go worse with the amateur author than it does now. So far from being actuated solely by personal bias, the critic who is worth his salt always does his best to imagine what class of readers would be attracted by the book in hand and how they would be apt to view it in comparison with others of its class. The author of the brilliant editorial which has furnished the text for this sermon entirely mistakes the position. It is not the critic who should assume the humble and devout attitude, but the author. There are plenty of good books in the world, new and old, and there is no occasion for gratitude that there are so many poor ones. There is a new baby born into the world every minute in the twenty-four hours, and each is as wonderful to its admiring parents as Cain was to Mr. Adam and Eve. The officiating physician is solicited to give his testimony that each is the finest child from Creation up to date, but to him the whole affair is commonplace and matter of fact. So, each writer is duly astonished at the miracle of his own manufacture, but the weary critic sighs when he recalls the fact that there are something like a hundred books published every day and that most of them are bad. The average critic, and admitting for the sake of the argument that the average is bad, is infinitely superior to the average writer. A critic has a wide field of comparison, for he probably reads more books every year than the average writer in the course of a lifetime. There is many a book which receives half a column of notice solely through the courtesy of the critic. If it were treated according to its merits, a perfunctory mention amongst the list of "Books received" would dispose of it.

The Fashionable Craze

In these days of ours when fortunes grow colossal, and our plutocrats have gained unlimited power for the indulging of their whims, we are inclined to flatter ourselves that art is being fostered and that culture is becoming widespread. But may we not be deluding ourselves? There are surely signs which would seem to herald the dawning of a day of light on our benighted, materialistic souls, but there is so much evidence of sham among those who have the greatest opportunities for the acquisition of culture that perhaps we should not be too sanguine. Many of our newly rich have plunged into literature and exposed their Philistinism. Every little while facts come to light that warrant the inference that superfluous wealth is applied to the accumulation of paintings and statues that are not first-rate examples of art. Books are bought for their sumptuous bindings rather than for their contents, and musicians and singers are touted as artists by rich patrons though they have never received divine inspiration, while others of genius are overlooked. We have seen a charlatan in literature, a mere scribbler, lionized by the educated (?) club-women of the community as though she possessed the true brand, and we wonder whether this alleged culture of which we hear so much is not merely a craze to be interested in art. It is true that the supremacy of the beautiful is establishing itself, but there is much that is factitious in our present notion of beauty. There is an elect number who possess true culture but the Philistines who are the loudest in affecting it are quite numerous.

HAVE YOU BEEN THERE?

Governor Pardee's Earnest Look

By Antolycus.

The decision in the Northern Securities case has opened the bunghole for a muddy and voluminous flow of confused thinking. It is vaguely characterized as "a blow at the trust" and this is true, although the eminent thinkers do not know why. The decision changes none of the essential conditions that existed before it was made. The control of the Great Northern and the Northern Pacific still remains vested in Pierpont Morgan and J. J. Hill, as it was before the decision was made. The only change is that the judgment hampers business in a way that may have serious consequences, not only to the trust but likewise to the whole commercial community, should a stock market panic follow from the inability of the underwriting syndicates to dispose of the great mass of "undigested securities" which they are carrying largely on borrowed money.

In order to understand the conditions it is necessary to explain the nature and purpose of a holding company like the Northern Securities. The strategic objective point of modern high finance is to hold the control of railroad systems or great corporations like the Steel Trust—this for the enormous patronage and pickings which follow the control. In order to control it is necessary to hold a majority of the stock, but this is expensive. The shares do not always pay dividends or pay less than money is worth in active banking or stock jobbing. To meet this difficulty the holding company was invented. For instance, let us say there are one hundred shares in the capital stock of a corporation. You hold fifty-one or more, and therefore control. But you would like to retain the control and sell some of the stock. Accordingly you incorporate your fifty-one shares as the Blank Securities Company. You can then sell forty-nine per cent of the Blank Securities stock and still retain control both of that and of the original corporation. Thus instead of having a vast sum locked up in the control of the parent corporation you can realize on nearly half of it. Instead of holding the fifty-one per cent you can cut down the investment to something like thirty per cent or less. That is to say, you can do so if you can persuade the public to buy shares in the Securities Company. It is an ingenious device to have your cake and eat it.

Another object of a holding company is to mobilize capital, to make it more easily negotiable in the shape of securities, more liquid, so to speak. Where a great corporation like that of the Great Northern, the Northern Pacific and the Burlington is effected it simplifies stock dealing to have all three properties represented by a single set of share certificates. These were the objects sought to be attained by the Northern Securities company. But in order to effect the consolidation it was necessary to borrow enormous sums of money. Multiply this operation half a dozen times for underwriting the Steel trust, the Louisville and Nashville and Southern Railway combination, the Southern and Union Pacific combination and other great undertakings, each one involving perhaps one hundred million dollars of borrowed capital, and you easily explain the frequent recent scares over the tight money in New York. The fact is that some of the biggest banks in New York have the larger part of their available funds locked up in these undertakings and the public is not coming in to relieve them of the load.

Why? One of the chief reasons for the public distrust is this very litigation instituted by the President against the trusts, and this state of mind must be aggravated by the recent decision. In that sense it is a very serious blow at the trusts. The general public could afford to feel indifferent over the sufferings of the trust magnates and let them fry in their own grease, were it not for the fact that should financial disaster overtake them it would bring panic and hard times that must involve everybody.

The root of the trouble lies in the fact that the underwriting syndicates and stock speculators have control of the big banks and are thus enabled to lock up vast sums in undertakings which are not legitimate banking. The power to use this money has made the trusts possible but so long as the public stay out of the market the condition is dangerous to the last degree.

But the decision has done nothing to break up the trust. Nor can any decision take from a man his right to buy as many shares of stock as he has money to pay for, whether that money is borrowed or his own. There are two ways to break up the trusts. One is a financial crash and the other government ownership.

In view of these conditions the comments of the statesmen are amusing. Governor Van Zant of Minnesota speaks of the Northern Securities case as if it were his private property and in a way he is right, because he is the only man in wide America who will reap any advantage therefrom.

Governor Pardee, being asked for a sentiment appropriate to the occasion, said of the decision: "I think it is a good thing." As this seemed to leave much unsaid the reporter helped out with the remark, "But the Governor looked earnest." Is not that delicious? Of course Dr. Pardee does not know whether the decision in its effects will be good, bad or indifferent. A man who has fifteen hundred or two thousand hungry Joes pulling his coat-tails for easy jobs has his hands full. There is a heap of trouble on the old man's mind without bothering about trusts. But he contrived to look solemn enough to impress the reporter with a sense of his wisdom and inflexible purpose to smash the trusts. Therefore speak gently to him, because he understands the importance of being earnest for publication.

The Saunterer

The Entente Cordiale

Many readers of the Examiner blinked their eyes last Sunday when they picked up a copy of the paper and saw a picture of James D. Phelan. The wise ones who are in touch with current events, and who enjoy that blissful privilege of tapping the private wire that leads beneath the surface of things, blinked their eyes only once and then sat up and took notice. The picture was a surprise to them but they quickly recovered from it, and then they began to speculate on the probability of Gavin McNab's picture appearing next Sunday. Mr. James D. Phelan has been a "dead one" so far as the Examiner office is concerned, ever since he retired from the Mayor's office. So long had it been since his name was ticked off on a linotype in the office of the monarch, that when the printer was engaged in setting up the caption for the Phelan phiz the machinery broke down. It seemed as though even the linotype rebelled against the intrusion of the ostracized millionaire.

The Hearst Slogan

The Examiner should have prepared its readers for the shock by nailing to its editorial masthead the legend adopted by Mr. William R. Hearst to do service as his slogan in his coming political campaign. It is a familiar one, being as old as Christianity—"Peace on earth, good will to men." That is it. The modern paraphrase is, Keep the pregnant hinges of the gladhand well oiled. Mr. Hearst anticipated the visit of President Roosevelt by dropping into town unannounced last Friday, and two days later the Examiner published Phelan's picture. From now on the readers of the Examiner should not be surprised at anything they see. The Hearst campaign is on, and harmony must be promoted at any cost. Phelan has stopped calling Hearst names and may be permitted to go to the National Convention. Others are to be placated, too. Who could have predicted that William R. Hearst, the most fearless and uncompromising of newspaper publishers, would put on his most winning smile and school himself in affability that high office might follow hotairing?

The Lane Boom

The fact is that Mr. Hearst wants a united delegation from California in the next National Convention, and I haven't the slightest doubt that he will achieve his end. Indeed I think he could achieve it without taking to the highways with the gladhand in the hope of placating his enemies. However he has adopted a policy with harmony for a keynote, and now it will be interesting to watch the hastening of the representatives of Phelan push toward the Examiner office. A little later we may expect to see the big daily engaged in booming Lane for Mayor. Lane pretends to be after something higher. He says that he owes it to the Democratic party that nominated him for Governor to keep out of the municipal political pool; that it would not be in keeping with the dignity of a defeated gubernatorial candidate to accept a nomination for Mayor. But Lane is a common job-chaser, and he knows that his intimate friends are now engaged in stacking the political cards with a view of having him urged by a convention to run for Mayor. That is the program and the Examiner will make no strenuous effort to obstruct it.

Lane's Tact

All the job-chasers of the Democratic party are for Lane for Mayor. They regard him as a popular man and capital vote-winner because of his persistent demagogic appeals to the labor unions. It does not interest them to know that Lane's conduct as city and county attorney has appealed to all the quasi-public corporations in town. His demagoguery has never given offence to any of the corporations. He has protected their interests not by what he has done but by what he has refrained from doing as a public official. He is a genius at side-stepping when it is up to him to set the machinery of the law in motion in the interest of the dear people. But what care the job-chasers or the politically ambitious? They never care what sort of Mayor a man will make. His chances of winning are all that concern them. Meanwhile the Republicans are not short of mayoralty timber. Arthur Fisk, John C. Kirkpatrick, Sam Shortridge, Treasurer McDougald and Adolph Spreckels are all under consideration by the men that make up the ticket. Fisk could have the nomination but he wants to go to Congress.

A Physician's School of Vice

A story comes to me so weird, so Zolaesque in its illustration of the fantastic whimwams of degeneracy, as to challenge credulity. According to the bizarre recital, one of the best known of the younger physicians of this city is engaged in conducting a school of vice such as only the morbid mind of a Poe could imagine. The queer tale involves, beside the physician, a princess of the small hours whose lures drew to shame and disgrace Lieutenant Jack Neale, the former dashing cavalry officer who is now wearing the stripes of a convict. The readers of the dailies may recall her for columns were devoted, after the exposure of Neale's defalcations, to the story of his downfall, which was attributed to reckless passion for Vivian Alcott, a beautiful blonde of the half world. The girl was in her teens then and save that, like most of her kind, she loved the inward blaze set by constant change of scene and admirers, she was not really bad when Neale met her. He spent thousands on her and went to prison. Then she met the physician. He lives at a leading hotel, is married to a woman of fortune and family, and is himself received in the most fashionable circles. He has or has had a large practice, and his fascinations of person and manner make him a favorite among women. If Vivian Alcott and others of her sort may be believed, this doctor finds his keenest pleasure in making drug slaves of them, and maintains a shrine for their initiation into the mysteries of the pipe.

His Tenderloin Den

Vivian Alcott is now in India. She crossed the Pacific to China on the steamship Nippon Maru, and after tarrying a few weeks in Hongkong left for Calcutta. She is a mere wreck from opium smoking. The beauty which drew Cavalryman Neale to ruin has been effaced by the fumes of the pipe, and she has become the consort of Asiatics—cursed by the craving for the exaltation of the poppy. And all through the Orient she is naming and damning the man who cast the spell that has enthralled her. She says that he has an apartment in the tenderloin here and that thither he invites young women and puts in their mouths the pipe which soon owns them. He derives the highest satisfaction from seeing them become victims of the witchery of the powerful drug. He smokes the pipe, too, but rather in a dilettante way, seeming to escape the thralldom which seizes others. It was here that the Alcott girl first got the taste for opium, and according to her story, in that same den dozens of others have been made fiends. It is incredible that the doctor should have escaped exposure so long, but I am informed that his relatives are aware of his degeneracy, and that he is threatened with a divorce suit.

The Superfluous Chaperon

When the engagement is announced of a society spinster and a gray-bearded bachelor, does conventionality then call for a chaperon to accompany the lady every time she goes to the theatre with her fiance? I ask the question because I have noticed that the society-gush writers of the dailies have frequently mentioned that a certain Miss Spinster who is engaged to a certain Mr. Graybeard was accompanied by her chaperon on occasions when she attended public performances. I inferred that she was a young thing and knowing her fiance I didn't blame her for having a chaperon. Ordinarily I should recommend a barbed-wire fence. But after seeing the betrothed of the middle-aged bachelor I wondered what pretext there could be for a chaperon. The lady is herself mature enough for the role of a chaperon. Is there no age-limit beyond which chaperons should be barred? Why should a lady in the remote thirties be chaperoned in the company of her fiance? These are questions that should suggest topics for discussion in club circles.

The Poet Returns

Joaquin Miller is back once more in his picturesque home across the bay. He has been away from that home quite awhile, and during his travels in the East and the South was lionized a great deal. Though Miller is a poseur, and sniffs greedily the fumes of incense burned at his pedestal, he was not always thus. It was not until he discovered that it paid to be a freak and to court adulation that he started out to bask in the limelight, but he is never so happy as when in the shade of his own roof-tree, inhaling the fragrance of his luxuriant garden, far from the lion-hunters. The poet, by the way, has been passionately fond of flowers from early manhood, and years ago he told me that at one time it was his early ambition to build up a little home and make a moderate living by raising something in a garden, such as fruit and flowers, and also practicing law in a quiet way, for though it is not generally known Miller is a lawyer. In early days, after leaving the mountains of Northern California, he went into the goldfields of Idaho to practice law, but there was little doing in the law there, and he became an expressman for the miners, to ride to and fro from the nearest settlement, to carry their gold out and their letters in.

The Story of His Name

Later on when Miller settled in Oregon he began the practice of law in a small town, and he was elected county judge. He never cared for the title of "Judge," however, but preferred to be known as "Joaquin," though that is not his right name. And yet when it was bestowed on him he was very indignant. He acquired it shortly after taking up his pen for the first time. It was in the early days of this city when he wrote a public letter in defense of the Mexicans with whom he had been associated in the mountains. At that time the tradition prevailed that Joaquin Murietta, the fiercest outlaw this State has ever known, had not been killed as reported but was still in the mountains. When Miller's letter came out, a Sacramento paper, in a spirit of banter, stated that now it was certain that the outlaw was not only alive but had the audacity to write to the press in defense of himself and his fellow-robbers. Thereupon Miller was hailed by his friends as the great desperado, Joaquin.

takes her matrimonial duties very seriously and dresses in the most comme il faut Eastern style. She lives not far from the Allan Wallaces, and she and Mrs. Wallace, who were always great friends, have resumed the intimacy of their girlhood.

The Resignation of Newton

Since the resignation of the Rev. Heber Newton from the Memorial church at Palo Alto, the rumor is once more current that Mrs. Stanford is seriously thinking of seeking admission to the Catholic church. The rumor is given credence by many of Mrs. Stanford's acquaintances who have heard her express her views of theology, and who are of opinion that she has given the Catholic religion much study and is inclined to seek further enlightenment from one of the clergymen of the church with a view of becoming a communicant. A story to the effect that she contemplated joining the church was published in an Eastern paper about the time that Rev. Heber Newton announced that he had accepted a "call" from Stanford. And that announcement put the quietus on the rumor until the other day, when it became known that the ex-New Yorker had resigned on account of differences that had arisen.

Jordan's Restraining Hand

There is also a story in circulation to the effect that Mrs. Stanford would long since have become a convert to Catholicism were it not for the influence of David Starr Jordan, who fears that if she declared allegiance to the Church of Rome the effect on the Palo Alto university would be disastrous. However, though she is not a Catholic, she objected to certain utterances of the Rev. Heber Newton which excited the derision of clergymen of the Catholic church. Father Yorke took occasion to poke fun at Newton's theology, and at his efforts to harmonize all the jarring sects, it evidently being the opinion of the priest that the Palo Alto divine is a faker who affects Christian beliefs though in reality he is an agnostic, if not an atheist. Father Yorke scoffs at the suggestion that his attack on Newton was responsible for the latter's resignation, but many of Mrs. Stanford's friends believe that it was.

The Baptizing of Bushnell

While on this subject I am reminded that many people were surprised when it was announced that Fred Bushnell, the well known photographer who died a few days ago, would be buried from the Catholic church. It was learned that he had been baptized by a priest shortly before he died, and complaint was made by his relatives who thought that he had been unduly influenced. Upon inquiry it was learned that before the fatal operation was performed he sent to St. Mary's Cathedral for a priest. Father Dempsey responded, and Bushnell said he wished to become a Catholic. He was told that he should receive some instruction before entering the church, and as the physician did not expect any serious results to follow the operation the ceremony was postponed. Bushnell told the priest that he had contemplated becoming a Catholic ever since he visited the city of Rome some years ago. After the operation he again sent for Father Dempsey and as he was then in a critical condition the ceremony was performed.

There is only one way to look at the work we must do. That is to fall in love with the work, even if it is only for the time it lasts. This is the secret of success.

Blacked William's Eye

The promotion of General von Hahnke to the rank of Field Marshal has occasioned a deal of talk for the reason that his chief claim to distinction seems to be that his son was the hero of a sensational affair that occurred on board the Hohenzollern some years ago. The truth about the affair is known to very few, and it has never been published. Lieutenant von Hahnke was the guest of the Emperor. He was an ardent cyclist and practiced the sport on the deck of the Hohenzollern, although the Kaiser had forbidden it. One day as the yacht was lying off shore at Odde, William caught young Hahnke at his favorite pastime, and high words ensued. Both lost their temper, the lieutenant telling the Emperor that his own nobility was older than the Hohenzollern royalty. Blows ensued and the Emperor received a black eye. In the confusion the lieutenant made his way ashore, taking his wheel with him, and a few days later it was found smashed to pieces on the rocks high above the sea. The supposition was that the young man committed suicide, but the fact is that he made his way to this country, where he is alive and flourishing.

A Pioneer Wanted

There's a chance for some enterprising, impecunious swell to make some money in San Francisco. Mrs. Jacob Vanderbilt has paved the way in New York. Her tea-room, with its "smoker" attachment, seems to have filled a long-felt want. The woman's club-house, often talked of among women here, that will have a smoking-room as one of its conveniences, has never materialized. Smart women are shy on pioneering a custom, and prefer to indulge themselves in a quiet smoke at home. They fear the adverse comment of—not their enemies, but their friends. But let a woman of recognized social position start a tea-room a la Mrs. Jacob Vanderbilt, and it would soon become the fashion.

That Souvenir Program

That Easter card which found such a ready sale, with a poem by Grace Hibbard illustrated by Gordon Ross, has a history. When Mrs. Horace Hill gave her De Lussan musicale a few weeks ago, she desired something unique in the way of a souvenir program. In her home is a beautiful stained glass window with a design of fleur-de-lis. This she decided to have copied and used as the decoration for the program. Gordon Ross was employed to do the job, and he charged Mrs. Hill ninety-five dollars for his work. Later, he decided to utilize the design on an Easter card, which was done. But very few who bought the card knew that the fleur-de-lis was a copy of Mrs. Horace Hill's stained glass window.

The Story of a Story

The story of millionaire Baker's hospitality is so good that the Oakland Tribune published it twice in a single issue, a circumstance that constitutes a pretty good story in itself. The Tribune has two correspondents who draw inspiration from the same source. One is George Hatton, the prince of political impresarios, and the other is a local newspaper man who writes over the nom de plume of "Magruder." Both heard that Mr. Baker, a visiting millionaire from the East, met Charles Rollo Peters, the artist, at the Bohemian Club, and invited him to take a trip on a private car to the Yosemite. Peters accepted and on the return trip to this city Mr. Baker charged the artist his pro rata of the expense bill. Both Hatton and Magruder sent the story to the Tribune in their Saturday correspondence and each devoted half a column to it. It appeared on two pages. Hatton stated that the trip cost Peters thirty-six dollars and fifty cents, but "Magruder" reduced the amount to thirty dollars.

In Society Again

Mrs. Mary Curtis Richardson accepted an invitation the other day to meet Ella Wheeler Wilcox at a luncheon, and the hostess congratulated herself on wooing this clever artist into society again. For Mrs. Richardson very seldom appears at a formal function, though it is not for lack of invitations. She loves to work and when she gets a good subject she finds her labor all-absorbing. She is one of our most successful portrait painters. One of the best things she has yet done is her portrait of Monsieur Paget, the French professor. Some years ago she did some portraits of her nieces, the Curtis girls, that were very lifelike. Mrs. Denis O'Sullivan (Elizabeth Curtis) received a deal of encouragement from Mrs. Richardson when she, too, decided to take up portrait work. Both found kind words and countenance from their relative, Benoni Irwin, one of the most distinguished portrait painters in America. Mrs. Richardson used to live in Oakland, in a quaint house opposite the Pringle home. Her home for many years, however, has been in an even quainter house on the pinnacle of Russian Hill.

A Corpse as Bride

C. E. Lorrimer sends me the following story from Japan: "Since the panting, sighing days of 'Romeo and Juliet' there has been no such dreadful tragedy connected with the course of true love as one which recently occurred in Japan. The gruesome awfulness of it is calculated to send cold chills down the modern spine. Its effect is quite as 'creepy' as a ghost story by candlelight and no less strange and unreal, in these practical days, when love is as much out of fashion as sunbonnets. A certain lady, daughter of one Mr. Kintaro Sameda, of Takasu Mura in Kochi Prefecture, committed suicide by drowning herself on the very eve of the day on which she was to be married to a Mr. Taketomi of a neighboring village. She left neither explanations nor farewells and the poor young man was briefly told the news on the following morning. Half crazed with grief, he hastened to the deceased's home as soon as he received the message, and he wore the crested kimono and the rich silk petticoat which had been made expressly for the wedding ceremonies. The mournful reminder of the services which were to have taken place so touched the already grief-stricken parents that they besought the young man to go through the forms of marriage with their dead daughter. He willingly consented. Accordingly the little group assembled in the best room of the house, the wedding guests were bidden and this most extraordinary marriage began. The bride's father poured the sacred rice, or rice wine, the drinking of which constitutes the rite, into the red lacquer bowls, and, amid tears and lamentations, the groom exchanged cups with the corpse. It is said that a sadder wedding has never taken place in Japan, the sweet marriage chant of 'Calm Sea and Evergreen Pine' sounding like a funeral dirge."

Miss Bessie Cole and Dick Rountree having attended the latest society weddings in each other's company, the tabbies will have it that they are taking notes for a similar affair in which they will be the leading performers. Miss Cole is the elder sister of Mrs. Martin Crimmins and is a pretty blonde of refined feature. She was the intimate friend of Mary Bell Gwin before the latter's marriage with Mr. Follis.

The Gunn-Woods Wedding

Generally the sexton at St. Luke's performs his duties as Cerberus with argos-eyed vigilance when officiating at smart weddings. But at the marriage of Kate Gunn and Charles M. Woods, on Tuesday night, he relaxed his vigilance on the side door, with a sad result. There was a scene decidedly not in the bill when forty or so of the uninvited, and in decidedly ungala-like attire, burst into the church. Poor Cerberus could do nothing at that late moment; it was close on to eight-thirty. There was another happening at the wedding which was not on the program. It was when the lights went out. The ceremony was about two-thirds over, and the central chandelier alone shed light on the scene. The ceremony proceeded but it was not until after the wedding party and most of the guests had left the church that the lights went up again. It was a pretty wedding despite the semi-darkness, and the wedding procession with the maids carrying enormous bouquets was quite picturesque. Miss Lacey, the maid of honor, was stunning in pink, and the bride looked even prettier than usual in her white costume. One of the bridesmaids, Miss Bruce, is to be a bride herself on April thirtieth, when she marries the Rev. Macon.

The Hamilton-McEnerney Marriage

The marriage of Garrett W. McEnerney and Genevieve Green Hamilton last Tuesday was refreshingly free from formality and ostentation, but it was a most impressive ceremony, performed as it was by Archbishop Riordan in the solemn manner characteristic of the rites of the Catholic church. The Sacred Heart church, which was the scene of the marriage, was thronged with the friends of the bride and groom, and they included many of the most prominent people in the city. Representatives of the legal and journalistic professions predominated, and there was also a sprinkling of society people. There was no wedding feast after the ceremony; the newly married couple leaving almost immediately on a trip to Oregon, where the honeymoon will be spent.

Oakland's Scandal

Oakland gossips are again busy with the domestic affairs of Dr. Crowley. As usual Mrs. Crowley is responsible for the stimulus given to the tongues that are wagging. In a fit of tantrums she blew the lid off an unsavory mess. Dr. Crowley is one of Oakland's most prominent physicians. Mrs. Crowley is a lady with a past. She was formerly the wife of Hugo Mansfeldt, the musician, and before that she was the handsome and vain Alma Moore, remotely connected, she was always pleased to say, with the family of Jefferson Davis. The original Crowleys and Mansfeldts were chummy neighbors until the wives caught the divorce fever. Later on Dr. Crowley married the former Mrs. Mansfeldt. In time the wife grew jealous of her husband's patients and then there was a divorce, followed by the remarriage of the pair. From the recent horsewhipping episode it is evident that Mrs. Crowley has not subdued the spirit of jealousy. She says that she wished to preserve her husband's purity. How good of her! It is a remarkable thing about Oakland that some of the gayest and friskiest wives over there are forever safeguarding their husbands against the wiles of the sex.

Mrs. Gus Spreckels and Miss Lurline Spreckels will leave New York for Paris next week.

Divorced—Next?

Now that Mrs. Louise La Montagne has returned to single blessedness her friends are wondering how long it will be before they are invited to another swell wedding. They say that she is too brilliant a woman to protract her grass-widowhood, and they hint that there is already a suitor in the field, a well known clubman of New York. I believe that Mrs. La Montagne's mother, Mrs. John F. Darling, who passed through grass-widowhood herself. expects her daughter to take unto herself a second husband in the near future. Mrs. Darling is an up-to-date woman in every respect, and she derives a great deal of amusement from contemplation of the comedie humaine, and the social strivings of the new rich for whom she has an exalted contempt.

Too Many Climbers

Mrs. Darling's long absence from this city is said to be due to the fact that she is disgusted with local society, so tolerant has it become of the climbers. Many years ago Mrs. Darling dominated the smart set of this city. She had just come from a tour of Europe during which she was presented at Queen Victoria's court. Her father's wealth and her dashing style and brilliant wit attracted a large following, and she was a leader in many important social events. At one time she was engaged to Dr. Bowie's eldest son, A. J. Bowie Jr., but they did not long agree. Miss Clara married an old love in Colonel Catherwood, an ex-Army officer, and Mr. Bowie married Miss Friedlander. In the course of time Mrs. Catherwood went abroad to have her children educated, returning when they were grown and "out" in society. One daughter married Ernest La Montagne, from whom she was divorced the other day, and another is the wife of Dr. Edward Keyes of New York. After a separation from Colonel Catherwood Mrs. Catherwood married Major John A. Darling, U. S. A., now retired.

She Snubbed the General

Mrs. Darling is a born leader and even during her residence at the Presidio she dominated social circles in the army. She became known as the "mother of the regiment" and she took occasion to snub General Graham, a martinet who was in command of the post. On the occasion of an entertainment given at the Presidio by Mrs. Darling, General Graham ordered the band to leave the scene of the festivity, and later on the indignant hostess exercised her "pull" in Washington in a way that made General Graham regret that he had ever been ungallant to the "mother of the regiment."

Where the Line Should be Drawn

It was also during the residence of this proud dame at the Presidio that she took occasion to express certain views about corrupting military society which had the effect of putting Cupid into mourning, grieving a popular young heiress and spoiling the chances of a handsome young officer with more red corpuscles than yellow gold. Mrs. Darling remarked that she did not mind young officers of good family putting their army titles on the market, but she thought that out of respect for the ladies of the Presidio who would be put to the painful alternative of either snubbing or accepting the vulgar rich, they should draw the line at pork, sugar and whisky. The remark was repeated and the engagement was broken.

The Papyrus Club's Show

Judging from the Papyrus Club's "classical vaudeville" on Monday night, the members of that organization are not going to elevate the stage, except perhaps in a social way. From an artistic standpoint the performance was not a great success, though it was by no means bad. The length of the entr'actes wore out everybody's patience. There was a large audience and many beautiful gowns, chiefly white, were worn. The ladies taking part in the program were also elegantly frocked. Mrs. W. P. Buckingham, in the scene from "The Winter's Tale," wore a yellow gown that was a dream. The minuet, too, brought out some picturesque Colonial costumes. It was a graceful dance, though the men, in white satin knickers, were cautious in bending through fear of dire consequences. Miss Jean Logan gave a Japanese dance, with limelight effects, that was original and fascinating, and later on she danced in another of her unique creations, "La Boheme," in which her costume was of flame-red relieved with black. The one-act farce, "Bunkoed," written by W. H. Clifford, had its premier on this occasion. It served to show Lieutenant Harry Howland in a new role, but his success was not great. "He is too pretty to act well," was a comment overheard apropos the Lieutenant's histrionic effort. Mrs. A. R. Kerwin, wife of Captain Kerwin, was the star of the farce. She was really witching and chic as Teressa, the model. Her costume, of green velvet and tulle, with a big picture hat covered with pink roses, was Parisian from brim to hem.

Its Methods Ineffective

The Papyrus Club was organized to develop a sense of humor among its members, and I am convinced that a sense of humor is what they most need. Last week I wrote a brief paragraph about a story told at a meeting of the club which I said almost provoked a riot, or words to that effect. Bright and early Monday I was visited by a very mild-mannered, polite and serious woman who said she had been told about the paragraph. She wanted to see it because she had heard that it contained something shocking. It was shown to her, and she really appeared very much shocked. She wanted to know who wrote it and what member of the club had given the information. She said she had attended every meeting and was quite sure that nobody's feelings had ever been hurt by a story. She also stated that she would like a retraction because the paragraph tended to make the club ridiculous. It is evident that the club's methods are not effective for here is a woman who has attended every meeting and yet her sense of humor has not developed beyond the embryonic stage.

Mrs. Gerberding's Achievement

Mrs. Gerberding's play, "The Euchre Prize," which was presented by the Spinners' Club at Century hall last Monday evening attracted one of the most fashionable audiences that have ever assembled there. The play was bright, the situations original, the lines clever and the foibles of feminine card players deftly and amusingly satirized. Ella Bender and Dr. Shiels, probably the best amateur players in society, made the best of their parts, while Mrs. Mark Gerstle showed unexpected dramatic force as the social adventuress. I should like to see Mrs. Gerstle in a more ambitious role. I imagine that she would give "Magda" a very interesting interpretation. After the performance Mrs. Gerberding, an imposing figure in black velvet, was overwhelmed with congratulations. Among those present were Mrs. Salisbury, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Bates, the Misses Spreckels and Elsie Sperry.

The Spinners' Club is an organization whose brilliancy is equaled only by its exclusiveness. You cannot dream of entering its sacred membership unless you have done something—or somebody (preferably an editor). The Spinners consider Mrs. Gerberding one of their star members, which she is. Her work as a dramatist has lately attracted favorable attention from high theatrical powers. She has an order for one three-act drama from an actor of stellar fame, though not of the Syndicate. She has also the plots for two more dramas and it is that she may work on these without interruption that she is going abroad. She would have left for Italy last winter had it not been for her son's wedding coming off in the spring, and then Mrs. Ernest Peixotto's illness made another detention. The Peixottos and Mrs. Gerberding had planned to go to Europe in one party.

To Propagate the Species

San Francisco is to have a novel school. Indeed it will be a school so novel that it will be hard to go about the advertising of it in print, and yet withal it is to be quite a swell affair. Mrs. E. G. Sparks is the founder of it, and she carries about with her the sanction of Ella Wheeler Wilcox, herself. It will be called "The Foundation of Life School," and will be instituted on the lines laid down by the writings of Mrs. Wilcox. The social world will be invaded and society will be told of its great crime. The young matrons who figure in the Sunday supplements as the leaders of cotillions and the instigators of divorces will be urged to take up the duties of the home and stimulate the perambulator trade. Young couples especially will be appealed to and taught. The fee is not stipulated in the bond. Mrs. Sparks will make a personal call upon all those she feels are neglecting to perpetuate the race, and after reviewing the teachings of Mrs. Wilcox, will enjoin them to attend her school.

Christened by Ella

Much stress is laid by the lady upon the enthusiasm of the poetess. "I called upon Mrs. Wilcox at her hotel," she explained. "I sent up my card along with hundreds of others who were very desirous of seeing this talented woman, but I was the only one granted an audience. When I came into her apartments I found her ill. She was in bed, yet she urged me to unfold my plan. I told her that I intended to found a school that should give an equal chance for the struggle of existence to the poor infants brought into the world by ignorant parents, and that our theme should be a constant tirade against the crime of society.

" 'What are you going to call this school?' Mrs. Wilcox asked me.

" 'That,' I said, 'I shall leave to you.' She could not think of a name during the whole time I talked with her, but just as I was going—just as I had my hand on the knob of the door, she suddenly sprang up in bed (she wears lovely robes) and cried out: 'I have it, I have it! It has just come to me; it is an inspiration! Call it " " "The Foundation of Life School" " " " '

"So that is what I shall call it, in honor of this great lady who helps so many people on the road to happiness through the columns of the daily papers."

Preaching but Not Practicing

Singular as it may seem, neither of these estimable ladies who are intent upon teaching the perpetuation of the race and the elevation of the species has any children of her own. Whether they intend to give practical demonstrations or merely to dwell upon the medical discussions in the abstract is not known, but it is safe to say that, give them three apiece to start with, and Mrs. Wilcox would do no writing nor would Mrs. Sparks teach school. It is the most delightful theme in the world, this talking about babies (and that is the extent of Mrs. Sparks' and Mrs.

Wilcox's progress) but when the average mother has bathed her three precious dears, and laved the linen, and fed and rocked the youngest one to sleep, it is safe to say that you had better not talk Ella Wheeler Wilcox to her—at least not for an hour or two. Give her a rest and she may listen patiently awhile without scratching you; but talk gently to her, for the chances are her back aches. Mrs. Sparks will make her biggest killing with the women in her own condition. She may grow poetic with some poor wretch who has never felt the claws of baby fingers, but if she goes fooling around any woman who is already well launched in the kindergarten trade she is likely to get hurt.

When Ella Met Mrs. "Pat"

By the way, that meeting between Ella Wheeler Wilcox and Mrs. Pat Campbell was much funnier than the newspaper represented. The actress is a woman of nimble wit, and she abhors the patronizing airs of the pretentious. Being a cultured woman she rates Mrs. Wilcox at her true value, and she resented the latter's intrusion because it was evident that the puerile poetess of fashion visited her in a a spirit of condescension. Now an actress who has been steadfast in her refusal to do drawing-room stunts for hire even in the palaces of our most puissant plutocrats isn't likely to flush with pleasure over the ostentatious magnanimity of an Ella Wilcox. Hence it was that Mrs. "Pat" accorded Mrs. Wilcox the same freezing reception that Mrs. Cortelyou received at the hands of Paula Tanqueray.

"Surely you have read my book," exclaimed Mrs. Wilcox after several efforts to explain what a famous woman she really was.

"No, I must confess I never read your book," said Mrs. Pat, "but I shall make amends. I shall be delighted to buy your book."

Then turning to her maid she said, "Jeannette, go right out and buy Mrs. Wilcox's book."

"My book!" exclaimed Mrs. Wilcox, "why, I've written nineteen books."

"Jeannette," said Mrs. Pat, with the air of one who had money enough to buy a whole library, "go out and buy Mrs. Wilcox's nineteen books."

The Secret of Her Greatness

With something akin to mock graciousness Mrs. Campbell requested Mrs. Wilcox to proceed. It was as though she believed her visitor had something very important to impart. And during all the time they were together the newspaper woman talked incessantly of herself. Finally the actress became so bored that she interrupted the flow of perpendicular pronouns. In her sweetest tones she said:

"You're quite vain, aren't you, Mrs. Wilcox?"

"Vain!" was the reply, "my vanity is the secret of my greatness."

His Affections Alienated

News comes to me from Solano of a divorce suit instituted in that county by the wife of a surety company magnate whose office is in one of the local sky-scrapers. The plaintiff, it is said, has no desire to be divorced, but is suing for a decree because she was coerced into assuming the role of plaintiff. It is the old familiar story of the heartless husband whose affections have been alienated, and who has resolved to shake off the matrimonial shackles and give rein to his passion for the latest object of his fancy. The conquest of his heart is said to have been made by a pretty typist employed in his office.

That Hayward Hat

All things come to him who waits—even style. There's Mr. Alvinza Hayward, for instance, the millionaire of the antique garb, who has been wearing a plug hat of the vintage of 1820 for nearly half a century. It is so old-fashioned that it looks like an heirloom, but it has at length come into fashion again. Out from New York came William R. Hearst, the other day, and he donned his long suit to appear at a wedding. On that occasion he wore a silk hat which is an exact replica of the flat-brimmed affair that has so long distinguished Hayward from all other mortals. Mr. Hearst is a well-groomed young man, and he would not wear a hat that was not strictly up to date.

The Plutocrat's Vulgar Show

That Miss Nielson that was is now a Vanderbilt is no news; it is notorious. If ever any woman was married, it is she. If by this time all the world is not aware of the fact, the fault is not to be laid at the door of the friends and families of "the high contracting parties." Abroad we have the unenviable repute of being a nouveau riche nation; of being socially impossible because of a national vice of vulgarity; of having no "artistic reserve" in the use of gold. As a matter of fact, we are not greater money-lovers than other nations, but we are better money-makers. It is our naivete, our lack of gumption, rather than our greed, that makes us the laughing-stock of the old-poor nations that receive our daughters and our dollars with the very best grace. However, to see this requires a spiritual insight such as belongs not to our Brother Bull. To have a bad reputation is for most men to lead a hang-dog's life; to deserve it is to lead a devil's. The American millionaire who makes a pow-wow of a sacrament is not a friend of the Republic.

Are They Fit for Corsica?

Whenever I read in the newspapers of the marriages of the ridiculously rich, I am minded of Guy de Maupassant's great short-story, "Happiness," and fall to wondering if the heroine of the space-writer's "story" could make of some dreary, beautiless Corsica a happy isle, or, as Carlyle would have it, an island of the blest. For it is not true that "even love is sold." For once Shelley was mistaken. It is not love, but a cheap substitute, a meretricious imitation, that is sold. Much nearer the truth, if not the very soul of truth itself, is the dictum of a lesser poet, that "Gold and iron are good To buy iron and gold." If there is any one thing that emerges in significant clearness from the shadow that veils the face of Fact, it is this, that happiness is not to be had at so much the heart-ful. That delicate thing, bred in a divine atmosphere, is sickened by the noxious smell of gold. Unless Reginald Vanderbilt and his bride are intrinsically fit for fifty years of solitude in bare, bloomless Corsica, with no millions of millions may they buy of Fate one jot or tittle of "the joy of living."

That Obvious Farce

Unfortunately for the young people, nothing could be less prophetic of future happiness than the setting out upon the joint journey under the auspices of that Prince of Vulgarians, Parade. (The "wild ride" back of the thoroughbreds to escape observation was the most obvious, the most inartistic of farces.) Poverty itself were better patronage, better company to keep. Indeed, lovers whose fine instincts prompt them to draw down decent window-shades need not fear the wings of Love when the fateful footsteps of Poverty are heard without the proverbial cottage door. But fulsomeness of all kinds will Love fly; with that and the like the god will not house. If the police present at that fashionable function at Arleigh had done their duty, they had prevented the indecent exposure. As it was, ostentation could no further go. For days, private people have read the papers shamefacedly, for fear of coming upon the "scoop" of a pestilential reporter present by invitation in the thalamos.

The Bride's Pedigree

"Reggie" Vanderbilt, the bridegroom of this latest vulgarly spectacular marriage, is the young man whose failure to graduate with his class from college was deemed of sufficient importance as an item of news to be wired all over the country. Later on we were told of his escapades in gambling houses, and of the efforts of the District Attorney of New York to summons him before the Grand Jury when the Canfield case was under investigation. "Reggie" is a fast youth and he has cut a very wide swath in tenderloin circles. From the reports in the dailies one would imagine that it was an act of phenomenal condescension on the part of a Vanderbilt to take for a wife a daughter of the house of Neilson. The fact is that the Neilsons have long held an excellent social position in New York. The bride's mother was Miss Belle Gebhard, sister of "Freddy" Gebhard of Langtry fame. Belle Gebhard was a daughter of a veteran New York merchant and a Miss Davies whose parents were born in Cork county, Ireland. Miss Gebhard married Frederick Neilson, the scion of an old Philadelphia family. He was one of the most dashing men in society. The Nielsons were separated in the eighties but as Mrs. Nielson was a strict Catholic there was no divorce.

Birdie's Muriel Was There

The papers have had it that all is not smooth between Cathleen Nielson and Birdie Vanderbilt. The announced departure of the W. K. Vanderbilts before the wedding has been taken as an index of the thermometer. But the prophets are evidently wrong as to relations between the two women, for an old friend of "Birdie's" in this city has received a picture of Muriel, the little daughter of the "W. K.'s Jr.," dressed in the dainty frock she wore as a flower maiden at "dear Miss Nielson's" wedding. Little Miss Muriel is a tiny dot of a girl and if a photograph is evidence, looks very much like her Aunt Tessie. She had as a floral partner at the wedding little "Chiffon" Kemp, who is a niece of the bride. By the way it is now the mode to fasten on youngsters names that hitherto were reserved for pet canines. "Chiffon" is going it mild, for there are several blue-blooded youngsters, I hear, who answer to names like "Nifty" and "Razzles."

To Avoid Temptation

Speaker Henderson is rusticating with his wife at Long Beach, near Los Angeles, and his son Don Henderson is at San Pedro, a few miles away. The latter came to the coast in a private car, two years ago, and for a year and a half he has worked as a laborer in a lumber mill at two and a half dollars per day. Recently he was promoted to the position of bookkeeper. Henderson is a fast young man, and it was for the purpose of avoiding temptation that he located in San Pedro and proceeded to develop a laboring man's appetite. San Pedro is a slow town, and occasionally Henderson found it deadly dull. On such occasions he broke loose but of late he has been on his good behavior. A correspondent informs me that he has been under the watchful eye of Congressman McLachlan, and that it is reported that his father may secure him a position on the Civil Service Commission of Los Angeles.

Whisky and Religion

George G. Brown, the Kentucky distiller who arrived at the Palace this week from Southern California, stirred up quite a rumpus among the temperance forces while in Los Angeles. He has the distinction of being a pillar of the Presbyterian church as well as a distiller, and he has published several articles in the Arena and other magazines, arguing that a man can be a Christian and manufacture whisky at the same time. He has quoted Scripture to show that liquor if not abused is a blessing instead of a curse. In an interview in Los Angeles he not only expressed those views but went further and asserted that prohibition is infidelity and not sanctioned by God. All of which called forth a fusillade from the temperance leaders. The two veterans, Dr. E. S. Chapman, of the Anti-Saloon League, and Francis Murphy, led the opposition. Dr. Chapman asserted that he did not think the church was very proud of a member who was manufacturing the "poisonous drug." Mr. Brown replied and the battle raged for awhile.

The Man for the Job

The story of how John J. Boyce secured the appointment to the position of United States District Attorney at Juneau, Alaska, has just leaked out in Los Angeles, writes a correspondent. Senator Bard was Boyce's sponsor, but shortly after his name was sent to the President, the anvil brigade in Southern California began to show signs of activity. The leading hammer wielder was a man named Parsons, a resident of Santa Barbara. Parsons protested vigorously against the appointment and Senator Bard wired out to Boyce for an explanation of the opposition. Boyce wired in reply that some fifteen years ago Parsons called him a liar in open court during the trial of a case, and that he licked his man on the spot. When Bard repeated the story to Mr. Roosevelt, the President beamed approvingly. "By Jove," he exclaimed, "Boyce is a man after my own heart. He's just the man we want in a tough place like Juneau." The next day Boyce was appointed.

Old Families United

The wedding of Miss Ruth Childs with Alpheus Redman which took place in Los Angeles last Tuesday unites two of the oldest families in the State. It took place at the old cathedral in Main street and all of the elite were there; that is, the most exclusive set, for in spite of the bohemian tendencies of Mr. and Mrs. "Willie" Childs, the rest of the family hold themselves aloof from the ordinary mortals. It was the home of the mother of the bride of last week that H. E. Huntington purchased for his home, but the family has never taken possession because Mrs. Huntington does not like Los Angeles.

A Lunch Club for Women

Some of the prominent women of Los Angeles, driven to desperation by the impossible restaurants of the town, are going to start a lunch club. It is bound to be a success for the leaders are Mrs. J. H. Johnson, the wife of Bishop Johnson; Mrs. Roy Jones, Mrs. H. T. Lee, Mrs. S. C. Hubbell, Mrs. Gilbert E. Overton and others equally prominent. The club will be a place where weary shoppers and callers can drop in for a little rest, a cup of tea or something stronger, and the inevitable bit of gossip.

The Strenuous Lillian

Lillian Burkhart, the actress, leads a life so strenuous that she almost out-Roosevelts President Teddy himself. She is always kept more than busy in Los Angeles, where she is probably more of a favorite among the members of the swell set than any other place in the country, although she seems to capture the people wherever she goes. Last Sunday morning at ten-thirty she attended the Passover services at B'nai B'rith synagogue, after which she was guest of honor at a luncheon. Then followed the afternoon matinee from which she went to Kaspare Cohn's to dinner. At the close of the evening performance she was a guest at the home of R. H. Hay Chapman, whose Sunday evening informal musicales, while not heralded in the daily press, are delightful affairs at which are heard some of the best local as well as visiting talent.

His Sixtieth Birthday

"Honest Frank" Walker was the host at a pleasant little function the other evening, at his home in Los Angeles. The affair had no political significance but was in honor of the sixtieth anniversary of Mr. Walker's birthday. There were present guests from Canada, Tacoma, Wash., and San Francisco. Mr. Walker is one of the richest men in Los Angeles but he is simple in his tastes and does not believe in ostentatious hospitality. When he entertains at his handsome home, corner of First and Flower streets, it is always a group of congenial friends that constitutes the company. Mr. Walker lived in Tombstone before he came to Los Angeles, and it was in Arizona that he laid the foundation of the fortune he now enjoys. He is a Canadian by birth, but all-Californian in feeling.

The Kakawak

The American cakewalk has invaded the drawing-rooms of Europe. Ragtime is popular not only in the music halls but also in private and fashionable homes. Nearly every letter that one receives from touring Americans abroad these days contains something about the spread of the cakewalk craze. Even stolid Germany is under the spell and all France is whistling ragtime. "Le Kakawak" is what the Parisians call the American dance, and those that can appreciate nothing that comes from foreign countries have rebelled. They declare that it is vulgar and in polite society there are many conservatives who protest most bitterly. "A bas le Kakawak" is the cry that they have set up, but in vain. The craze must run its course.

The World Is His Oyster

Arthur Brisbane, who originated the idea of the freak editorial and who writes most of the "heart to heart talk" articles for the Hearst papers, is an odd character in the newspaper world, aside from the circumstance that he draws a salary as large as that of the President. He spends it after the manner of his kind. After he knocks off work one of his favorite pastimes is to visit some select hostelry in New York and call for a bottle of some rare old vintage that a connoisseur would gloat over. He delights in the bouquets and fine flavors and prides himself on his delicate taste in detecting the fine qualities of these rare nectars. The wing of a chicken adds something to the cost of such reveries but Brisbane is usel to lunches of a kind that cost from fifteen to thirty dollars. He comes of a scholarly family. His father was an associate and colleague of Horace Greeley and Charles A. Dana in the old Tribune and American Encyclopedia in the middle part of the century. Besides being something of a scholar himself, a linguist and a connoisseur in the arts, he can put up his fists in a creditable manner. On one occasion he had a rather exciting scrap with Charley Mitchell and made a good showing. He can play billiards, read Dante, select wines and pick the winner in a horse race with equal felicity and judgment. He is not pretty to look at, though he has a pair of biceps that Apollo might admire. At one time, when he first went on the Journal, he had a great hobby for squandering his spare cash in polo. Later on he joined the young philosophers who were handling economic problems and gradually took up the work of putting them into editorial form. The world is his oyster and no subject is too big or too little for him to tackle. If you don't believe it, read his last editorial. Like many another "find," Hearst found him in Pulitzer's employ and lured him away with a bigger salary.

dine sumptuously. It is easy to make a front in a swell house, providing you don't spend too much money for grub. I took charge of the dining-room as soon as the house opened, and many of the swellest people in town became its patrons. There were carriages standing outside all day long. But the guests had no money to spend on their stomachs. Their spare cash went for clothes and for room rent. I served dishes fit for a Savarin but they were untasted. The guests came into the dining-room arrayed magnificently, but they ate sparingly. It seemed as though the most of them were banting. There wasn't any money in it for me so I retired."

An Inheritance from Mother

Young Algernon Sartoris comes rightly by his waywardness, and not solely from the paternal side of the family, either. Gail Hamilton, in her "Letters," tells how Nellie Grant, when a girl in her early teens, was sent to a fashionable school to be "finished off." But General Grant was so fearful that his darling would have a hard time with "naughty lessons" that he told her she need not stay if they asked too much of her. Next morning Nellie had a headache, and all the other ills followed. In a short time she went home and that ended her education so far as books and school were concerned.

Gossip of the Service

General Charles F. Humphrey is expected to arrive on the next transport from Manila. The General is well known here, for he was stationed at the Presidio in General McDowell's time. His military record is a fine one. A medal of honor was awarded him for distinguished gallantry in the action at Clearwater, Idaho in 1877, and his readiness to be in the forefront in times of need such as the Cuban campaign in 1898, the Chinese trouble, and later in the Philippines, indicates, better than any words, that he is a true soldier.

Several San Francisco favorites are included among the appointees on the Board of Officers, General Staff of the United States Army. These are Captain Sydney A. Cloman, Twenty-third Infantry, Captain Dennis E. Nolan, Thirtieth Infantry and Captain William G. Hahn, Artillery corps, all of whom have been popular here. Among others are Colonel John L. Chamberlain of the Inspector General's Department, Colonel Crosby P. Miller of the Quartermaster's Department and Major Sedgewick Pratt of the Artillery Corps.

One of the officers affected by the recent retirement of Major General Hughes is Major John A. Hull, lately Judge Advocate of this Department, who has been promoted to the rank of Lieutenant Colonel. Colonel Hull is now Judge Advocate of the Department of the Platte, stationed at Omaha, Nebraska.

When a few favored civilians received the other day this invitation,

"Lieutenant-Colonel and Mrs. Vogdes
Major and Mrs. Kneedler
Invite you to gather wild flowers
At Fort Rosecrans, California

Wednesday, April fifteenth, nineteen hundred and three"

they scarcely knew what to make of it. But it turned out to be a picnic, with a trip on the water to Fort Rosecrans.

Is it not a misuse of terms for the daily papers to refer to the "venerable" mother of Mrs. Charles Fair? Veneration seems scarcely the term to apply to one who would rake up an erring daughter's past for the sake of a few dollars.

Le Conte as Cicerone

Joe Le Conte, son of the beloved "Uncle Joe," has been asked to be guide, philosopher and friend to President Roosevelt on the Yosemite trip and has accepted the honor. No one knows and loves the valley better than Mr. Le Conte, and no one is more loved by the handful of Indians who still come down every summer to fish in the waters of the Yosemite. It has come to be an accepted fact that no white man can catch fish in the valley. Walter Hobart and Tom Driscoll went down there last summer to knock the bottom out of this theory but they only verified it. They bribed the Indians to take them to the fishing grounds but the red men evidently led them astray for never a trout could they hook. Even the fact that Roosevelt is the "Great White Father" would not conciliate the Indians into initiating him into the trout craft of the valley. But they will do anything for the son of "Uncle Joe," so the President will have a chance to prove that the fish do not entirely draw the color line.

The Rum Demon Victorious

The Commuters' Contention Club has been snowed under, and old Demon Rum is now rampant in San Rafael. Stormy Petrel Stevenson has met the enemy and defeat is his'n. All his tireless weeks of heart-to-heart campaigning on the seven-forty train came to naught. The fight which was started over the issue of high and low license ended in a struggle between the trades' people and the commuters. The merchants of the town objected to the autocratic manner in which the commuters undertook to seize the political machinery and run the government. They threw their support to the low license people except in such cases in which the character of the candidate was objectionable; then they put up one of their own choice. That was how David Duncan was elected trustee. It was said that R. Lee Duncan, who also ran for trustee, was put up bv the commuters to confuse the voters, rather crafty work for churchmen such as the Rev. Arthur Crosby and Deacon Stevenson to indulge in. However, the Good Government club suffered defeat, and all sorts of direful consequences are predicted by those who are on the qui vive for rebukes from Providence.

Among those stopping at Byron Hot Springs this week were W. F. Whittier, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Goodall, Mr. and Mrs. Heber N. Tilden, Dr. and Mrs. James H. Hatch.

A Birthday Breakfast

At the breakfast given by Raphael Weill last Sunday morning, to commemorate the eighty-sixth birthday of "Uncle" George Bromley, the guests were nearly all chosen from the older members of the club. It was a genial affair, not at all formal, with the exception that there were speeches of congratulation. Frank Deering acted as toastmaster. Poems were read by Peter Robertson and Lucius Harwood Foote. General Foote's is given here:

Brave Uncle George! for four score years,
  This gospel you have taught and sung,
That smiles are better far than tears,
  That happy hearts are always young.

How we recall the quirks and quips,
  Which woke to life the festal board;
What rare conceits escaped your lips,
  When loud the fun and frolic roared.

Your grave Ben Franklin face revealed
  A pained expression, when we laughed;
And not a smile your lips unsealed
  When forth you shot the feathered shaft.

In all the shining wit no sneers,
  No spleen or malice in the thought;
And thus, Old Boy, for four score years,
  You've lived the gospel that you taught.

Old things are best, we love them still,
  Pray call them chestnuts if you dare;
When Uncle George is on the bill,
  "Hells-bells" is in the startled air.

The organ grinds, and Gretchen sings
  "Eight bells have struck," "March on, March on,"
While loud the semiquaver rings
  From Raphael Weill and Doctor Swan.

March on, we follow where you lead,
  In calm content there is no strife;
And we accept your gracious creed,
  To laugh at all the ills of life.

"The Fitting Climax"

"AND NOW," said Noel Barton, author and playwright and the host of the dinner-party, "now that we have finally gotten around to the cigars, I want to tell you, gentlemen, my real object in asking you to accept of my hospitality tonight. I am, as you know, something of a literary man. I have written several stories and plays which the critics have received with favor, and have been the recipient of many compliments on the originality of my work. Now you fou rgentlemen whom I have brought together here this evening are not literary men; yet I think you will understand me when I tell you that my great ambition at present is to write a short story which will be so striking and powerful that it will grip the minds of the reading public with an iron hand and place me at one bound among the foremost short story writers of the day. I think you can help me, gentlemen, to achieve this end, and aside from the pleasure of your company, it was for that reason that I asked you here."

Barton paused, and knocking the ashes from his cigar, settled back more comfortably in his chair. His guests were silent.

"I suppose you are thinking, gentlemen, that I ought to ask my literary friends for suggestions rather than ask you who are not particularly interested in literature. The truth is, that, though I have several such friends, I do not like to ask them to give me ideas in their own line of business. You gentlemen are in other work and therefore will not feel that I am forcing you to give up, as one might say, 'trade secrets.' And now for the kernel of the matter.

"Gentlemen, the story which I wish to write is to be entitled 'The Fitting Climax.' The plot of it—if one may call it a plot—is this:

"Two young men, residents of San Francisco, go on a vacation trip among the foot-hills of the Sierra. There they become acquainted with a beautiful girl who knows almost nothing of the ways of the world. The younger of the two men falls in love with this wild flower of the hills, because of her beauty and sweet, simple nature. The other man also pays some attention to her at first, but later affects indifference. The girl therefore chooses the younger man, they are married and go to live in San Francisco. For several months they are very happy; then the husband begins to notice a change in his wife's manner towards him, which culminates finally in his finding the house empty one night when he comes home and his wife gone. Of course he went to his friend in his grief and perplexity, and his friend sympathized with him deeply, and to all appearances sincerely. But all search for the wife fails, and the husband at last comes to the conclusion that she must be dead."

Here Barton paused again, for one of his guests had evidenced uneasiness and now half rose from his chair.

"Keep your seat, Pearson, keep your seat. I know this is a damnably old plot, and I don't blame you for finding it wearisome to listen to. But just have patience for a few minutes longer and I will have done with that part of the matter. There is not much more to tell. One day the deserted husband receives a letter—and this part of the plot is very, very old also. The letter is from his wife, who is dying in an interior town, and it begs him to come to her before she dies. The husband—try one of those cigars in that other box, Pearson; and have patience, man, I'll be through in a few words more—the husband, as I was going to say, went to his wife at once. Then it was that he learned the truth about his friend. For that friend, gentlemen, had been the cause of the wife's desertion. Under cover of friendship he had blackened the husband's name and then made love to the wife. She had left home at his instigation and he promised to meet her in a few days' time. He did not meet her, however, but wrote to her that he had another fancy and that she must therefore go her own way. And she went the downward way."

Again Barton paused. Three of his guests lay far back in their chairs and sent smoke-wreaths curling upward. Pearson, however, leaned with his elbow on the table and his cheek resting on his hand. Barton looked at him just once, and then seemed to stifle a grim smile.

"And now, gentlemen, what I want you to help me with is the ending of the story—the climax. The husband, after he has buried his wife goes back to the city and meets her betrayer. Naturally, the husband desires to avenge his wife and himself; but in what way shall he do it? Willis, can't you suggest something?"

Willis took the cigar from his mouth and blew forth a cloud of smoke. "Well, I know what I'd do: I'd shoot the damned scoundrel as I would a dog."

"And you, Thomas?"

"Kill him, of course."

"And you, Walters?" Walters stirred uneasily. "Well, I'm not a very bloodthirsty man, but I guess that's about what I'd do with him, too."

Barton smiled. "That's the opinion of three of you. Now for the fourth man's views. Pearson, what do you think would be a good wind-up for the story?"

The man addressed seemed to be laboring under some intense emotion, and did not answer immediately. Then he appeared to recover himself. With a smile that was almost ghastly he looked into Barton's eyes. "Shoot him, I guess, Barton."

Barton picked out a fresh cigar and lit it.

"But, gentlemen," he said, "would shooting the man be a fitting climax? Remember that the plot is an old and hackneyed one, and the settlement of such matters with pistol-balls is even more hackneyed. You see, as the body of my story is not new, the end of it must contain the whole point. The end must therefore be original, striking, forceful. And yet, I suppose, the gun is what nine out of ten such injured husbands would use. I presume that is your idea, Willis?"

"Yes, that's my idea, Barton. I'm not, as you just remarked, a literary man; but I sometimes read stories, and I must confess that I like those best which are the most true to life—the most natural. It seems to me, therefore that the husband, when he meets his betrayer, should shoot him at once. If I were you, Barton, that's the way I would end it."

For a long minute Barton tapped the table with his fingers and seemed to meditate deeply. Then he roused himself and looked up with a clear face.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I had hoped that you would be able to suggest some novel mode of vengeance. Shooting, as I said, does not appeal to me as the fitting climax; but as you all seem to agree—and you are, as I happen to know, men who differ each from each in thought and temperament—as you all agree that shooting is best, I will give in to your judgment. Fill your glasses, gentlemen, and we will drink a health to the success of the story that is to make me famous—a health to 'The Fitting Climax.'"

Four men drank the toast standing, and none of them seemed to notice that the fifth man did not join them, but sat bent forward, gripping his chair and watching Barton with a white face. The toast drunk, the three guests reseated themselves at the table, but Barton remained on his feet. Setting the wine glass on the table, he stepped back a pace, drawing a pistol from his pocket as he did so. Then he raised his arm quickly.

"Gentlemen," said Barton, "you have kindly given me your advice, and I take pleasure in following it."

Then the pistol cracked sharply, and Pearson, just as he made a desperate leap from his chair, was shot squarely through the heart.

The Sensible Maid

The maid was young and the maid was fair,
And she loved a youth with golden hair;
The youth so loved, had dollars few,
Yet the maid cared not, for her love was true.

But the youth returned of love no whit,
No Cupid's arrow his cold heart hit;
With head held high, he uttered no word
To show he the maid's love plaint had heard.

The maid was young, but the maid was wise;
She took no carbolic to close her eyes;
Instead, she lived! this maid so fair,
She lived—to marry a millionaire!

THE DOG SHOW.

Interest in blooded canines has increased year by year in California, and the annual exhibition of the San Francisco Kennel Club is therefore looked forward to as one of the principal events of the year. The exhibition opening next Wednesday at the Mechanics' Pavilion will be one of the best ever held in this city. George Raper of Gomersal, Leeds, England, the premier bench show judge of the world, will judge all classes of dogs except cocker spaniels at the San Francisco show. He has a world-wide reputation as a judge and it is said that he was the model from which Richard Harding Davis drew his famous portrait of the bench show judge in that wonderful sketch of a dog's life, "The Bar Sinister." There will be exhibits in this bench show that have never been seen here before, and some of the old champions will also be on exhibition, trying for more cups and ribbons to add to their collection. George Turner has brought some of the prize dogs of Victoria, B. C., including some from Mrs. Bradley Dyne's kennels. Several of San Francisco's society women and clubmen will show their blooded canine pets. On the last two days of the show the Pacific Cat Club will exhibit the feline darlings of its members. There will be a fine showing of French bull terriers, cocker spaniels and St. Bernards at next week's bench show, and the other breeds will also be in large evidence. The officers of the San Francisco Kennel Club, which has done so much to keep alive interest here in dog-breeding, are: W. C. Ralston, president; John E. de Ruyter, vice-president, E. Courtney Ford, second vice-president, Charles K. Harley, secretary-treasurer, W. S. Kittle, director; bench show committee, W. C. Ralston, J. L. Cunningham and C. K. Harley.

A Picture

Gray the sky; the earth was gray;
Smoke from sacrificial altar,
Darkly heavy, trailed away.

Near the shrine a woman stood,
And, as incense to Ambition,
Burned the wealth of womanhood.

Desolate to heart and eye;
Not a trace of color trembled
'Neath the grayness of the sky.

* * * * * * * * *

Near the work the artist stood.
"What is this?" at last I ask her,
"Why portray such solemn mood?"

Stilling then an inward strife,
With dispassion born of patience,
"This," she answers, "is my life."

In my glance deep passion glows,
And upon the sacred altar
Quick I paint a scarlet rose.

* * * * * * * * *

Long the rose of scarlet lay
On the altar of Ambition,
Flushing red the sky of gray.

Tired, one day, and callous grown,
She, with brush annihilating,
Gave Ambition back its own.

But the cruel hand, 'tis said,
Hesitating in its firmness,
Left behind a blush of red.

Mabel Porter Pitts.

Fair Play

They met at the parting of the way. The woman loving, the man obdurate.

"This cannot go on any longer," the man said. "My reputation is at stake, as is yours. I can not afford to run further risks. When exposure comes—as I know it will come—my prospects will be ruined. I am, as you know, ambitious. Disappointment would be something I could never brook. Think of it as I do, Eleanor. We must never meet again. This must be our last good-bye. Believe me, it is best for you and best for me."

The woman looked at the topaz clouds a moment or two, then faced her lover with tear-dimmed eye and exclaimed softly:

"It must be then as you say. But it is very hard, Algernon. I—I have given up so much for you, and yet you are tossing me from you as lightly as you would your cigarette. Do you realize what your words mean to me?"

But there was no answer from the one who had sought this interview. It even seemed as if eternal silence had set its seal upon her lover's lips.

They met again at the parting of the way—this time also at the man's request. Two years had drifted on to join eternity, but the woman was still young and beautiful, the man comely as ever—or as comely as women chose to think him. In this instance, too, the man took the initiative.

"Eleanor," he said, "you were right about it. You were right. We cannot live without each other. I can't, I know. I have tried it. It was the work of an unthinking man—that plan of mine to leave you out of my reckoning. What has political triumph, the clamor of the multitude, meant to me? What has a moneyed success brought to my heart? Nothing. Eleanor, Eleanor, forget that I said it. Blot it out. Remember only that I love you, love you, love you!"

The man had fallen at the woman's feet and was awaiting her answer.

But he had not reckoned rightly. It was the woman now who was obdurate.

She was looking at the topaz clouds, too, this time, but her eyes were not tear-dimmed. Turning to her erstwhile lover, she said icily:

"We must never meet again, Algernon. And why should we meet anyhow? I can not warm your heart. You? You killed my love. You killed it two years ago this day. This must be"—said the woman, icily—"must be our last good-bye. Believe me, it is best for you and best for me."

At a Society Theatrical Show

When Society Amateurs Exhibit Their Talent for Sweet Charity.

THE AUDIENCE.

Miss A.: What bores amateur affairs are. I wonder they can get an audience together.

Miss B.: Oh, they have to come, you know, so they will be mentioned as "among those present."

Miss A.: I think the old way was much better—when the papers just took the Blue Book, and ran all the names.

Miss B.: Even the dead ones!

Miss C.: I wonder Scribbly Millions tries to write farces. The only decent book he can make is at the races.

Miss D.: And I wonder Mrs. Fashion tries to act.

Miss C.: She does it much better off the stage.

Miss D.: Yes, I understand she fools her husband to the top notch.

Polly Scribe (who does Society for the Daily Spread): I suppose I must say that the actors were all clever and the farce a gem.

Jim Carper (who does space writing for the weeklies): I shall satirize the whole affair.

(Some of the actors come among the audience, soliciting opinions on their performance.)

Miss A.: Oh, Mrs. Fashion, you are a second Mrs. Pat.

Miss B.: And you looked beautiful in that pink.

Miss D.: I didn't know you had so much comedy talent, Major Silly.

Miss F.: And how sweetly you did the love scene.

(After the actors return to the green room):

Miss A.: Such a fool—trying to act at her age.

Miss B.: That pink makes her look like a lobster.

Miss C.: Wasn't the Major a stick in the love scene?

Miss D.: I thought she was altogether too gay for a married woman. I'm sure it was a real kiss she gave him.

Miss G.: But he didn't return it—I saw his fiancee glaring from the wings.

(When it is all over):

Miss A.: Thank goodness, it's the end. Catch me coming to another of these shows again. I'd rather attend a funeral. There one at least gets something for one's money.

Miss B.: You might call it that—when you send flowers.

Miss C.: Here we pay to listen to bores, and reward them with flowers.

Miss D.: Let's go and get a highball and forget all about it. — The Josher.

The Bargain Counter Habit

The first day of the drug-store war there was a line of people in one store extending from sidewalk to counter, that suggested a sale of grand opera tickets. One young woman, the picture of health, stood for about an hour and to while away the weary wait engaged in conversation with her neighbors.

"Did you ever take ——?" she questioned, mentioning a widely advertised medicine that was among the druggist's "marked down."

"Oh, yes, it's a very good thing," answered the other, "what is your ailment?"

"Oh, I'm not at all sick," said the blooming girl, "but I thought I'd try it—such an opportunity when you can get a dollar bottle for twenty cents." —The Clerk.

The public will be delighted to hear that the management of Fischer's has acquiesced to the constant demands of the patrons of the house and will put on "Fiddle Dee Dee" for a run to follow "Helter Skelter." The production will excel anything of the kind ever put on at Fischer's and many new features will be added to the original production. The chorus, orchestra and cast will be doubled in size and all the scenery, costumes and paraphernalia will be made new from first to last.

When Nance O'Neil played in Salt Lake City last week an organ recital was given in her honor at the great Mormon Tabernacle. Miss O'Neil is an immense favorite in the Mormon capital and her engagement there was an ovation from start to finish. She is in Denver now.

STAGE

Mrs. "Pat's" Paula

After all is said and done I quite agree with Mrs. "Pat" Campbell herself. Some may prefer her Paula, and others her Magda, and yet some there may be who enthuse over her Aunt Jeannie with that protracted kiss which, if a stop-watch is to be relied on, lasts exactly twenty-eight seconds, but I think that the personal charm and exquisite art of her Beata are unsurpassed in anything else that she does. Her Beata enthralled by its very simplicity and truthfulness many an old stager who had not batted his eye in a theatre in many a long night, but at no time in "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" does she exert that spell which enchants in "The Joy of Living." So delicate is her art, so convincing is the weird voice, deep, sensitive and sympathetic, that it gives to the lines of Paula an expression that makes many a hardened old sinner pay tribute with a tear. But while her characterization does not lack effectiveness, it has not that distinctness, that evidence of thoughtful analysis that so impressed her audience of last week and held them spellbound. But the weakness is in the character, not in the actress. Paula is not an unusual woman; Beata is. Pinero's Paula is a woman that must always arouse deep sympathy, for you cannot resist the thought that she is getting much the worst of it. But there have been many Paulas. In this role Mrs. Campbell sets the task, apparently, of arousing sympathy, and therefore she refrains at all times from accentuating the viciousness of her past. She loves her husband and wishes to make him happy. Mrs. Campbell impresses you with the thought that Paula was not altogether lacking in refinement; that with a little encouragement she would not have been an unfit associate even for Ellean. But Aubrey Tanqueray was not the man to give her that encouragement. The fact is that Aubrey Tanqueray is a cad. None but a cad would have discussed his wife's past and her present shortcomings with a friend in his own house. None but a cad would have humiliated his wife in the presence of a woman who had snubbed her. Therefore your sympathies are with the wife rather than with the husband, and this would not be so were Paula an apparently vicious woman, lost to all sense of decency. So far as choice of material is concerned I should be more inclined to object to the husband in "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" than to the better half of Beata in "The Joy of Living." However, the choice of material is the playwright's own business; the task for him to accomplish is to mould the material in such shape as to make it plausible. The cunning Pinero always does that. He is perhaps more technically ingenious than any other English-speaking playwright. And nowhere is his superior craft, his finesse and thumb-touch delicacy more striking than in "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray." As usual Mrs. Campbell looked alluringly lovely this week in a succession of exquisite gowns.

At the California

The rural drama has more patrons than any other kind of theatrical show. This is because the rural drama is regarded as a "clean" play, suitable for grandparents and children. They can see it without having their moral sense shocked. And so people who would not be seen inside of a theatre ordinarily will buy seats days in advance for a drama like "Our New Minister." There is plenty of good stuff in this new Ryers-Thompson play. There is humor, good American humor, and there is a proper amount of balancing pathos. The plot shows how a humane minister snucceeded in boosting a repentant convict into public confidence, and is a lesson to pharisaic Christians. The company portraying the characters in this charming picture of rural life is an admirable one. John Ferris as the minister, Charles Stedman as the convict, John Brown, the New York boy, and Henry Scott as the postmaster are particularly good.

Actor, Artist and Hypnotist

While going the rounds of the local Quartier Latin the other day Mr. Emmet Corrigan, the actor, let slip the fact that he was an ex-member of the brotherhood. He commented on the difference between our art world and the Parisian Quarter immortalized by Du Maurier and Murger in a manner that marked him as something more than a dilettante. "But I never could draw for sour grapes," confessed Mr. Corrigan. "I just hung around because I liked the life. I saved a crowd of real artists from being thrown out into the cold world once, though. The concierge demanded the rent. None of us had a sou. The man was one of those weak-minded fellows that are such easy subjects for hypnotists. I am a sort of one, you know. Well, I caught his eye and held it and in a little while I had him, and I made him sign a receipt for three months' rent. That is the only time I put my little hypnotic powers to any very practical use."

The Son of His Father

Chris Bruno and Mabel Russel are easily the stars of the very interesting performance at the Orpheum this week. Chris is the son of Gus Bruno of Reed and Emerson fame, and as a laugh-provoker proves himself to be a worthy offspring. Our old friend, W. C. Fields, who is here for a week or two en route to Australia, amuses the crowd by his clever juggling and drollery. "Cu-urses," he mutters as the billiard ball misses his pocket and falls to the floor. Lizzie Wilson sings a number of coon songs in German which the Teutonic element in the audience vociferously applaud. McCue and Cahill, billed as refined lyric artists, are more refined than lyric.

At the Alcazar

Ernest Hastings has this week a new blond wig, and a different kind of a trick laugh from that he introduced in "Lady Huntworth's Experiment." The revival of "Her Majesty" proves that the little comedy is worth retaining in repertory. It is given a more faithful presentation this season than last. Miss Creighton gives a very charming personation of the young Queen, disguised as a peasant girl. Hastings as the crazy Casimir has only a small part, but it is one of the best things in the production. Osbourne, too, and Bacon have character parts to which they both do full justice. Miss Crosby as Lisa as usual slights nothing of her role's demands, and Marie Howe is amusing as Rinira von Altenheim.

Bryant to Go to Belasco

Charles Francis Bryant began with the Alcazar stock company as call boy. Now he is its stage director. The artistic taste which he has revealed in productions shifting as rapidly as the bits of colored glass in a kaleidoscope has found the recognition of the master. David Belasco has bidden Bryant go to New York, to the great Belasco theatre, where wizard-like wonders of stagecraft are wrought. Belasco and Mayer of the Alcazar are sorry to part with their protege but realize the wider opportunity opening up for one of his youth and ambition. As a parting token of regard they will give him a farewell testimonial benefit at the Alcazar Wednesday evening, May sixth. The play will be "We 'Uns of Tennessee," and Bryant will appear in his favorite role of Lige Monroe. There is the subtle fragrance of orange blossoms in the air. When Bryant reaches New York he will find some one waiting to share his happiness and double his expenses.

Our Second "Resurrection"

Ashton Stevens thinks his brother Landers is a "bad actor." But he should go and see that brother act in "Resurrection" this week, and then perhaps he would change his opinion. There is a deal of provocation to overact in the role of Prince Dmitri, the whilom betrayer and later penitent, but Stevens does not yield to the temptation. He acts the part in a manly and convincing manner. Dmitri, however, has little to do in comparison with the opportunities given to the heroine. Maslova is the keynote of every act, every scene, and Eugenie Thais Lawton brings out the various phases of the character with wonderful insight into the Tolstoi creation.

When Landers Stevens is doing a detective stunt at the Central next week, by the way, his wife (Fanny Gillette) will be playing Trilby to Emmett Corrigan's Svengali at the California. The Stevens's played for some seasons in Oakland, at a ten-twent'-thirt' theatre of which they were the managers. They gave shows of all degrees, ranging from the classic drama to musical farce comedy.

Irwin's Second Satire

Now that Wallace Irwin has got his pen in, so to speak, on stage business, he is going to give some satires to San Francisco that are worthy the name. His second burlesque at the Republic, "The Siege of Goat Island," shows a considerable improvement on its predecessor. It is a take-off on some army and navy doings, and the characters are burlesques of General Shafter and other prominent officers. The company enters into the spirit of each part. The minstrel first part has some changes this week.

"La Fille" at the Tivoli

"The Daughter of the Regiment" was the most popular opera in the Grau repertoire the past season. Marcella Sembrich as Marie, the dashing daughter of the Twentieth, put new vigor into the charming old opera and made such a palpable hit that the New Yorkers treated the Wagner music dramas with such stars as Eames, Nordica and Anthes in the cast, as off nights, and crowded the house whenever the Donizetti opera was announced. The Tivoli this week gives an admirable production of "La Fille." Bertha Davis sang the title role and was effective in the ensemble work. Arthur Cunningham as Sergeant Sulplice is a dashing figure and sings the interpolated Schumann number with great effect. Ferris Hartman manages to amuse the audience in a Jim Dumpian version of the bouffe part of Bruno. Edward Webb, essentially a comedian, is not very successful in the pretty tenor part of Tony. Aimee Leicester was very funny as Babette, although she was made up to look more like Sis Hopkins than a grisette.

Odette Tyler Scores

Last week was Mr. McLean's week at the Grand. This week belongs to Odette Tyler. Not that the King John of McLean lacks force or virility; it is a well-rounded conception of one of the most distinguished king-murderers in history. But Miss Tyler's Prince Arthur is so winning, so pathetic, that one forgets the other roles in contemplation of hers. Her scene is that in the tower, where she pleads with Hubert when he is preparing, per order of King John, to shut out with cruel irons the light in Arthur's beautiful eyes. Miss Tyler brings out all the horror of the contemplated act, all its pathos, in a manner that wins by its pure naturalness. The play is particularly interesting as it is rarely given nowadays, and it is well acted throughout. Miss Stoddard's Queen Constance is a strong piece of work, her mad scene being most effective.

Mr. Ravlin's Promotion

Clarence N. Ravlin, who has been the press agent at the California theatre for some time past, was advanced last week by Mr. Ackerman to the position of assistant business manager of the California and Republic. Mr. Ravlin is well fitted for the position, for he has had wide experience in theatrical work. He is very popular and has friends all over the State. For years he was connected with the newspapers here as sporting writer, and he is an authority on cycling and automobiling.

Recites in Darkey Dialect

Miss Clara Alexander will give a dialect recital in Steinway hall this evening. The patronesses include many prominent society women. This clever young Southern girl has become the rage this winter, her recitals being quite out of the ordinary. She is not an elocutionist, but gives her darky stories and songs simply and naturally, in the dialect that she heard her own "mammy" use in the South in her childhood.

Features of Next Week's Bills

Prices go down to the one-fifty scale for "Are You a Mason?" at the Columbia. John C. Rice and Thomas A. Wise appear as the two Masons, who are not really members of a lodge, though they tell their wives that they are. Sally Cohen, always clever, and George Richards, are in the cast. The play is a genuine New York success. Indeed, it has made a greater hit than any farce written in recent years.

Odette Tyler will play Desdemona in the Tyler-McLean production of "Othello" at the Grand. It will be a fine production scenically and histrionically.

Emmett Corrigan, who made such a hit at the Grand when co-starring with Maude Odell, will be Svengali at the California in "Trilby," which opens tomorrow night. He has a strong company headed by Fanny Gillette, who will be remembered as having scored here in the title role of the Du Maurier drama eight years ago.

"The Dancing Girl" will be the Alcazar's offering. It is one of the best things Henry Arthur Jones ever did. "The Man from Mexico" comes next, with "We 'Uns of Tennessee" and "Lover's Lane" to follow.

"Fatinitza" will be the Tivoli bill. It is a pretty opera, one of Von Suppe's most popular works. Caro Roma has the role of the young officer who masquerades as a girl, and with whom the general (Cunningham) falls in love. Hartman is the Turkish pasha and Bertha Davis is the niece of the general. Webb plays the war correspondent.

Even in Holy Week "Helter Skelter" turned people away from Fischer's, the S. R. O. sign being continually out. It is still on and will be for awhile yet.

The satire "The Siege of Goat Island" will be continued at the Republic and the minstrel first part has made such a hit that it will be repeated as it is.

One of the Orpheum's most important engagements this season is that of Charles J. Rose and Mabel Fenton, the New York favorites who have been featured at Weber & Field's for several seasons. They were here, at the Baldwin, some years ago. Their sketch is called "After the Ball" and introduces travesties on "Fedora" and "Virginius." Snyder and Buckley, musical comedians, are new here. William Friend and company, with Thais Magrane as leading lady, will present "Miss Bruno's Burglar," written by Richard Carle of "The Storks" fame. Arthur Deming, black-face monologuist known as "The Emperor," will be on hand with the latest stories and songs.

Heading the Chutes bill comes the "Cycle Maze," introduced by Messrs. Gus Seyfried and F. W. Sheelor the originators of the "Cycle Whirl" which created such a sensation last year. Green and Werner, the "babes of the jungle," will present their pleasing turn, the Alarcons, a Mexican musical quartet, will give languorous songs and dances, and Lizzie Wilson, the German comedienne, vocalist and dialectician, will appear here for the first time. Evans and Lindsey will offer an amusing triple horizontal bar performance, Brooke Eltrym, the pleasing mezzo-soprano, will be heard in ballads and operatic numbers, and Kalacratus will present an equilibristic and hoop rolling exhibition.

Every one who has read "David Harum," and who is it has not? will be glad to know that the dramatization made of the book will shortly be presented in this city by William H. Crane in the title role. The comedy is now in its third year.

REFORM OF LANGUAGE TEACHING IN EUROPE.

The American conquest of Europe in purely material matter has become an acknowledged fact. The superiority of our mechanical devices and of many of our staple and fancy articles is fully recognized abroad; the invasion of Europe by American capital and the establishment of gigantic enterprises are also well known; even the lighting of Paris—"la Ville-Lumiere," the city of enlightenment—by an American syndicate, has been seriously considered.

But even in matters not purely material, American expansion now progresses with giant strides. Europeans, hampered and annoyed by the dryness and scholasticism of their scientific systems, were not slow in discerning the advantages of our methods of instruction, due to the American instinct for the practical. This is particularly evident in the teaching of languages. The old European methods are rapidly being replaced, or at least reformed, by the Berlitz method, called in Europe, on account of its origin, the American Method. The Berlitz Schools, the first of which were founded about twenty-five years ago in Providence and Boston, have about two dozen branches in this country, but have spread over nearly two hundred European cities.

President Loubet of France entrusted the linguistic education of his children to this institution, and the Emperor of Germany displayed his confidence in the Berlitz School by placing in its care the French course at the Military School of Potsdam, while in another Berlitz School the Crown Prince perfected himself in speaking foreign languages. These are clear indications of success, the victory not only of American energy, but also of American intellect.

Col. A. Andrews, proprietor of the Diamond Palace in Montgomery street, celebrated his seventy-seventh birthday on April seventh. The Colonel, who is the youngest looking veteran in the city, received congratulations from a host of friends and relatives at his apartments in the Lick House. An informal entertainment was given in honor of the popular diamond merchant.

JAPAN.

Few people know that Japan has more mineral springs than almost any country on the globe. Most of them are hot sulphur and hot arsenic springs. Japan is the great health resort for English and Americans in the Orient. There is one spring, a short distance from Kobe, called Tansan (natural water), which has a world-wide reputation. Tourists always visit Tansan's bottling plant, knowing that this water is reputed to be the only uncharged sparkling table water retaining its effervescence after bottling. When shown how this Tansan is taken from the spring and bottled without being artificially charged they marvel at its wonderful properties. (See cover of this issue of Town Talk.)

MUSIC

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

The Holmes Recital

Like a bit out of the Bible, a psalm of David, say; like a song of Shakespeare's, "Full Fathom Five Thy Father Lies," for instance; like anything you will, divinely dignified, all simplicity, nobility, inspiration, was the Beethoven Sonata in G (op. 96) as interpreted by Mr. Henry Holmes at his concert in Heine hall last Tuesday evening. There be those (their name, alas! is Legion) who have no joy of the Bible, of Shakespeare, or of Beethoven; who in art prefer not him who is "the priest of his profession," but him who is the zany. They do not go to hear Henry Holmes. And that exquisite young artist, Kathleen Parlow, who, not yet in her unlucky first teen, reads the Max Bruch Romance in A minor with all the understanding of an adult; whose rare performance has moreover all the added sweet of promise—neither do they go to hear her. And Schumann's Quartet in A major (No. 3) played as it should be played (not easily this side of Germany will you hear it better played)—that delights them not. Others there be, music knowers and music lovers, who rejoice that in this "Philistine's day" there are still "a few who, nourished on some secret tradition, or illumined, perhaps, by a divine inspiration [keep] aloof from the reigning superstitions, never [bow] the knee to the gods of Canaan; and one of these few [is] called" Henry Holmes.

Good Society but Indifferent Singing

Mrs. Caroline McLaine Mason, assisted by Dr. H. J. Stewart and Mr. Nathan Landsberger, gave a song recital in Steinway hall last Monday evening. At the recital was more society than song; fashion was there, but fine art was not. Mrs. Mason is not magnetic. She cannot create musical atmosphere. Neither dream nor other delight is hers to give. Her singing has that icy regularity whose effect is "frost." To her and to the hearer the three Grieg numbers were as (a), (b), (c). Her Liszt was trite. Against her voice there is nothing in particular to say, save this, that there is nothing in particular to say for it. In short, Mrs. Mason's singing was indifferent.

The Impolite of Society

Polite people, people of taste, with some sense of the fitness of things, who attended the now famous reception given to Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox in the maple room of the Palace, must have minded them of the At Homes, with music in the corner, condemned so well by Mr. Haweis in his delightful "Musical Memories." Music and literature (?) clashed frightfully. There was a regular rumpus between smart-set magpies and the sweet sounds that the talented "Pasmore children" were discoursing, or endeavoring to discourse. To play against that chatter was impossible for a bag-pipes, even. If any there could converse more artistically than the Pasmore children play, I want to hear him, her, or them. But the best conversationalists speak at opportune times. While music is being played they keep golden silence. The impoliteness of "polite" society passeth understanding.

Never have the Hopkins musicales been more enjoyable, or more largely attended, than this year. Henry Heyman arranged for every one a charming program and on one occasion he himself added to the evening's pleasure by two violin solos. The final musicale of the season was held on Thursday evening, when the participants were Miss L. Purlenky, contralto, Hubert Clyde Linscott, tenor, Arthur H. Young, violin, Miss Frances Wertheimer and Miss Orrie Young, accompanists, Gerard Barton, organist.

Madame Eugene Mantelli, the distinguished soprano of the Grau Metropolitan opera company, who will give some concerts here shortly, will sing several grand opera selections and fully portray each with superb costumes. Among her selections are "L'apre per te il mio cor" from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delila," "Der Arsa" (Rubinstein), "Sans Toi" by Hardelot, and "April Rain" by Oley Speaks.

Of the newest papers the Linen Bonds displayed by COOPER & Co. are most effective.

Madame Elizabeth Mowry Carter, who died this week of pneumonia, complicated by heart trouble, had won not a little fame as a dramatic soprano. She was a great student, and spoke five languages. She was a Southerner by birth, her native home being Rockbridge, Virginia. Her father, the late Dr. W. N. Hardin, was at one time family physician to Gen. Robert E. Lee.

Mrs. Anna von Meyerinck has issued invitations for a concert and operatic recital at the Alhambra next Monday evening, when Spohr's cantata, "God Thou Art Great" and Mascagni's "Zanetto" will be given, with a group of French Dance Songs (eighteenth century), four quartets by Mendelssohn and a group of songs sung by Miss Feldheim.

The Neapolitan Mandolin and Guitar Club gave a concert on Thursday evening in the Y. M. C. A. Auditorium, under the direction of Theresa and Lily Snerwood. The club was assisted by Miss Pettigrew, soprano, D. M. Lawrence, tenor, and the Eureka Quartet; Signor Martinez, pianist, and Miss Brooks, accompanist.

Next Monday evening some of Miss Lotte D. Siegel's pupils will give a recital in Steinway hall. Those pupils who will take part are Mrs. George D. Graham, Mrs. L. Stern, Miss Olga Wagner, Berton Einstein, Oscar Frank and Lucius L. Solomons. The

"In oratorios and concerts, the form of the musician constantly disturbs us; true music is intended for the ear alone; a fine voice is the most universal thing that can be figured; and while the narrow individual that uses it presents himself before the eye, he cannot fail to trouble the effect of that personality."—From Goethe's "Wilhelm Meister."

FOR A GOOD PLATE OF OYSTERS.

Once upon a time the fallacious opinion prevailed among epicures and gourmets that the only place to obtain edible oysters was on the Atlantic coast. That fallacy was long since exploded. California now produces oysters that are as delicious in flavor as the far-famed Blue Points of the East. Pay a visit to the oyster-beds of the Darbee & Immel Oyster Co., whose local market is at 212 O'Farrell street, near Powell. The beds are at San Lorenzo and the choicest bivalves are grown there. They can be eaten in every month of the year, too, which cannot be done in the East where they are careful of the months minus the "r." The Darbee & Immel Co. are planters, wholesale and retail dealers in the choicest oysters. In no other place in the city are the oysters cooked quite so satisfactorily as here.

Ned Townsend's Latest

"Lees and Leaven" is the title of the latest novel by Edward W. Townsend. The lees and leaven appear in about equal proportions and the scenes, chiefly laid in New York city, are set in the tenderloin and the top story. There are two stories interwoven, those of the Paxtons and the Buntons. Both, originally residents of White River, in the western part of the State, journey by the same train to the metropolis, the Buntons as the latest new millionaires, and the Paxtons in the hope of making fame, if not fortune. Bunton, in his initial appearance, is a coal and iron merchant. He has the opportunity to make an investment which, owing to the information he has concerning the state of the market, he knows will prove enormously profitable, but he has not the necessary capital. Dr. Paxton, who is under some obligation to Bunton, happens along in the right nick of time, and is induced to mortgage his home for five thousand dollars. Bunton sells to him a parcel of land in the iron district of Michigan, which is easily worth the full sum. No one but the two men knows of the transaction, and by a series of unexpected occurrences the deed, instead of passing into Dr. Paxton's keeping, is believed to have been destroyed in the fire following a railroad wreck. Dr. Paxton is killed in an accident on the same day, and the five thousand dollars which he is known to have obtained at the bank is supposed to have been stolen by tramps. Up to this time Bunton has been an honest man, but the circumstances are too tempting for him to resist. He says nothing to the son and daughter of his deceased friend about the iron land transfer. It becomes the keystone upon which two rival combinations depend for the completion of their schemes, and the necessity which each sees for either obtaining possession or making certain that the other will not be able to purchase it raises the value of the property to a fabulous sum. Bunton does not intend to dispose of it. He never admits to himself that he intends to defraud the Paxtons, and yet he has no intention of deeding the property to them. His successful investments in iron ore, which were made on careful computations of the market, have given him an idea that he is a great financier, and he goes into Wall street, where the manipulations by which he is reduced to bankruptcy are as interesting as those which reduced young Percival Bines of "The Spenders" to seeming poverty. Meanwhile, Howard Paxton has come on to the metropolis on the invitation of a yellow journal, and the methods of that particular journal, or perhaps of yellow journalism in general, are laid bare. The Worthingtons, who were incidentally brought forward in "Days Like These," are important factors in "Lees and Leaven," where the Worthington interests are concerned in the destiny of that important tract of iron land. One of the most interesting characters in the story is that of Harry Lawson, weak, cowardly and incapable, but "such a pretty boy" that every woman is in love with him. Harry is the keystone in the arch. Through his very lack of character he becomes an important character. Had he been launched at the top, or anywhere near the top of society, he would have made a successful society clown, of the Harry Lehr order. As he began near the bottom he could only drift lower down, but even as the "sea food man" he was picturesque. Lawyer Bannister, through whose agency the knots are untangled, is an excellent character also. His hobby of fancy farming, and his interest in the study of plant life, remind one of Wilkie Collins's detective whose leisure moments were devoted to rose culture. Lawyer Bannister's eccentric family, each of which considered himself the only one who was normally sane, is a mild comedy element. There is a love-story apiece for each pair, for Howard Paxton and Madge Bannister see heaven in each other's eyes, and Jack Worthington and Grace Paxton do likewise. George Bannister and his Gertrude are a pair of comedy lovers, while Daisy Bunton and Harry Lawton are as happy together as either of them deserves. Some criticism has been directed against the police outrages which are depicted, but unfortunately for objectors, the two instances which are made use of were transcribed from the proceedings of the Lexow Investigating Committee. On the whole "Lees and Leaven" is not such pleasant reading as "Days Like These." But to any one interested in phases of metropolitan life, it is a book not to be neglected. No headache, no gastritis, follows the use of "Jesse Moore" pure whisky. It does one good. There is none other to equal it.

Agnes and Edgerton Castle is one of them. I say is advisedly, for though this husband and wife are collaborators their work is done in such a manner that it is impossible to put a finger on any two incidents and say, this is his idea and this hers. They are so essentially one that their books appear to be the product of one mind alone. "The Star Dreamer" bears no resemblance whatever to the last book, "The Secret Orchard." This is not an historical novel in any sense. Though the time in which the events take place is definitely mentioned as "when George III lay dying," the conditions and characters are not typical of that time nor any other. The story is a pure romance, with love and counter-plot for its interests. David, the master of Bindon-Cheveral, still a young man, has, as the consequence of a disappointment in love, a deceit on the part of a friend, and the derision of his only sister, withdrawn himself to his castle, where he devotes himself to astronomy. Within the castle there also lives a cousin, Simon Rikart, an aged man who buries himself in an underground laboratory, where he spends his time distilling essences and searching after the panacea which he believes it is possible to prepare. Between the two recluses the servants live in clover, feasting on the best, and drinking the priceless wines, while the masters are regaled with small beer and the thin ears of corn. Upon this blissful state of affairs enters Ellinor, the lately widowed daughter of the old simpler. She has had a disastrous experience as a wife, and returns to her father because she has neither means nor shelter. Her cousin, David Cheverel, installs her as housekeeper and makes her welcome, much to the disgust of the old servants, who see the end of their lives of ease and luxury and set themselves to work to oust her. Naturally, David falls in love with the beautiful and in all respects worthy Ellinor, whose arrival at Bindon-Cheveral is simultaneous with his discovery of a new star, an omen which he is convinced is propitious. The appearance of Maud, Lady Lochore, sister of David, on the scene, and her plottings to secure the estate for her little son, are not the only obstacles to the course of true love, nor is the interest entirely centered about David and Ellinor. Aunt Sophia is a delightful character, such as we may never more meet in the flesh, since board schools and universal education have banished forever such refreshing and egotistical ignorance. Aunt Sophia has married a clergyman with a genuine love for books and her attempts to render herself an efficient coadjutor, and to quote scripture or what passes for it in her mind, are as whimsical as the Widow Bedott's famous "Timothy, X, 16." And Margery Nutmeg, the housekeeper, and old Giles, the butler, are a worthy pair. Amongst them all Ellinor had no light task to keep the peace and perform her various tasks. What they were and what tragedy and comedy were intertwined, readers must discover for themselves. It will be worth their while. In a book which gives so much pleasure, it is a pity to point out even small discrepancies, but when we are told that ten years before a messenger had been sent to announce the birth of the little son of Lady Lochore, it is somewhat startling to find that the child, a few pages further on, is but three years of age. One cannot but wish that the Castles would write the other stories which are hinted at in the Introductory. F. A. Stokes is the publisher of "The Star Dreamer," and the volume is a tasteful and attractive one from every point of view.

Christian Science Lectures

"Spiritual Evolution" is a volume of essays in the form of lessons in Christian Metaphysics, by R. C. Douglas. The essays or lectures have been embodied from class teaching in Christian Science, and cannot fail to interest students or those already en rapport with the subject. They are simple and plain in language and present no technical difficulties. Whether they would prove convincing to an unprejudiced mind is another question. Admitting that a large share of the ills of mankind are purely imaginary, there yet remain a goodly number which are real. It would seem about as sensible to assert that an empty pocket-book is filled with gold, and to purchase goods on the strength of such possession, as to declare that a jumping toothache is a freak of the imagination or that the deaf may hear and the blind see if they will assert their belief that they can. But if people can convince themselves to the contrary, far be it from me to disturb their faith. [Published by Lee and Shepard.]

Professor Henry Wood is one of the best known exponents of the "new thought." Briefly expressed, he does what Ella Wheeler Wilcox tries to do. The tendency of Professor Wood's writings is decidedly hopeful and optimistic, and his language clear. The style is forceful, and often epigrammatic. It is as far from dogmatic assertion and cant as is Emerson or Ruskin. The essays comprised in the present volume, "Studies in the Thought World," are twenty-two in number, some of which have appeared in different periodicals. Their incorporation without change accounts for repetitions and similarities which occasionally appear. Grammatical lapses are probably due to careless composition. [Lee and Shepard.] —The Bookworm.

With the Money Makers

The Tevis Investments

The purchasing of the stock held by R. R. Colgate of New York and C. W. Childs of Boston in the California Gas & Electric corporation by William S. Tevis, representing the various Tevis financial interests, has been the leading feature of interest in local money circles during the past week, and has generally been favorably commented on. While street rumor has placed the consideration at close on to $1,000,000, which seems a conservative estimate considering the amount of stock believed to have been held by the Eastern capitalists, it has been authoritatively stated at the Tevis headquarters that the deal was closed for much less money, although the exact amount or a fair estimate was withheld from publication. It was further stated that Mr. Tevis took the stock in belief that it was a good investment for his surplus stock. According to Frank G. Drum, manager of the Tevis interests, the controlling interest in the corporation had not been acquired, as was common gossip on the street, and there would be no change in the management. The reasons attributed for Messrs. Colgate and Childs disposing of their holdings of stock is said to be their inability to give them proper attention, owing to their non-residence in the State. They still, however, retain their large holdings of the corporation's bonds. The California Gas & Electric Corporation was incorporated some two years ago with a capital of $30,000,000, which was subsequently reduced to $15,000,000. An issue of bonds to the amount of $10,000,000 was authorized, with which the controlling interests in the Bay Counties Power Company, the California Central Gas & Electric Company, Fresno Gas and Electric Light Company, Oakland Gas, Light and Heat Company, Sacramento Electric, Gas and Railway Company and the Valley Companies Power Company, were purchased, the final merging of the foregoing concerns into the corporation being effected about the first of the current year. Colgate's interests were largest in the Bay Counties Power Company, and when the company was sold to the new corporation he received for each share of his stock $83.50 in bonds and one-half share of stock in the new concern. Another recent investment of Tevis was the purchase of most of the 12,000 shares of the treasury stock of the North Shore Railroad Company at $9 a share.

Quiet Week on 'Change

The sales of industrial stocks in the local markets have been rather light during the last week, but while there has been a general air of quietude there has been no weakness in values beyond the ordinary and usual fluctuations incident to the business. The buying orders have been comparatively few and mostly confined to small parcels, but the paucity of buyers had no discouraging effect upon sellers and the latter have manifested no disposition to force trade by making concessions. The record of sales for the week shows that no particular stock or stocks constitute a special feature as was the case during the month of March, but the most of the listed securities were fairly well represented in the transactions. Lighting stocks are no longer the leading feature, the few sales during the week being no more than usual at this time of the year. San Francisco Gas & Electric has sold moderately but at lower prices than for the preceding week. There have been some offers to sell at $57 to $57.50 but buyers generally have been reluctant to bid more than $56 and occasionally $56.50 for small parcels. Even at this figure there was no activity, and it is doubtful if a round lot could have found a purchaser. The street appears to be bare of rumors and the usual gossip concerning this stock so it is safe to presume that the board of directors have thus far been unsuccessful in any effort towards carrying out the project as outlined in their circular letter to the stockholders when the latter were requested to deposit their stock in escrow with the Mercantile Trust Company. This, however, must not be construed to mean that the desired object may not be attained for there remains about eleven months within which the board of directors may successfully carry out their plans. Meanwhile, however, it may be reasonably expected that the stock will get back, in the course of time, to its normal market value. The other lighting stocks have been quiet with few sales in progress and prices remaining substantially the same as a week ago. Pacific Gas Improvement, which is a sort of side partner of the San Francisco Gas & Electric, is being offered at $40, but no one appears to be willing to bid more than $39.50 with $39.75 as an extreme. Pacific Lighting shares remain steady at about $57.50, although some holders are making a firm stand for $58.50. In Mutual Electric Light shares buyers and sellers are far apart, the asking price being $9, with the best bid $6. Equitable Gas is held strongly at $4.75, although there are some buyers on the street vainly seeking to obtain some shares at $4.25. United Gas & Electric is in demand with buyers bidding $34.50 and no sellers. Water Stocks have attracted but very little attention. Spring Valley has been weaker and a trifle lower, but holders of this security have every confidence in its future and consequently offering very sparingly. A few sales have been recorded at $83.75 and more stock could have been disposed of at $83.50, but this was below holders' ideas and consequently there were no transactions. There has been quite a drop in the price of shares of the Contra Costa Water Company, the bidding price being only $55, as against $60 a week ago. At present about $59 is the asking price with practically no business doing. This sharp drop in prices of the Contra Costa shares may be attributed to the fact that the annual report recently issued is not as satisfactory as shareholders had expected. In addition to this there have been a number of changes in the board of directors and this has not been very well received. Sugar shares have been quiet with prices in most instances at a slightly lower standard. Hutchison shares have remained fairly steady with $15 to $15.25 as the bidding price and holders asking $15.50. Paauhau has also remained steady, although at a lower standard than a month ago. Shares are in demnd at $17.50 although holders as a rule are asking $18. Onomea is being offered at $22.25 and readily taken at that figure, while Honokaa is being offered at $14.50 with $14 the maximum bid. Hawaiian Commercial is inactive although in some request at $44.75, with no sellers willing to dispose of their holdings at that figure. Bank shares show but few fluctuations, the feature of the week being the sharp advance in German Bank stock. The shares of this bank are now in demand at $2,200, but holders are demanding $2,300 and it is doubtful if any could be induced to shade this figure. Giant Powder stock has fluctuated slightly and is a trifle lower. Shares can now be had at $65.50, although sellers are demanding time for delivery, sales at this figure being usually seller 90 days. Oceanic shares are still neglected with $16 as the asking price and $13.50 the best bid. The bonds of the company are unchanged; offers to sell are made at $80, but buyers refuse to pay more than $75. There is some talk on the street that the bonds of this corporation will be higher in the near future, but as the rumor carries with it no satisfactory reason for an advance the statement has had no effect whatever in influencing the market value. Alaska Packers remains about steady at $153 to $153.50 with transactions few and usually small in volume. California Wine Association stock is strong at $104 with holders asking $106. Bonds sold quite freely during the week with fluctuations slight and prices generally well sustained.

CALIFORNIA NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY'S ATTRACTIONS.

The California Northwestern Railway Company has made its usual elaborate preparations for the summer vacation time, as is evidenced by the handsome hundred-page booklet that it has just issued, giving a list of places that take summer boarders, telling of the special attractions of each place, and the rates by the week, among the many places reached by this railway or its connections being Mark West, White Sulphur, Aqua Caliente and Lytton's springs, Blue Lakes, Soda Bay and the Geysers. For campers there is no end of attractions, the Russian river affording good boating, bathing and fishing. R. X. Ryan is the general passenger agent of the road.

Other People's Ideas

From "The Velvet Glove," by Henry Seton Merriman:

The majority of human beings are gregarious. They meet together in order to quarrel. The majority of women prefer to sit and squabble around one table to seeking another room.

There are many persons of doubtful social standing, who seek to make up—to bridge that narrow and unfathomable gulf—by affability.

Those few who see below the surface, know that the restful man is he whose life's task is well within the compass of his ability.

Men never discuss a woman in whom they are really interested, though fools do.

It is not difficult to be prophetic if one can sink self sufficiently to cloak one's thoughts with the mind of another and thus divine the workings of his brain.

What a simple world this would be if more of its women knew when to hold their tongues!

A man having once been nursed in sickness by a woman parts with some portion of his personal liberty which she never relinquishes.

There is no face so baffling as that which a woman shows the world when she is hiding her heart.

We all carry with us through life the remembrance of certain words probably forgotten by the speaker. A few bear the keener, sharper memory of words unspoken.

From "Ciphers," by E. O. Kirk:

Breck: Life is a perpetual fast and vigil for anybody who wishes to accomplish anything in this world.

Ruff: She cultivates too assiduously the art of being misunderstood by dull people.

Breck: An insufficient talent is the cruelest of gifts.

Milly: Not everybody can be a lioness or a tigress, but the least of creatures can put up her back and spit.

Milly: I envy men their opportunity to make real friends. It might be almost worth while to be a man to have men's friendships. I suppose the reason you all hang together so is that you know such dreadful things about each other.

Contarini: A succes colossal at ze outset may be a meesfortune colossal.

Ruff: Times were that when the brains were out the man would die. Nowadays their loss seems to add a lease of life to poets, novelists, even painters.

From "The Virginian," by Owen Wister:

The creature we call a gentleman lies deep in the hearts of thousands that are born without chance to master the outward graces of the type.

It's not a brave man that's dangerous. It's the cowards that scare us (at cards).

All America is divided into two classes—the quality and the equality. The latter will always recognize the former when mistaken for it. Both will be with us until our women bear nothing but kings. It was through the Declaration of Independence that we Americans acknowledged the eternal inequality of man. For by it we abolished a cut-and-dried aristocracy. We had seen little men artificially held up in high places, and great men artificially held down in low places, and our own justice-loving hearts abhorred this violence to human nature. Therefore, we decreed that every man should henceforth have equal liberty to find his own level. By this very decree we acknowledged and gave freedom to true aristocracy, saying, "Let the best man win, whoever he is." Let the best man win! That is America's word. That is true democracy. And true democracy and true aristocracy are one and the same thing. If anybody cannot see this, so much the worse for his eyesight. —The Gleaner.

Peddling Positions in Society

Breaking into society, or, what Mr. Yellowplush called the most "xquizzit suckles," is rapidly becoming a well-regulated and well recognized business. The unwary and unsophisticated may not recognize the smartly gowned drummer, press agent, spieler and principals of this new high calling, but they are abroad in the land, and industriously grafting for all they are worth. Why not? Society, on a basis of wealth, offers a fat field for just such birds of prey. Henry Labouchere of Truth has culled the following advertisements from a late London daily to show how, like an unconscionable tradesman, the "smart set" sells its friends:

"A lady of title, moving in the best London society, is prepared to introduce a lady of means. Luxurious home in the West End; carriages kept. Terms must be liberal. The highest references offered and taken. Address Box — — —."

"A well-known lady, titled, is willing to chaperon a Colonial or American lady. Would instruct one unaccustomed to the habits and behavior of good society. Liberal terms required. Address, in confidence, care of — — —."

"A lady—a member of one of the oldest country families—having a beautiful place in the country, would receive a young lady during the winter months and introduce her to the society of the neighborhood. Good hunting, hospitable country. An unique opportunity."

"A West End dressmaker, who desires to extend her connection, wishes to meet with lady or ladies who would introduce business. Liberal commission offered. The strictest confidence may be relied upon. Address."

"An old-established firm of wine merchants (city) is desirous of obtaining West End orders. A high percentage given to ladies or gentlemen introducing business."

"To noblemen or gentlemen of position in society, able to influence capital: A large sum wanted by an old-established firm. Genuine concern. Particulars in confidence through — — —."

"A young lady, rich, desires to spend the season in London and to be introduced to the best society. Would pay handsomely for services rendered. Absolute secrecy guaranteed. Address Box — — —."

Swindler Hooley, by the lavish use of money, had no difficulty in getting dukes, earls and lords to head the directorates of his "get-rich-quick" concerns, and thus help fleece the foolish rich who were trying to break into the court set. Whitaker Wright steered his dizzy course for years through the higher English circles and reaped golden harvests because he knew where to bestow royal largesse among those who lead the society rout. Harold Frederick in his novel, "The Market Place," made use of this same theme, the ability of a business man to rise from obscurity to great eminence through judiciously bribing society leaders to lend their names and influence to promoting his schemes. The "guinea pig" who came into prominence just before the Boer war illustrated how "gentlemen" can trade on their social standing. The condition is not so flagrant in this country, because the leisure class is as yet small and in its infancy. The society sharks of England and the Continent, however, are beginning to work this land because of the large numbers of our newly rich. But for a long time to come the staunch common sense and a healthy moral tone of the better class of the American people can safely be relied on to laugh at their allurements. Only the moths will be caught, and they'd burn themselves in penny rushlights anyway.

Will He Act as Pacificator?

Not the least interesting of the bunch of comicalities in the shape of hand-shakings, banquets, toasts, droolings, anvil choruses, bursting hot air calliopes and the like bestrewing President Roosevelt's picturesque "swing around the circle," will be the "peace pow-wows" of the factional Republican leaders in some dozen States along the line. These rancorous hatchetmen have agreed to conceal their weapons for the time being and to unite in waving the party flag of amity in order to honor the President. Of course, if either side can safely reach the Roosevelt car with his tale of the strife it is safe to say that his opponent will be given the roast of his political life. The late President McKinley was an artist in patiently listening to these little family differences and diplomatically patching them up. President Roosevelt is of another composition; he is rapid, blunt, and the warring factions must be in a receptive condition to get the full benefit of his methods of conciliation. California and Oregon each offer him a happy field for the role of pacificator. In Nebraska two factions are battling for control of the Grand Old Party. In Missouri the Republicans are calling each other suggestive names from two opposing camps. Minnesota has two Senators clawing each other's reputation to pieces in the struggle for Federal patronage, and the sugar beet farmers are at loggerheads over the Cuban reprocity treaty. Iowa Republicans are divided under Governor Cummins and his tariff revisers and the anti-revisers under Secretary of the Treasury Shaw. Alger and the Anti-Alger camps divide Michigan with their taunting shouts and Wisconsin has a world of trouble over the claims of Governor La Follette and Senator Spooner regarding Federal patronage. The artful and judicious dispensation of this same Federal patronage was McKinley's panacea for healing factional wounds. President Roosevelt's remedy will be watched for with keen interest by the under dogs.

The Perfunctory Gift

The "co-operative wedding gift" is the latest form of joint production, and it is not such a bad one, either. Like many another good thing, it is of humble origin, since its birth was among the starving class of England. For some time past the dependents and retainers of the aristocracy have been in the habit of contributing to a general fund from which one nice gift has been presented instead of each purchasing such humble tokens as individual purses would permit. Now it is quite the thing for friends to club together in the same way, and, instead of the dozen pickle jars, score of vases, and clocks by the dozen, there is a consultation, and some article especially desired by the bride takes the place of the quantity of duplicates which could not be exchanged without offense to the givers or the ornamental trash which the recipients must often have longed to consign to the flames. It is a pity that so many gracious customs are killed by becoming burdensome, and that what ought to be a genuine expression of regard becomes solely a perfunctory obligation, discharged as a matter of necessity, and with no other feeling than regret that money needed for other purposes has been sacrificed in order to keep up with the fashion. Wedding gifts, which were at first donations toward the setting up of the new household, and took the form of sheep, pigs, a cow and calf, feather beds, household linen and such homely furnishings, contributed by the immediate families, have long since lost any utilitarian value. Jewelry, silverware, stocks, bonds and real estate are expected from the relatives, the immediate friends follow suit as nearly as possible, and the train of mere acquaintances, in whom it ought to be considered an impertinence to give at all, must likewise contribute until the display is as composite and heterogeneous as that of a rummage sale. Between the universal Christmas giving, the perennial wedding gift, the Easter offering of flowers which is coming into vogue, and the hundred and one other occasions which call for recognition, a large part of both time and income must be sacrificed. Gift making, like calling or entertaining, must fall apart by its own weight, and we shall soon be back to first principles and a new start, but meantime the co-operative gift is a solution for a part of the problem. Everyone need not be shopping all the time, but it is going to work havoc with the business now transacted in duplicate wedding gifts.

A Curious Phenomenon

What is the cause of the curious approachment in type that is said by foreigners to be so evident in the case of the two sexes in America? This is an interesting phenomenon. It naturally strikes the visitor more forcibly than it does ourselves, but, once called to our attention, we are impelled to sit up, take notice and confess that it is so. There is undoubtedly a gradual rapprochement of man and woman in this country, and it is not altogether due to the cult of the tailor-made girl, for the male biped has developed a penchant for raiment of a decidedly feminine style. He affects shirts made of material generally reserved for women's dresses, and he goes in for picturesque vests, fluffy neckwear, ornate socks and clean-shaven face. Occasionally he adopts a coat that bulges at the hip and fits tight at the waist, and in summer he wears fancy bands on his straw hat. But the evidence of rapprochement is not confined to clothes. Foreigners have noticed and have written about the delicately cut features of men in America, their large eyes and slight hands and long hair; also, the business-like character of the average American girl; her square shoulders and steady walk; her strongly marked, level eyebrows and powerful chin, and her almost excessive love of athletics. Yet the American man is not effeminate; neither is the American girl masculine. But each is coming more and more to partake in some degree of the other's mental qualities, and, as is always the case, the physical type is responding to the influence of the mind. It would be interesting to study just how far this curious development is likely to go, and also to speculate on the subtle influences that are effecting it, for it may prove a serious matter. The closer the types approach, the fainter will become the attraction of one for the other. It would be dreadful to face the prospect of a race of effeminate men and masculine women.

Pernicious Legislation

Nowhere in the world have labor unions accomplished so much for the laboring man as in Australia and New Zealand. They have succeeded in legislating for the practical enforcement of many of their pet theories, and the result is not altogether satisfactory. Ignoring the law of supply and demand, they have endeavored to keep up the rate of remuneration in most industries by legal enactment, and, as a consequence, there is much suffering. The effect of this legislation is described by Mrs. Ada Cambridge in her book, "Thirty Years in Australia." She says: "What, I wonder, are the number of those who starve — really starve—in secret, because the law forbids them to work for less than seven shillings a day, which they cannot earn with a service not worth the half of it—all the old, and slow, and weak, but yet self-respecting and self-reliant, whose honest bread the Minimum Wage Act has taken out of their mouths? One is sick of the continual begging of these victims to inexorable inspectors and boards t be allowed to work for thirty shillings a week—for twenty-five. One poor tailoress who had supported herself with her needle for fifteen years stood up in court and begged, with tears, to be allowed to work for twelve and sixpence, which, she said, would keep her. The rule of labor unions is the rule of might, and wherever it is enforced there will be suffering and hardship. It interferes with the rights of the individual, but it is supposed to contribute to the good of the greatest number. Legislation which prescribes a minimum rate of wages is a blow to the freedom of contract, and that is a precious privilege."

flirt with conspicuous buttons, so as to protect them from rowdies and mashers in public places. Volunteer deputy sheriffs will promenade the thoroughfares and support the good work of the militant buttons. Stout as this protecting hedge seems to be against the machinations of the bold flirter, the President of the League fears trouble, as is evidenced in the following statement recently issued to the members of the league: "The great difficulty which our organization will be compelled to overcome will be that many times in cases of common street and car flirting our deputies will be uncertain as to whether the persons addressed or 'smirked' at wishes the matter stopped, or whether they connive at the same." To obviate this chance, buttons will be issued only to ladies asking for them. The personal display of this sign manual will accordingly be notification to the wide, wide world that the wearer, under no consideration, wishes to flirt. Thus far, there has been no great rush for these "I don't flirt" buttons. Whether this is indicative that most members of the league are not total abstainers and relish a little judicious flirting now and then is puzzlng the much-exercised officers. It may be that individual members consider such badges a sign that the wearer has been subject to annoyances from smirkers of the other sex or that she considers her attractions sufficient to require protection against philanderers. It is safe to say that the wearers of the buttons will attract far the most of the objectionable attentions. Meanwhile both the smirkers and the guileless deputies are wondering if the league members who don't wear the button really want to flirt.

The Irrepressible Prodigy

While the agitation of the subject of child-labor is hot on every tongue, there is one phase of the matter which is in danger of being overlooked. And yet there is not an argument to be urged against the breaker-boy, the newsboy, the cotton-spinner or any of the rest of the juvenile bread-winners which does not apply with equal force to the child poet, the infant historian and the baby novelist and playwright. It is universally conceded by political economists that child-labor invariably follows in the wake of female labor, so that when women plunged headlong into "literature," it was only the expected that happened when children began to appear, at first, sporadically, but with increasing frequency, until now it is with fear and trembling that one takes up a magazine or weekly paper, lest several pages be found devoted to the maunderings of some precocious infant whose injudicious parents have not the mercy to conceal its shortcomings from the public. Why periodicals will accept the rubbish, even if it is donated, is a mystery. These infant phenomena never blossom into perfect flowers. Their childish verses and compositions are apt to be their last appearance in public, and if their souls are in the least sensitive, one might readily believe that it is because of the forcing of their immaturity. If the parents of these youthful prodigies whose productions are spread at large and whose precocity is exploited on stage and in concert hall, had elementary perceptions they would note that of all the vast army of stage wonders that have appeared in the last generation, those that rise in maturity above mediocrity are notable exceptions. Of the musical wonders, scarce one is heard from after its first flights across the concert stage, and the child artists, where are they? Reasoning by analogy, there is no better chance for their own darlings to distinguish themselves. Undoubtedly some, at least, of these juvenile prodigies have talent if not genius, but more often they have merely muscular agility and bone suppleness which belong naturally to youth. But in any case, whether it be genius, talent or facility, the one thing that they want is stern discipline and hard work. Nothing is accomplished without application and regulation, and nine times out of ten these are just what are not enforced. The child musician is dragged about the country, giving concerts which, in plain English, are simply showing-off stunts, and the little actor becomes the bread-winner for father and mother who travel with it. The child writer does not have quite the same opportunities to develop big-head, but the cultivation is carried on in private until people learn to avoid the vicinity in order to escape "Jessie's last poem," or "Wallace's new story."

Diaz Taking Precautions

The belief in some quarters that the integrity of Mexican institutions will be seriously tested when President Diaz retires from office finds some support in the recent action of the leaders of that Republic. Mexico has just adopted a policy of military expansion which seems likely to develop a highly efficient system of national defense and adequate to meet any possible clash with the usual Spanish-American revolutionists when the present strong hand of the government is removed. President Diaz is now bending his energies so that within two years Mexico will be able, on short notice, to mobilize an army of 200,000 thoroughly trained and perfectly equipped soldiers. Three hundred thousand boys and young men are now receiving regular daily military instruction in 11,000 public schools in the country. The regular army will be chiefly recruited from among these cadets. Concurrently detailed plans have been made to strengthen the navy. Two vessels are now under construction in a New Jersey shipbuilding yard to be added to her fleet. Evidently the prudent Diaz, having put Mexico on a stable and enlightened basis, does not propose to take any chance of having his great work placed in jeopardy by the bandit practices of any up-to-date Spanish-American candidate who aspires to succeed him in the Presidency. Diaz made Mexico, and if his present precautions will preserve it for half a decade after his death he can leave no greater monument to civilization.

Right vs. Might

"Force and right are the governors of this world; force till right is ready." This is how Matthew Arnold translates a thought of Joubert's. And he adds, with significant italics: "Force till right is ready; and till right is ready, force, the existing order of things, is justified, is the legitimate ruler."

A pretty apology this; a new and neat disguise for Pope's infamous fallacy, "Whatever is is right"—that doctrine for dullards and sluggards. How facile a rejoinder it puts into mindless mouths: "But, my dear fellow, right is not yet ready for us, nor we for it; therefore is force still the legitimate ruler." Injustice has the argument by heart. Thus is the day of right deferred. But, alas, Death is not so easily put off. Is it not high time to make ready for right—right the legitimate ruler; time to depose force, the usurper? The old right was might; but Right shall be the new might; man shall recognize it as his king, and the old might shall minister unto it.

In the year 1893 the large-minded Huxley—a man who could say many a word at once new, true, and beautiful; a man beside whom Darwin felt himself a babe in brains, and Lyell himself an infant in intellect—gave what is known as the "Romanes" lecture, choosing for his subject the rich theme of "Evolution and Ethics" and handling it with a result remarkable alike for its intellectual and moral power and its literary perfection. There that giant of thought flung himself against the fallacy, then and still prevalent, that the discovery of Darwin gave the support of the constitution of things, and therefore moral support, to the doctrine that might makes right; and it is almost pathetic to see him, that high priest of precision, that apostle of accuracy, that ideal talker, whose speech (to borrow from our beloved Stevenson) "corresponded and fitted upon the truth of fact—not clumsily, obscuring lineaments, like a mantle, but cleanly adhering, like an athlete's skin"; it is, I say, almost pathetic to see him, for the first and last time in his life, forced beyond the limits of the facts by the fury of his indignation against such a misuse of the great theory of evolution which he himself had done so much to establish. Here is how he puts his foot down:

"Cosmic nature is no school of virtue, but the headquarters of the enemy of ethical nature." And again:

"Let us understand, once for all, that the ethical progress of society depends, not on imitating the cosmic process, still less in running away from it, but in combating it."

Cosmic nature is ruinously red in tooth and claw, but it is not cruel. It is non-moral an-ethical; neither good nor bad, but indifferent. Right and wrong are no concern of nature's. In the cosmic process might may mean survival, but it connotes no right to survive. Nowadays the world is well aware of this and is so far ready for right. Even in war, where we copy the cosmic process most closely, we feel the need of deadening our consciences with the anodyne of "Divine intention."

Nineteen hundred years of Christianity co-operating with other forces have so changed the mental and moral outlook on life that today civilized nations must need shoot against the light, and the recoil of the cannon deals death-blows to the characters of the men behind the guns. The momentum of their animal and militant past forces modern peoples into the making of war despite the protests of head and heart. The savage feared what was unknown to him, and hated what he feared. All men but those of his own tribe were unknown to him; he feared them, he hated them. But culture is conquering ignorance, fear and war. Even seventy-odd years ago, when Macaulay, for the furtherance of "just principles," wrote his noble essay on "The Civil Disabilities of the Jews," the world was much farther away than it is at present from that ideal state of tolerance that passes so imperceptibly into appreciation. When Washington Irving visited Walter Scott, the latter's countrymen looked on the French as barbarians; now, to the native of Edinburgh, the Parisian is but as a Scotchman who speaks French. The speech of men from oversea is no longer "bar-bar" to us. Distance-destroying science is bringing together and making as one Man whom impassible mains and mountains had parceled into men. Propinquity is the mother of sympathy and sympathy the mother of morality. The cosmic process and the ethical process here co-operate, converging toward the goal of aggregation. A world-wide whole, with nations for units—nations specialized according to their several peculiar aptitudes and the natural resources of their habitats, and so mutually dependent as to make war practically impossible.

Day by day the socius is growing more self-conscious, its now examined life becoming more purposive; sometime tomorrow it will learn to walk in the pleasant ways of wisdom, to pursue her paths of peace, to recognize Right's right to reign.

Meantime, to be sure, we will feel as heretofore the hard hand of Heredity, that "Nemesis without her mask... the last of the Fates, and the most terrible . . . the only one of the Gods whose real name we know." The harsh voices of our brutal forbears will speak at times through our milder mouths, to our infinite astonishment and terror. Our great-grandfathers and great-grandmothers will try to work their moldering wills through us, but the wise will have an everlasting Nay for them.

Meantime, as heretofore, Pan will play his varied pipes and the old world waltz through space, keeping time and step as best she may. As of old, about the first of April, Nature will find her fools a-plenty and the love-lure beckon every living thing. The young lambs will bound atop the hillocks as to a tabor sound, and the blackbird grow him a beak of gold to sing his rival down; and man—well, man, the master, the magician, carrying climate in his pocket, is privileged to make love (or a most precious fool of himself, if you will have it so) all the year round; and I take it that this new note of man, the master, the magician, working wonders under the rule of right, will be heard more and more hereafter in thy playing, Pan, and the world move man's way as well as thine, thou good old Goat-foot!

Hearst's Magic Spell

The work of reorganizing the local Democracy is now in full swing. All factions, all cliques and all elements of the party that was so ingeniously disintegrated by James D. Phelan are to be reunited in one harmonious whole. It will be interesting to watch the discordant and jarring elements come together and smoke the pipe of peace. The local Democracy has been split wide open for many years. It has not presented a solid front to the enemy since the days of Christopher Buckley, and it was the blind boss who started the work of disintegration. Mr. Phelan had a chance to harmonize the factions, when the revolt in the ranks was in its incipiency, but he preferred to build up a personal machine, and he undertook to make the local Democracy as exclusive as the Pacific-Union Club. He favored the establishment of a political Holy of Holies from which should be barred the proletariat. He not only sundered the organization but he sought to deprive men of the elective franchise. He forced men to become bolters, he alienated friends, and stirred up animosities that are rankling yet.

Great Democratic Love Feast

However, the entente cordiale is to be restored; the spirit of amity is to be promoted; the immaculate bird of peace is to be induced to spread his wings over friend and enemy, and the representatives of all the jarring factions are to be invited to spread their legs beneath the mahogany at a real old-time Democratic love-feast. When this phenomenon is achieved the Democracy will owe a debt of gratitude to William R. Hearst, for it is the ambitious journalist who has undertaken to reunite the dismembered party. And already there are signs that presage the happy culmination. Politicians and job-chasers who have been among the ostracized for years are working shoulder to shoulder with the erstwhile Phelan exclusives by whom they were long since repudiated. Buckley lambs, Rainey heelers, Popper squaws and McNab whisperers are all rallying to the Hearst standard. If the young Congressman is able to exercise his alluring fascinations on the politicians of New York and Chicago as successfully as he is employing them in this city he should have no difficulty in obtaining the nomination for President.

Will Bachelor Hearst Wed?

Now that it is generally understood that William R. Hearst, the strenuous young newspaper publisher, is to test the gratitude and strength of the plain people by becoming a candidate for President, there is speculation as to whether he will qualify for the high honor by taking unto himself a wife. Though there is no law, written or unwritten, prescribing a wife as one of the essential features of the Presidential entourage, and notwithstanding the fact that we have had bachelor Presidents, there are many people who think that Mr. Hearst as a bachelor candidate would not be so popular as Mr. Hearst in the role of a married man. They appear to resent the suggestion of a young man of wealth becoming President without a wife to grace the White House. They completely ignore the fact that he has a mother who would make an ideal hostess in the Executive Mansion. Some of them, with astonishing impertinence, have ventured to choose a bride for him, and I have even heard it hinted that he himself has been giving the matter serious consideration. Mrs. Grundy has remarked that the handsome young Congressman has been very eager of late to find pretexts to visit the Coast, and she has hinted that Cupid has been taking a hand in his affairs. In a rather significant way she has reported that a very strong friendship has sprung up between Mr. Hearst and the sister of a young Oakland matron whose husband has long been an intimate friend of the proprietor of the Examiner. Mr. Hearst has been entertained a great deal in the Oakland home, and the circumstance has whetted the curiosity of the matchmakers.

Gowns Got Her Into Trouble

A few months ago the friends of a dashing young San Francisco beauty were congratulating her on her marriage to a wealthy mining man of Redding. Their honeymoon included a trip to Europe and the husband is still there, but the handsome young wife dropped into town alone the other day and is quietly preparing to ask for a divorce on grounds agreed to by the capitalist. What the real reason of their separation is no one seems able to surmise. About three months ago a swell dressmaker brought suit against the belle for gowns furnished before the marriage but the threatened legal proceedings brought an immediate cable and enough money was flashed across the water to induce the modiste to hush up the matter. But the dressmaker had already done enough talking to give Mrs. Grundy some choice tidbits.

Paying for Her Trousseau with Alimony

It seems that when the young woman, who was older in experience than years, found that her charms had struck pay dirt, she went to the dressmaker and induced her to furnish her with a trousseau befitting a rich mining man's bride. She agreed to pay handsomely for the things as soon as she had a finger in hubby's purse, so the modiste fitted her out royally and was content to wait for her money. The bird flew to Europe in the fine feathers and Madame sent her bill in pursuit and waited for the snug little payment coming to her. The bride wrote that she could not send such a large sum in one lump without taking her husband into her confidence, and that, under the delicate circumstances, she dared not do. She promised however to liquidate the debt as fast as she could coax money from him without exciting suspicion. Then came the sudden breach that separated the pair. When the lawyers on each side talked the situation over the attorney for the husband agreed that the wife should be paid three hundred dollars a month pending a settlement of the case in the divorce court. It is from this alimony that the young bride is making payments to her high-priced modiste for the elaborate trousseau furnished her.

"I see Miss Mamie Browne is always present at all the smart functions, and her gowns are always described. She must be a great beauty."

"Well, it is not exactly that. You see, all the society reporters know who she is, and they're not so sure of the others' identity."

Oakland's Newspaper Fight

A very pretty fight for supremacy in the evening newspaper field of Oakland is being waged these days. For many years that field has been dominated by the Tribune, of which William Dargie is the proprietor. So thoroughly and well did it cover the field that it was conceded to be the leading daily on the other side of the bay. Not until a few weeks ago was the pre-eminence of the Tribune questioned. It was then that the Herald was launched with a great blare of editorial trumpets and a fanfare of screeching headlines in flaming type. From the very beginning it was evident that the purpose of the Herald was to make the Tribune not worth while. The people behind the new journalistic enterprise sought not only to divide the advertising patronage of the town and alienate the Tribune subscribers but they undertook also to cripple the Dargie staff. They appeared to be plungers of the Hearst order, for, after the example of the young Napoleon when he entered the New York and Chicago fields, they proceeded to lure away the Tribune reporters with offers of princely salaries. And they succeeded in securing a few. They didn't stop at reporters, for they had designs even on Dargie's office boy and they offered him a raise of one dollar a week. Naturally Mr. Dargie sat up and took notice. Competition is the life not only of trade but also of the professions, and journalism is making a tremendous spurt in somnolent Oakland. The Tribune is covering a wider filed than ever and the Herald is running two color presses side by side. It's a momentous, Titanic struggle for the survival of the fittest, for the commuters and the urbanites cannot hope to support two great dailies. One must fall by the wayside unless there is a reckless angel in the journalistic field.

Re-enter Klein the American

At present the Herald is doing most of the spectacular splurging anent which there is considerable curiosity. An angel is a rara avis in Oakland. The climate of the burg isn't conducive to the sprouting of wings. The nominal backer of the Herald is John C. Klein, known to ephemeral fame as "Klein, the American," but even the gullible, unsophisticated of Oakland aren't taking Mr. Klein seriously in the role of a journalistic plunger. Mr. Klein is the reporter who happened to be representing the Examiner in Samoa some years ago when international complications approached a crisis. He became involved to such an extent that the German authorities contemplated subjecting him to drastic measures that might have boosted him into the leading role of a hanging episode. It was one of those lucky opportunities that sometimes grasp men and which the world afterwards credits them with seizing. By making a mountain out of a molehill in the case of Mr. Klein the German authorities favored him with notoriety which he was able to capitalize. Thereafter he became a correspondent for the New York Herald, and though he is a man of ability he has never done anything notable since leaving Samoa, because, perhaps, no other fortuitous opportunity has been kind enough to seize him.

Smith is the "Angel"

However, he is now the ostensible proprietor of the new Oakland daily. But nobody believes that he is backing it. The supposition is, and it is pretty well founded, that Frank M., better known as "Borax" Smith, is the owner of the paper. Mr. Smith can afford to buy color presses and other newspaper luxuries, and beside he has substantial purposes to subserve, not to speak of revenges to wreak. Mr. Smith is an interesting character. Most men are that alight in the centre of the financial stage after coming through a star trap. Years ago he was a teamster for Warren English in Nevada. Now he controls the borax trade, owns all the street railroads in Oakland, is threatening the Southern Pacific with competition in its ferry service, conducts the Realty Syndicate Company which owns nearly all the unimproved real estate across the bay, keeps a yacht on the Atlantic coast, has one of the handsomest residences in the State situated on Oakland Heights, and notwithstanding the fact that he is one of the brand-newest of the nouveau riche manages to make things hum in Oakland's smart set. So it is high time and propitious for Mr. Smith to have a newspaper for a toy. But he did not invest a hundred thousand in the Herald merely for amusement. They are saying in Oakland that he launched his newspaper by way of rebuke to Will Dargie because the latter interested himself too deeply in the affairs of the Realty Syndicate and other Smith enterprises. The Tribune attacked the Syndicate and its methods of luring capital, and it deprecated the poor service of the street railroad system operated by the borax trust magnate. Moreover it failed to appreciate the activity of the "Borax" Smiths in Oakland society. It happens that Mrs. Smith is a very charitable woman, and charity is a powerful agency in the promotion of social ambition.

Society Puffing as a Fine Art

So it is a pretty fight that is being waged in Oakland; Smith on one side seeking by way of retaliation to make the newspaper field less profitable for Dargie, and the Tribune publisher on the other, holding his own in journalism and endeavoring on the side to expose the shortcomings of the Realty company and intent upon official investigations and other things which may jeopardize the very lucrative business of the corporation. Incidentally, of course, the Herald can be utilized in the interest of the Smith social activities, for it is no longer considered a breach of newspaper ethics, or evidence of rank vulgarity, for a newspaper to exploit the social doings of the family of its proprietor. These are decadent times, and though a man may not be inclined to stand on the street corner and assume the role of the circus spieler for the purpose of telling strangers all about the social achievements of his family, he will not hesitate to give them publicity through the columns of his own paper.

Found Warbling Didn't Pay

Mrs. Smith, of "Moxey" and "oil stock" fame, is not the "mysterious" woman the daily papers seem to think her. She was formerly the wife of Roscoe Warren Lucy the piano teacher and accompanist, and has herself been a singing teacher in San Francisco. Many a parlor warbler has had vocal massage at her hands and she herself was at one time down to trill at almost every benefit performance. But after she secured a divorce from Mr. Lucy she allowed her musical accomplishments to languish and time has not treated her voice kindly. About three years ago she attempted to give a concert and it may have been after that fizzle that she decided there was more money in floating stock than putting up the remnant of her voice at the concert counter. For since then she has devoted herself to letting people in on the "ground floor."

Money Slipped Through Her Fingers

Mrs. Smith has at different times in her life fallen into cushioned ease, thanks to inheritances, but the money has slipped through her fingers. A few years ago she inherited a comfortable fortune from her mother and she at once sent her three young boys, who are the sons of Mr. Lucy, to a ranch near Petaluma, while she herself started on a tour of the East and Europe. It is doubtful whether any of that money is left to help her out of her troubles. Mr. Lucy, the former husband, has always been on the kindliest terms with her and it is said has offered to smooth out her present difficulties if it is within his power. In her virgin days Mrs. Smith was considered a winsome beauty and she has still traces of charm.

"Amen" Barred

One might imagine that the uses of the injunction had been exhausted, unless it could be invoked to prevent the rain from falling or the wind from blowing, but the trustees of a church in Mount Gilead, Ohio, have managed to obtain one to restrain a member of the congregation from responding "Amen" to the prayers. The man in question is an old-fashioned Methodist who believes in the fervor of vocal demonstration. He has a front pew and is a regular attendant at all the services, and his enthusiasm is not appreciated by his fellow worshipers, who have passed beyond the primitive stages, and believe that St. Paul meant men, as well as women, to "keep silent in the churches." They have remonstrated and sent committees to confer with the recalcitrant brother, all in vain, so now they have enjoined him, and it remains to be seen whether that will have any permanent effect, or whether, as has happened on less provocation, there will be a split in the congregation, and a new church, if not a new sect, inaugurated.

Sam Parker on the Color Line

If the dusky swells of Hawaii could have heard the rumpus raised in the Cosmos Club a few days ago over the proposed admission of one of them to membership, they might have grown a shade darker with wrath. Sam Parker was proposed by one of his friends, and some of the enemies of darkness in the club at once tried to bar him on the color line. Memories of the royal Kamehamehas! Sam Parker debated over as a negro! A man who owns a principality in the isles of the thirsty, and who was all but appointed governor of Hawaii by Roosevelt; who is famous as the semi-royal entertainer of all distinguished visitors to the kanaka paradise—and he to be classed with Booker Washington. How gallantly his friends in the Cosmos came to his support! They told the hesitant committee that the blood of the big Hawaiian was as free from the taint of Africa as their own, that in the veins of the proud Parker rolled a fluid almost indigo in its aristocratic hue, and they warned the committee not to confuse the ancestry of Parker with that of the late reigning family of the islands.

Old Blossom's Scan'lous Work

The committee acknowledged that they had some vague recollection of a story concerning a negro having been the father of the last monarch of Hawaii. Poor old Blossom, the coon cobbler who mended the shoes of a generation or two ago in Hawaii, has been blamed for much, and so his fame can stand the accusation of his amours with royalty .However if the tale were true, said the friends of Sam Parker, what had it to do with our candidate? He was a pure Hawaiian, "quarter-white," they insisted, and only a Yankee and kanakas had to do with his getting. One had but to look at him to know his forbears. Though dark in color his features had naught of the ragtime race in them. Go to the books in the Honolulu court house, said the irritated and indignant backers of Parker, and examine the records of his ancestry. Who, they chanted, could drink deeper than old Sam? Who was willing to buy oftener than the generous Hawaiian? Who bet higher on two pair, and who counted his chips less ostentatiously than he? Who was always eager for a good time, and who scattered his money more like water? The committee was stormed with a fire of like interrogations. They were told that they might as well bar red noses and thereby empty the clubhouse as to keep out Sam Parker. Sam was elected.

Manipulating the Royal Colors

While it is perhaps not wholly strange that Americans should draw the color line, and make errors sometimes in such distinctions, it was a much queerer thing when Queen Victoria drew that line. Fancy a European exponent of the divine right of kings discriminating against the born Queen of the Hawaiian Islands. Yet that is what the Queen of England did on the occasion of her jubilee. Queen Kapiolani was in London for the jubilee, and was invited to Windsor Castle. Prince Komatsu of Japan and several Indian princes had also to be entertained by England's Queen. The color of their epidermis cut a big figure in the plans of the royal household's program of entertainment, but finally the problem was solved. The brown "anointed" lady and gentlemen from the Far West and East were made the "exclusive" guests of Queen Victoria at Windsor. Thus was the great color problem adroitly solved in a manner to hurt no one's feelings.

Led the Gay Set

Poor Alex Mackintosh Jr. died a few days ago at Parker's ranch in the islands. Many San Franciscans will remember him. At one time he was the fiance of Bernice Landers. Three or four years ago he was the leader of the jeunesse doree in Honolulu, and the merriest of all that wild crew. Alex's father has been for twenty years the leading Episcopalian clergyman in Hawaii, and is one of the old school, broad-minded preachers, who went out from England two score years ago to convert the heathen, not only to the Church of England beliefs but to the use of tubs and soap. Young Alex got his education in England, where all the expatriated Britishers of Hawaii then sent their sons to school, and was intended for the navy. But he never entered it though he spent a couple of years on H. M. S. Brittania, and became thoroughly English in his ways and speech. Finally he went back to Honolulu where, though he held a nominal position with a prominent firm, he plunged into the dissipations of that most tempting of cities.

Fled from Love and Debts

About three years ago he fled from Hawaii. All sorts of reports were spread about him. He left a hopeless tangle of debts, and it was said that a charming Honolulu girl mourned the loss of a lover and something else. During his visits to San Francisco he had met and wooed Miss Landers, but the engagement was broken off on account of his habits. After his flight his whereabouts were a mystery for many months. One day when Sam Parker was making ready here to marry the rich widow of old Jim Campbell, the noted sugar planter, Alex turned up at the Occidental hotel, and threw himself on Sam's hands. Sam sent the prodigal to his great sheep farm on one of the Hawaiian islands. There Mackintosh lived in peace and plenty until his worn spirit passed, a week or so ago. Cast out by all the world, he had found a haven in the homestead of the man whom some of the Cosmopolitans sought to exclude on account of his dark skin. Many have touched the big heart beneath that sun-browned covering, and incidentally the fat purse in his pocket.

He—Must we take along a chaperon?

She—Certainly, but I've arranged it to get rid of her at the proper time.

Cleared His Account With Mackay

..I chanced to see two well-known people chatting together in the corridor of the Palace hotel, the other day, and seeing them reminded me of two little stories, in no way associating them but characteristic of each. The one was Pat Lennon, the old-time mining man, editor and pioneer of many Western cities. The other was Miss Salisbury, niece of Monroe Salisbury and grand niece of James G. Blaine. In the early days, but after Fair and Mackay had made their great strike, Pat Lennon at one time was in need of financial air, and, like many another man, turned to one of these rich friends. It was Mackay who offered him what he wanted, but in handing him the check, for fifty thousand, I believe, Mackay said: "Do you know, Pat, I have lent piles of money, but there has been only one man that ever paid me back, and that man I've got on my books in big black letters. I can't forget him."

Pat Lennon used the money for the purpose he desired it and made good with it, so that when the expiration of the note came, he was ready to meet the obligation. He wrote the check and pinned it on to the following note:

"John Mackay—Enclosed find your check for fifty thousand, due this date, and don't you forget to put my name alongside of that other fellow's, damn you.

PAT."

Miss Salisbury Scores Her Point

As I recalled the story, I looked up and saw the old-time editor fairly beaming under some charm of words with which the vivacious girl was binding him, and I recalled what some reporter man had said of her; that she was the most thoroughly unaffected American girl he had ever seen. At one time in Salt Lake Miss Salisbury, with a very aristocratic friend of hers, was passing a new building when she chanced to catch sight of one of the workingmen whom she knew. "Why, Mike," she said, rushing over to him, "I didn't know you were here." They chatted a moment; then she turned and said: "But let me introduce you to my friend, Mrs. Willard-Potter-Brown-Asterbuilt."

Mike started to speak affably, but the Mrs. Willard-and-the-rest-of-it froze him cold. For a moment the girl was nonplussed; then she turned frowningly on the workingman. "It seems to me, Mike," she said severely, "that you do not treat my friends with much cordiality." Mike was what his name signified, and he saw the point.

Plan for a National Theatre

According to local theatrical gossip, Andrew Carnegie has at last been won over to help back the scheme of a national theatre in New York. The scheme contemplates an organization to be chartered and managed by an American director, to be chosen by a board of fifteen directors. Three of these are to be chosen by the Association of American Dramatists, one by Columbia University, one by the Authors' Club, three by the Federated Arts Society, one by the Bar Association and one by the Chamber of Commerce. These ten will choose five additional directors. This is only one of many theatrical schemes now under way in this country. Six new thatres are now actually under construction in New York, and will be open for the public in the fall. Plans for four more have been filed, and their projectors are already breaking ground for the new foundations. The builders of these theatres say they will surpass in every way any of the present playhouses. One of them, the Drury Lane, will be the largest theatre in this country, and probably in the world.

Her Very Lively Suggestion

I told several weeks ago of the elderly society woman who is called Mrs. Malaprop on account of her many bulls and aptness for saying the wrong thing. It was she who called Knox Maddox "Mr. Dunlap" on account of some similarity in the names in her mind. Now she has outdone even her best previous efforts. Some well-known young women were at her fashionable home planning a fancy ball to be given soon, and Mrs. M. was asked for suggestions as to characters and dresses.

"Why don't Ethel go as a Mexican girl and do a cascaret dance?" she asked. She must have meant the castanet, which adds so much to the Spanish national dance.

Jay Spooner—I'm going to kiss you when I go.

Miss Passe—You're sure to forget if you wait that long.

Painted a Hoodoo in Berkeley

Universities are supposed to be death to superstition microbes but there are evidently some pretty lively ones still stalking the Stanford campus. The night before Field Day some Stanford boys became infected and started up for Berkeley with a bucket of red paint to "queer" the rival college. When Berkeley got up the next morning and rubbed its eyes the fatal number 13 was daubed in gigantic figures on every prominent point on the campus. A great scrawling red "13" glared ominously opposite the Berkeley grand stand but the Blue and Gold "rooters" scorned to notice this relic of the dark ages. However when their star-man sprained his ankle in a try-out and was prevented from entering three of the events for which he was picked a winner, the Berkeleyites began to wish they had wiped those "13's" off the face of the earth.

Walter Hobart's Fancy Horseflesh

The sale of some of Walter Hobart's polo ponies to Harry Payne Whitney for thirty-five thousand dollars proves that it will be several days before the wolf will come a-scratching at the young millionaire's door. So long as he has ponies to sell, he can always realize a few dollars. By the way, I wonder how many recall when Walter Hobart owned some of the highest-priced horseflesh in this part of the world. At the time of the second horse show, Hobart was one of the largest exhibitors, and it is said that his desire to win ribbons at that modest little equine exhibit was the turn of his fortune. He purchased the Czar and the Sultan from John Bratton, the dashing Chicago horseman, giving four thousand for the two. They were both well-bred trotting horses and prize-winners. About two years before that Hobart bought from George Hulme the magnificent tandem team Superba and Mayday, at the same time purchasing C. T. Bates's tandem Cadet and Contribute, ten thousand dollars covering the price of the quartet. It was after the National Horse Show eight years ago that Mr. Bates again sold the young millionaire some horses, none other than the handsome four-in-hand, Acrobat, Athlete, Autocrat and Aristocrat. Monarch and Performer were later bought from J. F. Talmage of Brooklyn. His craze for thoroughbreds caused Hobart to add to his stables Bright Phoebus and Ferrier, Hazel Wilkes (2:11), She (2:14), Tuma (2:18 1-4) and others who had won fame on the turf. Some of those beauties were among the first to go when the millions of their owner began to shrink.

Will San Francisco's Beauty Be There?

A book on "American Beauty" is ready for publication and the smart set here is on tiptoe to see who will represent San Francisco. As the financial "graft" of all such books is practically the same people are wondering who has been vain enough to "bite." Beatrice Cameron, the compiler of the book, is evidently cleverness to her finger-tips for she has coaxed women who have secure social prestige into its covers. The only two names that have leaked out so far are those of Mrs. Walter Farwell and Mrs. Hobart Chatfield Chatfield-Taylor, whose photographs are given as the par excellence of Chicago loveliness, though the originals spend as much time in New York and Washington as in Chicago. Mrs. Chatfield-Taylor and Mrs. Farwell are sisters-in-law. Mrs. Farwell was Mildred Williams and a great belle in Washington before her marriage about a year ago with Walter Farwell of Chicago, who is a brother of Mrs. Reginald De Koven and Mrs. Chatfield-Taylor.

A Bid for Mrs. Hobart

It is known that Miss Cameron asked Mrs. Walter Hobart to represent San Francisco in the beauty line but Mrs. Hobart is supposed to have refused and another young woman with more ducats than beauty is said to have given her photograph to Miss Cameron. However the forthcoming book will settle the question.

Latest Novelty in Society

Miss Vescelius, high priestess of Musical Therapeutics, has announced that as soon as New York can spare her she will carry this new gospel of Aesculapius to San Francisco, for she believes that we of the fog-swept hills are so sensitive to music that its charms, scientifically applied, will cure us of most of our ills. Possibly Mascagni and Grau have told her how music-mad we are. The family doctor will not be able to define "musical therapeutics" for you, but Miss Vescelius will be along soon and then we may expect to hear club-women and etherealists expounding on the effect of Chopin on colds and Wagner as a cure for insomnia. Miss Vescelius has been "taken up" by New York society women and her lectures on the therapeutics of music are drawing room-crushes. The idea of course is older than "music hath charms to soothe the savage breast," but it has probably never before been seriously applied as a cure for disease. A "Society for the Culture of Musical Therapeutics" has been founded in New York and the proselytes of the faith are spreading the tenets of the cult.

Music Prescribed in Doses

Just how pleasant music will taste as a medicine depends on how much you can pay for the musician who comes to the house to administer the dose. Mrs. "Stuyve" Fish put herself under Miss Vescelius's care when her nerves were on end. A sympathetic player came to her boudoir for an hour every day and filled the prescription written out by Miss Vescelius. If the patient was feverish the first movement of Beethoven's "Moonlight Sonata" lowered the temperature immediately. Miss Vescelius does not claim that music can supplant medicine but her idea seems to be that the stethoscope and the tuning-fork ought to go hand in hand; that music has curative value that the physicians have overlooked. Some of her wealthy followers have established a tuneful clinic in one of the hospitals despite the protests of orthodox physicians.

George Newhall has bought a lot in Pacific Avenue that is half a block square and he purposes building one of the handsomest houses in San Francisco. Carrie Taylor will know how to grace such a mansion for without being a beauty she has a distinguished air and can play hostess with rare charm. With one of the finest houses in town and a collection of jewels that makes most people's look like near-diamonds she will be the envy of the young matrons. The wedding day is still a carefully guarded secret but I hear that it is dated for early summer, and that the bridal party will be composed largely of matrons-of-honor as most of Miss Taylor's intimate friends belong to the young married set.

Gayboy—I've seen you out rather frequently with Mrs. Dasher lately. Is n't she an expensive habit?

Slowboy—Well, er, I dunno; but for the life of me I can't understand how Dasher stands the pace.

Married in Reno

A very pretty wedding, and one not devoid of romance, took place last Sunday afternoon in the Congregational Church of Reno. The contracting parties were Henry C. Cutting, the young Tonopah magnate, and Mrs. Minetta Chesson of this city. Dr. Joseph Edward Stubbs, President of Nevada State University, the groom's friend and former instructor, officiated. Mr. Cutting, who made a considerable fortune during the early days of Tonopah, met Mrs. Chesson during one of his visits to this city. Mr. Cutting returned to Tonopah and named his last-discovered claim "The Minetta." Soon after he returned to San Francisco and opened a broker's office, his friends say in order to be near his fiancee. Whatever may have been the cause, he succeeded equally well in fortune and love, and the cortege of friends who met the happy pair at Reno and escorted them to the church represented a large portion of the combined population of Reno and Tonopah. Mr. Cutting, who came to Tonopah during the early days of that camp with four dollars in cash, is supposed to be climbing rapidly toward the million-dollar mark. He will erect a handsome residence in this city. Upon their return from the honeymoon, about May first, Mr. and Mrs. Cutting will take up their residence on Broadway pending the completion of their new home.

Barred All but the Pewholders

It would take more than forty days of repentance to condone the offensive scenes that were enacted in front of Trinity church on Easter day. Those who were not pewholders came early and fluttered their finery in front of the barred doors. Two policemen were there, probably to keep the crowd from forcing their way into the church should they attempt to wedge in. But for the most part the waiting people were quiet and well-mannered and the presence of the policemen was resented by them. When the doors finally opened a dozen ushers barred the way, refusing to allow any one to enter until every pew-holder was seated. Among those waiting were many tourists who were not there out of mere modish curiosity, and they were indignant at the manner in which they were treated.

She was Deeply Mortified

The Peri at the gate was made about as welcome as these strangers at the door of the sanctuary. Every time a carriage rolled up the crowd was hustled off the sidewalk to give the "pay customers," as some one called them, full sweep of the pavement. The majority of the crowd realized that the pewholders had justifiable privileges, but they objected to being mob-handled by the ushers and policemen when there was nothing in their behavior that warranted such treatment. Dozens of them turned away in disgust and the ushers came in for some very uncomplimentary remarks. Mrs. J. Dennison Matthews, an Eastern woman of wealth, not knowing that entrance was forbidden, got as far as the vestibule when one of the ushers seized her by the arm and urged her to the outside door. Mrs. Matthews was so mortified that when she returned to her hotel she sent for a lawyer, but by the time he arrived her anger had cooled and she decided to overlook the matter. But it is safe to say that she and the rest of the visitors who were offended will not include Easter service among San Francisco's delights.

A Church of Christ

There was a deal of difference in the way the crowd was treated at Grace church. No guardian of the peace was there to watch that the non-pewholders should not gain entrance. The latter waited outside until by degrees they were admitted. There was a cord across each aisle, as a matter of precaution, but the ushers were courteous in their manner and not dragon-like. A few at a time, the strangers were given seats. A. B. McCreery, the millionaire, who worshiped solo in his pew, allowed several of the non-elect to occupy seats therein. Grace church is not the sanctuary of the snobocracy. The old Southern families as a rule hold pews there and they have retained the notions of hospitality that won them renown before the Civil War, before they came to California.

Didn't Injure Her Beauty

Mrs. Will Taylor had the Hopkins pew all to herself on Easter day and as a result an absurd rumor ran around the aisles to the effect that Mrs. Gus Taylor had been so disfigured in that recent automobile accident that she was going to take the veil—not the kind that suggests nunneries but the kindly mesh that half reveals and wholly conceals. In other words it was said that Mrs. Taylor's beauty was so impaired by the accident that she would have to shun daylight scrutiny for some months. As Mrs. Taylor always answers the roll-call on dress-parade day her conspicuous absence on Easter lent color to the report that her face was laid up for repairs. But as a matter of fact there is not a scratch nor a scar to form a "cross marks the spot" where the cruel wheels grazed. Mrs. Taylor's bruises are matters of the past and it is not because she has been scratched from the beauty list that she stays so closely under cover at Menlo. She is so interested in that new house E. W. Hopkins is building for her that she would rather be "among those present" when the carpenters get in their fine touches, than shine at a fashionable gathering.

What Rattled Fred McNear

Apropos of that automobile accident, however, it is now certain that it was not caused by an itinerant house, as the autoists thought at the time. Fred McNear was running the machine and did some sort of fancy manipulating to get out of the way of a house that suddenly loomed up before them in the middle of the street. The next moment the automobile was turning handsprings and the occupants were thrown into the air. Now it seems that the house that was being moved stood half a block away from the spot where the accident occurred and it was only the shadow thrown by the house that rattled Mr. McNear and precipitated his guests. He has had to stand all sorts of chaffing on "seeing double" and is the recipient of numerous mathematical calculations as to how far a two-story house on wheels casts its shadow.

Among the week's arrivals at Byron Springs were Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Milton, Mr. and Mrs. J. de la Montanya and H. M. Hickei from San Francisco, L. M. Jacobs of New York, F. A. Boole of the Sanger Lumber Company, and Mrs. Boole.

The Haughty Mrs. Pat.

Now that Mrs. Patrick Campbell has carried the progress of dramatic enlightenment into other fields, there are many rebels among us who declare that they were disappointed in the much-advertised Englishwoman. Her haughty disdain of public demands certainly made her fashionable, for the ton loves to be Juggernauted, but the Philistine and the iconoclast saw nothing but irritation in the beautiful woman's languid indifference. As a study in modes, however, she was valuable, and the "Tanqueray hat" is becoming prominent in the shop windows. The women went openly and unashamed to see how she dressed. "How many acts are there to 'The Second Mrs. Tanqueray'?" asked a friend of a prominent matron. "Let me see," said the lady, "she had on pink in the first, white in the second and blue in the third and fourth—there must have been four."

One of the Blase

A well known clubman who poses as a blase critic said, "Tanqueray was very soothing. I slept during the first three acts and went out in the fourth." The lateness of one of the curtains during Mrs. Campbell's engagement here has at last been explained. The call before the rise of the curtain was made, but Mrs. Campbell failed to respond. The audience began to applaud impatiently, but still no answer from the cool Englishwoman. At last a trembling maid rapped at her door, responded to the summons from within, and found Mrs. Campbell busily writing a letter. "The audience is waiting for you, ma'am," said the girl. "Let them wait," replied Mrs. Campbell, "I intend to finish this letter before I do anything else."

Mrs. Carolan Visited Mrs. Pat.

prestige of her presence to social functions, she found it impossible to maintain an impenetrable aloofness. Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox wasn't the only person who invaded the Arctic circle of reserve in which the actress sequestered herself. Mrs. Frank Carolan came all the way from Blingum to pay Mrs. Campbell the compliment of a visit. She had never met the actress, and she didn't have a letter of introduction, but those circumstances constituted a trifling handicap for the bold dame from Blingum. Into the presence of Mrs. Campbell she sallied, much to the latter's amazement.

"I am Mrs. Pullman-Carolan," said the lady from Blingum by way of introduction.

She probably adopted the hyphenated name for the occasion, thinking to impress the Englishwoman, who has doubtless contributed to the meagre income of more than one Pullman porter; or perhaps she thought that as Mrs. Campbell had been entertained in Chicago she would at once recognize the name of Pullman and be duly appreciative of the honor conferred. But the actress gave no intimation of recognition. However Mrs. Pullman- Carolan was not daunted.

"Everybody tells me that I look so much like you that I wanted to see if I could note the resemblance off the stage," she explained. "My friends in Chicago wrote out that you were my double."

Her Graceful Rejoinder

Mrs. Campbell inspected her visitor without appearing to be highly elated, but she was not ungracious. As she afterwards explained she has found Americans so unconventional that she has schooled herself to tolerance even under the most disagreeable circumstances.

"I cannot see the resemblance," she said. "Perhaps it is because you are so much younger than I."

This graceful bit of flattery pleased Mrs. Carolan very much. Last Saturday she attended the Columbia matinee with a party of friends, and invited them to visit Mrs. Campbell's dressing-room after the performance. While there she said to one of the party, "I think I look like Mrs. Campbell's sister." So pleased is she over the imaginary resemblance that she has been affecting the Englishwoman's style of dress.

Her Machine-Made Britishers

Many people thought that Mrs. Campbell was supported by an English company, but she wasn't. Her leading man, Emmett King, was dubbed while here "the Englishman from Kentucky." On the stage he is more British than ale and he completes the illusion with a Hyde Park dialect that bears an unmistakable foreign label. Off the stage, however, Mr. King is nothing else than a natural, genial American gentleman who pronounces "bath" and "can't" even as you and I. He was bred in old Kentucky, and he saves his anglicisms for the special uses of the Campbell atmosphere. The merest trace of an Americanism is extremely distasteful to that lady's nerves, it would seem, and it is the prime requisite of a member of her company to be able to talk like Mr. Joseph Chamberlain. Most of her support are machine-made Britishers. Unlike Mrs. Campbell Mr. King mingled freely with the populace while in San Francisco, and he was much entertained in and out of clubdom. He has not always been the hero of the Pinero parlor drama, for he first made a hit while understudying Mayo in "Pudd'nhead Wilson."

Dub Boy—Flashleigh always was lucky: they say he married a little girl just loaded with money.

Club Boy—So everybody thought at the time, but it seems now that it was a little money just loaded with a girl.

Exit Hero Hobson

The passing of a hero was never more apparent than at the arrival of Naval Constructor Hobson in San Francisco without the report of either kiss or gun. The kissing contingent among the ladies had passed through several strata of emotion, including Italian and Belgian musicians galore, since the day when Hobson was ripe for osculation. So Hobson came to town very quietly, nor was he overwhelmed by invitations to dinner. He was only banqueted once, and that by the members of his fraternity at Berkeley. With as little noise as had attended his coming he "took up his tent like the Arabs and silently stole away"—to Stockton, where the town is smaller and the girls more numerous to the square man. Miss Elsie Sperry is also at Stockton, and she and the ex-hero are rival lions, but unfortunately for the latter, Miss Sperry is well known for her ability to hold her own, and when the fair San Franciscan holds the floor Hobson is crowded to the wall—a sort of Hobson's choice, as it were.

The "Cabinet's" Outing

It was a strenuous outing that the members of the "Cabinet" enjoyed in Los Angeles as a result of the election bet made by George Patton and T. T. Williams. They reached Los Angeles late Saturday night and their itinerary opened early Sunday morning with an excursion to Catalina, on which they were the guests of Mr. Patton and Captain Banning. of the H. E. Huntington railroad system piloted them to Mount Lowe, where they enjoyed a luncheon, and then on special electric cars they visited the Baldwin ranch and the orange groves. Monday night they attended the performance at the Orpheum, and at midnight they sat down to a banquet in the Angelus hotel. The menu was a gastric symphony, but neither the viands nor the vintages were as refreshing as the post-prandial flow of wit. The "Cabinet" established a new record in after-dinner speaking. It was after five o'clock before the last toast was responded to, and until the close no one had the slightest inclination to leave the banquet hall. Usually such affairs drag, but the Patton banquet was as effervescent as a Pinero comedy. The toasts were snappy, and the responses rippled with merry jest and epigrammatic observation.

Sparkling Jests and Anecdotes

In my time I have attended many banquets, and I have heard a few famous after-dinner speakers, but never before was I regaled with such a succession of brilliant and sparkling gems as those that scintillated in the flow of soul at the Hotel Angelus. And of all clever speeches there made Ned Hamilton easily carried off the honors. For half an hour he kept the tables in an uproar as he gracefully pointed out the colossal pretensions of the statesmen of Los Angeles. Nobody enjoyed his rapier thrusts more than his host, George Patton, and the other residents of Los Angeles, including Mayor Snyder. Tom Williams was the toastmaster and with his characteristic drollery kept the affair in motion. He presented George Patton with a gold watch as a token of the "Cabinet's" esteem. It was inscribed, "To a Good Loser." In responding Mr. Patton spoke with much feeling and in eloquent style. Judge Hunt sustained his reputation as a quaint wit with some amusing doggerel. J. J. Barrett and Judge Dooling of San Benito were the spellbinders of the occasion, and Judges Kerrigan, Sargeant and Lawlor, James H. O'Brien, Walter Moore, Charley Shortridge, Charles Heggerty, Louis Sloss and others enlivened the banquet with graceful quips, dainty satire and apropos stories.

Will Entertain at Tahoe

The I. W. Hellmans are making elaborate preparations for the house warming at their new country home on Lake Tahoe. A private steam launch is being built for other things than to ride gracefully on the blue waters before the house. Twelve pretty guest chambers show that the Hellmans propose to give their friends some happy outings. Mrs. Hellman delights to entertain largely and there is little doubt but that their corner of the lake will soon enjoy a reputation for happy times.

Will Marry an English Heiress

There is a rumor that Mr. Williams, a young mining engineer to whom Marie Oge was at one time engaged, is to marry a titled English girl who has been visiting in South Africa. Mr. Williams was one of the most popular of the younger set while he was studying for his profession at the University of California. He is related to the Van Ness's and his father is one of the highest salaried engineers in South Africa. After Mr. Williams joined his father it was thought that Miss Oge would go out there to be married but their engagement was finally broken. And now tripping on the heels of her marriage to Truxtun Beale comes this rumor that he is to wed a titled English girl. His relatives here do not seem to be informed on the subject but the report has gained credence somehow.

"That Miss Dreamy Eyes must be an ideal summer girl."
"Why?"
"She just confided to me that even without a chaperon she loves to lie among sequestered shades, far from the babbling brooks."

There Is No Suitor

When a society woman obtains a divorce nowadays it is assumed that it is merely a preliminary step, the popular supposition being that in the smart set second and subsequent marriages, unlike the first, are made on earth and usually while nuptial bonds are chafing. Hence when a woman of society sues for divorce there is speculation regarding her second choice. This was so in the case of Mrs. Louise La Montagne, who was divorced two weeks ago, but I am assured that there is no foundation for the rumor that there is a suitor for her hand. In discussing the matter with some friends the other day, she said: "Those who know of my year of absolute isolation on a ranch near Rutherford do not believe that I contemplate marrying again. I have no intention of marrying any one. This tale of a suitor was started last winter by a former Californian now residing in Philadelphia, and who is friendly with the woman who broke up my home. Her purpose was to persuade people that I wished to make a scapegoat of her friend to further my own ends." Mrs. La Montagne does not intend to fly back East. She purposes spending the summer either at the Rutherford ranch or at Del Monte with her little boy, who has just returned from his school in the East.

come by the crushing poverty in which that disastrous venture cast the family his brother, Ernest, has just shot himself. He was so poor that, though a nephew of the Emperor of Austria, he was obliged to take up his residence in the barracks of his regiment. Most of us remember the time, some ten years ago, when Prince Leopold descended on this country in search of the Golden Fleece. The daily prints of that date devoted columns to his advent. Some time afterwards came the great sensation when the local agent who furnished him with the financial and social standing of the Californian heiresses was exposed in this city, and a fistful of criminating letters was published. But that happened some time afterward.

Tried to Capture Great Heiresses

Princes were a less common marketable article in those days and when he arrived in this country unsuspicious Society was all agog to get a peep at him. Very soon it was announced that he was engaged to Anna Gould; then came the rumor that Consuelo Vanderbilt, now Duchess of Marlborough, would become the Princess. Right on the heels of this followed the report that Florence Pullman was the one. This was stifled with the bulletin that Tessie Fair would certainly be the next Princess Leopold Eisenberg. Alas, like a thunderbolt from a clear sky, came the exposure that this haughty Prince was engaged on an ordinary heiress-hunting trip, that bankers and money-lenders had financed his venture and that his fearful creditors were already squabbling over ancestral estates.

Society's Eye-Opener

It was through this squabble of the creditors that the European end of the story all came out, and that story proved the first big eye-opener to gullible American society. The Eisenberg domains proved to be mortgaged to their full limit and the family, though related to the reigning house of Austria, were in desperate straits. In this extremity a great family council had been called and it was decided that Leopold with his princely title should go to the United States and endeavor to snare the richest heiress in the land. But where to get the money to surround him with the splendor due his rank and properly impress the western barbarians with his princely worth and magnificence? That point proved easy of solution in a country given over to mariage de convenance.

His Plan Financed by Banks

The plan was submitted to the Bergeische bank, the Vereinsbank and the Wuttemberg bank, and they readily loaned the Prince something like two hundred thousand dollars on the venture, taking of course his notes, duly endorsed by his family. The loan was to be repaid out of the fortune of whatever American heiress he might hook. And so it was that this resplendent Prince appeared among us with his seven valets, two dozen trunks and a retinue of lesser servants that fairly dazzled the hotel proprietors. After the exposure and his pitiful return to his ancestral estates the tragedy followed fast. The bankers and money-vultures came down in clouds and fought for everything in sight and the Eisenberg family practically disappeared. Now and then a story cropped up showing their desperate financial straits, just as this last one has regarding the unfortunate brother, Ernest.

"Why did Slowboy marry a widow to go into life's partnership?"

"He had no confidence in himself and wanted some one who could furnish experience while he contributed the capital."

Mascagni Relates His Experience

Over sparkling wine at a happy reception dinner, Mascagni has just been telling his friends in "dear Paree" what he thinks of the Americans. A letter describing the occasion quotes the maestro as saying that he would have made a fortune in this country if he had cut his symphony concerts and devoted his time to the private entertainments of the rich. He made what he described as an artistic success and a financial failure. "Ah," he said, "if I had only followed Salvini's advice. He cautioned me: 'Don't believe those artists who praise America. True art and money-making are strangers there. The trouble is that the returning artists will not always admit it.' Soon after I reached America I realized the truth of Salvini's advice, and I sent home the fine musicians I had taken over there." (What will the musician's union say to this?) "The less said about Chicago, Philadelphia, Washington and Boston the better. San Francisco was the scene of my real success. There where all languages are spoken except English, perhaps; where all people are found except Americans, where no artistic deductions exist, I met enthusiasm."

"Get into Society" Schemes

The latest serenely poised aristocrat to offer the aspiring rich American a chance to enter the portals of exclusive English society and mix with the Vere de Veres for a cold-blooded consideration in dollars and cents is Mrs. Clifford. Mrs. Clifford has just arrived in New York from London. She is almost forty years of age, "the wife of a Clifford and a Clifford by birth," looks the grande dame and talks about English society as if she were the intimate of its haughtiest members. She is quartered at the Waldorf-Astoria and has an advertisement in a morning paper offering "to chaperon rich orphans or widows for the London season and to present them at court." Her terms are one thousand dollars a month and five thousand dollars extra for the court presentation. According to her story, she must pay that sum to an influential peeress "who helps defray her own expenses by doing that sort of business for English society people." Very frankly Mrs. Clifford states that it is a purely business matter, "pounds, shillings and pence."

Will Not Furnish Husbands

"Understand," she says, "I am not a matrimonial agent. I do not undertake to secure titled husbands for American women. If I pave the way—that is enough. Already I have been flooded with applications. The wife of a millionaire dry goods merchant is one of the most persistent. I don't want to take more than one or two. They must be irreproachable in character and of the sort that one need not be ashamed of. You know I couldn't, in deference to my own standing, chaperon any one who was impossible. Whichever two I shall take abroad I shall introduce to my aristocratic friends; there will be entertainments in the country, visits to the race meets, boxes at the opera, teas, receptions and balls. Ambassador Choate has been very kind to me. I will introduce my charges first at the Embassy.

Golden Road to the Smart Set

"Of course, secrecy must be preserved in all this. This business unfortunately became public property through my advertisement in the newspaper. You know I came over to this country on the business of selling a private museum valued at half a million dollars to Mr. Morgan. One day a friend suggested to me that I chaperon a few American girls abroad and that's how I came to take up the idea seriously. I have never done this sort of thing before and it seems I didn't handle it right to keep it secret. But now I'm in I'm going to see it through. There's no doubt it can be done successfully. Such things are done every day in English society but of course only those who are in close contact with all the best families can perform the task with complete success. I know I am in that position. I have met the King at country houses and have danced with him. He is the kindest and best gentleman that ever lived. He is the gentleman first and the King afterwards. I have met your Harry Lehr, too. Make fun of him as you please, he wields great influence among your society. Still, he would not be tolerated in English society."

And so the race between the "get rich quick" schemers and the "get into society" schemers goes on unflaggingly.

"I've noticed you dancing attendance on Miss Wadleigh. I can't see what you find so attractive in her."

"Bank stock, my boy."

Has Been Made a Countess

A plain little San Francisco girl, Mary Erickson, has been granted a title by the King of Denmark. She is the first American to be thus honored and her career promises to be a noble one for she is a protege of the Countess Schimmelmann, formerly Dame of the Palace to the late Empress Augusta of Germany. The fortunate girl was not born with even a plated spoon in her mouth. She is the daughter of a Swedish sailor who gave her to the wife of a brother sailor. The little girl was taken to Chicago and when her foster-mother died the Countess, who was visiting there, was attracted by the little one's marvelous intelligence and sweet disposition and adopted her. Countess Schimmelmann had already two other protegees whom she had adopted under somewhat similar circumstances—all of them waifs of seafaring men. The three children are still in their teens and Countess Schimmelmann has just taken them to her farm in Denmark where they are to be educated with the idea of fitting them to carry on her work among seamen. She asked the King of Denmark for permission to bestow her name and title upon them and contrary to precedent the King granted it. When these three girls grow up they will each wear the proud title of Countess Schimmelmann.

Helps Thousands of Sailors

For the last ten years the present Countess has devoted herself to uplifting and succoring the men before the mast. She has a "Seamen's Home" in London which yearly gives shelter and meals to about ten thousand sailors of all nations. Countess Schimmelmann has spent much of her time in New York and Chicago and purposes returning to America after a summer of rest on her Danish farm. Hers is a life brimming with noble deeds, and it is good to think that a San Francisco girl is being trained to follow in her saintly footsteps.

Hatchet Buried at a Funeral

After years of estrangement two of Stockton's leading and wealthiest citizens agreed, the other day, to forgive and forget. The occasion of their burying the hatchet was somewhat odd. They were called upon to act as pall-bearers at the funeral of a Stockton citizen, and more than once they found themselves in an embarrassing situation. The undertaker stationed them directly opposite each other, and all through the funeral they found themselves vis-a-vis. At the close of the funeral the undertaker directed the pall-bearers to their carriages, and by a singular coincidence the two enemies found themselves the only occupants of one hack. Then it was that J. D. Peters, the banker, stretched out a hand to P. B. Frazer, the banker, and suggested that they be friends once more. The hand was promptly accepted together with the suggestion.

Dogs of High Degree

Our bench show has not the magnificent tone of the London and New York canine exhibits. There is more dog than style about our little show. In London, for instance, nearly every dog is attended by a white-capped, aproned maid, who attends to its wants as if it were a baby. In New York, the big breeders send their grooms, in neat livery, to watch over the fortunes of their blue-blooded pets. But we're getting there. There never was so much interest shown in the dog show by society before as this year, and one readily attributes this enthusiasm to the fact that so many of our social lights are themselves exhibitors. But I predict a general coolness after all the awards are made; perhaps, in another social grade, there would be hair-pulling as well as backbiting. No one can envy Mr. Raper his job. Nifty, Miss Hager's Boston terrier, sulked in a corner of his kennel on the opening night. He evidently cherished bitter thoughts toward his rivals. Andrew Welch's beautiful Gypsy Queen was much admired among the collies, also Mrs. W. P. Burnham's Yarror. This year's exhibit of collies goes beyond any of former years. The Old English sheep dogs and Irish terriers are especially interesting. S. A. Cummings's Italian greyhound, Duke, was bred by Mrs. W. A. Deane, who owns the most valuable Italian greyhounds in town but who did not exhibit this year. Mrs. Frank Carolan's little Yorkshire terrier is housed in London style, in a white satin-lined glass case that looks like a coffin but is really a fairy palace. He is the most smartly framed dog in the show.

Smartly Gowned Women

There were plenty of pretty clothes worn at the dog show Wednesday night, but as a rule it was not the smart people who wore them. Swelldom was garbed soberly, the men in everyday attire and the women in plain street suits. Miss Ethyl Hager wore a black frock and a black hat with flapping brim beneath which nestled pink roses. She was with her sister, Mrs. Walter Dean. M. H. de Young was there with his daughter, who looked charming in a pale gray cloth. Mrs. Willie Whittier, whose Heathcote Wonder is among the bull terriers, wore a tan and brown suit.

Bound for a Trip East

Friends of Mr. and Mrs. James Moffitt of Oakland are no doubt very much surprised that she has been prevailed to leave her beautiful home for any length of time. For years she has declared that nothing could tear her from it. But now she and her husband have just decided to take a trip East and visit their two daughters, Mrs. Doubleday and Mrs. Lynch. Both girls married prominent Eastern business men.

The G. H. S. Alumnæ

There were only a few "celebrities" present at the reunion of Girls' High School graduates last Saturday. Mrs. J. M. Pierce and Mrs. Grace Dickman, both of the alumnæ, contributed to grace the program with charming songs. There have been others, graduated from the Girls' High, who have won place as singers—among them Mrs. Abbott Kinney (Marguerite Thornton), Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup and Miss Anna Miller Wood, contralto of the Boston Unitarian Church and favorite pupil of Arthur Foote. Of artists one hastily checks off Emilia Kalisher, Bertha Stringer Lee, Gertrude and Lucy Wores, and Isabel Morrison Niles, now of New York. Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels and her sisters Hattie, Minnie and Frances all graduated from the Girls' High. Eliza D. Keith, grand president of the N. D. G. W., is a graduate, also Charlotte Thompson, the playwright. Poor Maud Knowlton, who had such a checkered career on the stage and elsewhere, was another. One of the "nicest" classes socially was that in which graduated Miss Brechemin, now of Manila, the daughter of Dr. Louis Brechemin of the U. S. A. There were several Army girls in the class, and the social tone altogether was high. Mrs. Julius Kahn, wife of the Congressman, is a graduate. It would be hard to limit the membership of an Alumnæ Association of Girls' High School graduates, and retain only those of social excellence. But I understand the first idea was to limit the G. H. S. Alumnæ to ninety-seven members.

Passing of a Pioneer

No one will mourn the death of James B. Roberts, who died this week, more than the Churches, to whom he had been a father ever since their own parents died. When the senior Church, who was very prominent in banking circles and in society years ago, died, he confided his orphaned children to the care of his old friend. The latter with his wife left their beautiful home across the bay and came to live in the old Church house in Harrison street, near the bridge. Florence Church, it will be remembered, married one of the Selbys. Her brother Tom married Kate Corbell, whose daughter became the wife of one of Outing's editors about a year ago. Mrs. Roberts still lives at the old home above the "Second street cut."

Flitting Countryward

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Grant are going back to their Burlingame home for a month.

Mrs. Jacob Stern is preparing for an outing at Monterey; after the seashore she will visit the mountains at Tallac.

Mrs. H. M. A. Miller is just convalescing from a severe illness. As soon as she is well enough she will go to Blythedale for the summer.

Mrs. William Friese is convalescing and preparing to go to Lake Tahoe for two months with her mother, Mrs. Isaac Hecht.

Mrs. Sig Stern is going to visit Tallac and then spend the summer days at her home in San Rafael.

Mr. and Mrs. I. W. Hellman Jr. have taken a house in Ross Valley for the summer.

Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels is at Aqua Caliente in Sonoma county.

A NEW AIRSHIP

An airship constructed under the patents of Dr. Greth will be completed early in May and will create a big sensation when it sails over San Francisco next month. This airship is a small one of the Santos-Dumont type and will carry two people. The initial trip will be made from San Jose to this city by Dr. Greth, the inventor, and Capt. Baldwin, the well-known aeronaut.

The company that controls this airship, together with three others in course of construction, will pay enormous dividends to their stockholders. The financial plans of the Company are to exhibit these airships in all the principal cities of the United States. The limited amount of stock we have for sale will double in value three times before June 1st.

This is not only a good speculation but a perfectly safe investment which is easily investigated and which does not depend upon the success of the first airship to bring returns.

The airship may be seen in this city (by appointment only) and we ask you not to form an opinion until you have made a full investigation. Telephone Bush 433 and arrange for a personal interview and a private inspection of the airship itself. FROMME & CO., 411 HEARST BUILDING.

The Test of His Life

She sat with her chin pressed upon her hands, her eyes gazing vacantly at the space before her, a cold, dull chill filling her entire being. Not six months married and all her illusions absolutely destroyed. All the charms of her dream world were cruelly stripped away and before her appeared what she dreaded most in all the world, her life linked to that of a drunkard. To her fine feelings it seemed horrible. All her life she had despised men who enslaved their manhood and their faculties to liquor, and now she, she who had such high aims in life, was awakened to the loathsome fact that all her future years were irrevocably linked to such a base creature. She shuddered like a condemned criminal who sees Siberia and the dreary years stretching before him.

That John Bowen had come into her life just as her eyes began to open to the truth regarding the character of the man she had married only added to the ghastliness of the situation. As an old friend of her husband Bowen must have known his weakness and the bitterness that awaited her. What a wretched piece of irony it all was. After an hour's struggle she pulled herself together with a resolution to face her future with all the womanly dignity she could command. So well did she succeed that all the world thought her a contented woman.

But John Bowen knew otherwise. He knew the world, knew women—after a man's fashion, and was listless about them unless they were rarely beautiful, and then he loved to contemplate them for their beauty, very much as he would a fine picture. And this may have been the reason he began to admire Marcia Cranston. He knew how she struggled to conceal the secret of her unhappy life from all the world and he was touched by the nobility of her character. She was a revelation to him in womanhood and he began to study her. And the more he studied her the more he admired her. He tried to understand how a woman of her fine feelings could remain chained to such a wreck as Travers Cranston was becoming. To Bowen the farther the wreck sank the higher the angel climbed, and their contrast struck him more forcibly as the days dragged along. As the husband grew weaker the wife seemed to grow stronger, safer and more noble in her purity and womanly dignity. Man of the world as he was he felt that if nature had created her double he would not hesitate to marry her. And in this growing faith he sought her society more and more.

So the months passed.

Early one evening he called at her house. Cranston was away as usual. Bowen knew he would come in hours later and in a pitiful condition. He found Marcia in a drear condition, a condition she had stoutly fought against for months. His heart gripped with pain at sight of her.

"Will you take me out," she said, "out into the air, anywhere? I am stifling here."

He telephoned for a cab while she disappeared to put on her hat.

Bowen was the first to break the silence as the cab rolled over the smooth asphalt of the avenue to meet the cool Park breezes. "I know what you are suffering."

"You know! Ah, but you can not know all: no one can. It is unbearable and I have struggled, oh, so hard and for so long. And now it seems as if everything was slipping from me, that my strength was at the vanishing point."

She shivered.

His heart yearned to help her, but how?

Her low, pained voice broke the silence again. "I feel like the exhausted swimmer who feels his weakening fingers slipping from the plank he clings to. I can cling to this old life no longer, even to preserve my own. Oh, I have tried so hard, and I'm alone, all alone. There's no one I can turn to for help."

He moved as if to reply.

"Yes, I know you have been kind, more than kind. Believe me, I appreciate all the delicate things you have done for me, but, oh, if you could change his habits, change him so I would not despise him so, hate him so. You do not know what it is to be thrown in daily contact with such a beast. It is not just that I should suffer in this way, year after year, with no hope, no joy to look forward to. Why should this punishment be put upon me?"

Her words cut deeply into him. But try as he would he could think of no way to help her. Bare words seemed so inadequate, and to see her now so crushed, so helpless, she, the woman he had regarded as being so strong, so supremely self-reliant, dazed all his faculties.

Evidently she was disappointed at his silence, for after some moments she said, "Let us go back, please. I—perhaps I was mistaken, after all, and these wild words may all come from my nervous headache."

"Not yet," he said, "I cannot let you return in this condition. I must do something for you. You know, you must have known for some time how much I think of you. I love you, Marcia. There is nothing in all the world I would not do for you. Let me know how I can help you and I swear I will do it."

"Then take me out of this wretched life where I am dying."

"What! you can't mean—"

"I mean what I say. I cannot stand this life another month. Feel my hands, how cold they are. My brow, it is liquid fire with fever. Oh, you do not, you cannot know the suffering I endure. I know you love me and I—I love you. I realized it before you had been visiting us a month and I knew then that my marriage with Travers was life's mistake."

"But—" he began.

"I can bear that life no longer. Oh, take me away," she moaned. "Anywhere, only take me away from him."

"Very well," he answered, and his eyes began to glint.

"You will?" she said eagerly, "where?"

"To destruction, to purgatory, to wherever souls go that are lost. Marcia," he went on, more slowly, "do you not realize that such a course is the beginning of the end for both of us? I love you, dear, you are the most sacred idol of my lone heart. Nothing outshines you in perfect honor and womanly purity. If I tear that down, what is left? Fallen idols, bitterness, darkness, nothing. I have raised you so high that to see you fall would be the destruction of my whole world. After that—after that would come—" and he looked into the darkness of the night and was silent.

A moment later her soft hand sought his and she murmured in a low voice, "I understand, dearest. Take me home."

Less than a week later Travers Cranston lurched over the balustrade at the club and received internal injuries that ended fatally ten days afterwards. During all that time his wife was his constant attendant. —The Cabman.

LIFE.

I saw a rose in a garden fair
A scarlet rose, that I longed to wear;
I begged of Fate that she'd gentle be
And give the beautiful rose to me.
She shook her head in assumed regret
And answered softly, "Not yet, not yet."

The rose's petals beneath the sun
Unfolded, tenderly, one by one,
Its rarest leaves were at last unfurled
And shed their glory upon the world;
I asked again, but again I met
The same denial, "Not yet, not yet."

One day, the color began to fade,
The scarlet turned to a deeper shade,
The petals fluttered upon the air—
Its life was over, the stem lay bare.

All through my life I have known the pain,
The harsh derision of this refrain:
The mournful dirge of a life's regret,
This mocking echo, "Not yet, not yet."

Mabel Porter Pitts.

The Astute Distiller

In the reign of Roosevelt there lived a prominent distiller who had made much money by building up a whisky trade. He had liberally patronized billboard and newspaper advertising columns, and had not disdained street-car posters blowing forth the quality of his distillery. And, because of his liberal advertising, he had grown rich.

But all at once he found the sales of his whisky diminishing. Other whiskies had gone beyond his in patronage, and he knew not the reason. He had kept pace with the other whisky manufacturers in giving prizes to buyers—a St. Bernard dog for two hundred labels, silver tea set for one hundred, a drawing-room set for fifty, and lesser bribes in proportion. He had employed famous artists to draw his posters, and more famous poets to pen verses extolling the product of his distillery.

But sales continued to fall off.

The prominent distiller pondered and thought, considered and worried, until his brain bulged forth with a great Remedy to dispel the drought.

In less than a week a great Medicine was advertised in every paper, large or small, in the United States. The Medicine was especially adapted for nervous diseases, and was no more or less than Blank-Blank's Pure (Medicinal) Rye Whisky.

Billboards proclaimed its efficacy in cases of breakdown, nervous prostration and kindred complaints. In a month testimonials, with pictures of the writers, graced the pages of the newspapers. No prominent singer, actor, writer, orator, merchant, lawyer, doctor or politician could apparently get along without Blank-Blank's Pure (Medicinal) Rye Whisky.

Prohibitionists were induced to try it, and they in nearly every case bought a case directly after the trial bottle was gone. Women, who would have been ashamed to drink any other brand of liquor in public, openly imbibed and praised Blank-Blank's Pure (Medicinal) Rye.

The sales increased so enormously that the prominent distiller had to start two other distilleries. He became a billionaire. His daughters married titles and his sons more billions.

And when he died he was eulogized as one of the greatest benefactors of the human race.

STAGE

The Columbia

"Are You a Mason?" is a brisk, breezy comedy with a lot of snappy lines and absurd situations that the delighted audience punctuates with hearty laughs. It has nothing to do with the conventional goats, trap-doors, buzz saws and other initiatory flimflams supposed to adorn the ante-rooms for novitiates but it deals in a festive and highly entertaining manner with the absurd situations that befall two married wights who artfully pretend to have joined Masonic lodges for purposes of getting "nights off." Each of course believes his relative is the real thing in the secret order. The fun begins when they meet and try to deceive each other. Their delighted and eager wives, daughters and sisters-in-law are craning over them to watch their every motion in order to at last gain an inkling of the "inviolable secrecy" of the order. And so the complications go on till a young man, a bona fide Mason, appears on the scene as the suitor of one of the daughters. Like all comedies based on the efforts of husbands and wives to deceive each other the action and lines at times shave gingerly on the edge of the unrefined. But the principals into whose hands it is given to toss the fun about know their business and play up the colors of the abounding, healthy comicalities. Thomas A. Wise is one of those big, unctuous, good-natured two hundred and fifty pound stage boys who snugly fits a two hundred and fifty pound part without leaving a crease or anything else to be desired—especially by an up-to-date son-in-law who has the failing of perking up his ears at the swish of any passing woman's skirt. As for John C. Rice, as the son-in-law, he traveled so long in May Irwin's rag-time companies that what he doesn't know in the way of "night off" parts as portrayed on the stage isn't worth meeting after the electric lights go out. The years after in no wise dulled his usefulness, or his everlasting perkiness and freshness. Edward Abeles interjects a somewhat in the line with "Charley's Aunt" and does it in a wholesome, manly way that leaves no unpleasant reminders. Little chance is given to the women in the cast to attract attention by their work. Like the little dressmaker from Mme. Jolivet's they simply act as lay figures, and come on to the scenes more to act as models and to serve as foils for the two comedians, Messrs. Rice and Wise.

Fatinitza at the Tivoli

The dear old lively opera "Fatinitza" was sung at the Tivoli this week with a cast more or less interesting, according as one had heard it done before, better or worse. But there is nothing in which comparisons are more odious than theatrical performances. However, the Tivoli gives us a fairly good idea of the charms of the von Suppe opera. Miss Bertha Davis as Lydia had a better opportunity to sing well and look pretty and crisp than in any role in which she has hitherto sung at the Tivoli. Miss Roma's voice was heard to advantage in Vladimir, but she did not invest the role with the spirit it requires. Mr. Cunningham was the terrible old general and Ferris Hartman the funny Pasha. For the rest, there were pretty wives of the harem and doughty Russian warriors, but the hit of the performance was a group of negro babies, tray-bearers to the Turks. Their active minds couldn't understand why those wiggly trays wouldn't stay still upon their active American backs. Miss Annie Meyers returns next in the popular "Toy-Maker."

The strong play of "The Dancing Girl" is rousing the emotions of the Alcazor's clientele. It is one of the cleverest things that Henry Arthur Jones ever did as is evidenced by the popularity with which it holds the boards. We have had it here before and with good casts, but this last production holds its own with them. The play calls on the principals for versatile work, both Bertha Creighton and Ernest Hastings meeting the requirements. Next week the house will produce that funny skit "The Man from Mexico." On Monday, May fourth, a special testimonial is to be tendered Charles Francis Bryant, the stage director, who is going East to join Belasco's forces. Mr. Bryant will appear as Lige Monroe in "We 'Uns of Tennessee."

Bertha Creighton's popularity at the Alcazar has taken deep root. She is making friends who are likely to prove loyal. The role of Drusilla Ives in "The Dancing Girl" was a crowning test of her breadth, scope and versatility. It is wholly abhorrent and unsympathetic and the actress who plays it must rely entirely upon her art. And yet it is this performance which confirms the earlier expressed belief that she is one of the best all round actresses who have yet appeared at the Alcazar.

The bill at the Orpheum is very attractive this week. W. C. Fields, the Colby Family, and Bruno and Russel are the hold-overs and as amusing as ever. The star among the newcomers is Arthur Deming, a black-faced monologuist whose jokes of the Ezra Kendall flavor "catch on" wonderfully with the house. Friend and Magrave waste their talents on one of the poorest sketches ever seen on the circuit. "Mr. Bruno's Burglar" should be shelved. Chas. J. Ross and Mabel Fenton present some very funny travesties on "Fedora" and "Virginius." Ross is particularly clever in burlesque.

It is generally considered that Svengali makes "Trilby." In the California production however it is not Emmett Corrigan who scores, but Fanny Gillette in the title role. Wilton Lackaye spoiled us for any other Svengali, but we are always ready for a new Trilby.

There is no more refreshing drink at this season than a high-ball of Chapin & Gore.

Of the three characters Mr. McLean has shown us during the present Shakespearean season at the Grand, his Othello is the least satisfactory. His Richard III was all one could wish for, his King John was admirable, but his Othello is weak compared with those that have been seen here before. He has not the authority of the soldier: rather is his Othello a thing of poesy. His Othello does violence to his feelings in killing Desdemona. His rage is not the insanity that, for the moment, would kill its best beloved. Nor could the Othello of Mr. McLean's conception have been so credulous as to believe a lie. He is a Hamlet posing in the Moor's garments. And I can believe that Mr. McLean's Hamlet, if we are to see him in that role, will be worth seeing. Odette Tyler has her most important role thus far in Desdemona, and she makes her a very charming, sweet and sinned-against heroine. Iago is not a role for Mayall, not at least to assume on short study. I believe Mr. McLean should have cast himself as Iago. Gilbert Gardner's Roderigo is one of the smaller parts well done.

"The Climbers," "A Modern Magdalen" and "The Frisky Mrs. Johnson" constitute an imposing array of New York successes from which Miss Amelia Bingham will select the vehicles to be used for the introduction of her company to this city at the Columbia theatre in June. The first, by Clyde Fitch, has a record-breaking run of six months at the Bijou theatre, New York; the second, by Haddon Chambers, played for over one hundred and fifty nights at the same theatre, and the third, by Clyde Fitch, is now running to the crowded capacity of the Princess theatre. Miss Bingham's initial popularity attained by her production of "The Climbers" is now firmly established.

The role portrayed by Amelia Bingham in Clyde Fitch's "The Climbers" is that of a wife who strives to lead a noble life in spite of an unfortunate marriage. The character of the husband is set forth in his remarks:

"I was a Climber after wealth and everything it brings."

"And I after happiness and all it brings," replies the wife.

George Fleming, announced ambiguously in the despatches as "the young woman writer who dramatized Kipling's 'The Light that Failed,'" is to dramatize Mrs. Humphry Ward's "Lady Rose's Daughter" for Charles Frohman. George Fleming can't be such a very "young woman." She is a writer of experience, if memory serves me aright. Years ago she wrote a novel, "Kismet," which, published in the "No Name Series," made a great success and was later given other editions over the author's pseudonym. She has also written other books, and is an authority on Egypt.

Features of Next Week's Bills

"The Toymaker" will be put on at the Tivoli on Monday next, with Annie Myers in the role of the doll. This opera is a huge favorite at the local house. Hartman, Webb and Cunningham have their original parts in the merry piece. There will be the toy matinee for the children on Saturday as usual, when each child attending gets a pretty toy. On Wednesday night Al Pape, the well known oarsman and athlete, is to be tendered a benefit by a number of the local rowing and gun clubs.

There will be fun and laughter galore at the California for the next two weeks where the big Eastern comedy success, "Zig Zag Alley," will hold forth with a galaxy of pretty chorus girls and a host of clever comedians. "Zig Zag Alley" is a "trick" farce comedy headed by those funny fellows, Zeb and Zarrow, who were out here at the Orpheum three years ago. Ben T. Dillon, a clever delineator of Irish comedy, is also with the organization.

In the first act of "David Harum," in which W. H. Crane will appear at the Columbia, Harum sells the balky horse to the Prices, by the way, stay at the one-fifty standard for Crane's engagement.

Emmett Corrigan will join the company supporting Mr. McLean and Miss Tyler at the Grand in "Julius Caesar." He will be Brutus, Herschel Mayall Mark Antony and Miss Tyler Portia. This is an unusually strong cast.

"The Man from Mexico," Willie Collier's rollicking farce, will please the Alcazar's patrons coming as a change after the seriousness of this week's play. "We 'Uns of Tennessee" comes next, Bryant's benefit, May sixth, and then "Lover's Lane."

Miss Helene Montrose, who Mr. Friedlander says is the handsomest girl in all San Francisco, will join Fischer's company when "Fiddle-dee-dee" goes on again. In the meantime "Helter Skelter" continues to attract, and there have been some changes in the program of specialties. Barney Bernard gives his parodies in the last act and the general program is: Opening chorus, "Signor Gazzana," "I'm Making a Bid for Popularity," "The Queen of the Ring," chorus, quartet specialty, "Delia," ballad "You" (Maude Amber), finale, "Down where the Wurzburger Flows," parodies on popular songs (Bernard), "Zanona," ballet, solo, duet "When Two Hearts Beat as One."

Imro Fox, the great magician, will be the Orpheum headliner. The Montrose family of acrobats, just returned from a triumphal tour of Australia and the Antipodes, have one of the most sensational somersaults in acrobatic history. J. Aldrich Libbey, who has popularized so many songs, will have Katherine Troyer, a soprano, to aid him in a musical potpourrie. Seilor and Barbaretto, formerly of "The Belle of New York" company, promise a novelty in "The Man and the Pajama Girl." Ross and Fenton will give a travesty on Sardou's "Cleopatra," Snyder and Buckley, Deming, Friend and company and the biograph will complete the bill.

Magee and Dale, comedy sketch artists from the Keith circuit in "A Hot Finish," Jack Symonds, monologuist, and Miriam Marr, a pretty coon shouter, will be new at the Chutes. The holdovers will be Seyfried and Sheelor, Green and Werner, Lizzie Wilson and Evans and Lindsey.

At the eighth monthly musical service at Trinity church, tomorrow evening, the following program will be rendered: "Gallia," Gounod, Miss Flynn and choir; tenor solo, Mr. Vinson; quartet (unaccompanied), "God so loved the world" (The Crucifixion —Stainer), Misses Flynn and Fairweather, Messrs. Vinson and Barnhart; Salve Regina, Buck, Mr. Barnhart; "Bow Down Thine Ear," Attwood, Miss Flynn and choir; "When Winds Are Raging," Foote, Miss Fairweather; "Blessed Jesu, Fount of Mercy," Dvorak, chorus; "Save Me O God," Randegger, Miss Flynn; offertory, Cantabile from Seventh Organ Symphony, Widor; "Hear My Words," C. H. H. Parry, anthem for soprano and bass solo, quartet and chorus; postlude, Toccata in F, Bach:—Louis H. Eaton, organist and director.

This evening at Byron Mauzy hall a musicale will be given by the pupils of Prof. Louis Holz when the program will be rendered by Misses M. Schmidt, Clara and Else Rahskopff, I. O. Clarke, M. E. Walsh, Louise Hartmann, Amy Jann, Irene Harrington, Tilda Schalitz, Mary, Violet and Rose Lawlor, Hazel, Edith and Grace Bell, Ethel and Edith Rodda, Maud McWilliams, Genevieve Merkle, Gertrude Rosemond and Effie Farrington, Milton and Arthur Silverstone, J. Levy and Professor Holz. The program will include numbers for piano and violin.

Gets in Readiness for Glad Vacation Time

California Northwestern Railway Offers a Long List of Special Attractions

When the vacation season begins the California Northwestern Railway Company will be ready to make thousands happy. Its lines run through one of the most picturesque regions of the State, and every here and there are ideal places for rest and recreation. Lakes and mountain streams, cosy corners in beautiful valleys, comfortable farm houses, mineral springs, natural springs, camps in the wildwood, all these are offered, and each has the advantage of being only a short distance from the city. Only a small expenditure is needed for railway fares, and in each instance the other charges are very reasonable.

In conformance with its usual custom the California Northwestern has made elaborate preparations for the glad vacation time, as is evidenced by the handsome hundred-page booklet that it has just issued. This publication, "Vacation, 1903," gives a long list of places that take summer boarders, tells of the special attractions of each place and gives the rates by the week.

For campers, there are no end of attractions. Throughout Marin, Sonoma, Mendocino and Lake counties the climate is delightful and it is a pleasure to sleep in a tent. Along the Geuneville branch of the California Northwestern, paralleled by the picturesque Russian River, are many ideal spots for camps, the river affording good boating, bathing and fishing. One of the most beautiful places on this branch is Russian River Heights, one of the most charming spots in all the West.

The booklet contains much valuable information, and all who expect to make a vacation trip this summer will do well to supply themselves with a copy before making up their minds.

A Modern Fairy Tale

The Society Benefactress.

Once upon a time there lived a Deposed Queen. It is true she was still beautiful and had only passed, by a few years, the age when she did not look it. But somehow she had lost her power and her realm being only that of Men's Truant Fancy it was not possible for her to regain it except she recovered a Magnet she had lost.

The Queen had been very powerful in her day, but like that of many Queens of the Primrose Realm her day was a short one. She had been deposed by a younger woman who had glorious eyes and red hair.

The Deposed Queen had made fortunes during her reign, she had ruled bank accounts as well as hearts, but as she had never given thought to a Rainy Day she had now nothing to live upon. She was too proud to accept the homage of subjects of no social degree, and so she pined alone. She pawned her diamonds, and seriously considered what to do next.

About this time she happened to meet one of those who had figured as King for a Day in her interesting past. He greeted her kindly, asked how she was getting along, and then lapsed into a sad silence.

"Why so doleful?" asked the Deposed Queen.

"My wife loves another," was the answer.

He then confided further his dilemma. He wished to let his wife marry her lover, for their own had been but a marriage of convenience with no love on either side. But he did not desire the world to know of his wife's defection. His idea was to arrange a divorce quietly, but his wife refused to do anything in the matter unless he would give proper cause.

"She insists that statutory grounds alone can condone a divorce," said he. "Now she has given the grounds but for years I have looked upon no woman but her."

A bright idea flashed across the brain of the Deposed Queen. She already saw her diamonds out of pawn, and herself seated on a new throne.

"That's easy," she returned, "why not have a co-respondent?"

The result of their conference was that the man who had been King for a Day went to Paris with the Deposed Queen. They made no secret of their journey, their pictures went in all the papers, and in Paris they appeared daily on the boulevards, driving through the Bois, or at the theatre. Society was scandalized, and the man's wife got a divorce and soon after married the prince of her heart.

The Deposed Queen came back alone to her own country, but she no longer seemed to mind the fact that she had lost her crown. She sent out beautifully engraved cards to a few lawyers and men she had reason to believe desired freedom from uncongenial marriages.

"Queen ——. Suite 910, —— Palaces. Professional co-respondent. Matters arranged with magnificence and attendant publicity. References."

She soon had her tablets filled with engagements. She had to be engaged months ahead. In due time she had figured as co-respondent in a case where a young Prince had married a Princess who did not wish to wed, but whose relatives had forced her to the step; another with an old King whose wife disliked the way he spent his days and nights at the Club; still another where incompatibility of temper had displayed itself before the wedding breakfast was over, and in others less savory but of startling and sensational import. She enjoyed trips abroad and to all the fashionable watering-places. She found herself growing young again. The lost Magnet was discovered. And one day a young Prince who was Heir Apparent to three thrones asked her to marry him. He was feeble-minded but good-natured and generous, and she thought it over. Finally, amid the protests of thousands whom she had helped to happy divorces, she wedded the Prince. Gifts were sent her from all over the country, and as she had acquaintances in many Queens who had reached happiness through her offices she had no difficulty in finding guests to attend her wedding, or social sponsors afterward.

The night before her marriage she sent for the Queen who had succeeded her in the Primrose Realm. The Queen with glorious eyes and red hair was now Deposed in favor of a sinuous muscle dancer with raven locks.

"Take my card-plate, address book and references," said the Bride-to-be, "I give you them with the goodwill of my business, which you can continue. You will be a benefactor to the race, and I hope will have the same good luck that befell me. When you weary of your job, pass it along to the next Deposed Queen." —The Romancer.

MUSIC

The Symphony Concert

Prominent among the musical events of last week was the Zech symphony concert. Two new selections, by members of the orchestra, "The Raven," a symphonic poem (Frederick Zech Jr) and "Among the Giant Sequoias," suite for strings (J. Louis von der Mehden), added much to the popularity of the program. Naturally the questions arise: Is Mr. Zech's poem coequal with Poe's? Is it likewise heart finding, memory haunting? Has Mr. von der Mehden made music to match the big trees? The solemn forest effects, the birds' choir invisible, the wonder of the winds, the delight of dawn, the moody midday, the dream of dusk; the infinite suggestiveness of it all—are these to be found in the "suite"? One needs not love literature or nature more than music to answer, No. Naturally, too, almost inevitably, one is led to make critical comparison between Mr. Zech's baton and the magic wand of Maestro Mascagni. And the Italian's place is with Poe and the Sequoias. In spite, however, of these odorous remarks, there is much to be said of the concert as a whole pleasantly renascent of the floral tributes with which both composers were presented.

A Musical Eight-Year-Old

Ever since the little German boy with the big soul was discovered in his nightgown playing to the spirit of light in the midst of darkness, the musical world has lain awake nights to watch for other wonderful children. We like to be amazed, and nothing else is so amazing as adult genius blossoming on a baby stalk. With such thoughts in mind I awaited between hope and fear the appearance of the very latest infant-prodigy, eight-year-old Maurice Robb. "Will the marvel of Paloma Schramm be reenacted? or will some stiff little automaton presently exhibit precisely the character of instruction he has received, nothing less and, alas, nothing more?' Now, though Master Maurice is by no means a pianola en petit, his is not the personality that takes possesion of one; his fingers do not find and keep you as did those of Paloma. That little lady seemed made of music and therefore to make music naturally. Maurice Robb makes music artificially. Musicians, like all artists, are both made and born, but Maurice is more made than born. Yet something cannot be made out of nothing! and he is certainly marvelously good material, and predictions that he will be a great musician are not wanting. Steinway hall was well filled; the applause was generous and sincere; the flowers were more than the little fellow could carry. His teacher has every reason to be proud of him and of—herself.

An Artist for Art's Sake

The chamber music discoursed last Tuesday evening in Heine hall confirmed and more than confirmed all that I have said of Mr. Henry Holmes. He is an artist for art's sake. The greatest of all gifts, the gift of joy-giving, is his. The violin he holds sacred; to be used only for noble purposes; never to be profaned. Music is to him a religion—emotion touched with morality. The significance of Matthew Arnold's phrase, "high seriousness," is not hidden from him. His Beethoven is in the "grand style." He is a wizard of the "natural magic" of music. He is more: Virtue is in his violin. Applied to him the word "virtuoso" retains all its original meaning; indeed he exalts it, my boyhood friend, Archbishop Trench, to the contrary notwithstanding. In my opinion Henry Holmes's bow is as great a force for good as was Richard Trench's pen. In fact it would not be very far from the truth to say in general, that as the pen is to the sword, so is the violin to the pen. "God preserve the Emperor." Thus the pen. But you should have heard the strings saying unspeakable things in Haydn's famous quartet in C. Music takes up expression where poetry leaves it. Mendelssohn did not compose so much "Songs Without Words" as songs beyond words. What I think of Mr. Holmes's music could only be expressed in music; the violin in his hands is much mightier than the pen in mine. A feature of the evening was a quartet for pianoforte and strings (Henry Holmes), which won an ovation for the composer. The last concert of the series will be held next Tuesday evening. On Thursday evening of last week Mr. Holmes gave a concert in the artistic Unitarian church of the college town. The music matched the place, the players the music. There were two Schubert numbers, the quartet in A minor and the unfinished quartet (posthumous). The andante movement from the Brahms quartet in B flat, the posthumous Satz, and a solo (the Ernst "Elegy") played in her own wonderful way by Kathleen Parlow, completed the program. If a nobler sermon, a sermon with more uplift in it, was ever preached in that delightful church, the Unitarians of Berkeley are to be congratulated.

A Mascagni Opera Performed

The hit of the Von Meyerinck recital was the Mascagni operetta "Zanetto," the English version being by Mrs. Mary Fairweather. The plot is based upon "Le Passant," a little drama by Francois Coppee. Miss Helen Colburn Heath took the part of Sylvia and Lydia Sturtevant Sterling that of the minstrel, Zanetto, it being her first public appearance. Both ladies acquitted themselves surprisingly well. Miss Heath in particular singing and acting with all the aplomb of a veteran, and making besides a stage picture very good to look upon. The music is graceful and idyllic, but by no means easy. The cantata, "God Thou are Great" (Spohr) for soli and chorus, an ambitious number, was hardly so successful in its rendition, rather lacking in spirit. The poverty of male voices was noticeable, although the first two choruses and Mrs. Carolyn Roper von Benzon's solo went off in good style. Miss Maybelle Craig was charming in her group of old French dance tunes. The dainty music was well suited to her light but true voice and coquettish manner. Miss Jessie Burns's good enunciation was evident in Liszt's "Lorelei." Miss Lulu Feldheim's best number was the Gluck aria from "Orpheus." Mr.

Strauss hardly bore out the good impression his solo work made on me a few nights ago. His voice was quite lost in the Spohr and Mendelssohn quartets. Mrs. Arthur Lewis, the pianist, deserves commendation for her intelligent work. The strings in "Zanetto" were also good.

The Siegel Recital

The recital given by the pupils of Fraulein Lotte Siegel attracted a large audience. The participants were Mr. Berton Einstein, Mrs. L. Stern, Mr. Lucius Solomons, Miss Olga Wagner, Mr. Oscar Frank and Mrs. George D. Graham. Mrs. Stern made a favorable impression in her Mozart number and in her Franz song, "Im Herbst." Miss Wagner has a fresh, pure voice which she used with feeling and intelligence in her three songs, Liszt's "Lorelei," Rubinstein's "Es blinkt der Thau" and Chaminade's "Silver Ring," the last named being worthy of special praise. Mrs. Graham's choice of "Break, Break, Break" was not happy. Her voice was not equal to it, and she has some defects of enunciation. Her long a's became long e's; for instance, "at plea" for "at play," and "bee" for "bay." She did much better in Bemberg's "Nymphs and Fauns," the lighter music being better adapted to the quality of her voice. Mr. Frank bore off the honors of the evening in Von Fielitz's "Eliland." Mr. Solomons was not at ease in his Leoncavallo numbers, but more than redeemed himself later in Bemberg's "A Toi" and especially in Denza's "May Morning."

Mandolin and Guitar

The rare concerts of the Neapolitan Mandolin and Guitar Club always draw very large, appreciative and smart audiences. The audiences are worthily appreciative, for the Misses Theresa and Lily Sherwood, the originators and directors of the club, never fail to arrange artistic programs for these affairs, and what is more, see that they are carried to a successful finish. Their concert last week was most enjoyable in every respect, the concerted numbers being rendered in excellent style, with strict adherence to tempo. Miss Helen Pettigrew was the vocalist, her program numbers being Rubinstein's "La Nuit" and three songs from "The Prince of Pilsen" by Gustav Luders. Signor Martinez performed a Liszt transcription of the Ballade from "The Flying Dutchman," and the Eureka Quartet furnished two numbers, "The Vogel Waltz" and "The Wild Irish Rose." Mr. D. M. Lawrence, the first tenor, was also heard in a solo.

Miss Alexander's Recital

A fashionable audience listened to Miss Clara Alexander in her "Dixie Darkie" recital last Saturday night. Miss Alexander has an evident sense of humor and appears to take an artistic delight in her impersonations. She is wonderfully clever in portraying the darky in his pathos, his humor and his strong religious fervor. Her camp-meeting songs were given with swing and earnestness. The greatest tribute paid to her work was by an old negro woman, whose eyes grew moist as she heard the old camp-meeting songs so faithfully interpreted. Miss Alexander was assisted by Homer Henley, Arthur Weiss and Mrs. Birmingham, with Miss Moroney as accompanist. Mr. Weiss was unfortunate in being placed first on the program as the people in the audience were too much interested in each other's appearance to give him their undivided attention. Homer Henley was down for five of Shafter Howard's songs, and was compelled to repeat "The Bowl of St. Giles." Mrs. Birmingham sang several numbers, Brahms' "Meinacht" and Bemberg's "A Toi" being especially notable. Mr. Weiss on the 'cello and Miss Moroney at the piano gave a most expressive rendition of Schumann's "Traumerei." Miss Alexander, by the way, leaves some time in October for London, where she proposes to recite in drawing-rooms. She has letters to Mrs. Bradley Martin, Mrs. Paget and Mrs. Ronalds. As Miss Alexander's entertainment is absolutely original, and the rage for Americans still continues abroad, she should not fail of making a success there. She will but be following in the footsteps of Denis O'Sullivan, Andrew Bogart, Anna Miller Wood, Viva Doane, the Withrows, Sigmund Beel, Ysadora Duncan and other Californians who gained instant recognition in London.

The pupils of Miss Helen M. Anderson will give a musicale this afternoon at the residence of Mrs. William Ede, 3520 Seventeenth street. They will be assisted by Mrs. H. P. Carlton, vocalist. —The Music Critic.

An Unusual Story

"Spinners of Life" might be called the possibilities of thought transference raised to the nth power. A man whose affairs are in a most unsatisfactory condition, who is, in fact, on the verge of bankruptcy, idly turning over the pages of a book, comes across a paragraph from Jean Jacques Rousseau: "If, in order that you might inherit a great fortune from a Mandarin, living in some far-away China, whom you had never seen nor heard of, it were necessary for you merely to touch a spot on your wall—would you touch it and kill your Mandarin?" Jack Gaffney's nerves were in a sufficiently disordered state from brooding over his difficulties that the idea became a sort of obsession to him. He dozed in front of his fire till it died out, and when he awoke chilled through, there was but one bright coal which appeared to him to have a persistency not canny. He sat and stared at it thinking over Rousseau's problem, until finally, when he rose to retire, he thought he saw a red spot on the wall, and in a spirit born of his revery he pressed the spot, exclaiming to himself that he would kill the Mandarin. Within a few days from that time he inherited a great fortune left to him by a man of whom he had never heard, who died suddenly at sea at the very moment when Jack had in intention committed a murder which would have enriched him had the Rousseau puzzle any foundation in reason. Gaffney was a sort of nondescript, a young man who knew nothing of kinship or family. He had gone through college and lived comfortably on an income which was sufficient for his needs. With good manners and social presence he was welcomed by society, though his classmates in college had characterized him as having a "streak of yellow dog" in his make-up. This is a book which will delight those who revel in attenuated theories of hereditary influences and "absent treatment," for at times it is hard to see where Mr. Thompson means to let fact end and theory begin. There is a celebrated alienist, an important character in the story, who is a friend of Gaffney's, and to whom he confides the curious coincidence of the Rousseau query, his own action, and the fortune which comes to him from the unknown source. Jack is, of course, in love, and with the advent of millions he determines to lose no time in marrying the girl, whom the doctor also loves without knowing it. Mary is a trained nurse living with her mother. She is the orphan and only child of a political magnate who was killed in a bar-room brawl on the eve of an election, by his political rival for the leadership in the "Gas house" district. Dan Harrington is such a "boss" as "J. Devlin," and is idolized by his followers, who, nevertheless, proceed to impoverish his widow when he is gone. It appears that the mysterious stranger who left his fortune to Gaffney was in reality the young man's father, who had committed a crime which made it not only advisable, but necessary for him to leave the country, and evidently Dr. Ross, the alienist, is of the opinion that although Jack has never known anything of his origin, for his mother died in his infancy, the fact that the father committed a murder and the son had put a finger on the spot which he thought he saw on the wall at the moment when his unknown father died of heart disease, was proof of hereditary instinct to take life. He also seems to be of the opinion that the money thus inherited was tainted and had better be abandoned, though there is nothing to hint that it was not honestly accumulated. His whole idea is to save Mary, though from what is by no means clear, unless marriage with a man who ardently loved her, albeit he was selfish and egotistic, as most of us are. When Mary Harrington decides on the eve of her wedding day that she cannot marry Jack Gaffney no one can blame him or her. The revelation which makes it impossible is as startling to him as to her. There is nothing that he can do but depart, and when he betakes himself and his fortune to Europe one has to ask what Dr. Ross expected, unless it were for him to commit suicide and leave his money for the establishment of an asylum for the insane. But just the same this is a good and an unusual story which it is unfair to spoil for readers by disclosing too much. One does wonder, though, why Jack says d—n, and G—d, while Mary was permitted to say "God" right out, without disembowelment, and why, if G—d, we should have Gad intact. There is a curious but most natural bit of jugglery with the ages of the Harrington mother and daughter, which one cannot but regard as a touch of realism, for Vance Thompson is too experienced and careful an observer to have been oblivious to the matter. On the first page we are introduced to Jack Gaffney, then thirty years of age. On page 57 we are told that Mary was a child of ten when her father was killed, and on page 68, we are told that "a woman of twenty is always in love." Later on she is referred to as "a slim, straight girl," and on page 155 she is "a neat little filly" to a gang of street loafers, while in the same connection where Mary is described as being twenty, Mrs. Harrington is "about fifty." When Mary was ten years of age Jack Gaffney's father committed the crime which made him an exile, and his wife died of the shock when the news was brought to her. Jack was an infant lying on the bed, where he played with his dead mother's hair. He was so young that he was put out to nurse, and had no recollection of his parents at all. Thirty years later, and the period is referred to over and over, so there can be no mistake, Jack is thirty years of age, while Mary has added but ten to her score, and bearing in mind her age at the time, and her mother's long widowhood, in connection with that lady's age of "about fifty," she must have been a mother at the ripe age of ten. If this sort of thing goes on in the "Gas house" district of New York, it is time to drop the subject of infant marriages in India and look closer at home. Dr. Ross, also, who was a white-haired young man of thirty when the tragic events took place, and who, by all methods of addition, ought to be full sixty, is represented as a contemporary of Jack's, while Kelthwaite, his father's old friend, is all but senile, though he should be a contemporary of the doctor and Mrs. Harrington. It is doubtful whether animosity would have remained so active after thirty years as to make it a questionable proceeding for Jack's father to return. Political memories are short when there are no more favors to be secured. But the story is worth while, and that is the chief concern of the writer of fiction. [Published by Lippincott & Co.]

A Charming Novelette

The only way in which to give an adequate idea of the charm of "A Comedy of Conscience" would be to reprint the story, word for word, as the author, S. Weir Mitchell, has written it. The plot, delightfully original as it is, is only a small part of the charm, for the bits of description and characterization are inimitable. Miss Serena Vernon, a spinster and a gentlewoman, living comfortably and contentedly in single blessedness on a small income, took a car to the town near which she lived with the intention of making some necessary household purchases. Not being able to decide upon what she wanted, she followed the feminine practice of securing samples from which to make a more leisurely choice at home. When she proceeded to do this in the evening she found, much to her astonishment, that her purse and its contents had disappeared, but amongst the samples in her shopping bag there lay a huge ring which she had noticed upon the finger of one of her fellow travelers. From the appearance of the wearer, she came to the not unnatural conclusion that the article of jewelry was a paste gem in a bogus setting, for which she had paid an exorbitant price, and dismissed the subject from her thoughts. The following day, as a matter of form, she consulted a jeweler as to the value of her "find," and was surprised to discover that the ring was genuine and the stone worth eight hundred dollars. As Miss Vernon had an extremely tender conscience, and did not desire to profit from what was so evidently the proceeds of a burglary, she consulted her few intimate friends for advice. These were the bishop of her church, the doctor, her most intimate friend and her cousin, John Winterburn. The sort of advice which she received and the effect upon her are part of the comedy. Cousin John Winterburn thought the story so good that he told it to "a man at the club," and the man at the club did as other men do and told it to another. It was the old story: "Thou hast a friend, thy friend has a friend and his friend has a friend; therefore, be thou discreet." In as short a time as a Marconigram could have carried it, the tale reached the newspapers, wherein it was printed with variations and scattered broadcast from New England to California, with additions and emendations till it resembled the old game of Russian Scandal. Only one thing was preserved, the name and residence of the victim, with the result of an endless procession of reporters intent on getting still further particulars. Cousin John Winterburn finally disentangled the knot with a bit of genuine comedy in which he successfully holds up a burglar and makes the fellow regale him with a recital of his criminal exploits, while he waits for the answer to a telegram which is to settle the ownership of the diamond beyond question or dispute. Incidentally there is a delightful love story which is settled quite as satisfactorily as the other matter. If popularity were not the most elusive and unaccountable thing in this uncertain world, one might predict for this little story such a run of appreciation as has greeted "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch." The illustrations are by Henry Hutt, and one can say no more than that they go with the story, which is reprinted by the Century Company, having first appeared in the magazine in 1901.

Mrs. Poultney Bigelow has just obtained a divorce. The last piece of news we had concerning her was that she had been awarded a one thousand dollar prize in a short story competition for a tale of marital infelicity. Now, did the facts furnish material for the fiction, or was it the other way about?

The Smart Set Publishing Company will shortly bring out a novel from the pen of E. S. Van Zile, which promises to be something original. It is a travesty on reincarnation. Another volume promised by the same company also deals with the supernatural or what passes for it. "A Puritan Witch" goes back to that fanatical period in colonial history. —The Bookworm.

With the Money Makers

The Lighting Situation

The recent decision of the board of directors of the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company to establish a uniform rate of 75 cents per 1,000 cubic feet for all consumers in the city irrespective of locality seems to be regarded in some quarters as a sort of grand-stand play. At all events one fact is assured, and this is if this company can do business and earn interest on its capitalization at a general rate of 75 cents per 1,000 cubic feet, it must have been over-charging to an enormous extent when it was getting $1.75 per 1,000, and latterly $1.25 per 1,000, the two prices being so divergent that both cannot be harmonized with the previous allegations of the company. As a matter of fact, however, competition is bringing its beneficial results to gas consumers in general. Some time ago officials of the company appeared before the Supervisors and stated that the actual cost of production was 41 cents, while the cost of distribution was from 50c to 54c, thus making it appear that the actual cost of the gas at points of consumption was 95c. The difference between this price and the charge, $1.25, being 30c, it was claimed was no more than a fair allowance in the way of profit. Comparing these facts with the present selling price to consumers it would appear that the company is losing 20c per thousand cubic feet on all gas furnished to consumers. Furthermore at the recent meeting of the board of directors it was stated that the payment of dividends would be discontinued for a time, at least until September, by which time it was hoped the present floating indebtedness of the company would be liquidated. The question naturally arises, if the floating debt was created while the great majority of consumers were paying $1.25 per 1,000, which was a profit of 30c per 1,000 on the cost of production, how can the company pay off this indebtedness within six months with gas rates at 75c per 1,000, which according to official statements is 20c per 1,000 below the cost of production and distribution? It is evident that San Francisco is to have a war between gas light corporations. The Independent Light and Power Company has been extending its service pipes and has never pretended to charge more than 75c per 1,000 cubic feet, at which figure they claim a substantial profit is made. The San Francisco Gas & Electric Company has been losing so many of its customers by reason of the competition that they have been compelled to meet the 75c rate in the hope that by so doing they can retain a goodly portion of their business, while in the meantime some strong efforts will be put forth either to sell the plant or to place it in such position, by installing more modern machinery, to enable them to sell gas profitably at 75c a 1,000.

Interest Lacking on 'Change

Rather a quiet tone has prevailed in the local stock market during the week and prices have fluctuated but little. Why the market should be dull is not easily explained, but the fact remains that buying orders have been both few and small and there has been a general lack of interest manifested. Lighting shares have been a subject of considerable comment and various street rumors, but the general tendency in prices has been towards lower levels and no influence appears to have been strong enough to check the downward tide. It would appear from the recent announcement of the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company reducing their rates to 75c per 1,000 cubic feet, that the corporation is being closely pressed by the Independent Light and Power Company. It would furthermore appear that the recent attempt of the board of directors of the Gas & Electric company to carry out a plan whereby they hoped to obtain for shareholders a general rate of $90 per share has resulted in failure. It is known that stockholders largely deposited their stock in escrow with the Mercantile Trust Company but the whole plan of proposed operation appears to have to come to an end with the accumulation of the stock. Of course the board of directors have some ten months yet within which they can devise some measure or measures for meeting the expectations of the depositing shareholders, but as the efforts heretofore put forth have failed it will make the subsequent attempts all the more difficult. Now that the rate of gas to consumers has been cut down to 75c per 1,000 feet, the outlook for intending purchasers or syndicates cannot be as alluring as before the reduction was made. For several weeks the price of San Francisco Gas & Electric shares has been in excess of $55, while under the influence of the announced reduction in gas rates the best bid for the shares of stock has been $50, while the Trustee's Certificates, which represent stock in escrow, are dragging with $49.75 as the best bid. This business of the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company has no effect, whatever, upon the existing options upon the stock of the Equitable Gas Company, and the transfer of the latter concern will without doubt go through as scheduled. Shares in the Central Light and Power Company are being offered at $4, but buyers as a rule are holding back and are not inclined to offer more than $3.75. Pacific Lighting Company stock is offered at $58.25, with no bids. Mutual Electric Light shares are steady at $6 bid, but holders are very firm and refuse to sell for less than $9, so there is no business. United Gas & Electric is steady at $34.50 and Pacific Gas Improvement is selling down to $35.87 1-2. Spring Valley Water shares have been quite steady during the week with a slight improvement in values. Holders are more firm in their demands and as a rule refuse to accept less than $85. Some few transactions have been recorded at this price, but buyers are seeking to fill orders at $84.75. Giant Powder stock remains steady at $66.25, with occasional sales a fraction above that figure. Savings Bank stocks all remain firm at unchanged prices, $2,200 per share being freely offered for German Bank shares. Oceanic Steamship shares are very dull with $14 the best bid. Transactions are very light and buying orders very few. What little change has occurred in the price of Sugar stocks, the recorded transactions being unimportant and without guiding trade indications. Hawaiian Commercial is in request at $47.50 with no offers to sell. Makaweli is steady at $27.50 and Hutchison at $16.25. Paauhau stock is firmly held at $18.25, with few sellers willing to accept that figure. Some bids of $18 have met with no response in offers to sell. Onomea is in demand at $22 with no sellers. Alaska Packers Association shares have flucuated slightly although the prevailing price of $151.50 to $152.50 is well sustained. California Wine Association stock is in moderate demand at $104.50 although holders as a rule decline to sell at less than $105. Sales of bonds have been moderate and largely confined to railway and some of the leading industrials.

Financial Note

According to President W. C. Murdoch, of the Western National Bank,, arrangements are being made to increase the capital from $200,000 to $300,000 and in all probabilities the new stock will be issued by July 1st. As the shares of the institution are now at a premium, a handsome amount is expected to be added to the reserve fund. It is the intention of the directors to make a further increase of $100,000 about January 1, 1904. The bank has secured the corner of the new Flood Building at Market and Powell streets. —The Financier.

The Dog

By Various Writers.

I am his Highness's dog at Kew;
Pray tell me, sir, whose dog are you?
—Pope.

From Encyclopaedia Brittanica:

Dog; a name common to several species of Canidae—a family of carnivorous mammals widely distributed over nearly every part of the globe. Many of the species belonging to this family, as the wolf and the jackal, are social animals, hunting in packs, and are readily tamed; while in confinement they show little or no repugnance to breeding.

The pariah dogs of Eastern cities know no master; they prowl about the streets in troops, eating whatever garbage may come in their way, thus serving the useful purpose of scavengers, and occasionally receiving a meal from the more humane of the inhabitants. On no account, however, must even the garments of an orthodox Mahometan be defiled by their touch, and such is the intelligence and sagacity of these ownerless curs that, having become aware by painful experience of this religious prejudice, they seem to take the greatest care to avoid giving such offense.

There are few human passions not shared in by the dog.

ALLIED PRINTING TRADES COUNCIL SAN FRANCISCO

Resting on His Laurels

Having exposed the Chinatown corruption fund, Mayor Schmitz, well satisfied with himself and his marvelous achievement has once more ceased his official activities, and modestly sequestered himself to rest undisturbed upon his laurels. Meanwhile the Chinatown gamblers are doing business at the old stand, and the corruption fund is being disbursed just as it always was. The Chinese are accustomed to sporadic interference on the part of disgruntled authorities. They have a contempt for Christian virtue as expressed by American officials, for they have successfully demonstrated many times during the last quarter of a century that the integrity of our public servants is measured by the size of the sack with which they are tempted. Whenever there has been interference with their unlawful pursuits they have understood that it was the case of another white devil whose palm was waiting to be crossed. And they have ever been ready to meet all reasonable demands. The Chinese are generous bribe-givers, and they are willing that their illegal traffic should be assessed heavily. The only serious harm resulting from their immoralities is that of the demoralization of the police department, but they should not be saddled with all the blame for that. The white lottery dealers carry on their unlawful business not only with the protection but with the connivance and co-operation of the police and other officials whose identity it should not be hard to guess. The white lottery dealers carry on their business openly, and the police have long since refrained from arresting peddlers of lottery tickets. It is a significant fact that whenever forged lottery tickets are put into circulation the police run the forger to earth in a short time. Yet it is obvious that if forged-lottery tickets were permitted to circulate freely the lottery business would be seriously jeopardized. Isn't it strange that our virtuous Mayor who has such a holy horror for Chinatown corruption funds has never had the curiosity to ascertain why the police are prejudiced against forged lottery tickets and solicitous for the business of the white lottery dealers? To exercise the police power for the protection of purchasers of lottery tickets is to foster an illicit traffic. Why should our distinguished Mayor seek to safeguard the morals of the Chinese, and wink at the demoralization of American citizens? There appears to be a premium on rank hypocrisy in this neck of the woods.

The Availability of Hearst

Republican politicians and editors are busily engaged these days in trying to determine who is the strongest man the Democrats could select for their Presidential candidate. And singular it is that the men to whom they give the most consideration are seldom heard of in the councils of the Democracy. Judge Parker, Grover Cleveland and Richard Olney are the men that the Republicans regard as the most important of the available timber in the forests of Democracy, and they appear to be wholly oblivious of the fact that none of those estimable gentlemen is taken seriously by the people who are most likely to dominate the convention that will select the Democratic standard bearer. If the moneyed interests of the Republican party were vouchsafed the privilege of selecting the Democratic candidate they would not dispute very long over the merits of Parker, Cleveland and Olney, and with any of those three as the candidate they would not be very enthusiastic in the cause of Theodore Roosevelt. However, the probability is that William J. Bryan will be as conspicuous in the next Democratic National Convention as he was in the last two, and that he will exercise considerable influence upon the various delegations. And at this time the indications are that Mr. Bryan will advocate the nomination of William R. Hearst. The most powerful capitalistic interests throughout the country are arrayed against Hearst, and they are intent upon pooh-poohing and making light of his prospects. The subsidized press and the envious rivals of the young prophet of yellow journalism studiously avoid giving publicity to the Hearst boom, but it is steadily growing, and it is becoming more apparent every day that it is something more than a mere newspaper sensation. Mr. Hearst is certainly a Presidential quantity today, and if he be nominated his chances of election will be much greater than were those of William J. Bryan, who really made a remarkable showing despite the full dinner-pail and the magnetism of McKinley. Bryan had never accomplished anything. He was merely a job-chaser with a wonderful gift of gab. He had long represented the down-trodden workingman, with his mouth, but his achievements were exclusively oratorical. William R. Hearst has done things. He has befriended the masses and he has inspired them with courage and with a sense of their rights. Grant that many of his ventures and much of his double-leaded howling were for advertising purposes; that his newspaper policy is of a demagogic tinge, and that his trust-busting is largely spectacular and theatrical, nevertheless the solidarity of labor throughout the country today is mainly due to his persistent efforts. There is no doubt that labor would respond to his call were he nominated for President, but the laboring element does not control the destinies of this country. There is a powerful conservative element that distrusts aggressiveness whatever the direction it takes, and that is the element which Mr. Hearst would have to conciliate. His aggressiveness in the cause of labor has won the confidence of the workingman but it may have alienated the sentiment of the conservatives who are opposed to revolutionary methods and experiments. William R. Hearst stands for certain principles which have long been identified with Democratic doctrine. No other prominent man in the party has so conspicuously proved his allegiance to those principles, and if the issue in the next campaign is to be a clear-cut one, free from equivocation and not to be juggled, there is no man whose availability so quickly suggests itself as that of William Randolph Hearst.

The Roosevelt Record

As it is pretty generally understood that J. Pierpont Morgan directs the policy of the New York Sun, it is of interest to know that a recent issue of that paper contained a leader endorsing the Roosevelt administration and declaring that Mr. Roosevelt is the man of the hour. Heretofore the Sun has not been enthusiastic on the subject of President Roosevelt. It has sneered at his trust busting proclivities, and it has jeered at his strenuosity. On many occasions it has artfully held him up to ridicule while pretending to admire him for his independence. Even in the editorial endorsing the Administration and conceding that Roosevelt's nomination is an assured thing, there is an undercurrent of sarcasm, and a delicate sprinkling of equivocation. While proclaiming him to be a strong man and a leader of the masses it deftly casts upon him the aspersion of demagogism.

> Keenly sensitive to the drift of public feeling and profoundly impressed by current discussion, the President saw his way to the sympathies of the people and never hesitated for a moment. Since the day that he penned his first message to Congress there has been no public act of Mr. Roosevelt's which has not been undertaken and executed with an eye single to its effect upon his candidacy. He has done nothing perfunctorily or as a man might who was only conscious that he was President of the United States and that he was doing his duty. * * * The Presidency by election, as well as by the decree of Fate, has never passed from before his waking vision for a moment.

Truly a polite and artistic way of pronouncing a man a cunning demagogue. In the same article it is asserted that Roosevelt has fought the trusts and borrowed from the thunder of William J. Bryan so persistently, that the latter has nothing left but free silver to cling to. Incidentally he is compared to William of Germany and Napoleon Bonaparte for his forcefulness and his ability to handle crises. It is evident that Mr. Morgan feels that Roosevelt cannot be beaten for the nomination.

To Foster International Friendship

Nations are becoming as sensitive and thin-skinned as individuals. So easy is it to wound the feelings of Germany that the Administration is very much concerned as to the probable outcome of repeated international pinpricks. At the instigation of President Roosevelt every effort will be made to stop the so-called German baiting which has been prevalent in certain official quarters. It is the desire of the President to demonstrate to Germany that the expressions of a desire on its part to be on terms of the most complete amity with this country are appreciated, and will be met more than half way. Therefore he has given notice to the Cabinet that he will not brook the continuance of efforts on the part of subordinates to create the impression that Germany is an enemy of the United States. The Kaiser must be stroked the right way. But the Administration was responsible for the impression in Germany that the relations between the two countries were strained, when our Navy Department declined an invitation to send a fleet to Kiel for an approaching celebration. Germany's feelings were hurt almost as badly as when Admiral Dewey said that the West Indian manœuvres were intended as an object lesson to Emperor William. It seemed ungracious on the part of the Navy Department to decline Germany's invitation, and subsequently send the European squadron to greet the President of France at Marseilles. Germany was quick to take umbrage at what seemed to be a snub, and the incident occasioned a great fuss in the noisy section of the German press. Some of the more belligerent of the Teutonic editors have been shouting defiance at us ever since and it really behooves President Roosevelt to prevent the recurrence of incidents which, however insignificant in themselves, tend to make a formidable aggregate for the stimulation of bad feeling.

A Plea for the Mirror

Women have been spending so much time seeking their rights in recent years that the looking-glass has been neglected. It is falling into innocuous desuetude. Hence the many untidy and carelessly gowned women to be seen ambling aimlessly the slipshod paths of dowdiness. The women that have been striving industriously for the enactment of emancipation laws scorn to foster those charms that guarantee to the sex certain privileges which are of much greater value than the rights they cherish. As a rule it is not pleasing to contemplate the feminine advocate of woman's rights. She usually offends with the spectacle of hairpins that have sprung from their moorings. Her skirt is quite often dragged round to one side. Her hat is seldom on straight, and there is generally a shine on the end of her nose. You never see her pause before a shop window to apply one of those parenthetical pats or indispensable dabs which are infallible in restoring complexion and harmony of ensemble. What a miserable and unalluring creature is the dabless and unpatted female! The mirror is an essential feature of the feminine toilette, and the sensible woman, the one that earns our gratitude by making the world a brighter and more beautiful place, keeps a small one on her person for ready reference. The man that jeers at a woman for devoting attention to her looking-glass is a fool. The dowdy female is depressing. She belies her Creator, for he fashioned her with intent to render her captivating, and she makes herself hideous. Instead of sneering at the woman we see engaged in searching her mirror for defects we should be generous in our applause. And then we would be candid and sincere, for since we admire the daintiness and elegance of the spick-and-span appearance, why deprecate the attention to detail which we are pleased to call vanity but which insures the fitness and the fairness of the eternal feminine?

Pestiferous Meddling in Literature

Some one has started a discussion on the old subject, who is to edit the editor? Who is to have the final word, and to say whether a thing is good or bad, or merely indifferent? What is the final test of fitness? There are instances without number in which publishers and literary advisers have concurred in refusing manuscripts, which, being accepted elsewhere, make reputations, if not fortunes, for their authors. There are very few books by new or unknown authors which have been accepted by the first firm to whom they were submitted, and if there is a publisher who has never made the commercial error of refusing what turned out to be a good thing, it must be because he has been such a short time in business that he has not had the opportunity. While the matter is left to the decision of the publisher and his official adviser, it may be said to be on a business basis, but every now and then we hear of the non-official interference of wives or daughters or other female relatives who are permitted to give an opinion. Usually it is only the favorable intuitions which are confided to the public, but once in awhile it is the other way. There is the case of a comparatively recent novel, "Sister Carrie," by an American author. Both the publisher and his literary adviser were in favor of its acceptance, and the contract for publishing was entered into. After it was all in type, and almost completed, the publisher's wife took up the proofs and she denounced and condemned its immorality at such a rate that the book was practically suppressed. The bare terms of the contract were carried out, but the novel was neither advertised nor sold in this country. An English edition was a great success, and the probabilities are that some day we shall have a belated American re-publication. And there is the story of Bret Harte's "Luck of Roaring Camp," which horrified the moral sensibilities of a compositor or proof reader of the Overland. Had she had the final word, there would have been another suppression. By the way, why is the name of that now historical damsel never mentioned? It is, like the real author of the "Letters of Junius," one of the things we should like to know. The Overland once mentioned Mrs. Sarah B. Cooper in this connection, and some one else has said that the fastidious female was afterward the companion of the well-known printer in whose establishment the magazine was brought out, a rather wide range of choice. But in any case, the question remains, whether the female relatives of publishing houses are competent to act as literary censors, and whether their prudery or pruriency is to be an established standard for the rest of the world. If a vegetarian wife or a prohibitionist sweetheart is to regulate our literary diet, we might as well get back to the Rollo books and be done with it. When there is a question of morality involved, a matter of whether a book is fit for general circulation, a publisher is capable of making his decision without petticoat interference. When it is a matter of egotistic preference, the mere fact that a woman is the wife or the sister or the daughter of the publisher does not qualify her to decide for the rest of the world any more than if she were the cook.

The Story is the Thing

"The decline and fall off" the historical novel, as the immortal Wegg would have it, is pointed by the publisher's announcement in connection with a late book that "this is not a historical novel." We may also note the disclaimer of the problem novel, and the novel with a purpose. A novel has no business with any other purpose except to relate a good story, let it be romance, adventure or what not. Primarily, the story is the thing, and whatever lesson, purpose or moral may be hidden in it, it should be well hidden. the problem novel never yet solved a problem, and for the novel with a purpose, once we suspect the pills, the taste of the jam is spoiled. There are problem novels and purpose novels by the score, which have lived and will live, but it is because they are good stories first and last. Who, today, cares about the schools of Yorkshire, the Chancery courts or the debtors' prisons of England? Who is concerned about the religious doubts which beset Robert Elsmere? Most of the writers that make use of the form of fiction to set forth their views and opinions on religion, or crime, or social laws and restrictions, have a very imperfect idea of their subject. They see from their own point of view and they take this method of setting themselves before the public, sure of a wider hearing than they could secure if they were to attempt a serious treatise, and thus put themselves into competition, as it were, with those who have made a study of the subject. They have no story to tell, and their characters are but lay-figures tricked out in shreds and patches, and second-hand garments. The best of preaching is unconscious preaching. Since children first began to read, the maxim of the nursery has been, "Skip the moral." Some of us can still remember the page or more of deduction tacked at the end of our stories, and gravely labeled "Moral." In our unsophistication we flattered ourselves that when we omitted that from our reading we had eaten our jam and escaped the pills entirely. Later on, we learned to be suspicious when jam was supplied in unlimited quantities, and to reject the whole mass rather than take our chances with the pellets. People who resort to fiction for their history, their religion, their political economy or their morals are not apt to bring away much.

On Breeding From Our Best

If there is anything that the great indifferentist, Nature, seems to have a care for, it is the preservation of species. The race, that, if aught, is her concern. To the end that its kind shall not perish from the earth, the flower hangs out its flaming signal, keeps a store of honey in its heart, and breathes out a love lure with every breath. The romances of reproduction in the sub-human world which they write who are read in "the manuscripts of God"—Maeterlinck's "The Life of the Bee," Darwin's "The Fertilization of Orchids," "Birds, Insects and Flowers," by Grant Allen—how rare they are; how finding is their fascination! Now if Nature so regards the grass as to give wings to its seeds, or some marvelous barbed or corkscrew contrivance, for their dispersion, will she be unmindful of "her darling," Man, and forget to cause him to increase and multiply and replenish the earth? May not the population problem, which of late has come between our President and his sleep, be safely left, as the old maids of both sexes would fain leave it, to the Mighty Mother? If the question were one of quantity merely, we might answer, Yes; but quality is chief of all human concerns. A man is known by the estimate he puts upon quality.

Mr. Dooley pokes philosophic fun at Mr. Roosevelt, and points a refuting finger to Archer Alley swarming with the young of man. Is Archer Alley so righteous that its seed should preferably inherit the earth? Is the prolificness of Archer Alley, conspicuous in the narrow nursery of the street, matter for national rejoicing?

You may laugh, says Darwin, in effect, at the minuteness of some of the rules for successful breeding, but the man who laughs wins no prizes. The breeding of horses, of dogs, of pigeons, of roses, is no laughing matter; neither does the prize-winner leave Nature alone. He directs her forces to desired ends, causes her to realize his ideals. Now, though man, by taking thought, may improve his own breed, he cannot very well adopt the methods of the successful breeder. But how may he best in his own case approximate the results?

In these after-Darwin days, the dictum "Blood will tell" has gained added significance. Blood, stock, original impulse, constitutional tendency, or what you will, grows in import with the growth of our scientific knowledge. The most momentous of all moments in the life of a man is that in which he chooses his parents. Greatest of the modern gods is Heredity—most powerful for good or for evil. Social progress may be said to depend in a superlative degree upon our breeding from our best. To thus emphasize the importance of happy heredity is not to underestimate the value of favorable environment, of education. But if right surroundings can do much for poor stock, how much more can it not do for good? The difference between Margaret, the infamous "mother of criminals," and Bach, the father of the famous musical family of that name, is not due so much to external circumstances as to internal impulses. "Enough; but how is the human breed to be improved?" That is the very question I wished to raise. I am not ready to answer it just here and now.

Shall we, following Plato's advice, give social sanction to the free or extended fatherhood of the great; and request of Mrs. Grundy to smile approval, or at least to look the other way, when his polygamous instincts get the better of a Goethe? Shall we cease to consider puberty, a purse, and a priest, as the sole requisites of marriage? Shall parenthood, the most important of all branches of learning, be taught in our schools, and our reproach among philosophers like Herbert Spencer be taken away? Shall we try to direct human nature to socially desirable ends? Ideas are the lords of life. Sane world ideas on this subsubject would work wonders. Powerful is the public frown, powerful the public smile. Here at least is a force that might be used to encourage breeding from the best and to discourage breeding from the worst.

What we are now doing in the matter is this: Our physical best we select, not to be fathers, not to fill fine mouths, but to be food for that foul-mouthed monster, the cannon. Of our moral best many are selected for the celibate priesthood. Among women of that society which arrogates the exclusive right of using as a hallmark the word "good," an operation that makes motherhood impossible is almost a fashionable fad. This fact would be much more deplorable were our "best people" really our best. Furthermore, according to the Herbert Spencer of half a century ago, we pay for increased intellectuality with decreased fertility, so that as fertile as a fool may some day pass into a saying. Of Nature, this must here be said: She does draw the line at idiocy. Art, too, is a jealous mistress, and many a man remains single for her sake. Again, many of those fittest for social life fail to reproduce themselves because of the difficulty of finding suitable mates.

The real problem—how best to breed from our best—is accordingly by no means easy. Archer Alley does not solve it. No nation breeds from its best. It would be to the credit of our country if she were the first to feel deeply the moral necessity of so doing. Thereby may be improved, as by no other means, the quality of feeling enjoyed by men and women; thereby immeasurably increased the sum total of human happiness. To be born with a bias in the blood in favor of noble activities, in favor of beauty, goodness, truth, is now known to be the most enviable of fates. The duty of parenthood is obligatory upon those whom wise children would choose for fathers and mothers. But the emphasis must not be laid upon the duty of parenthood, but upon its delights.

Hearst's Preliminary Step

The readers of Town Talk were not unprepared this week for the announcement of the marriage of Mr. William R. Hearst in New York. Last week I intimated that the Presidential bee was not the only insect droning sweet music within earshot of the young Napoleon of Journalism, but I must confess that I had no hint of the imminence of the event which marked the fruition of his wooing. And I am not inclined to claim the credit of hastening the happy event, though it was somewhat of a coincidence for the clear sky to drop its thunderbolt as though in verification of the horoscope I had cast. That is the second time that Mr. Hearst has attested the accuracy of my forecasting. I told of his Presidential aspirations months before the symptoms of his ambition became sufficiently manifest for anybody else to discern them. His marriage is undoubtedly a preliminary step in his advance toward the Presidency. It is in the nature of a proclamation to the effect that he has abandoned the heterodox ways of the irresponsible bachelor to devote himself to the most solemn of the duties of good citizenship.

She's Not a Society Butterfly

Judging from the accounts of the marriage published by the dailies there was some surprise over the fact that Mr. Hearst had not chosen a bride distinguished for her high social position. Indeed considering the prominence of Mr. Hearst the information vouchsafed as to his bride was exceedingly meagre. If she had been a Newport belle noted for her indifference to the conventions and her fondness for fashionable dissipations, or a smart set widow who had yoked herself with two or three millionaires and frisked with Harry Lehr, her picture would have appeared in every newspaper that sports an art department, and columns would have been devoted to a recapitulation of her charms and her accomplishments. But it happens that Miss Millicent Wilson was until a few years ago an humble chorus girl, ambitious of stage honors and exhibiting talents that gave promise of a successful career. She possessed beauty and a gentle nature that commended her to the attentions of the young millionaire newspaper proprietor. When he met her she was in the chorus of "The Girl from Paris," a Broadway production. Her sister Anita Wilson was premiere danseuse of the same company. The latter was engaged to marry Sidney Tovey, a well-bred young Englishman who was a member of the company, and through him Mr. Hearst secured an introduction to Miss Millicent Wilson, who was then not more than eighteen years of age. Both young women were intent upon a stage career, and their mother by whom they were always chaperoned indulged them in their ambition.

A Gibsonesque Beauty

It was love at first sight on the part of Mr. Hearst, and what could be more natural than that the man who has for years espoused the cause of the plain people should bestow his affections upon one of them. He took an interest in the girl from the start but only a few of his intimate friends knew that they were to be married. Miss Wilson's mother was informed of the engagement, and at Mr. Hearst's suggestion both daughters retired from the stage, and with their mother made a tour of Europe during which he frequently joined them. Meanwhile Mr. Tovey married Miss Anita Wilson, and during the Spanish war he went to Cuba where he contracted a fever and died. Young Mrs. Hearst is not more than twenty-two years of age. She is a bright and vivacious young woman and of the Gibsonesque type of beauty. The marriage is of course a notable one, uniting as it does one of the most conspicuous of the young millionaire Captains of Industry and a young woman of a comparatively humble station. But such a marriage is not uncommon even in New York where two of the Goulds and others of the millionaire tribe have lured their wives from a stage career. From acquaintances of Mrs. William Randolph Hearst I have learned that she is an estimable young woman possessing many rare qualities of mind and heart.

The Vanderbilt Marriage

The daily newspapers showed remarkable forbearance in discussing the domestic affairs of the Vanderbilt family in connection with the marriage of William Kissam Vanderbilt and Mrs. Lewis Rutherfurd. They made but brief reference to the divorce that startled society eight years ago, and only vaguely and between the lines did they hint to the circumstances of that sensational case. However, the New York Sun could not forego the opportunity to pay Mr. Vanderbilt a well-deserved tribute for the dignity with which he conducted himself under very trying circumstances. "During the time of his domestic troubles," says the Sun, "and the pendency of proceedings for divorce he bore himself with most admirable self-control, though the circumstances must have been mortifying to him, and according to report peculiarly exasperating. His treatment of his divorced wife, so far as concerns financial provision, was princely, magnanimous, to a degree that even makes it remarkable in history."

An American Gentleman

It is quite evident that the Sun believes the version of the Vanderbilt divorce case which has long been discussed by society gossips in New York. Unless that version is accepted Mr. Vanderbilt is entitled to no credit for magnanimity or having borne himself "with most admirable self-control." But even if the popular version be true, Mr.

HAVE YOU BEEN THERE?

Vanderbilt has done nothing more than a gentleman should do under similar circumstances. Every man should be guided by a desire to subserve the best interests of his children. The father of children who having occasion to distrust their mother seeks to publicly disgrace her is a cad. After all it is a petty spirit that prompts a man to punish the woman by whom he has been wronged. It was in 1893 that the Vanderbilts started on a ten months' cruise in their yacht Valiant, but the trip ended abruptly before four months had passed. Mr. and Mrs. Vanderbilt lived apart until 1895 when the wife obtained a divorce on the ground of adultery. It was understood that a woman had been brought into the case merely to enable Mrs. Vanderbilt to obtain a divorce and to marry "Ollie" Belmont which she did nine months later. Since then Mr. Vanderbilt appears to have been governed by a high sense of respect for his children, to whose welfare he subordinated any personal and selfish inclinations to another marriage he might have had. He has given himself up to the management of his railroads and he has made himself one of the most powerful of the conservative forces in the field of American railroad enterprise, and a tower of strength in the financial world. His conduct has been in pleasing contrast to that of his ex-wife and also to that of other husbands and wives in the same social sphere who rush in hot haste from the divorce court to the marriage altar.

"Why does she nag her husband so?"
"Oh, she's simply trying him out."

A Striking Contrast

At an informal gathering in Oakland the other day the Charlemagne Towers were under discussion. It was stated that since they attained their high position in diplomatic circles Mrs. Tower has been seldom heard from by any of her old friends in the burg across the bay. There are several matrons in the Oakland swim who were the intimate friends of Mrs. Tower when she was plain Miss Smith. The Smiths were at one time prominent in Oakland society, but their father entered financial straits and it was considered fortunate at the time that one of the daughters had married Leroy G. Harvey who was quite prosperous. It was while being chaperoned by Mrs. Harvey on a trip to Alaska that the second daughter met Charlemagne Tower, who fell in love with her at first sight. Now the status of the two women is reversed. Mr. Harvey met with reverses and is now comparatively poor. The Harveys are living in a very modest way in Oakland. Charlemagne Tower, the United States Minister to the Court of Berlin, who lately created a sensation by adopting a diplomatic uniform for state occasions weighted with bullion and designed to reveal ample calves in expensive hose, is a multi-millionaire. The sumptuous hospitality of his home is almost on a par with that of royalty.

The Heirs Took Notice

The gossips of Oakland have taken note of the fact that a certain handsome young woman, who enjoys the distinction of a title that proclaims her the Queen of the district in which she resides, has lost her job. Some time ago she became the companion of a very rich and elderly woman across the bay. The woman soon became deeply attached to her, and one day there appeared in the social columns of an Oakland daily a story to the effect that the Queen had ingratiated herself into the affections of her employer to such an extent that the latter would probably bequeath her a large slice of her fortune. Now the principal heirs to the estate of the elderly woman are her nieces who are prominent in the smart set on this side of the bay. It was suggested in the story that they should sit up and take notice of the winning ways of their aunt's companion and they evidently did, for now the handsome young woman is out of a job. The gossips have given the whole matter a great deal of attention, and they say that the young woman is deserving of much sympathy; that the story was a cruel one and that it was inspired by envy.

"Don't you always telegraph your husband when you're away?"

"Oh, no, he's careful to send money every week without any wiring."

The Bishop at Sea

From Ned Clough, who is traveling in the Orient with Dr. Woolsey, I have received the following correspondence:

"Among the unusually distinguished personages who voyaged westward on the Siberia was Bishop D. H. Moore, accompanied by some other Moores not so distinguished—mere satellites shining by the reflected light of the central sun. We all knew that Bishop Moore was on board as soon as the passenger lists were distributed. There was his name and title as conspicuous as the names and titles of Hon. Sam Parker, Comte M. de Perigmy, Captain Stephen Rand, U. S. N., General W. W. Blackmar, Hon. J. T. McDonough, Colonel Frederick H. Smith, and Mrs. "Captain" H. K. Struve. But the Bishop was not wholly dependent on the printed list for the bruit of his fame. The light of his episcopal presence was not aflame to be hidden under a bushel, and his own resources were sufficient to keep him constantly in the full glare of the calcium. It was Bishop Moore who arranged the first divine services at sea, and it was Bishop Moore who preached the sermon—a Methodist discourse much longer than the moral law. At the conclusion of this sermon Bishop Moore made an ass of himself in these words:

" 'I have been requested by the captain of this ship to ask you to sing "My Country 'tis of Thee." Those of you who wish to sing to King Edward may do so.'

"It is difficult to understand whether the Bishop meant this as a compliment or an insult to Captain Smith, who is born an Englishman. Perhaps his reverence was merely facetious, remembering that the tune of 'My Country 'tis of Thee' was originally the tune of 'God Save the King.'

The Bishop's Crowning Triumph

"The next public appearance of the Bishop was at a 'camp-fire' around which he and General Blackmar and C. D. Roys sat and fought their battles over while the rest of the passengers sat helpless and silent, consumed by ennui and only prevented from deserting the music-room by the thought that if they did so it would be an act of discourtesy to the three old gentlemen whose vanity had imposed them so tiresomely on the company. The program of this seance included a long introduction by General Blackmar, a long story about a bugler named 'Little Billy' by Private Roys, and a long reminiscence of Morgan's raid by Bishop Moore. When Bishop Moore had 'been heard to cease' there was not a sleepless eye in the audience. The crowning triumph achieved by the Bishop was the baptizing, according to the peculiar rite of the Methodist religion, of little Siberia, a Japanese babe born in the steerage after the ship left Honolulu. The ceremony was participated in by the entire missionary push. The mother of the babe had been asked if she would object to the baptism of her child and not understanding what it might all be about, consented. Mrs. H. C. Smith stood as godmother and M. Hashi officiated as godfather. When it was all over the unconscious victim of this flummery was ticketed for the Methodist heaven under the name of O-Fumi San, which, being interpreted according to the epistle of Bishop Moore, to the Hairy Ainus means "Ocean-ship-born." If Bishop Moore lives to a green old age he will probably administer to O-Fumi San the last sad rites that are permitted to one about to perish for piracy on the high sea of Japan.

What the Smoking Room Thought

"Among the scoffers of the smoking-room it was argued that Bishop Moore had displayed vast nerve in thus taking advantage of a poor, sick heathen steerage passenger and a helpless pagan babe, to snatch this brand from the burning for the purpose of quenching the flame with Methodist holy water. It was suggested that perhaps the Bishop intended to enter O-Fumi San in the ledger of his missionary account as a 'convert,' charging the usual commission to the home society. It was also debated concerning the reception that would be accorded a Buddhist or Shinto priest if he should propose to baptize the babe of a Christian mother in the faith of Gautama or according to the rites of the sect that has built a straight path to the Japanese elysium. There was a consensus of opinion in the smoking-room that Bishop Moore would be among the leaders of the indignant mob assembled to throw the impertinent Japanese ecclesiastic overboard.

He was Johnny-on-the-Spot

"There was a rumor aboard ship that a marriage was on the tapis, whereupon the ever-ready Bishop of Japan, Korea and China offered his services. In this, however, he was properly rebuffed by Captain Smith who informed the prelate that if there was any marrying or giving in marriage aboard the Siberia he would assert his prerogative as commander of the vessel and perform the ceremony himself. Thereafter Captain Smith was not as popular with the missionary push as he had been. As the Siberia was crossing the one hundred and eightieth meridian a poverty stricken Chinese died in the steerage. As far as can be learned Bishop Moore has not offered to preach the funeral sermon and this poor soul will be compelled to find its way to beatitude by the ordinary heathen route unassisted by a letter of introduction from the Methodist dispensation."

"What's the best thing to buy for a quick rise?"
"Hot air ships."

Captain Johnson To Be Introduced

Captain Johnston's fondness for society, as well as his recent social misstep in giving a bachelor's ball at the Presidio and failing to invite his fellow officers, has made him the topic of many a quip in military circles. It would seem that his ball-room and tea-table ambitions he has taken with the utmost seriousness and in many cases has ranked them in importance above his obligations to Uncle Sam. At calls and balls he is indefatigable, and these, together with the regular duties mapped out for him who wears the shoulder straps, render him a very busy man. The other day a group of officers were discussing the Beau Brummel of the Bachelors' Ball when one of them remarked: "That is going to be a swell function which the officers at the Presidio are intending to give Johnston."

"I never heard anything about it," said another, "what is it to be?"

"We are planning to give Johnston a pink tea and introduce him to his company," said the first officer with true military gravity.

Howland's Great Achievement

An anonymous correspondent has written to me in defense of Lieutenant Howland's histrionic ability. My correspondent is indignant that I should have failed to enthuse over Lieutenant Howland's performance at the amateur entertainment given in Golden Gate hall two weeks ago. The letter is typewritten and subscribed "A Constant Reader." The writer betrays a remarkably intimate knowledge of the young officer's affairs, and of his conduct and feelings on the night of the performance. In the first paragraph I am charged with being a poor and illogical critic for having stated that the lieutenant was "too pretty to act well." "Who ever heard of an actor's good looks detracting from his presentation of a character?" asks my correspondent. "Why, that is absurd. It usually enhances his performance." In the criticism referred to I merely quoted the remark of one in the audience who probably received the impression that the lieutenant was self-conscious. Good looks are a valuable asset on the stage, but when an actor becomes preoccupied with a sense of his pulchritude his art begins to limp.

A Genius and a Hero

My unknown correspondent assures me that Lieutenant Howland was a great success. "Not only did he enact the role entrusted to him well, but finding that the author's lines dragged and delayed the action of the play, he improvised and interpolated on the spur of the moment dialogue and 'business' which improved the farce wonderfully and made it run smoother than it would otherwise have done, which fact I learned later in conversation with Mr. Gilmore, the stage manager." No doubt Lieutenant Howland has a genius for improvising, but "A Constant Reader" also presents him in the role of a hero. "He went through the evening's entertainment, the play, as the curtain-raiser, and the minuette as the finale, with a sprained foot without so much as wincing or showing that he was in pain." And here we have been frittering away our time lionizing a Hobson while we had among us a Howland, a genuine hero who has the nerve to dance and act with a sprained foot. A bad actor he may be, but unquestionably he is a true soldier. Grit he has as well as pulchritude.

Frohman Couldn't Lure Him

But his enthusiastic admirer, my "Constant Reader," who evidently knows him like a book—almost as well, I might say, as he knows himself—insists that above all he is an actor. "I know," says the unknown, "that he has had a great deal of experience in amateur theatricals in the East, and indeed, that once in Washington he was offered an inducement by no less a personage than Mr. Frohman himself to resign from the army. He could give some of our so-called amateurs in this city, my own city, some advice in stage work. It is needless to add that your critic merely showed his or her own ignorance in writing the comment referred to. I know that in justice to Lieutenant Howland you will correct the impression which the item in your last issue may have created." Nothing could give me greater pleasure.

A Delicate Question

The Tevis baby and its light-hearted mamma continue to amuse friends and intimates. With characteristic irresponsibility Mrs. Hugh Tevis fails to regard the son and heir to the Tevis millions with great reverence. Some one asked solicitously after the child some time ago, and the little pink widow sighed and said, "It's too bad that babies can't be more interesting. One day last week the nurse had to be gone for a few hours and I was left alone with the baby. I don't know which of us was the more bored, the baby or I; but I am sure that we were both glad when the nurse returned." When Miss Baxter married Hugh Tevis she was received with open arms by our smart set, but when she was buried with her weeds in the Monterey hacienda the clasp of kinship was relaxed, and she found San Francisco society not over-urgent in its hospitality. The Baxters were really anxious to cut a wide swath in local social circles but somehow they have never succeeded in making headway.

Stockton Club Gossip

The Yosemite Club of Stockton, which includes in its membership all the prominent business men, recently had an interesting election for president. Tom Connolly was the choice of the nominating committee. He is to be the cashier of the new bank which is about to be instituted by San Francisco capital, and he was no doubt chosen for that position upon the presumption that he enjoyed great popularity in Stockton. However many of the members of the Yosemite Club objected to the choice of the nominating committee, and decided to make Frank Lane the candidate on an opposition ticket. They made a vigorous campaign and Connolly was defeated. Later on Lane sought the Republican nomination for Mayor but failed to get it. Mayor Catts could have secured renomination at the hands of the Democratic convention, but preferred to retire to private life. The administration of Catts was very popular. He made a splendid record, and would have had no trouble in being re-elected. He was born in Stockton, and for years cherished the ambition of becoming Mayor of the town. Having achieved the honor he was quite willing to retire from politics.

The Aristocrats of Ross

The scented atmosphere of exclusive Ross Valley in Marin county has been impregnated with the noxious vapors of plebeianism, and the provincial aristocrats who have long held themselves aloof from the common herd are in great distress. The exclusives of Ross take themselves with unparalleled seriousness. They frown upon people that venture along the road upon which their homes border. It is a barbed-wire exclusiveness that they maintain, and their absurd pretentiousness is as amusing to strangers as it is impressive to the polloi of the village. Some people have to wander far afield to find a community in which they may pose successfully as superior beings and awe the natives. Ross Valley was an ideal spot for most of the haughty ones that settled there. It was easy in that sequestered spot to confound isolation with that exclusiveness which has long been affected by the fictitious Vere de Vere. But now they are in distress, and all because of the invasion of the sylvan retreat by the common herd. A little village has sprung up near the station and there are several rows of cottages the occupants of which do their own washing, and flaunt their linen and flannels on the line in a manner that is positively disgusting to the old residents.

A Curiously Mixed Congregation

Long ago the fashionable residents of Ross decided that St. Paul's church in San Rafael was too remote; besides, it was not exclusive. One ran the risk of meeting one's grocer or baker in St. Paul's. So it was resolved to have a place of worship far from the gaping crowd's ignoble stare, and Ross chapel was erected. It is a curious place. The congregation includes Unitarians in the persons of the Barbers, Presbyterians represented by the Allens, High Church devotees in Mrs. Griffiths and the Dibblees, and Low Church followers in the George E. Butlers. The clergyman from whom these people receive spiritual sustenance is a suave and diplomatic gentleman who hails from San Rafael. He goes down every Sunday afternoon and preaches an exceedingly cautious sermon that pleases all hands. The first discordant note sounded in this mixed congregation was heard about the time that the George E. Butlers withdrew from Ross chapel. It appears that there had been a difference of opinion between Mrs. Barber and Mrs. Butler concerning the distribution of a certain five dollars that had been collected. Mrs. Butler was of the opinion that the Foreign Missions were in need of immediate assistance, and Mrs. Barber, mindful of the wisdom of commencing charity at home, contended that the money should go to swell a fund for the purchase of a new altar rail. I am told that the discussion between the two ladies was very spirited. Mrs. Barber won and the Butlers withdrew.

Last week Mrs. Willie Babcock of San Rafael gave a dinner at her home in honor of the Baroness von Schroeder. Mrs. Eleanor Martin and Mrs. James Follis, who will summer in San Rafael, were among the guests. The Upper Thirteen was unrepresented. Mrs. Babcock never entertains members of that unique social body. She appears to be oblivious of their existence.

Kocian a Larcenist

So the pretty, dollar-drawing romance of how Pauline Astor, enamored of the beautiful boy, Jaroslav Kocian, and of the music he made, gave him a priceless Guarnerius, grounded, as we guessed while it was going the rounds, on nothing more substantial than the baseless fabric of a managerial imagination. The Cremona, it seem, is now upon the high seas, and its lawful owner, W. C. Clopton, may whistle for it, and for the police. But if the fiddle is not where it legally belongs, it is where it belongs artistically, in the hands of a master. Is not a rare violin rather his who is able to play than his who can afford to buy it? I appeal to every lover of beauty. Beauty is forever having the best of morality, and by a divine right not yet recognized by obtuse police. I would like to bet a ticket for the next Kocian concert here that the recording angel knows on which side of the account to put such conduct down. But how the devil are we to know whether or not this sequel is not also a clever bit of advertising?

Why Clark Is Easy

There is now scarcely a subject of scientific, social or political interest upon which Senator Clark has not been interviewed. There was a time when the Senator was exceedingly shy in the presence of an interviewer, but the reporters succeeded in overcoming his prejudices. They discovered that he was vain and after that it was easy. When he first went East the space reporters tried to work him as he had been worked in the West but for a long time they failed. One night an Eastern paper wired to its western representative: "Must have interview with Clark. How do you work it?" The answer was immediate: "Tell him the world lingers on his tongue. Say you need him to make the sun rise." The next day that paper had a three column interview with the Senator from Montana, and since that time he has been good for about three columns daily in the various publications of New York and Washington.

The Moreland Inquiry

The Bishop Moreland inquiry has without doubt been an actual trial to Bishop Nichols for a week, for those who have followed the career of the young Bishop of Sacramento know that the Bishop of California has been to him guide, philosopher and political pilot. Since Moreland has been on the coast he has had the senior bishop for a sponsor in the most of his undertakings. They are graduates of the same divinity school and it was the backing of Bishop Nichols that made the Sacramento man's ascension to a seat in the House of Bishops possible. Naturally Bishop Nichols feels a sense of responsibility for the good behavior of the young man whom he discovered and recommended as worthy a place among the apostolic representatives of the church. Had Moreland been brought to trial, the position of Bishop Nichols would have been an apologetic one, to say the least. The excellence of his discernment as a judge of human nature would, even unconsciously, have been instinctively prejudiced, and with the prospect of Archbishop's honors coming before the church, there might be a very far-reaching political effect. No one seemed to remember these important facts in prophesying what the judicial board of inquiry would do or has done. Consideration for Bishop Nichols would be no slight reason for regarding the charges of the rector of Vallejo in as light a manner as evidence would allow. That the board was on general principles favorable to the accused was admitted by at least one of the jurors. It would also be strange if even in an ecclesiastical tribunal there were not wheels within wheels, and especially where churchmen must these days be careful to guard the organization against a world always cynical and ready instantly to be captious.

He Was Up Against It

It is generally admitted that the Vallejo rector exhibited remarkable nerve in preferring charges against a dignitary securely hedged by the bulwarks of high office. And it is believed that if he had more influential friends he could have come closer to the goal he so belligerently sought. People in touch with the politics of the church say that Mr. Bollard was driving in the right direction but that he lacked an expert chauffeur. His indictment was feebly supported, but even though the evidence were far more convincing it would have been hard to overcome the prejudices of the commission of inquiry. There were astute men on that board. Dr. Trew has held the Southern diocese in his hand, and was entitled to the credit of electing Bishop Johnson. Rev. B. W. R. Taylor was at one time close to Dr. Trew and Archdeacon Emery is very close to Bishop Nichols. The members from Oregon were usually found in the company of Dr. Trew. Dr. Frederick W. Clampett of this city and Dean Hart of Denver were among the strong, independent men of the commission.

He Waited Long for Fame

From the chair of political economy in a university to that of libretto writer for comic opera producers is no trifling transition but it was achieved by Mr. Frank Pixley, who has been sojourning in this city several weeks and enjoying the experience of being the motif of lionizing functions. Mr. Pixley is known to fame as the author of "The Burgomaster," "King Dodo" and "Prince of Pilsen" librettos, but before he ever thought of writing jingling lyrics for comic opera comedians he was a professor of political economy at the University of Illinois. He drifted into the newspaper business in Chicago and worked with Peter Finley Dunne and George Ade long before they achieved fame. He was also the boon companion of Eugene Field, and it was in the latter's society that he was inspired to write jingles. Pixley has had the experience which enables him to testify that after writing something for the stage it is no easy matter to secure its acceptance even though it possesses merit. He carried the manuscript of "King Dodo" in his pocket seven years before he could induce anybody to produce it. One friendly manager did consent to put "The Burgomaster" on in Chicago as a "summer snap," and it made such a hit that there was a demand for more of the same kind, and then he handed out "King Dodo." He is now engaged in writing a political satire in musical comedy form for Klaw & Erlanger. He says that this city is full of comic opera atmosphere and that he is surprised that nobody has ever availed himself of the abundant material it affords.

Artists to Migrate

The most sensational gossip current in the studios is to the effect that Monterey is soon to be abandoned by the art colony which has done so much to immortalize the famous old mission town. The dissenting painters have staked out Carmel bay, equally beautiful and picturesque, and but a few miles further up the coast, as the site of their new settlement, and it is said that the hegira thitherward will be in the near future. This change will be a matter of considerable expense, as several of the artists, among them Charles Dickman and Charles Rollo Peters, have recently built themselves fine new houses overlooking the bland blue waters of the bay. Dickman, it is said, is already packing his effects preparatory to going, and in all probability Peters, MacComas, Fonda and Evelyn McCormick will be next to follow and the "Monterey school" of painters may in the near future be known as the "Carmel School."

Soldiers Taint the Atmosphere

The causes to which this contemplated change is attributed are various, but it is pretty generally conceded that the military post established at Monterey is having a great deal to do with it. Artists complain that the khaki clad servants of the government are taking all the romance out of the old Spanish capital and that what little is left of the adobes and the sweet Castilian atmosphere is being spoiled by the governmental vandals who are pouring all over the town. In spite of the fact that Mr. Peters made his greatest fame on "The Camp by the Cross", a military subject, he has joined his brothers in protesting that a soldier is not favorable to the composition of a mission picture. Not only artists, but wealthy residents as well, are complaining of the depredations of Uncle Sammy's men, who seem to regard Monterey as their natural playground, and persist in making night hideous with their beery cat-calls and vinous roundelays.

The moving of the art colony from Monterey brings up several interesting questions, important among which is, Will the famous "Monterey atmosphere" be affected by the change of locale? It is certain that Peters's and Fonda's and Miss McCormick's work smack of Monterey and of nothing else, and it is certain that Carmel bay, though closely resembling Monterey bay, is not the same. It surely will not be without a twinge of regret that these talented Californians who established Camp Dan O'Connell, built their homes as the padres built theirs and stood as the exponents of all that Monterey means to the art world, shall abandon their old headquarters for the new.

The Picturesque Hubbard

It is a significant fact that San Francisco, the breezy Western metropolis of suppositious cowboys and prospectors, turned and stared at the sight of one man and two boys wearing sombreros in Market street. The man was Elbert Hubbard, arch poseur and professional iconoclast, and the boys were his sons, principally famous for having had their portraits published as advertisements for a patent breakfast food. Like Ella Wheeler Wilcox, Mr. Hubbard has gone through San Francisco without having been smothered under the roses of the admiring thousands, and it is a notable fact that few, if any, of the truly fastidious of the town have taken any notice of his visit to the Coast. This indifference is due to several causes: First and foremost, the little domestic difficulties which have shown Hubbard's private life to be somewhat at variance with the pugilistic morality of his preaching; second, that same preaching which has exuded a raucous self-satisfaction which, however clever, has gone far to scare the public of the Hubbard personality; third, Hubbard's universal reputation for veiled commercialism, which, despite its journalistic disguise, is still commercialism. Hubbard is essentially an advertiser. The Philistine, whatever its satirical power, is certainly the greatest advertising pamphlet in the world. Fra Albertus is an ideal lecturer. He possesses the knack of making platitudes sound like epigrams and of keeping his sombreroed personality ever to the forefront. His conversations are in the nature of interviews, for when he talks to you he is in the habit of suddenly producing a note-book and taking tab on your brains. This is not the least unpleasant of the Hubbard poses.

On the Platform

Not since the time when Swami Vivekananda expounded the teachings of Theosophy and hypnotized his hearers with his weird voice and inscrutable smile, has there been a lecturer who so completely held the attention of an audience as did Elbert Hubbard in his talk on Roycroft Ideals at Steinway hall. The audience was composed chiefly of pale young men with picturesque long locks and a great many comfortable-looking Unitarians. Many furtive glances were exchanged, while acquaintances greeted each other with an expression of surprise, as much as to say, "You here?" There seemed to be a little trepidation among the conventional, for the man who had become famous for his statement that he had "loved many women, one at a time," could not be depended upon to call a spade an agricultural implement. However, their fears were quickly dispelled and forgotten in the quick fire of pungent aphorisms that came from the lips of the tall, lean person on the stage. In appearance Elbert Hubbard reminds one greatly of the old pictures of Edgar Allen Poe, the same dark, mysterious eyes and the lines about the mouth bearing out the resemblance to a marked degree. At times there was a suggestion of Bryan in his expansive smile, and now and then there was an inflection to the voice or a peculiar gesture of the hand that was startlingly like Sol Smith Russell's. He had not talked for many minutes before every one realized that an excellent actor had been lost to the stage.

Ancient Anecdotes Revived

His impersonation of the different characters about East Aurora and the Roycroft Shop were inimitable, and his anecdotes were told with all the effect of a George Fuller Golden. It takes an extraordinarily clever raconteur to relate an old story acceptably, but the Fra uncorked several of ancient vintage that were received with spontaneous hilarity by the audience. One tale in particular that was greeted with great eclat was the one concerning his reply to the Duke of Manchester that in America we called our leisure class "hoboes". That democratic answer is usually attributed to our own Gertrude Atherton, but no matter, we appreciated its revival.

"What is the easiest way for me to stop this dreadful habit of cologne drinking, doctor?"

"By keeping it up, madame."

Tully Threatening to Arrive

Californians hear a great deal about the quick fame of Richard Tully, the talented California boy who has been placing plays with New York stars, but it might be well to wait and see if those plays appear before heralding him as a Western Clyde Fitch. Young Tully is a cousin of Tully Marshall, the well-known manager, and it is said among professional people that to have the co-operation and perfect confidence of a stage manager is to have won half the battle. Tully's college play, which was put on here while he was still an undergraduate at Berkeley, was certainly not a fair standard by which to gauge his talents, but it gave some hints, I surmise, as to the promise of his future work. The aforesaid farce, while rather barren of originality, was certainly pregnant with neat devices and situations and contained more "laughs" than the average professional show. Tully is now working in the capacity of a small sub-manager, and is learning the business from the ground up. It is said the Goodwin will put on Tully's "Strenuous Life" after the Shakespeare revival this fall.

A New Californian Novelist

The author of "The Inevitable" is not the only brain worker who has found the air of Piedmont bracing to the intellect. Herman Whitaker, who has been writing good short stories for the last three years, has had a novel accepted for publication by the Harpers. Mr. Whitaker is not a Native Son, but an Englishman. He comes of good stock, and was the eighth in a family of ten children. He was in the British army for three years, having run away and become a Tommy Atkins when he was a mere boy. His wife is a Canadian. The Whitakers tried ranching in Manitoba for some time after their marriage, but their home was burned to the ground by the Indians. After trying other localities, they came to California eight years ago, finally locating in Piedmont. They are both young and full of enthusiasm for their work, Mrs. Whitaker having been her husband's constant encouragement since he began to write. I believe President Roosevelt would approve of them. They are the parents of five boys and two girls.

"Everything comes to him who waits," said the philosopher. "Yes, even duns," added the impecune.

The Latest Municipal Scandal

Anent the latest scandal that has broken out in the Civil Service Commission involving Commissioner Mershon, Mayor Schmitz has been quoted as saying: "I very much deplore the bringing of the municipal service into disgrace. I have always upheld the merit system," etc. How refreshing is the Mayor's virtuous pose! He really does a very good stunt in that line. Only a few months ago he appointed Mershon to office despite the protestations of people familiar with the Mershon record. The appointment of Mershon in view of the notoriety of several of the deals in which that exponent of get-rich-quick scheming had figured was an unprecedented example of boldness for even a protege of Abe Ruef to give. Mayor Schmitz knew Mershon better than did many people who protested against the latter's appointment, but Schmitz wanted him on the Civil Service Commission to promote the interests of the Ruef-Schmitz political machine. Mayor Schmitz does not deplore the scandal half so much as he does the exposure of his protege by Civil Service Examiner Moran, who is deserving of credit for the courage he displayed in the matter. The statement of the Mayor that he has always upheld the merit system is entitled to as much credence as his other hypocritical utterances. Like his predecessor Mayor Phelan he has persistently ignored the merit system whenever it clashed with his political interests. He went so far as to appoint one of his brothers to a civil service position though the young man had never taken an examination.

Why De Long Rushed Eastward

When George De Long suddenly resigned his position at Fischer's a few weeks ago, and hastily sped Eastward, there was speculation on the Rialto as to the cause. But the handsome young actor who gambols in the drawing-rooms of the smart set when he is not earning a salary before the footlights left no hint among the mummers as to the incentive of his trip. The gossips of society circles, however, believed that they could guess the object of the actor's sudden change of scene. De Long's being smitten by the charms of Miss Lurline Spreckels has long been the chatter of fashionable folks, and it was noted that they were always together when opportunity offered. De Long was conspicuous at the Spreckels ball and about that time the rumor of an engagement was bruited, but both denied the soft impeachment. And as Lieutenant Skipwith of the Marblehead was also in the train of the popular belle, the tabbies were kept guessing as to which of her admirers received the greater encouragement. When Miss Spreckels left for the East it was thought that perhaps De Long had failed in his task of heart-winning, but when he threw up his job at Fischer's and hurried Eastward, it was remarked that he would arrive in New York in time for an interview with Miss Lurline before she mounted the gangplank for her ocean voyage. So the coincidence has stimulated gossip once more. Though De Long is now a penniless actor it was not always thus, for there is blue blood in his veins, and before his father met with financial reverses he was one of the swim's most popular beaux.

Bierce at His Old Tricks

Ambrose Bierce, in a recent newspaper essay, declared that Shakespeare is inartistic and that his admirers are diseased.

Naughty, naughty Ambrose Bierce!
Always saying something fierce,
Always making planets small,
Just to JAR you, that is all,
Like the kid, with sin intense
Who writes swear-words on a fence,
Bierce blasphemes for fun, to see
Just how wicked he can be.
Tired of baiting kings and queens,
Next at God he shoots his beans,
Then on critical pretext
Poor old Shakespeare gets it next—
Fiend or poet, man or god,
Ambrose Bierce must shoot his wad.

Young Weill returned from Paris only last week, and he is now visiting his relatives, the Sylvain Weills. Sylvain Weill, I hear, has closed out his business interests in his brother Raphael's drygoods house and will shortly return to Paris to take up his permanent residence. His brother Alexander resides in the French capital; he is the father of David Weill, who is here on a visit.

The Pampered Bow-wow

"To lead a dog's life" has long been used as a moving figure. Heartless indeed is he considered who refuses an alms of pity to the wretched human being of whom such an existence may be predicated. The phrase must have come originally from Constantinople. Had the phrase-maker attended a modern bench show, or seen the lordly Poodle lying in the lap of luxury, or had he been tantalized by witnessing lips, on which his hopeless fancy had feigned ten thousand sweetest kisses, lavishly bestowed on some luckier dog than he—had he, in short, observed the dog of nowadays having his day, he would surely have made his phrase to mean how much better it is to be born a blooded son of the wolf, heir of prizes and pettings, than a "brother of the ox," careless of Plato and the Pleiades.

Mrs. Stanford's Withdrawal

So wise, so noble was the action of Mrs. Stanford in abdicating the throne at Palo Alto that many will see in it evidences of intrinsic fitness for retaining the position. They will argue that a woman capable of such thoughtfulness cannot well be spared from office. But the lady has reason. It is better that she be an alma mater than the Alma Mater. The management of a great university is not naturally within her province. That calls for a combination of abilities very much rarer than that rare thing, first-rate pedagogic power. Many a famous educator has lacked the necessary executive knack. Many an able executive officer upon a board of university trustees has lacked the necessary knowledge of the science of education and practical experience in what may be called "college psychology." Fortunately for Stanford University, for this community, for this nation, for the advance of education generally, the head of the faculty at Palo Alto has the many things needful. Grant him but one thing further, a free hand, and the boy, Leland Stanford Jr. University, will be father to the man that enthusiasts in educational matters expected to see come to magnificent maturity in the Santa Clara Valley.

The Wrong Mr. Black

F. D. Black, the Seattle capitalist, and his family are visiting in Southern California. On his arrival in Los Angeles Mr. Black was surprised to learn that all of the fashionable hotels were full to overflowing and he was obliged to seek quarters elsewhere. When he reached Long Beach he was told the same story. His bad luck followed him to Pasadena and other suburbs. Meanwhile friends from Seattle who followed him south found accommodations where the Black family coin had been spurned. In desperation the capitalist consulted a lawyer friend, who on investigation found that Mr. Black the capitalist from the Sound had been mistaken for F. D. Black the pool-room king of Los Angeles. Explanations followed and the good Mr. Black is now a welcome guest.

She Started a Cold Wave

Mrs. Eliza Tupper Wilkes, the favorite lecturer of the Los Angeles women's clubs, was the speaker of the hour at last week's meeting of the Ebell Club. A number of fashionable clubwomen turned out to listen with becoming meekness and humility to an essay on "The Simple Life." It was a beautiful picture of simplicity in social life that Mrs. Wilkes portrayed. But when she advocated the admission of members of the proposed working women's clubs to full membership in the meetings of the exclusive Ebell a cold wave chilled the atmosphere. It was awful while it lasted. A simple life is a beautiful sentiment but fears are expressed that Mrs. Wilkes's theories will not work out in the Westlake and St. James Park districts.

She Carries a Gun

Burglars and footpads are holding high carnival in Los Angeles, and one of the results of the prevalence of crime is the arming of feminine reporters whose assignments keep them out at late and unusual hours of the night. Last Saturday Mayor Snyder issued the first permit legalizing the carrying of a deadly weapon by a woman press worker. It was granted to Miss Jane Sheaff who was formerly connected with the Post of this city. She has equipped herself with a silver-plated shooting iron of the most approved pattern, and thus armed goes to pink teas, Methodist conferences and Y. M. C. A. meetings. With a view of improving her marksmanship she spent last Sunday at Deadman's Island at the entrance to San Pedro harbor, but she did nothing by way of testimony to the appropriateness of the island's designation. These be strenuous times in the metropolis of the sun-kissed South.

The Story of Warner's Ranch

Ten years ago ex-Governor Downey's suit in ejectment to compel the removal of Indians from Warner's ranch came before the courts. Now the Indians are in possession of Pala valley, the "promised land" selected for them by their Moses, Charles F. Lummis, when the Supreme Court confirmed the ejectment decree. The ousting of the Indians from Warner's ranch was in violation of the spirit of the concession of the Mexican Government by which the title to that tract was bestowed on Dr. Warner. The grant was made about the year 1837. Dr. Warner was a New Englander who was suffering from consumption and who came to the coast for his health. His concession was on the edge of the desert, and the Agua Caliente Springs were located within its boundary lines. The Indians knew the healing properties of the springs and when any malignant disorder threatened their systems they bathed in the waters and were healed. Dr. Warner's grant from the Mexican government contained the provision that he was always to care for these Indians. He fulfilled the trust, watching over his charges with patriarchal kindness and treating them as if they were his own children. They worked for him in return, raising the corn that was the chief product of his ranch, and caring for the cattle. Dr. Warren entertained with generous hospitality, in the seignorial style of the Spaniards. He occasionally came to San Francisco, and his daughter Mary, who had a Spanish mother, was educated in a local convent.

Overwork and Intemperance

A warning cry is heard all over the country against overwork. We are becoming a nation of neurotics. We are burning the candle at both ends, for when we are not engaged in accumulating dollars we are devoting ourselves to excesses of various kinds. We seek relaxation from business activity in the quest of voluptuous diversions, and the consequence is that we collapse under the strain. The evil effects of overwork are generally experienced by those that neglect to fortify themselves against the attack. A man's capacity for work is in proportion to the restraint he puts upon his cravings for the things that weaken the constitution. The man that indulges his appetites immoderately draws upon both his physical and intellectual strength, and he is bound to fall by the wayside if he fail to husband his energies in hours of leisure. And there is no more effective method of husbanding them than that of sleep. The first warning of approaching collapse comes when the overworked man is unable to sleep. Insomnia is a symptom of nervous disorder. It is the tip that nature gives to the victim of overwork, and he should heed it instanter.

Irving M. Scott

By the death of Irving M. Scott, this week, San Francisco lost one of her most enterprising citizens. The shortcomings of Mr. Scott were of the head exclusively. He was pompous and an egotist, but he possessed many virtues, and was beloved by his intimates. He admired brains and culture. He was a generous patron of the arts, and constantly added to his gallery of rare paintings. Toby Rosenthal painted his great canvas, "The Immolation of Constance de Beverley," to order for Mr. Scott, who chose the subject for him from "Marmion," one of his favorite poems. The millionaire used to tell a story anent this picture, which he considered highly amusing. He was showing the painting, shortly after its receipt here, to Arriola, when Brookes, the old-time painter, dropped in.

"That's a magnificent painting," exclaimed the old artist, adding "if Rosenthal painted it."

"He most certainly did," said Mr. Scott, "for I saw him at work on it."

"Well," said Brookes, "it's incomprehensible to me. Now I've been painting for years and years, and I can't believe a youngster could do a picture like that."

"Ah," chipped in Arriola, "did you never know that a young eagle can fly higher than an old jackass?"

Home and Family

The Irving Scotts' home is in an old part of town, in Harrison street, and the house, though old-fashioned, is comfortable and luxurious. After Laurance Scott's marriage with Caro Crockett, the young people, when in town, made their home with the former's parents. The only daughter of the family, Alice, married twice. Her first husband was James Nash Brown, and after his death her nerves were so shattered that a trip to the Hawaiian Islands was undertaken to restore her health. On that journey she met Dr. Reginald K. Smith, Assistant Surgeon United States Navy. After a brief courtship they were married at the Church of the Transfiguration, in New York.

Beata Still With Us

Mrs. Campbell is no longer with us, but she is not forgotten. A Blingum matron who is a great admirer of the English actress fell out with a friend the other day through an argument over the histrionic ability of "Mrs. Pat", and the question whether "The Joy of Living" is an immoral play. And over in Oakland, on Will Dargie's paper, there is an editor who insists that the morals of the play call for searching attention. He admits that it does not provoke gross thoughts or stimulate eroticism, but he contends that it is a subtle attack on the marriage relation, "because it makes the sinners of finer mould than any of the other characters." So it is evident that though Mrs. Patrick Campbell, who turns the thoughts of ten thousand into feelings and their feelings into thoughts, is no longer with us, her "Beata" is. All the world's a stage, as all the world knows, and "Beata", the woman who dares to live, who endeavors at any price to attain the harmony Nature intended her to attain, has for the moment the centre of it. Daily the problem is being presented on the broader boards. Why not play on the narrower? Is it not good for men and women to be audience of their own ideas; to observe themselves from an impersonal point of view? The conventual ideal for woman, the woman of today will have none of. The vowless nuns of nowadays fret like fury at the narrowness of conventional walls. The wine of new womanhood cannot be held in old parchments. The modern quickened consciousness of the shortness of life but adds to the determination not to miss its sweetness. "And if they are not the holiest?" That has a startling sound when thought aloud. But the "woman that remembers in the night" has long thought it in the silence of her lonely chamber. Who has not been startled by hearing unlikely lips declare with unmistakeable emphasis: "I mean to live. I'd do anything that would make me happy. If there is the devil to pay—well, I'll pay him."

"This parting gives me pain."

So said the molar to the forceps; and the dentist's chair laughed with glee.

The Retirement of Hitchcock

D. W. Hitchcock, who is one of the most popular railroad officials in this city, and who has held the position of General Passenger Agent of the Union Pacific for a score of years, has been retired on a pension, having reached the age of seventy-two. His retirement is regretted by all who have had business relations with him, and who have appreciated his uniform courtesy. For years he has controlled the cream of the passenger traffic business out of this city. He is to be succeeded by Samuel Booth, who for the last three years has acted as confidential secretary to Traffic Director J. C. Stubbs.

Col. Jack Wright's Social Side

The late Colonel "Jack" Wright was a popular man. He was good-natured and hail-fellow-well-met. Perhaps had he not been so popular his life would not have burned out so soon. His social standing was at the top notch, and both his wives belonged to the smart set of Sacramento. His first wife was the eldest of the Hanchett sisters, and when a young girl her beauty was renowned. She was a sister of Mrs. Rutherford, who married George Crocker after her first husband's death, and of Mrs. Edgar Carroll. The second Mrs. Wright was Laura Clarke, daughter of millionaire C. W. Clarke, and sister of Mrs. H. Stuart Baldwin of this city. There were two children by the Colonel's first marriage, and the daughter, who is known to her friends and family as "Sister" Wright, lives with her aunt, Mrs. Crocker. She was her father's favorite, and is a beautiful and charming girl, very much like her mother in manner. Colonel Wright built a handsome home about two years ago for his second wife, and they entertained a good deal.

Gay In Her Bal Poudre

Stockton awoke from her Rip Van Winkle social sleep last week, put on her war paint and looked proud. The Daughters of the American Revolution gave a musicale and Bal Poudre to celebrate Lexington Day and bright the lamps shone o'er fair women and brave men—the latter trying to look unconcerned and happy with several pounds of cornstarch, talcum powder and diamond dust on their coat lapels and manly shoulders—left there by the heads of the women. But though there was plenty of starch on the guests there was none in their behavior, for the hoi polloi had been carefully excluded and the elect could afford to be gracious without danger of being misunderstood. Mrs. J. J. Tully is fairly entitled to the spurs she won as a leader at this, the first social affair given by El Toyon Chapter since she was elected regent. Mrs. Mary Sperry of San Francisco brought along her spinning wheel and gave the entertainment a quaint touch with her spinning, as well as giving a graceful example of how to be natural before folks. The Episcopal rector, Rev. Alfred S. Clark of St. John's, was there with his wife and daughter, giving an air of delightful decorum that a dozen chaperons might have failed to bestow. As for the rest, Mrs. Sidney Hodgkins was generally voted the swellest looking of the young matrons in an elaborate black spangled frock over white.

There were many who admired more the daintier, more petite beauty of her sister-in-law, Mrs. Eugene Wilhoit, who was in white, or the fragile willowiness of Mrs. Francis Hodgkins (who was May Budd), grown lovelier and more spirituelle under the grace of motherhood. Mrs. Frank D. Nicol, who is a "Daughter" and a direct descendant of John Rogers, wore a wig and looked like a colonial picture. Miss Bernie Terry looked a dream in pale blue. Miss Beatrice Welsh and her fiance, Stewart Elliott, attracted a good deal of attention because they were to be married so soon. Their wedding took place at St. John's Episcopal church, on Wednesday. There were four bridesmaids, with Miss Maud Welsh, the bride's sister, acting as maid of honor. The Welsh family is among Stockton's wealthiest families, but both girls have chosen poor men, yet men of such calibre that a girl's life may be safely intrusted to them. "Uncle" George Wheatley was the one gallant at the Bal Poudre who had no need of powder, his hair—what there is of it—being snowy white. On this account there's a good deal of speculation as to Mr. Wheatley's age.

"A pretty girl asked me if you were a young old man or an old young man," said a saucy, detached widow to "Uncle" George at the ball.

"What did you tell her?" asked "Uncle," looking his alarm.

But the saucy nymph ran away laughing, without telling him.

daughters are all beauties. Minnie, the eldest, was married in this city to Captain Thomas Pierce, at present with his regiment in the Philippines. Leila, after a brief experience on the stage, was recently married at Governor's Island, New York, to Lieutenant Wells of the Eighth Cavalry.

Colonel E. A. Garlington, who has been Inspector General of this Department for the past six months, leaves today for New York, where he will take station at Governor's Island as Inspector General of the Department of the East. Major B. B. Ray, Paymaster U. S. A., who returned on the Logan from Manila, will also be stationed in New York.

The Presidio is at its liveliest, informal receptions being the ordre du jour and dances the ordre du soir. Colonel and Mrs. Rice were the motifs for a delightful reception by the Nineteenth Infantry last Thursday night in the mess room of the regiment, and next Tuesday evening General and Mrs. McArthur will be complimented by a reception in the clubhouse.

Among the arrivals at Byron Hot Springs the past week were Mrs. Frank G. Drum, Miss Augusta D. Ames, and Mr. J. R. Stanton from San Francisco; Mrs. J. C. Klein, New York City; Mr. P. R. Helm, Honolulu; Mr. and Mrs. F. M. Helm of Fresno.

Mrs. Cheney's New Religion

A correspondent sends me a digest of the "New Gospel" preached by Mrs. Abbey Cheney, once of San Francisco and Los Angeles, and now the protege of some of the richest and smartest people of the East. Mrs. Cheney's School of Life and Expression is an institution that claims to make its devotees radiantly beautiful, and to keep them in perfect health, with the strength and vigor to do eighteen hours' work every day. Mrs. Cheney says she works that number of hours, and that though she formerly suffered from fatigue, since she adopted her present religion she feels not a trace of weariness after her most strenuous labors. "It is impossible to separate physical, mental and spiritual development," Mrs. Cheney says; "they are three factors of a perfect whole, and the three natures must be cultivated equally and harmoniously, with a keen appreciation of the right relationship of each to all." Mrs. Cheney says a woman is not to blame if born ugly, but she is decidedly at fault if she concludes to remain unattractive, since anyone can be beautiful who follows her new gospel. "Mind moves outward, and personal atmosphere, which is the finer relation of character, is the result of mental vigor or the lack of it. The tongue may lie, but the body will not. With every thought the Recording Angel is writing on face and form. Anyone may become beautiful in form and character if willing to work hard enough for the desired results. Definite training along moral lines should at least go hand in hand with mental and physical training. Practice for those moral qualities which make the helpful, beautiful personal atmosphere should certainly hold no inferior place in education."

How to Achieve Health and Beauty

Mrs. Cheney says the woman who would be beautiful, strong and tireless must learn to relax mentally and physically every nerve and muscle, drop worrying thoughts and become "receptive to the infinite health currents existing all about, and into which we can throw ourselves as easily as into a current of air. She must take sufficient sleep, and the subject of diet must be given due attention. The best science of diet that I know of," was her recent dictum concerning this topic, "is to eat food that you enjoy, and then enjoy it as one does good air, good company, or beautiful environment. Good, pure food of any kind will agree with anybody whose heart is running over with benevolence. A wonderful chemist is good will. A good dose of warmheartedness, a burst of genuine enthusiasm, will set the digestive organs into healthful action. There is a good deal of genuine heaven in good digestion, and there is no way to get into heaven but by the development of the soul; and the practice of benevolence means rapid soul development. * * * We only know that which we have really lived. I have lived the things whereof I speak, and I know that they are true."

GRETH AIRSHIP

Every day is one day nearer to the time when the Greth airship—a twin brother of the Santos-Dumont No. 7—will sail over San Francisco. Many people have been bitten by speculating in the stock of unfortunate oil or mining properties and other propositions that looked well on paper, and anything new is looked upon with suspicion. At present airships are certainly new in the United States, but will not be for long. The American Aerial Navigation Company will have four practical airships on exhibition in Eastern cities this summer. The first of the four will sail from San Jose to this city some time this month. As a money-making attraction, the exhibiting of airships will appeal to any business man who gives the matter consideration. Don't be too cautious to look into it. If you buy this stock now, next month your investment will increase in value from ten to twenty times. This is only our judgment in the matter. After you have seen the airship itself (by appointment only) you can form your own opinion.

Through the Veil of Illusion

[Letters from Miss Constance Durham.]

I.

To Mr. Randolph Ross.

At home, Easter Eve.

My darling,

Just a minute since you left me. But I am so happy I can not go to bed at once. You love me—I keep saying it over and over. I had loved you so long, you know, and I never for an instant felt sure that you loved me. Men are so shy about revealing their inner feelings. You never even flattered me, or praised my frocks, my walk, my manner, as others did. You were so cold sometimes, so—yes, cross. And to think you loved me—and I am to be your wife. I have grown ten inches. Now, I look in the mirror and instead of a little five-foot-four woman with a white skin and straight brown hair I see a Venus de Milo. All because of you, my darling. Oh, it seems an age—a cycle of Cathay—to our next meeting. Why do you have to go to New York on the morning train?

Your Constance.

P. S. I am glad my name is Constance—it's what I shall always be to you. C.

II.

To the same, a month later.

Dearest,

No letter for two days! I hope you aren't ill. I am just looking forward, counting the days, until your return. Mother wants to go to our country place this week, but I've persuaded her that there is so much malaria there at this season that town is the proper place for another month. I have not told her, dear, our secret yet. Let us keep the sweet secret of our love to ourselves for a little while. Congratulations, engagement gifts and all that would vulgarize it for me. You great, handsome boy—what can you see in little me? I am glad, darling, you went to see my friend Mary Roberts. Poor thing, she nearly died, too, when her husband died. What would I do if you should be taken from me? Like Brunhilde, I know I should perish on your funeral pyre. Your Constance.

P. S. Mary writes me she likes you so much. Now be nice to her. I shan't be a bit jealous. C.

III.

To Mrs. M. Roberts, a month later.

Dear Mary,

This won't be half an answer to yours, because we are going directly to the country and are so busy getting gowns and things. Ran is back, and he tells me he thinks you one of the women he has ever met. If he hadn't loved me first, I am sure you would have been his choice. Now, isn't that a ridiculous thing for me to say? Fate, I know, orders these things. If it had been you, he would have met you first. I'm glad he didn't. What chance would a girl have against a beautiful widow like you? No, dear, we haven't announced our engagement yet. It was my idea not to, at first, and now Ran thinks we'd better wait until his plans are settled. He returns to New York next week. Be good to him, dear, for my sake.

Constance.

IV.

To Mr. R. Ross, two months later.

Dear Ran,

Your last letter puzzled me. I am sure I ought to tell Mother, now that such a long time has elapsed. She can't understand why I am so changed, care nothing for society, and insist on spending so much time at home—writing letters, dear, you know to whom. Can't I tell her? By the way, Mary hasn't written to me for such a long time, I wonder if she is ill. You have not mentioned her, either, for several letters. And, dear, your letters are so short and so far apart. Remember, darling, I have only your letters to live on these days. I think I should die if you forgot to write at all. Of course—doesn't such a contingency make you laugh? I am laughing now.

Your loving little Constance.

V.

To the same, a month later.

Darling,

Just think, I am to see you soon—you couldn't come West (that horrid "business"), but I have persuaded Mother that a season in New York would be lovely for her Connie. We start on Friday—the thirteenth, too, but I'm not superstitious. I am counting the hours till I see you. Be at the Grand Central. I'll wire just when we will arrive.

Your impatient

Constance.

P. S. If you can get Mary by 'phone tell her we are coming. I haven't had a letter from her in months. But I love her just the same, tell her.

P. S. On second thoughts, don't tell her. I'll drop in and surprise her the day after our arrival. Not the day—that belongs to you.

VI.

To the same, one day later.

Sweetheart,

Your letter just arrived. I can't understand it at all. I am glad I shall see you soon, and find out what you mean. Has anybody been talking behind my back? Why, dear, I'd trust you even if my eyes said not to. I am always your constant

Constance.

* * * * * * * * * *

From Mrs. Durham to her sister.

New York.

Dear Louise,

I am in the greatest distress. Constance is very ill, and nobody seems able to give any cause for it—brain fever. She seemed very much excited as we approached the city, though she had been as quiet as a nun on the entire journey. She sent off a telegram for Mr. Ross—you remember him, that grave, tall insurance man we used to have at dinner occasionally?—to meet us at the station. I thought it a good idea, for I am such a poor hand to attend to baggage and such things. He did not appear, however. The wire, Connie thought, did not reach him. It turned out that the reason was something like that. He'd sailed for Europe the day before, his office boy told us when Connie 'phoned from the hotel. The next day Connie took a cab—I was too tired to accompany her—and went to see Mrs. Mary Roberts—you remember her? She was Connie's chum at boarding school. When Connie returned, she was in the queerest state, hysterical, and all I could get out of her was that Mrs. Roberts wasn't home. She was not in town—gone abroad, the people in the apartment house said. I am not sure that Connie didn't say Mrs. Roberts was married again—but she's been so ill since that she can't say a rational word. The trip was too much for her delicate nerves at this season, I fear. I will write again.

Yours affectionately,

Lydia Durham.

VIII.

From Constance to Randolph.

New York.

My dear,

Still my dear. Why didn't you tell me? How could you love me after you had seen Mary—my beautiful Mary? At school I used to worship her beauty—her great blue eyes and that golden hair with red glints in it. I loved her always, and nothing could shake my friendship. You two—you were my all. But neither of you had the trust in me that I had in you. Couldn't you think, dear, of what life would be after losing you and Mary, and my trust? If you had only said something—even a hint—but you did not. I love you still—I love Mary. I can't break those chains all at once. But I have been so ill. And there was no one to tell. Mother never knew of my love for you, Randolph. I wonder if things would have been different if I had told her that Easter Eve? I hope you will be happy. Tell Mary I want her to be happy. But—Ran, don't let Mary lose trust in you. Always be honest with her. There's nothing like that—to believe in the one you love, and do nothing that will destroy her trust in you.

Constance.

The Losing of Mrs. Gayety

When Mrs. Boredom Gayety descended the marble steps of her Pacific avenue home the carriage was already waiting for her. "John, drive me to the Southern Pacific offices," she commanded in an educated tone. The society season was drawing to a close and Mrs. Gayety was fairly yearning for excitement. Already, as the carriage whirled through the busy centre of town she smiled as one who could see a whipping finish. Before the Southern Pacific offices her carriage stopped, she dismounted and entered the plate glass doors. But she was not too quick to be seen by the argus eyes of the press. From the five great dailies reporters were already hurrying toward the scene of interest. Breathless with exertion they reached the Yellow Front just as Mrs. Gayety re-entered her carriage, her mission accomplished. The carriage drove away and the reporters went about their several details, industriously taking notes.

II.

The next morning while sitting in her morning gown at her dainty breakfast table, Mrs. Gayety ordered that the five great dailies should be brought to her. With a woman's unerring instinct she opened them all at the society columns, and this is what she read:

The Investigator: "Mrs. Boredom Gayety will leave next week for a three months' trip to Mexico. She may visit Central and South America before returning to San Francisco."

The Caller: "Next week Mrs. Boredom Gayety will visit the Atlantic Coast and possibly Newport, where she will be received with open arms by the dwellers in that fashionable colony."

The Chronic: "Mrs. Boredom Gayety will depart within a few days to visit relatives in Los Angeles."

The Bullet: "Mrs. Boredom Gayety's many friends in the smart set will be gratified to learn that she will not desert us this year, but will spend the summer at Del Monte, whither she departs next Saturday."

The Rost: "Mrs. Boredom Gayety left yesterday for Philadelphia, where she intends to take up her permanent abode."

The lady munched her toast and sipped her coffee reflectively. "Now," she said, "I can slip away to Jerkwater Springs for a few months and the bores and the invitations will have a jolly good chase before they run me down!"

The Combination Wedding Gift

(Suggested by a recent editorial in Town Talk.)

Invitations, to the number of three thousand, are issued for the marriage of Miss Trixy Wealth and Lord Blood-and-Bones of Castle Nowhere, Noshire, England, Erin Lodge, Ballynothing, Ireland, Castle Lockcantfind, Scotland, and Castle Abcdefghij, Wales.

The dear one thousand intimate friends invited to the breakfast cogitate what to give the bride, it now being the fashion to combine forces and give a present worth presenting, instead of the out-of-date thousand and one trifles.

Ten representatives are chosen by the one thousand to decide upon the gift, the ten being elected after vigorous polling, and considerable pulling, to their distinguished offices.

The following debate ensues:

Mr. Parvenue (formerly a silversmith, and still interested in his old firm): I say we should have an elegant silver tea-set made, unlike anything ever bought before.

Mr. Stocks and Bonds (a banker): No, that would be absurd, when the Lord has all the family silver and she can get it out of pawn for him. I say give her some shares in a good banking concern.

Mr. Lots (a real estate agent): Now that would be the height of absurdity when she has all the money now she can look after. I say buy her a good lot somewhere in a smart locality.

Mr. Contractor: That's right. And we'll build her a big house on it.

Mrs. Upholsterie (whose husband has not been doing very well lately): How nice—and have it all furnished from top to toe.

Mrs. Poor Swell (who sometimes takes commissions): I move that we buy her some of that priceless old lace that the Battenberg House has in private stock. Why, it's worth its weight in gold.

Mrs. Schemer (whose husband promotes big affairs): Now what would really be nice is a solid block of stock in some old-established company like the Association to Supply Oil to All Ships and Trains.

Mrs. Bric-a-Brac (who has a collection of articles de vertu she would not object to part with): When our dear girl can buy anything she sets her heart on, how much nicer to get her some rare old vases and tapestries that she could not get at a shop.

Mr. Practical: I move we give her the money and let her buy her gift herself.

Mrs. Refinedly: How vulgar—one might do that for one's cook, perhaps—

Mr. Boredandblue: My God, men—and women—let's not waste this time talking. Get something or get nothing, I say.

His advice turned out so good that the combined forces bought nothing except the usual things, which went individually—twenty or so of silver sets, sixty or so separate spoons, olive forks, ice and sugar tongs, vases, urns, forks and knives, dishes, pictures, rugs, bits of lace, linen etc.—the regulation affair, received with carded thanks but muttered imprecations by the bride. —The Valet.

STAGE

The Quaintness of David

Those who were looking for a Josh Whitcomb style of rural drama in "David Harum" were no doubt disappointed. The play is humorous, but it is not of the horse-play brand of humor. It is little more than a character study and it serves to emphasize the fact tnat the book was not written with a view to dramatizaion. The book is lacking in elements essential to the drama, and consequently the play is vapid. It is interesting only because of Crane's art . Some alterations have been made in the story to meet the dramatic exigencies, but they are unimportant. The love scenes might as well be omitted, as they are not well done and detract from the interest. Crane has assimilated the character of David to a degree that makes it difficult to figure just where Crane ends and Harum begins. He has the speech of the old banker who finds his relaxation in "hoss" trading. His mannerisms are suited to the character and his laugh is infectious. In the last act, where he leads up to his Christmas gift, of the mortgage on her home to the widow Cullum, after telling her the story of her husband's kindness to a poor boy, is one of the most artistic touches in Crane's impersonation. The part of the widow is played by Lois Francis Clark, who is a picture in the life of the poor, downtrodden woman, harassed by debts and with the joy crushed out of her.

He Called Us Jay

It was Wiliam H. Crane, familiarly known as "Billy" Crane, who first dubbed us "jay." He was ahead of Blanche Walsh in thus designating local theatregoers. It was after his engagement at the old Bush street theatre where he appeared with Georgie Drew Barrymore and Tim Frawley in "The Senator." Miss Barrymore and Mr. Frawley received more credit than did Crane for their work in that play, and when the veteran actor reached New York he said that this city could appreciate nothing but horseplay. We were extremely provincial then and we thought that we would never forgive Mr. Crane. I recall that Peter Robertson took a satirical fling at him in an article beginning. "So you're real mad at us, are you, Mr. Crane?" Crane is one of the few survivors of the old school of American actors. He has lost none of the old magnetism that won the public when he and Robson twin-starred themselves into popularity. Crane is said to be a rich man. His summer home is on the Massachusetts coast, at Siasconsett, near the home of Agnes Booth Schoeffel. He owns a fine steam yacht.

To Uplift the Stage

If ever there lived a Shakespearean enthusiast it is R. D. McLean, husband of Odette Tyler, who at the time of his marriage was reputed to be a millionaire. McLean first went on the stage when he married Marie Prescott. He declined to accept a salary but acted for the love of it. Shakespearean characters were his forte. When he married Odette Tyler, one of Frohman's most popular stars, it was said that she wished to retire from the footlights forever. But her husband's love of the legitimate drama was too strong. He persuaded his wife to join him as co-star in "Romeo and Juliet," "The Merchant of Venice" and "Othello," and later they added to their repertory others of the Shakespearean dramas.

Shakespeare at the Grand

This is the last week of R. D. McLean and Odette Tyler at the Grand. "Julius Cæsar" has proven to be the most popular play that the management has put on since Nance O'Neil's record-breaking engagement. Emmett Corrigan as Cassius easily carried off the honors of the production. His interpretation of the part is virile and convincing. McLean as Brutus gave his lines a most intelligent reading and in his speech to the Romans did some really fine acting. The quarrel scene went very well and in it Corrigan and McLean were seen at their very best. Herschel Mayall made a very graceful Marc Antony and in the speech over the body of Cæsar gave quite as many pretty gestures as a young lady who has studied Delsarte.

Price's Protege

Channing Pollock is coming into great prominence for a young man not yet twenty-four. He has been selected to dramatize "The Pit" for William A. Brady who is to star Wilton Lackaye in the play. Two years ago Pollock was working on a Washington newspaper. He was discovered by Mr. E. D. Price, now general manager for Belasco & Mayer at the Alcazar, who was then managing the Manhattan theatre for Brady and Ziegfield. On Price's recommendation Pollock was sent out in advance of Anna Held but he could not satisfy Ziegfield and was discharged. Price subsequently called Brady's attention to the young man and urged that he be tried. Brady engaged him to do press work for his wife, Grace George, and he did more for her than was ever accomplished for any American star. A year ago he wrote a story of the Oberammergau Passion Play entitled "Behold the Man" which attracted a deal of attention. The California manager is naturally proud of his protege.

The Letters of Mildred's Mother

By the way, it is not generally known that Mr. Price has attracted some attention in the literary world. Though he has been connected with the theatrical profession for many years he has dabbled more or less in newspaper work, and about a year ago he struck a quaint vein of humor which he exploited in the New York Morning Telegraph. He wrote a series of sprightly sketches revealing the inner side of the New York chorus girl's life. They were in the form of letters purporting to have been written by a very dashing and unconventional mother to an equally unconventional daughter. Blakely Hall declared that they were wonderfully accurate and convincing character studies, and these words of encouragement prompted Mr. Price to reproduce them between covers. The title of the volume is "The Letters of Mildred's Mother to Mildred." They are very entertaining and are as aptly phrased as some of Ade's best work. Mr. Price has touched upon a phase of New York theatrical life that is by no means edifying but none the less interesting.

Gets in Readiness for Glad Vacation Time

California Northwestern Railway Offers a Long List of Special Attractions

When the vacation season begins the California Northwestern Railway Company will be ready to make thousands happy. Its lines run through one of the most picturesque regions of the State, and every here and there are ideal places for rest and recreation. Lakes and mountain streams, cosy corners in beautiful valleys, comfortable farm houses, mineral springs, natural springs, camps in the wildwood, all these are offered, and each has the advantage of being only a short distance from the city. Only a small expenditure is needed for railway fares, and in each instance the other charges are very reasonable.

In conformance with its usual custom the California Northwestern has made elaborate preparations for the glad vacation time, as is evidenced by the handsome hundred-page booklet that it has just issued. This publication, "Vacation, 1903," gives a long list of places that take summer boarders, tells of the special attractions of each place and gives the rates by the week.

For campers, there are no end of attractions. Throughout Marin, Sonoma, Mendocino and Lake counties the climate is delightful and it is a pleasure to sleep in a tent. Along the Geur neville branch of the California Northwestern, paralleled by the picturesque Russian River, are many ideal spots for camps, the river affording good boating, bathing and fishing. One of the most beautiful places on this branch is Russian River Heights, one of the most charming spots in all the West.

The booklet contains much valuable information, and all who expect to make a vacation trip this summer will do well to supply themselves with a copy before making up their minds.

Bacon's Comedy

The prompter was a busy man at the Alcazar on Monday and Tuesday nights. He really did four times the work of any of the actors, and it is hoped he may be able to take a vacation next week. "The Man from Mexico" was a good vehicle for Willie Collier's peculiar talent, and Frank Bacon manages to get even more out of it. His fun is of that inimitable dryness which one remembers in Sol Smith Russell. Some day some one will fit Bacon with a star part in a play that will make him famous. Just now he is content to please Alcazar audiences, and he has made hosts of friends here. The audiences this week have been large, approving, and hysterically joyous.

Legs and Detectives

It is often said that an actor or actress will persevere in a grotesque make-up to every detail except the hands. The hands he, or she, always leaves in their native whiteness. It is here vanity asserts itself. There's something more curious than this. It is in relation to stage make-ups of detective characters, parts requiring several hastily-assumed disguises. I noticed it in Gillette's Sherlock Holmes, and the same thing is apparent in Landers Stevens's detective in "Caught in the Web," the very thrilling melodrama at the Central this week. Sherlock Holmes disguised every portion of his anatomy but his legs, and one could spot him every time from those members. The Gillette legs are straight and thin and not very muscular, and the actor walks with his toes turned out, showing that he went to dancing school when he was a boy. He disguised himself as to face and figure so that his best friend would not have known him, but the legs could not be mistaken. Landers Stevens does some very clever lightning-change dressing in his detective role, but his legs give him away every time. There's a slight, very slight indentation at the knee that points to early horseback rides with short stirrups, or none at all. Those indentations give "Leonard" away, just as the Gillette turned-out toes revealed their owner.

A Marriage in the Profession

It seems only a few years ago that Georgie Cooper made her debut as Little Lord Fauntleroy, but she has made successes in various roles since then. Her latest appearance was in a hasty marriage trip to San Jose. The love scenes of Georgie Cooper and Landers Stevens at the Central this week were given with such attention to detail that, after the divorce of Fanny Gillette from Stevens the sequel of the marriage on Wednesday scarcely seems so surprising . Yet the Stevens's were considered a model couple only a little while ago. Fanny Gillette was a divorcee when she married Landers Stevens but theirs was a pure love match. It was only last year that Georgie Cooper's engagement with M. L. Alsop, the Alcazar's erstwhile leading man, was announced. Alsop was married, but his intention was to obtain his freedom and wed the witching San Francisco soubrette. The two were very much in love and no one seems to know just when Miss Cooper decided to be off with the old love and on with the new.

Stevens to Arrive

So Edwin Stevens is to return to the Tivoli once more, and there is to be a revival of "Wang"! Stevens has a strenuous way of taking a vacation; he quits work in the East and comes to San Francisco to visit his relatives and amuse his friends, but never stops drawing salary. Though Stevens has long enjoyed a measure of popularity on Broadway he has never been starred. He has long been contributing to the success of other stars, and I believe that he has been very much disgusted at the oversight of managers, for he is sensible of the high quality of his art. He has the actor's good opinion of himself. But Stevens is really a versatile chap, one of the most versatile on the stage. He plays Malvolio as successfully as he does a grotesque character in a comic opera. He is as much at home in burlesque as he is in legitimate comedy. However it was not until the other day that it was determined to make a star of him. Dave Belasco has at length taken notice of the Stevens personality and he has decided to star him in a play which he had originally intended for Dave Warfield. So Mr. Stevens is to arrive. Meanwhile he will stimulate the writing of mash-notes among the patrons of the Tivoli, for though Edwin is no beauty he is quite a matinee idol in San Francisco.

Mary's New Play

Mary Mannering has Mrs. Thomas Whiffen in the company heading this way in "The Stubbornness of Geraldine," and Arthur Byron is her leading man. The play has a pretty plot. Geraldine is an American heiress who is returning from a long stay in Europe. A poor Hungarian nobleman has fallen in love with her at first sight in Budapest and has followed her on a steamer, traveling second class. A white rose which he leaves on her steamer chair leads to the introduction that he seeks, and love on both sides begins with a song he sings to her on the promenade deck in the moonlight. The plot turns on mistaken identity. The count is so proud that he poses as a commoner, in order to escape the suspicion of fortune hunting, but he has an elder brother who has an international reputation as a blackguard. Matters are complicated by a confusion of the two, but in the end all is straightened out, the the stubbornness of Geraldine is justified and the curtain falls on happiness.

The performance at the Central theatre next Friday night will be for the benefit of Tommy Kierns, the popular character comedian who has been forced to retire from tne stage on account of ill health. Mr. Kierns has many friends in this city, of which he is a native, and there is not a more popular member of the profession in this country. In addition to the performance of "Devil's Island" next Friday night there will be specialties between acts.

San Francisco Lodge No. 3, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, has decided to have a big "Day and Night with the Elks," at the Chutes, Wednesday, May twenty-seventh, instead of the regular annual theatrical entertainment in aid of their charity fund. There will be special features in the theatre and on the grounds and at night there will be a magnificent display of fireworks.

Features of Next Week's Bills

"David Harum" has drawn very large houses to the Columbia and will be the attraction next week. Mary Mannering in "The Stubbornness of Geraldine" comes next, and during her engagement she will also give the premier of a new play by Ramsay Norris.

Emmett Corrigan in "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," that weird play based upon Robert Louis Stevenson's novel, will be the Grand's attraction. This play always drew when Mansfield had it in his repertory, and it has been long since it was seen here. It is one of the most remarkable plays, with a dual identity as the motif, that was ever written.

"Fiddle-dee-dee" was the first Fischer success in the Weberfieldian repertory and calls for its repetition have finally been yielded to. Not a piece of the old scenery, or a rag of the old costumes, however, will be used in the revival. The amusing Florodora sextet burlesque is retained and there will be new musical and dance features. Helene Montrose is expected to make a hit; she is the new Amazon leader. A burlesque on "Sapho" called "Sapolio" comes next.

"The Toy Maker" has found favor at the Tivoli and will continue all next week. Monday, May tenth, will come Stevens in "Wang." There will be toys for the children who attend "The Toy Maker's" farewell matinees.

"Zig-Zag Alley" will remain at the California. "Town Topics" will follow.

"We 'Uns of Tennessee" is always a favorite with Alcazar audiences. It is a strong drama, full of exciting scenes. Charles Francis Bryant's benefit Wednesday night should draw a packed house. He will play his original role of Lige Munroe.

Emily Lytton, always a favorite here, with W. H. Gerald, a clever Eastern actor, head the Orpheum bill. They and company will present Edmund Day's newest farcette, "He, She and It." Janet Melville and Elvie Stetson, in a new act that enables them to display some of their smartest costumes, will appear, also Harding and Ah Sid, "the clown and the Chinaman," in an amusing stunt. Mademoiselle Olive, a pretty and deft juggler, and the Wilsons, singers, dancers and cakewalkers, will be new. Jim Corbett will shortly appear at the Orpheum in his original monologue of personal experiences.

At the Chutes Beahan, Mascotte and Beahan, comedy sketch artists, Frank Bowman, a noted magician, Martin and Ridgeway, character comedians, George and Laura Lewis, "the rube and the lady" will appear, and among the holdovers will be Sheelor and Seyfried with their daring cycle maze. —The Playgoer

The Prayer

Lord, God, hear thou a suppliant. Abject,
All crimson-stained, I cringe, lest Thou, in wrath
At my presumption, raise Thy mighty hand
And crush the worm that dares to lift its head
In quivering fear to Thine omnipotence.
The years Thou gav'st I've drunk like honeyed wine,
In fetid grasp to burning lips and heart
I've pressed the sweets of life, and drained the dregs
Of every worldly pleasure. Lord, I dare—
Yea, I! a lep'rous thing—the crawling things
Of earth of which are 'shamed—I, dare to come Before Thy face.

Lord, God, hear Thou a suppliant. Outcast,
World-weary, broken hearted, losing all
I turn to Thee. . . .

What's this I've dared to say?
Great One, be blind and deaf, that I may snatch
This blasphemy from out the Great Beyond
And plunge it back within my withered heart
To mock its human selfishness. I turn—
A thing all foul within, unfit for hell,
A pigmy that infects Thy universe,
I turn to Thee when all is lost—Just God!
I wonder Thou hast spared so vile a thing
To soil Thy name.

Emblazon all my sins; none can there be
To equal this most human infamy.

When once again a suppliant I come,
'Twill be to ask if any good deed done
Can blot from out the angel's record-page
This prayer. Amen.

Mabel Porter Pitts.

Unfinished Sentences

"Do wise people ever finish sentences?"—Lady Blixworth in "The Intrusions of Peggy," by Anthony Hope.

It is always well to leave something to the hearer's imagination. If we didn't, well—

Dashes cover very clever reservations sometimes.

Deceptions?

Perhaps.

Poor Lover, affianced to an heiress: Ah, if I were only rich—

(Sotto voce: I would never marry you, but the girl I love.)

Deceptive Husband: I untrue to you? Why, darling, if you knew the secret of my heart—

(S. v.: You'd leave me at once.)

Deceptive Wife: I deceive you? Why, love—

(S. v.: I do it every day, but so long as you don't know, what's the harm?)

Fiance: You ask me if I ever loved another woman. How absurd, when you know—

(S. v.: Nothing—and never will, from me, of your ten or twelve predecessors.)

Forgiving Fiance: Never speak to me again! Unless you had confessed it yourself I would never have believed—

(S. v.: That you'd be such a fool as to give yourself away.)

Husband, with wife telling of her extravagance in millinery: This is scarcely the proper time, madame—

(S. v.: No, indeed. Every moment she talks cuts off my prospective poker profits.)

Suitor, to father-in-law-elect, with expressive wave of hand: I assure you, sir, your daughter will never want. My prospects are—

(S. v.: Nil—good he has an imagination.)

Suitor, to heiress, homely but "easy": If you knew the depth of my love—

(S. v.: You'd give me my walking papers.)

Indignant Virtue: What, play for money? Sir—

(S. v.: Not for worlds—when an I. O. U. will do the business.)

The clock ticked and their souls knew—

(That both had a date, perhaps, and they had missed it.)

—The Finisher.

MUSIC

Antonia Dolores (Trebelli)

Manager Will Greenbaum announces as his final musical attraction of the most successful season ever given in this city, the popular soprano, Mademoiselle Antonia Dolores (Trebelli). No artist ever visiting San Francisco made as many friends and warm admirers as this charming woman, and after her triumphal tour of the Australian colonies, where she attracted larger audiences than even Melba, she will be sure of a hearty welcome. Mademoiselle Dolores is unquestionably the greatest concert singer before the public and students of the vocal art realize that attending a Dolores concert is worth a half dozen lessons to them. Arrangements have been made for three concerts at the Alhambra theatre—Wednesday evening, May twentieth (which will be under the auspices of the California Club), Saturday matinee, the twenty-third, and a sacred concert Sunday night, the twenty-fourth. Prior to her first appearance Mademoiselle Dolores has been especially engaged as a soloist at the last Loring Club concert of the season. After her appearances in San Francisco the artist will tour the coast, going East via Canada, where she has a number of engagements.

Manager Greenbaum is now arranging his plans for next winter, and promises some fine attractions. The season will open late in September with Augusta Cottlow, the brilliant young pianiste, whose playing created a furore here nine years ago when she appeared as the child wonder at the Bauer symphony concerts. Since that time Miss Cottlow has achieved success in Germany and Russia, and last season played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and other important engagements in this country, and has without doubt taken rank amongst the world's greatest artists.

At the Union Meeting of the Adelphian Club in Alameda today the program will be: Songs—Hochsommer, Eichenscher, Prelude, Locher, Romance (new), Debussey (Paris), New Love, Mendelssohn, Miss Una Fairweather (Fred Maurer, accompanist); Fantasia D minor, Mozart, Fantasia E minor, Cecil Cowles, Waltz E minor, Chopin, Cecil Cowles (pupil of Hugo Mansfeldt); Maiden Songs, Richard Strauss—Cornflower, Poppy, Ivy, Waterlily, Ode, Goldmark, Miss Fairweather; lecture, "The Bible as Literature," Mrs. J. B. Hume.

Musicale in San Rafael

The pupils of Miss Esther A. Mundell gave a recital on Monday afternoon, at the residence of A. W. Foster in San Rafael, which was a very enjoyable affair. The following program was rendered: Trio, Festival March, F. Behr, Misses Foster and Alexander; Bridal Chorus from "Lohengrin," Alma Birmingham; duet, "Pas des Amphores," C. Chaminade, Misses Dodge and Dollar; Tarantelle, P. Beaumont, Margaret Sheehy; song, Cupid and I," Miss Irene Miler; Floriano (intermezzo), L. True, Ina Perham; duet, Hungarian Song, F. Behr, Misses Graham and O'Connor; Badinage, V. Herbert, Miss R. Casey; Chattering, L. Novara, Juanita Waterman; duet, "La Grace," C. Bohem, Misses Newhall; Butterfly, E. Grieg, Miss Dodge; song, "Pensee d'Automne," J. Massenet, Miss Mundell; June Barcarolle, T. Tschaikowsky, Philip Faymonville; duet, "Song to Evening Star," from "Tannhauser," Misses Driscoll and Landon; Valse de Concert, E. Schutt, Miss Dollar; duet, "Attack of the Ulans," C. Bohem, Messrs. Evans and Johnson.

On Friday evening, May eighth, a concert will be given by the pupils of Dr. H. J. Stewart, in Steinway hall. The program will be entirely contributed by the pupils with the exception of some violin solos by Nathan Landsberger.

Founders' Day, at Mills College, will be celebrated next Tuesday. The special feature will be the dedication of the new pipe organ in Lisser hall, at half-past two o'clock, by Dr. H. J. Stewart. The choral class will render Sullivan's "The Lost Chord" and Handel's "Largo" and there will be other musical features.

The Holmes Concert

They were a delighted lot of music lovers who lingered in Heine hall last Tuesday evening at the close of a series of the Henry Holmes concerts. Not a few showed signs of that divine drunkenness, that blessed inebriety, that comes of the dream drink of love, or music, or literature, at its best. Mr. Holmes has the secret of charm, charm, the sine qua non of effectiveness in art. And ineffective art is a contradiction in terms. Without charm, music is as a sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. Unless there is that "something other than the" notes, there is at best nothing more than "the least disagreeable of noises." It is the addition of moving personality that gives the necessary over-note of distinction and sets up the process of idealization in the hearts of the hearers. Henry Holmes has temperament. To understand my use of that abused term, one must have heard him. Personality, rare in a man, rarer in a woman, and rarest in a child—Heaven has also bestowed it upon Kathleen Parlow. Through your ears to your heart went the wonder of her reading of the Max Bruch "Swedish Dances." You began to dream. You even forgot that Fred Maurer's fingers, full of their wonted magnetism and finesse, were wooing the chaste ivories. Mr. Holmes's colleagues, Miss Goldmann and Messrs. Wismer, Becker and Friedhofer, are to be congratulated upon the excellence of their co-operative efforts. —The Music Critic.

Mr. Scott-Leslie, the society "entertainer," now in the Straits Settlements, tells some amusing stories of his Indian experiences. In Simla he engaged rooms at a boarding house which was recommended and settled terms with the lady of the place. When, however, he told her his name she said:

"Oh, I don't think these rooms will suit."

Seeing how displeased he looked she went on to say, "I am quite sure you are thoroughly respectable, but we have to be so very particular and only those can be allowed who are on the Government House list!"

He tells an even more significant story of an experience in England. "Once I was asked to give an entertainment in the country, and was asked in after dinner. When it was over the hostess came up and said, 'Oh, Mr. Leslie, I want to tell you how much we enjoyed your entertainment. I am sorry I didn't ask you to dinner. We did not know you were a gentleman.'"

An Army Story

In "A Daughter of the Sioux" General King is back on familiar ground. Once more we are at Fort Frayne, with Captain Ray and Blake, in the midst of an Indian uprising, with the excitements of the post and the pursuit of the savages. "The Daughter of the Sioux" who gives title to the story is a beautiful girl, who, despite her three parts of white blood, and her advantages of education and environment, is a thorough Sioux at heart. She is the niece of the post trader's wife, and her appearance at the port is timed by herself, so that she can assist her dark-skinned relatives. Nanette's Indian origin is unknown to the garrison, and her aunt has designs on the bachelor Major General Webb. It better suits the young lady's purpose to enslave the youthful Adjutant Field, and she is unscrupulous in the advantages which she takes of him, and for that matter, of every one else. There is a new and unexpected element in the Indian outbreak, a strange young chief unidentified, whose methods are something of a puzzle to the garrison commanders. He has a fluent vocabulary of English profanity, and other peculiarities which are neither Caucasian nor Indian. Just who or what he is cannot be determined at first, but he turns out to be one more specimen of the fostering care of a philanthropic government, an irreclaimable who had been educated at the Carlisle school, and was later a member of the Wild West show until he had caused so much trouble that it became unnecessary to dispense with him. Now that the Indian troubles are probably settled for all time, since there is no longer a frontier where settlers can be murdered and troops massacred, books like this can be written, since they cannot be construed into criticism of the powers that be. And it is well that a soldier should speak of the things that touch him near the heart, of the folly of feeding the savages on government rations all winter, sheltering and clothing them, and giving them opportunities to arm themselves with better weapons than the troops, not to mention the chances for an English education, in order that they might turn and rend the hand that cared for them. But there was the situation: Eagle Wing, otherwise Ralph Moreau, in the camp of the Sioux, turning all his knowledge and experience to account against the white soldiery; Nanette Flower, living with her aunt, apparently a white girl, free to come and go and visit at the fort, but unscrupulous, treacherous, ready to do and dare anything for her Indian brave. It takes a soldier to write intelligently of military matters, but the veriest amateur and novice must acknowledge the truth and common sense with which General King discusses the sentimental philanthropy of the theorists who interfere with the practical common sense of the frontiersmen, and if we had forgotten, or never before knew of the ineptitude of such officers as Major Flint, temporarily in command, but long enough to do sufficient mischief, we have had wars enough in the last five years to make it plain to us that it takes something more than "pull" to make an officer. Of incident and movement there is plenty in this story, which might be called the best kind of a historical novel, for without attempting to supplant history, it helps to preserve a picture of times and scenes which are too lightly passed over. These Western "skirmishes" and "brushes" with the Sioux, the Apaches, and other tribes are to be met with only in the current newspapers, or buried in the archives of the war department, while every insignificant reference to the far milder types found on the Atlantic coast is spread in detail in the pages of the elementary histories. There are some stirring descriptions of military operations as well as of life at Fort Frayne, and Nanette must stand for a heroic figure from the Sioux point of view. This is a book which admits of no skipping. Illustrations are by Frederick Remington and E. W. Deming. The cover design shows an Indian girl in full Sioux costume, done in colors. Letters of an Actress

"The Letters of an Actress" is an unpretentious little book, presenting no claim to be considered as "literature" and yet which will serve to interest many. Miss Ethel Gladys Luttrell Hobson is the epistolarian, and whether she be a real personage and her correspondence genuine, or whether this is a love story cast in the form of a correspondence, and seeking fame through anonymity, it matters little. The author made her debut as little Eva in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," some time in the eighties, followed that by "East Lynne," and a few more childish parts, and then found place as a pantomime actress in the English provinces. As the first letter bears date 188-- and the last 1899, one is somewhat at sea as to the age of the young lady on her first appearance, but as, in the course of the correspondence, some one else remarks that she was "rising ten" when he first saw her, and as this considerably antedates the first epistle, one is justified in supposing that Ethel Gladys was in the neighborhood of twelve. On the supposition that the correspondence is genuine, in that case the question arises naturally how some of the letters found their way back to the writer. But taking it as genuine, one cannot help but enjoy the guessing part of it, where real London managers and playwrights are described under fictitious names. Gladys Ethel's hard work as a pantomimist, the ways of "hall" artistes, and her love affairs are all good enough reading to while away a summer's hour or so, and there is no attempt at "fine" writing or epigrams. The very simplicity of the little letter-story commends it, especially since it never touches the risque as do so many stories of stage life. A good part of the correspondence consists of the love-letters written to an actor to whom Ethel Gladys was engaged for a time, but who jilted her, thus leaving her free to form an alliance with an "Hon." and become a lady by marriage as well as by birth. [F. Stokes Co., Publishers.]

Another Revolutionary Romance

Though "Cliveden" brings up at the tail of the procession of Revolutionary romances, it is by no means one of the worst of them. On the contrary, had it appeared a year or two earlier, it would have ranked, in all likelihood, amongst the best-sellers of its day. "Cliveden" was the summer home of the patriot, Benjamin Chew of Philadelphia, though for the purpose of the novelist it is inhabited by a family of mythical Murrays, a blind father, a married son and a grown daughter. Those who can recall the details of the battle of Germantown will remember this stone house, which was made a temporary fortress by the retreating British, and this incident is used to good purpose in the book. As is to be expected, it is a love story with a background of war, but we are indebted to the author, Kenyon Cox, for his characters, who are flesh and blood and believable. Margaret Murray is a dignified lady, such as we like to picture our Revolutionary foremothers to have been, and Arthur Peyton, the British officer who wins her heart, is a man of honor. We have glimpses of Washington, Hamilton and Andre, who, however, are kept in the background, for the plot is confined chiefly to the members of the Murray household. There is plenty of incident and action, and the villain is not an improbable figure in a time when so many trimmed their sails with a view to keeping on the winning side. Margaret Murray is the heroine, but of heroes there are half a dozen and all worthy ones. The time is that strange winter of 1777-78, when the patriot army starved and froze at Valley Forge while the wives and daughters of the patriot leaders feasted and feted with Howe's officers in Philadelphia. Mr. West has spared us both the flippancy and the astonishing epigrammatic brilliancy of the average Revolutionary romance, but one could wish that he had let his characters talk "United States," even if we have been taught to believe they did otherwise. It is hard to imagine that people in their everyday clothes used such expressions as "What means he?" "Keep me not in suspense," "Saw you not?" "Knows he not?" "Why send you him away?" and a dozen such on every page. "Oft" and "ere" rather grate on one, and it is not likely that any one who has read "Sentimental Tommy" can suppress a smile at every encounter of "methinks." There are more than Corp Schiack who find it a most useful word. But for those who are not sated with these tales of Revolutionary times there is good reading in "Cliveden." It would pay to cut out some others and give time to this. [Published by D. Lothrop of Boston.]

Geraldine Bonner has written her second novel, a story of a bonanza fortune, which is sufficient of a hint that it will concern Californian life. Amongst the host of writers, East and West, male and female, there are, after all, comparatively few to whose announcements we look forward with much expectation, and amongst the elect Miss Bonner has her place. To be sure, that first short story of hers, printed in Harper's Monthly, was not grateful to our sensibilities, not so much because of its improbability amongst a certain class of the new rich, but because it is the kind of thing that the provincial Easterner accepts as typical of San Francisco. But in "Hard Pan" Miss Bonner more than redeemed herself. It was not only an exceptionally good novel, but an exceptionally true picture of life. The new book is promised as one of the early autumn publications. —The Bookworm.

The Crocker Feud

As a culmination of the bitter squabble and the sensational charges of conspiracy to defraud made about a year ago by Henry J. Crocker against his cousin William H. Crocker and Prince Poniatowski, and which incidentally led to a suit for some $80,000, Henry J. Crocker's name was dropped from the list of directors of the Sierra Railway of California, at the adjourned annual meeting of stockholders held last Monday. All the old directors were re-elected, Crocker's place being filled by ex-Congressman S. D. Woods, of Stockton, who has been the company's attorney for some time. The new board is composed of Prince Poniatowski, president; W. H. Crocker, vice-president; T. S. Bullock, general manager, S. D. Freshman, secretary and treasurer, and S. D. Woods. The dropping of Mr. Crocker out of the directorate did not come as a surprise. The statement of the company for six months ending with December 31, 1902, shows the gross earnings, $181,492.84, and the operating expenses $69,611.46, making the net earnings $111,881.38. The Sierra Railway of California runs from Oakdale to Tuolumne, via Jamestown and Sonora, with a branch line from Jamestown to Angels, and has a mileage of 84 1-10 miles. There are now $1,243,000 6 per cent bonds outstanding, which are due April 12, 1937. Of this amount $5,000 has been retired yearly, and in future it is intended to increase this amount. There have been no dividends paid on the stock; all surplus earnings have been used in construction work. The road is reported prosperous and is doing an excellent business. No further extensions are contemplated for the present.

Morgan's Latest Acquisition

It is believed in Philadelphia that J. P. Morgan has acquired control of the Cramp Shipbuilding Company. It is said that he will not formally assume the control of the company for some while, but it is expected that he will practically dominate the management of the company from now on. It is also reported in Philadelphia that a number of the directors will resign, and that very important changes will be made when the reorganization is consummated. There will be a radical reduction made in the operation of the company, and a general curtailment of expenses in running the plant. A plan of operation is now being mapped out by experts.

Interesting Features on 'Change

Although trade conditions with reference to several leading securities have been somewhat unsettled during the week the actual market prices for stocks have been quite steady with no important fluctuations, beyond the slight changes usually incident to daily transactions. The buying element has been rather backward for some days, but whether this is caused by a temporary neglect of this class of investments or by a disposition to hold off in the hope that after a short time some of the rumors of proposed changes in the corporate affairs of several of the leading companies would assume more tangible form, cannot at this time be determined. Certain it is, however, that there is an unsettled feeling in relation to the lighting stocks and the affairs of the Spring Valley Water Company and the Oceanic Steamship Company. For the most part the sales of the week were confined to small lots and it is quite probable that if any large blocks of stock had been thrown on the market a break in prices would have surely resulted. The proposed change in the Spring Valley Water Company and its re-incorporation is the chief topic of conversation on the street. The peculiar feature about the change in the company's affairs is the manner in which the capital stock is to be doubled. The original company which has been in existence for so many years had a capital stock of $14,000,000 divided into 140,000 shares of $100 each fully paid. The new company has a capital stock of $28,000,000 divided into 280,000 shares of the par value of $100 each. The additional capital stock will not be sold, but will be divided among all the present stockholders at the rate of 2 shares of the new for each share of the old. As the old stock is fully paid to the amount of $100 per share and the new stock is of the par value of $100 per share, the question which is agitating the street is, how one share of the par value of $100 and a market value of $84 can be made into the equivalent of two shares of the par value of $100 each, without the investment of a single dollar on the part of the shareholders. It is asserted by some that this manufacture of new stock is merely a scheme to facilitate a larger bond issue, and the cinching of rate-payers. It may be stated by the way that the present outstanding bonds aggregating $13,975,000 become due in 1906, and it is doubtful whether the company has any sinking fund with which to redeem them. The proposed new bond issue is to have for security the same property, and plant which served as collateral for the old bond issue. There is every probability that when the present bonds mature in 1906, the holders, instead of receiving gold coin to which they are entitled, will be tendered some of the new issue of bonds. In this way, it is said, the company will pay its bonded indebtedness and have an abundance of new paper to float. Oceanic Steamship shares have been very dull although there have been a few sales at from $7 and $7.50. This price does not represent a decline for the corporation has increased its capital stock from 25,000 to 50,000 of the par value of $100 each, and the shareholders are now receiving two shares of the new stock for each share of the old; by this means the additional capital of $2,500,000 is issued and the company can then make an additional bond issue of the same amount. The same questions relating to the Spring Valley Water Company apply with equal force to the Oceanic Steamship Company. At the end of the year 1902, the Oceanic Company owed in the neighborhood of $1,000,000 floating indebtedness. Of this amount about $900,000 was in the notes of the company, due to J. D. Spreckels Bros. & Co. It is now reported that these notes will be paid out of the new bond issue. The company's expenditures last year are said to have exceeded its receipts by nearly $860,000. There is a growing feeling on the street that the fight now in progress between the rival gas companies has become so bitter that all hopes of a compromise are forever at an end. The Independent Light and Power Company is rapidly extending its system throughout the city and their patrons are growing so steadily in number that the management of the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company and the Pacific Gas Improvement Company are appalled at the outlook. Strange as it may appear war has been declared between the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company and the Pacific Gas Improvement Company. This disagreement is said to be the outcome of the failure of the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company to effect some plan of combination for the enlistment of new capital. It is said that the directors of the Pacific Gas Improvement Company refused to acquiesce in the proposition. Hence the quarrel.

Some Chinese Proverbs

From an interesting book on Chinese proverbs and common sayings recently published at Shanghai; its author, Rev. A. H. Smith, a missionary:

Heaven is not sparing of doctrine, nor earth of treasure.

The monastery faces the nunnery; there's nothing in that, but there may be.

A person of great size is sure to be a fool; if not a fool he must be vicious.

Children born within ten months after their parents' marriage will always be poor.

Small hands and large feet, a life of wretchedness.

If the forefinger twitches, one is sure to have plenty to eat.

From Mary Cholmondeley's "Moth and Rust":

If there is one thing more than another which exasperates a conventional person, it is an impulsive action.

It seems to be the miserable fate of certain upright, closed natures who take their bearings from without, always to fail when the pinch comes; to disbelieve in those whom they obtusely love when suspicion falls on them; to be alienated from them by their own success; to be discouraged by their faults, incredulous of their higher motives; repelled by their enthusiasms.

There are long periods in the journey of life when "the road winds up-hill all the way." There are also long periods when the dim plain holds us, endless, day after day, till the last bivouac fires of our youth are quenched in its rains. But when we look back across our journey, do we forget alike the hill and the plain? Do we not rather remember that one turn, exceedingly sharp, of the narrow, inscrutable way, what time the light failed, and the ground yawned beneath our feet, and we knew fear? There is a slow descent, awful, step by step, into a growing darkness, which those know who have strength to make it. Only the strong are broken on certain wheels. Only the strong know the dim landscape of Hades, that world which underlies the lives of all of us. . . If we needs must go down that steep stair we go alone, and none shall say how it fared with us. Nature has some appallingly beneficent processes of which it is not well to speak. Life has been taught at the same knee, out of the same book, and when her inexorable disintegrating hand closes over us, the abhorrent darkness from which we have shrunk with loathing becomes our only friend.

"Wasn't he the tease, though?"

"Mother says that when a girl's in love her feet swell a good deal."

The "Cocktail's" Origin

The origin of the American "cocktail" is obscure. Many attempts have been made to trace it. One that has lately been going the rounds of the press gives it a medical significance. The old doctors had a practice of treating certain diseases of the throat with a pleasant liquor applied with the tip end of a long feather plucked from a cock's tail. They finally began to use this preparation as a gargle, and the name cocktail clung to it. The gargle gave way to an appetizer—to the mixture of bitters, vermouth and liquor that is still in demand. Another story says that the original cocktail was made from pulque, an alcoholic beverage distilled from the juice of the maguey, or agave. The liquor was discovered by a Toltec noble who sent some of it to the king by the hand of his daughter. The monarch drank the pulque, and looked at the maiden. Whether her looks gave more delicate flavor to the liquor, or whether the taste of the liquor made the lady seem fairer, is not certain. The king, at any rate, fell in love with both, started a pulque plantation, and married the girl. Her name, Xochitl, thus became associated with the national intoxicant. When General Scott's troops went to Mexico they drank the liquor and pronounced it good. With the adaptability of the Saxon its Aztec name turned into "cocktail," which was carried back with them to the States.

Civil Service Corruption

The star-eyed goddess of Reform, like a Malay fanatic, ran amuck in this city a few years ago, and one of the results of her activity was the institution known as the Civil Service System. In the pursuit of the ideal, the sad-eyed young reformers who had been lured into municipal politics by that arch manipulator, Mr. James D. Phelan, insisted that San Francisco should have Civil Service Reform. They predicted that with Civil Service Reform would come purity in politics and a clean, business administration of municipal affairs. The system has been in operation over two years, and it has been responsible for more scandals than ever took place in the same length of time in the history of the city. Civil service in San Francisco is a delusion and a snare. We have had two Mayors since the new charter went into effect, and both have made a farce of civil service. Mayor Phelan showed contempt for the charter by making the Civil Service Commission part and parcel of his political machine. With the connivance of his tools on the commission he appointed his henchmen to office in open violation of the civil service provisions of the charter. Then came Mayor Schmitz, who from the beginning of his administration has consistently ignored the civil service law, and who capped the climax of his irregularities by appointing a notorious rogue a member of the Civil Service Commission. The law relating to civil service having been so frequently violated, and it appearing from the numerous scandals that have broken out in the Civil Service Department that frauds have been practiced, people experienced in municipal politics now seriously doubt the possibility of conducting the system on an honest basis. When a man of the wealth and standing of James D. Phelan could not withstand the temptation to "do politics" in a manner that jeopardized his reputation for honesty and integrity, how slim are the chances of ever electing a Mayor of sufficient moral stamina to resist the blandishments of the political siren! We believe that Civil Service in municipal government is conducive to trickery and deceit, and we believe that a majority of the voters of this city believe that it has proved a failure, for they know that men are employed in the City Hall in violation of the law and that frauds have been practiced. After all the Spoils System, so far as municipal politics are concerned, is not so bad as it has been painted. Under our system of government, and with our election machinery in its present condition, political management has become an art, and a party is the best medium yet found for giving concrete expression to political ideas. The men that devote themselves to politics as a profession, who contribute to party organization and keep alive party enthusiasm, have a right to expect a living out of politics. Though parties are founded for great purposes, and act as great moral agencies, they must depend for their every-day working energy on the stimulus of hope and fear, of success and failure, which go to form the fuel of human endeavor. Civil Service Reform is the ideal of those highly respectable citizens who are either too lazy or too indifferent to take an active part in politics, and whose knowledge of public affairs is derived eleven months in the year from perusal of the evening papers through the smoke of an after-dinner cigar. They are the sad-eyed reformers who think they know how the government should be run. They are theorists, and bad ones at that.

Elocution and Oratory

The Bulletin bewails the neglect of elocution by the pulpit and bar and sets forth a plea for the teaching of it in all the higher schools. The Bulletin's champion of the useful and pleasing art contends that it is a valuable aid in making education a practical power, and that it is all wrong to believe that this is a business epoch in which courts and audiences regard only what one has to say and not the manner of saying it. Undoubtedly the useful and pleasing art of elocution is neglected. It is a singular fact that many of our most eloquent orators are unskilled in the art of elocution. They appeal to their audiences solely by their personal magnetism and the charm of their utterances. On the other hand there are men that pose as orators and that enjoy some reputation for oratorical ability who have not the faintest spark of eloquence, but who appeal to the mob by the exercise of those tricks of elocution which are invoked for declamatory effect. Quite often do we witness illustration of Story's lines:

> Loose declamation may deceive the crowd,
> And seem more striking as it grows more loud,
> But sober sense rejects it with disdain,
> As naught but empty noise and weak as vain.

It is usually the bombastic declaimer who goes in for spellbinding with a hungry attention to detail in the matter of inflection, intonation and gesture, and he is fully as theatrical as the ranting barnstormer of the old-time histrionic school. He has memorized numerous chapters of catch phrases from Macaulay, O'Connell, Phillips, Clay and Webster, and though he may deceive the crowd he is as vapid as food without salt and as unconvincing as a romance by the Duchess. The art of elocution is most advantageous to those that have nothing to say but who desire to say it well. One occasionally finds a young lawyer just out of school skilled in the art of elocution. He is always thrusting himself forward whenever there is an opportunity to declaim. He loves the sound of his voice and to tickle his ear with it he will volunteer to act as secretary of the County Democratic Convention, or he will play heavy parts in amateur theatrical shows, for the young elocutionist is always in doubt whether he should become a lawyer or take to the stage. The art of elocution is neglected, but it is the decadence of the art of oratory which should be deplored. The fact is that the true spirit of eloquence is on the decline, but not because men have neglected the art of gesticulating with Delsartian grace. It is because the public speaker of the present day is a victim of the utilitarian trend of the times. He loves to stick to facts and figures; he gives his imagination no play and he fosters no ideals. The man who has no ideals cannot be truly eloquent. The true orator is a man of artistic temperament whose pleasure it is to paint word pictures, to move by the magic charm of verbal imagery, and to make the conquest of his audience with brilliant metaphors. He combines reason with soul and he would scorn to invoke theatrical device.

The Man Behind the Gun

A few months ago an authority on naval marksmanship deplored the deterioration of gunners on American ships. He represented that the marksmanship of the United States Navy was far below the British standard. His views were evidently based on information obtained in England. The views of adverse critics of American institutions generally are. The North Atlantic fleet engaged in target practice the other day, and established the world's record. From the showing made it now appears that the man behind the gun who distinguished himself in the Spanish war has lost none of his skill. The only serious rival of the United States navy in marksmanship is the British, and they need considerable practice yet before they can hope to approximate the record made by our North Atlantic fleet. The Alabama carried off the honors by her splendid work with the thirteen inch guns, hitting the target twenty-two times out of thirty-two shots and making a percentage of 68.75. The Illinois scored a percentage of 53.1. The Indiana's gunners missed the target only six times in twenty-four shots, their percentage being 75. The general average for all guns was 51.50. The firing was done by moving ships, often steaming ten knots at a target sixteen hundred yards distant. The percentage of hits of a British fleet on the Asiatic station was 49. The German Second Squadron made such a poor showing in quick-firing practices several years ago that the authorities decided that such practice was not in accord with fundamental military principles. The French are so reticent about the skill of their gunners that they merely report that the men show great "dash" in aiming big guns.

Merely Target Practice

Admirers of the President point with a good deal of satisfaction to his phenomenal self-control in Yellowstone Park. Mr. Roosevelt is a great patriot, a fine statesman, a gallant soldier, and a model husband, but of all things he is a sportsman. His ruling passion finds expression with the aid of a trigger. The rifle is his favorite toy. Hunting wild animals is his most pleasing pastime. And yet he penetrated the depths of Yellowstone Park, encountered mountain lions and other ferocious game, and never once did he indulge his passion. It required superb self-control on the part of the President to refrain from speeding at least one bullet into the hide of a mountain lion. However the President merely respected one of the laws which he has sworn to execute faithfully. There is an act of Congress which prohibits the killing of birds and animals in Yellowstone Park, and that law applies to the President as much as to any other citizen. Yet as it had been announced that he carried a rifle when he entered the park it was believed that when he reached its isolated and remote depths he would avail himself of the opportunity to do some killing. It now appears that he used the rifle merely for target practice. Our strenuous President is never without a shooting-iron. Some men are confirmed cane carriers; Mr. Roosevelt prefers a gun. In Washington he wears it in his hip pocket, but in the wild and woolly West it is too large to conceal. It was therefore quite natural for him to go armed into the park, and there is no reason why we should not believe that he withstood temptation and expended his energy on a target.

Children in Court

Judge Taylor of the Circuit Court of St. Louis has announced that "Hereafter children will not be allowed to hear the testimony of their parents in divorce cases which come up for trial in my court." The propriety of this decision is so manifest that the wonder is that it has not been made the rule all over the land, not only in divorce proceedings, but in all cases where the child's presence is not necessary to the conduct of the case. This is, perhaps, the first time that the children's rights have been officially considered in the matter of separations between parents, but it is high time that some cognizance was taken of the effect upon them. To put it on no higher grounds, can anything be imagined in worse taste than to allow children to listen to the testimony concerning the cruelty, jealousy, injustice and infidelity of mother or father? Children are being used nowadays in all sorts of litigation. In all cases of criminal procedure, the little children and the aged parents are utilized if they are available. It is more than hinted that the respectable and heartbroken old mother is to be had on hire, like a dress suit, and a shrewd lawyer never misses his opportunity to work in the indirect evidence. Tableaux are arranged and rehearsed, and a bright child is put through its paces precisely as it would be for a stunt on the vaudeville stage. Ostensibly, the accused man or woman is consoled and comforted by the presence of the children and the moral support of the rest of the family, but who believes for a moment that any parent with the good of a child at heart could derive comfort or satisfaction from having it listen to the testimony of a trial for arson, robbery or murder? There is only one idea and that is to work on the minds and sensibilities of the jury and influence a verdict by means of intangible evidence. We have even witnessed the spectacle of a murderer on trial for having beaten his little daughter to death, fondling and kissing his other child who was permitted to attend the trial and listen to all the gruesome testimony. Instead of treating a trial of any kind, civil or criminal, as a scientific investigation in which the sole object is to elicit the truth, it has become a theatrical exhibition, with stage setting and characters, and the object sought for is to produce effects and influence audiences. Whatever may be said of the propriety of admitting adults to court proceedings, children should be rigidly excluded. It does them no good to hear evil, and least of all, evil of their own families. Disillusionment and sophistication come soon enough. The least that can be done for them is to leave them their enchantments and ideals as long as it is possible. Soon enough they must learn to weigh and balance, to choose and judge. The impressions made on a child's mind by the proceedings of a trial are lasting, but the deductions are open to revision and often reversal later on, and it behooves those who would keep the lasting love and respect of their children to see to it that they are not the causes of greater wrongs than they can redress. It will be in the interest of sound morals if Judge Taylor's decision is universally adopted and extended.

The Overdone Mannish Girl

The latest rumor from the haunts of fashion is that the mannish girl is out of date. The shirt waist and the short skirt are doomed, and tanned wrists and sunburnt noses are behind the times. The frills and chiffons, tucks, ruffles and fluffs generally are to take the place of the tailor-made and severely plain, while the pink and white complexion of our grandmothers is to be restored with the rest. Of course there is more or less exaggeration in all this. The athletic girl will not be suppressed in a moment, and no one who has experienced the convenience of short skirts for walking will be apt to return to trains, but the signs have been pointing in this direction for some time past. The mannish girl overdid the mannishness, and the inevitable reaction has set in. When girls made golf, tennis and hockey championships the chief aim of their existence, patronized inch-thick boot soles, and men's gloves, if they wore any, and rolled their sleeves to their armpits in the pursuit of their pleasures, no doubt they were companionable to the men of their set, but in persistently claiming equality in one direction, they had no cause to complain when it was granted in another. The girls who could wheel as far as a man, play outdoor games as long, wear heavy shoes, drink as much beer or as many cocktails, and consume as many cigarettes, had only themselves to thank when the men took it for granted that they could carry their own luggage or hang to a car strap as well. There will never be a return to the pinched waists and back-boards of the earlier time, nor will a pale, pasty complexion, secured by insufficient food or a surreptitious diet of slate pencils and vinegar, ever come into vogue again, but the ladylike girl, who can speak in a low tone, enter a room without knocking the chairs over, close a door without slamming it and seat herself so as not to make a display of her lingerie, will supplant the loud-mouthed, slangy, profane and obstreperous sisterhood who have aimed at popularity through being "good fellows." The great mistake which the mannish girl made was in keeping it up all the time, and the natural result is that she has "played herself out." When a girl can and will do anything and everything that a man does, she loses all attraction for men. They would be just as well satisfied, if not better, with the companionship of another man, or a boy. Coming down to final facts, there is no use in trying to eliminate the differences in sex. It is the old parable of "making a spoon or spoiling a horn," with the chances very much in favor of spoiling the horn.

The Problem Solved

The proposed appointment of President Roosevelt to succeed President Eliot of Harvard in 1909 is suggestive of a solution of the problem, "What shall we do with our ex-Presidents?" Though we seldom have more than one or two ex-Presidents out of a job, it has long been felt that those who have attained the dignity of the high office should be insured against the necessity of job-seeking or of engaging in occupations that might involve them in unpleasant conflict with the common herd and dim the lustre of a great record. To be elevated to the executive chair of a great institution of learning is a high honor, and one in every way commensurate with the dignity of an ex-President. Moreover it would be highly advantageous to our universities if they received the benefit of the practical experience of men who had sounded all the shoals and depths of a career which had found its climax in the highest office in the gift of the people. Scholarship is not an essential qualification for ornamental or active headship of a seat of learning. Dr. Low, Mayor of New York, went from the counting house of a wholesale tea concern to the presidential chair of Columbia. Dr. Harper, of Harper's Educational Bazar of Chicago, is a hustler first and a bookish person afterward. Dr. Jordan of Stanford knows more about fish than he does about the classics. The successful university president these days is skilled in the art of advertising. He devotes himself to the task of promoting capitalistic endowment of the institution over which he presides. He applies commercialism to higher things. It has been said that the appointment of President Roosevelt to succeed President Eliot would be a "tremendous advertisement" for Harvard. It certainly would. And if Grover Cleveland succeeded Harper of Chicago he would not only impart prestige to that institution but he would restrain its sensational professors from augmenting the output of asininity by uttering absurdities that contribute to the gayety of the irreverent.

The Miracle Industry

By Autolycus.

The complications which have arisen between the sovereign commonwealth of California and the Hat Creek tribe of Indians are distinctly of the international type. It is the immemorial law of the Hat Creek Indians that the tribal medicine man when he loses consecutive patients shall be decapitated, and the nearest relatives of the defunct patients are thereafter privileged to use the mediciner's head for a football. These legal proceedings of this character have recently been carried out without stay of execution or appeal on the body of Muley John or some such name. There arises at once a conflict of jurisprudence but the district attorney of Shasta declares that in order to bring to justice—his justice—the offenders it will be necessary to indict three-fourths of the tribe. It was Edmund Burke who informed the world that you cannot indict a nation but the district attorney of Shasta, albeit torn by conflicting emotions of expense and a high sense of duty, feels impelled to try.

It is not here a question of the justice or expediency of extirpating an incompetent medicine man for which much might be said, but rather an invitation to trespass on the border land of conscience, which has always been an alluring battleground. What time the memory of man runs not to the contrary men have died and worms have eaten them for conscience's sake. That was the old custom but it has fallen out of favor. The traitor who fought for the wrong king had his head cut off and impaled on a spike as an example to mankind, warning them not to make mistakes. But we are not so sure of ourselves as we once were. When a British judge not long ago solemnly assuming the black cap imposed a sentence of death on Colonel Arthur Lynch for treason, he knew as well as anybody that he was engaging in a ridiculous masquerade, a humiliating duty from which a national sense of humor might have saved him. If his lordship on the bench had announced an ambition to grow a tail and live in the tops of the trees the reversion might have created equal wonder, but not more amusement.

One does not expect this sort of thing from the French, whose humor other nations are proud to steal. Yet we are told one hundred and fifty years after Voltaire wrote, that the French government proposes to do the very thing that he blasted in a biting epigram. It was some time in the middle of the eighteenth century that somebody with supernatural help as he avouched worked a miracle on the streets of Paris. He promised to repeat the performance the following Sunday at the same place. Naturally the advertisement of the miracle worker was expected to draw a vast crowd and the government, fearing a riot, forbade the show by proclamation. It was then that Voltaire wrote:

De par le Roi: defese a Dieu.
De faire miracle en ce lieu.

That may be translated: "The King forbids his God to work a miracle on this spot." That was a long time ago but the French government proposes to do very much the same thing today. It is announced that the Republic, inspired by a sense of humor as imperfect as that which afflicted the King, will undertake to stop the working of miracles at Lourdes. France seems to need a new Voltaire for the only comment or remark that comes over the wires is a brief lamentation that the prohibition of miracles will "hurt business."

If it is a public offense to commit a miracle in France an obvious business opportunity lies open to invite the wonder workers to come to California. We have souls and bodies to heal and we are ever hospitable to the healers of either, come in what guise they may. One remembers when the Rev. B. Fay Mills first came to California to work spiritual miracles on salary; the churches assessed themselves liberally to pay the price. It is true there arose a slight unpleasantness over the payment of certain assessments. The Rev. Eli McClish of Grace Methodist church explained the difficulty thus:

"There is no doubt he does what he can to strengthen the Calvinist churches. My church collected one hundred dollars for the expense of his meetings but I advised my trustees to hold on to it until we could learn the drift of the Mills revival."

In brief, Dr. Mills was suspected of holding out converts on the Methodists. It is a miracle beyond question to convert a San Francisco sinner by sheer force of talk, but it is not a good investment if the subject drift into the wrong pew. Dr. McClish and others of like persuasion could not see where they got their money back if Brother Mills turned the stream of grace only on the Presbyterians. Doubtless Dr. McClish after all these years, notwithstanding the doubt whether the Calvinist God or the Methodist God profited most by the labors of Brother Mills, must even now feel encouraged in the wisdom of his financial tenacity by the fact that the husbandman whom he suspected of gathering his harvest of souls into the wrong barn has himself backslidden into the hated Unitarian fold. It was almost like getting converts under false pretenses to take them hot from the hand of a Unitarian in embryo. And those who in that profitable season of grace were miraculously converted to orthodoxy—do they not feel dubious about their theological pedigree?

An Engagement Notice Expected

The gossips of the smart set, who are ever on the alert for a morceau sufficiently palatable for tea-cup chatter, believe that they have detected signs significant and portentous in the attentions paid by Clement Tobin to Miss Russell, the blonde step-daughter of Eugene de Sabla. They are predicting that the engagement of those young people will soon be announced. Miss Russell is the daughter of Mrs. De Sabla by her first husband, who, up to the time of his death, was engaged in the shipping business. Mr. De Sabla married the widow in Guatemala. By the way, he has made quite a fortune out of the Bay Power Company.

Hubbard, His Morals and His Gowns

A committee of citizens were discussing Elbert Hubbard, after that notable press agent had departed from our midst. During the conversation the meaning and fitness of the Hubbard trade-mark, "Fra Albertus," came up. "Fra Albertus," explained one, "means Brother Elbert, and is the priestly Latin for Brother Hubbard." "If Brother Hubbard is a priest, what robe does he wear?" asked another. "A Mother Hubbard, of course," said a third in all seriousness. "Why should the Mother Hubbard be emblematic of Brother Hubbard's faith?" asked the first. "Because, like his morals, it is loose, and, like some of his ideas, it is made out of whole cloth," replied an incorrigible knocker.

Howland Will Be Missed

Among the passengers on the transport Thomas, which sailed for Manila last week, was Lieutenant Harry Howland, who will be away with the Twenty-third Infantry for a year or more. Among those who departed none will be more missed in polite society than Howland, who was considered the most desirable of the army officers this season. He possesses the good looks and the manner which the girls adore in a military man, and these gave him whatever he wanted, socially, in San Francisco. During his exile Howland will find time to follow his literary bent. He already has an order for a book of Filipino stories from Robertson and from a Manila publisher. These he intends to furnish before the expiration of the year.

May—I suppose you think he's too old to love.

Belle—Oh, dear, no; he's not old enough. He might live a dozen years.

Judge Morrow Glared

Attorneys Barnes and Boardman had a very uncertain five minutes in the United States Circuit Court the other day during the hearing of the sensational Mrs. Smith case. Captain Barnes had finished speaking on a motion and was just sitting down when Boardman hurriedly whispered in his ear: "Cap'n, make a motion that I be admitted to practice in this United States court, will you? I want to say something to the court on this point." So William arose and in his graceful way made the usual motion on behalf of brother Boardman. The latter arose to find himself looking straight into the penetrating eyes of Judge Morrow.

"I'm more than astonished at this action, Mr. Boardman. Didn't you address this court on some motion several days ago?"

"I—I believe I did, your honor."

"Were you registered then?"

"I was not sure, your honor. I believed I had been admitted. Since then I've asked the clerk to look it up, but he was unable to find my name."

"This is most extraordinary. You ought to be punished for contempt of court." Then turning suddenly on the sponsor: "Mr. Barnes, had you any idea of this condition of affairs when you made your motion?"

"Not in the least, your honor, not in the least," said Mr. Barnes hastily.

"Most extraordinary," repeated his honor; "it is a case that should be seriously dealt with. Mr. Clerk, enter an order that this court"—and he glared again on the culprit—"stands adjourned."

Both attorneys heaved a simultaneous sigh. But they did not dare shake hands till they were safe outside in the corridor.

"He has a very exalted opinion of himself."

"Yes, but it's based on biased information."

The Sumptuous Dingee Home

The W. R. Dingee mansion at the corner of Washington and Franklin is slowly nearing completion and will be in perfect readiness for next season's festivities. Mrs. Dingee hoped to have it in readiness six months ago, but was not wholly satisfied with its interior decorations and decided to have certain changes. She has made repeated visits to Europe and has returned with some famous art treasures. I predict that society, which is already on tip-toe with curiosity concerning the big house, will be agape with astonishment when it is thrown open next fall. A very few have been allowed to view its splendors and those have not enough adjectives to describe what they have seen. One of the latest additions is the state chair of a Doge of Venice that will repose at one end of the magnificent salon. A splendid ball-room with a complete stage will also be one of the features, and Mrs. Dingee is said to contemplate giving weekly functions with professional entertainers.

Connoisseurs of perfect goods appreciate "Jesse Moore" Whiskey for its purity and delightful flavor. It is without a peer.

An Exciting Club Election

The annual election of the California Club was pulled off last Tuesday, and Mrs. George Law Smith was elected president despite the active opposition of Mrs. Lovell White. It was one of the most exciting elections ever held by a woman's club in this city, and despite the fact that all the courtesies and amenities of club life were duly observed it was apparent that the spirit of rancor was not absent. Between Mrs. Smith and Mrs. White there is an armed neutrality. Of course, the ladies desire it to be understood that perfect harmony prevails in the club, but the fact is that there are dissensions and more or less factional strife. Mrs. White was at one time the most active spirit in the California Club, and she is deserving of credit for having done much toward making it an influence for good in the community. She controlled the club and dictated its policy for several years, but finally an opposition was started against her and she was forced to abdicate.

Mrs. White's Activity

During the first year of Mrs. Smith's term Mrs. White took scarcely any interest in California Club affairs. I believe she attended only one meeting, but as the election approached she showed signs of activity. She marshaled her friends and sent out letters in support of the opposition ticket. On election day she was at the polls from the opening till the close, and devoted all her energies to the defeat of Mrs. Smith, but she was unsuccessful. Mrs. Smith made no personal canvass, but her friends rallied to her support and won the day. One of the most active of Mrs. Smith's friends was Mrs. Arthur Cornwall, who was a candidate for director. She was more interested in Mrs. Smith's fight than in her own, and she was beaten by one vote. The friends of Mrs. Smith are now saying that many of the opposition element were women who take no part in club affairs, but who materialize on election day to tell people how the club should be conducted. Prominent among them was Mrs. Robert Watt of Oakland, who never attended a meeting last year.

Bourn Wins

Fully as exciting as the California Club election was that of the University Club which took place on the same day. There is considerable factional feeling in the University Club, too, and two factions were arrayed against each other on election day. The leaders of each faction were very active, and as a consequence a large vote was polled. It resulted in a victory for William Bourn of the gas company, who is to be the new president of the club. The faction opposed to him was led by Fairfax Wheelan, who is now president of the club, and Frank J. Symmes, who has lately bobbed up as a financier with a big banking scheme which he expects to finance on the strength of his popularity, which is almost as great as was that of Joe Crockett when the latter was conducting the affairs of the gas company.

Disastrous Economy

It appears that there has been dissatisfaction in the University Club with the Wheelan administration, and that of late there has been agitation in favor of a new deal. A few years ago the club was on the top wave of popularity, and it was the favorite resort of men who belonged to two or three clubs. Its cuisine excelled that of the Pacific-Union, and the members prided themselves on the skill of their chef. In those days the dining-room was always well patronized, and the club that feeds its members well is always prosperous. In the course of time an economical wave struck the club, and expenses were cut down in a way calculated to make big profits, providing the members did not wander away. But the members wandered. The administration of Fairfax Wheelan, who, it is said, was guided to some extent by Mr. Symmes, was declared a failure. A short time ago some of the members asked Billy Bourn to take hold of affairs and restore the club's prestige. They had great confidence in his executive ability, and were sure that if he could be induced to take an interest in the matter success would crown his efforts. He was prevailed upon to agree to become president of the club, but he insisted that he should be vouchsafed the co-operation of two men in whom he had confidence. The two men he had in mind were Frank Michael, the attorney, and Seward Webb, and it was agreed that they should go on the board of directors.

The Symmes-Michael Row

Everything went along swimmingly until the Wheelan-Symmes push decided to oppose the election of Michael. Their objection to him was that he was one of the men who had transferred their allegiance to the Pacific-Union Club. The charge was true, for Michael deserted the club simultaneously with the impact of the economical wave. But his friends pointed out that his defection was due entirely to the sad results of Wheelan's maladministration, and that the members should be glad to have him serve as a director and help restore the popularity of the club. But it was considered surprising that Symmes should be a leader of the opposition against Michael. It was Symmes who engaged Michael as the attorney for the Employers' Association at the time of the memorable Teamsters' Strike. However, it is not unlikely that the breach between them dates from the time of that strike, for it is said that after provoking the storm that broke upon the Employers' Association Mr. Symmes went off to the country for his health and left Mr. Michael to fight the battle. But whatever the cause of the enmity, the opposition to Michael was a failure. He was elected, and President Bourn will now undertake to restore the prestige of the University Club.

The Blackballing of Corbin

The story came over the wires the other day of the blackballing of Adjutant-General Corbin by the Metropolitan Club of Washington. Nobody familiar with Corbin's career in the army or with the high standing of the Metropolitan Club should be surprised at the action taken. It is not the first time that Corbin was "turned down" by a club. Some years ago he tried to break into the swell Union Club of New York and was treated to the same dose that was administered in Washington. There has been a deep-rooted prejudice against Corbin in army circles for many years, especially among West Pointers, for he is not a graduate of the military academy. He was once court-martialed for cowardice, and his enemies have never permitted the story of the incident to be forgotten. Then he has also been charged with having acted very suspiciously on one occasion in a game of cards. Ever since that occasion a certain hand in poker has been known in army circles as the "Corbin Flush." However, Corbin is a man of rare executive ability, and though he never went to West Point he came from Ohio, a circumstance that has greatly assisted him in his political climbing. The effort to get him into the Metropolitan Club was made by several army men who have received appointments through his influence. But their backing counted for naught. The Metropolitan is one of the most exclusive clubs in America. Its members are prominent in the army, navy and diplomatic circles, and include members of Washington's smart set.

Prima Facie Evidence

The Examiner published a picture last Wednesday of "Civil Service Commissioner P. H. McCarthy declaring his innocence." The blatant McCarthy may be innocent, but if ever he should be brought to trial and he should take the witness stand and look like that picture the jury, in my opinion, would return a verdict of guilty without leaving the box. And yet, as I scan the picture, I have not the slightest difficulty in recognizing Mr. Phelan's protege. There is a proverb to the effect: "The greater the truth, the greater libel." It is exemplified by that picture.

Crossed Party Lines

Behind the scenes in the wind-up of the Dimmick case was a strenuous bit of political wire pulling, struggling to overcome a lusty determination to save thirty thousand dollars. As the days of the last chance to convict Dimmick for stealing the Mint money approached Superintendent Leach decided that it would be best to get a new lawyer for the prosecution. So he consulted his private attorney, Guy Earl, and asked him to recommend a good criminal lawyer. Earl counted over the whole list of attorneys and ended by asking the advice of a professional friend. After careful consideration the latter recommended Peter Dunne. In due time the United States District Attorney's office was notified that Mr. Dunne had been specially engaged to prosecute Dimmick. At once there was a protest. Leach was informed that if he thought it necessary to employ special counsel he might at least keep inside the lines of his own party and employ a Republican—that good Republican lawyers were as plentiful as Democratic legal lights and could be had as easily. Leach demurred and declared he had made his choice and would abide by it. Dunne was told of the protest and declared he would stay in the fight if the United States District Attorney's office was going to take such a stand. The debate finally grew so warm that the local office wired Washington to direct Leach to change his mind. In due time the Superintendent was advised by the Washington authorities to do as suggested by the local District Attorney's office. Thereupon Leach departed for Washington, and presented himself to the Attorney-General to whom he pointed out that if Dimmick escaped conviction he (Leach) would have to put up thirty thousand dollars. He argued that under the circumstances he should be allowed to select the special counsel and after convincing the Attorney-General he returned in triumph.

"God knows I'd like a chance to rest," said the Fable.

"What do you think of poor me?" groaned the Dialect Philosophy.

He Wasn't Surprised

Judge Garber heard some good stories in Washington, and he has been regaling the members of the Bar Association with them. One of the stories is about a noted lawyer famous for his repartee. One day he was told that a certain unscrupulous politician had "got religion."

"Aren't you surprised?" his informant asked.

"I shouldn't be surprised to hear of anything he had which didn't belong to him," was the reply.

Kleptomania in Oakland

Society in Oakland appears to be inoculated with the germ of kleptomania. The itch for larceny has manifested itself in the most exclusive circles. Some weeks ago I related that purses had been rifled of their contents during card games in private houses. The story has been told of the theft of a fur coat at one house, and the subsequent recovery of the garment at a local furrier's. It had been sent to the furrier to be altered, presumably by the person who had stolen it. And now the officers of the Ebell Society, which is the most exclusive organization across the bay, complain of the loss of books from the library. The General Curator of the Ebell Society recently inserted a notice in an Oakland daily of a list of the books that "are missing." Of course she does not charge that they have been stolen, but when books are missing from a club library it is usually because they have been stolen, for members are prohibited from taking books to their homes. "Members will please return them before vacation," pleads the curator.

Society was Shocked

Many people were shocked at the Twentieth Century Musical Club last Saturday afternoon by an Oakland girl who is noted for her proficiency in the use of picturesque and forcible language. A nervous youth who was frantically trying to do the proper thing spilled some punch on her gown. The accident certainly warranted the indignation of the young woman, and as she has never schooled herself in repose she said aloud what a more dignified and composed member of the sex would have expressed behind her teeth. "Damn you," she exclaimed, "if you do that again I'll break your head." As she is of the athletic type the youth did not wait to apologize.

Pardee Talks in a Strange Tongue

Though Governor Pardee has never distinguished himself as a linguist, many readers of the Oakland Tribune are of the opinion that he has lately been familiarizing himself with a new tongue. Last week the Governor was a guest at a banquet of the Berkeley Board of Trade, and he made a speech. This is how the Tribune reported it:

> Governor Pardee said in part: Korch th, nGini oo hui rpiiteeg a a a aa

I am unable to classify the language in which the Governor did his spellbinding, but I have no doubt that he was quite eloquent, and that his sentiments aroused great enthusiasm, for according to the Tribune he was warmly applauded. There is no language so dead or so new that it cannot be understood in Berkeley.

Bigots Kill an Oakland Club

Some years ago, at the suggestion of President Wheeler of Berkeley, a club composed of men and women graduates of the university was organized in Oakland. It was intended to be a dinner club at the meetings of which there should be talks on subjects of interest to university men and women. All went well for several dinners, with large attendance and much good speaking. Then came a dinner at which George de Golia was host, and at which Judge Harry Melvin, Peter Bowles, Mrs. Frank Deering, then Mabel Craft, Professor Gayley and John R. Glascock, all distinguished themselves as clever talkers. It occurred to Mr. de Golia that a little claret would impart zest to the occasion, and the juice of the grape was served in mild doses. The dinner was pronounced by far the best the club had ever had. Judge of the consternation of the President and host when the next week brought a flood of letters from women who had attended the dinner, protesting against the claret. The officers of the club were so disgusted at this betrayal of Puritanical intolerance by women of presumed enlightenment that they took no further interest in the club and it was permitted to die. It came to life again last week, the occasion being a dinner to Governor Pardee, but not even the presence of the Executive could lure back the brains and spirit that made notable the former assemblages. It was a very tame affair and the speeches were deadly dull. That's what a few rabid and benighted Prohibitionists have accomplished in the somnolent town of Oakland.

"What is there to drink?" inquires the ne'er do well Jenkins in the supper scene of "A Modern Magdalen," Amelia Bingham's Bijou play.

"Water," snaps his shrewish wife.

"Water," replies Jenkins, calmly and reflectively, "a very excellent beverage. But, somehow, it never gets one any further."

A Story from Oakland

The brand of kid that flourishes in Oakland's smart homes is unique, and excels in a kind of brightness that is not found elsewhere, even on this side of the bay. An Athenian Club man relates this instance of juvenile Oakland brilliancy: The child was showing the picture of a pig to a lady visitor. The pig had a very curly tail, and the visitor remarked.

"That's a very curly tail for a pig. I guess it must use a curling iron."

The little girl returned:

"What's that?"

President Theodore Roosevelt's wine is Ruinart.

"Why, a curling iron—hasn't your mother a curling iron?"

The child stared at the picture and then at the questioner.

"Why, my mamma hasn't got a tail," she said, "what does she need a curling-iron for?"

Macon in a New Parish

A report was printed in an Oakland paper that the Rev. Clifton Macon, now assistant of Dr. Clampett at Trinity, this city, had been called to the rectorship of the church in East Oakland. While the report was premature, it is a certainty that Mr. Macon will be called to that church, and that Dr. John Bakewell will be made the Rector Emeritus. Since the assistant at Trinity has just entered the interesting state of matrimony, an independent parish at this time would be opportune, and also personally agreeable to him, his friends believe, despite the cordial relations that have always existed between himself and Dr. Clampett. The new parish is also Trinity, and while not large is in a growing field and officially reported in good condition. By the way, the Rev. W. Carson Shaw, who is rector of the prosperous Church of the Advent in Oakland, was once assistant at Trinity here; and he left under less smiling circumstances.

To Wed In Oakland

On Tuesday, May nineteenth, the marriage of Miss Alma Sherman and Allan Chickering will be pulled off at the First Congregational church in Oakland. The bride-to-be is a Fresno girl but is as well known in Oakland society as in that of her own home. Her father is Dr. Sherman of the raisin city. Her fiance is the eldest son of the William H. Chickerings who recently returned to their Oakland home after spending the winter in town. He is associated with his father in law practice, and has considerable literary talent. He was the first editor of the Daily Californian of the U. C. Miss Sherman, too, has a taste for literature and has written plays for college presentation. It was while attending the Berkeley university that their pretty romance had its origin.

A Fulfilled Prediction

The despatch announcing that the marriage of Miss Alanna Marmion and Joseph O'Sullivan would be one of the early May events in Paris did not come as a complete surprise to readers of Town Talk. The rumor of their engagement came from a Paris correspondent over two months ago and was first noticed in these columns. Alanna Marmion is a granddaughter of the late Rear Admiral David McDougall, who was once prominent in local society, his beautiful daughters being very popular. Alanna's mother was Carrie McD. Van Voorhies before her marriage with Medical Director R. A. Marmion, U. S. N. Her grandmother, Mrs. Van Voorhies, took the young girl abroad some years ago. In Paris she was having her voice cultivated, and so was "Joe" O'Sullivan, who was studying under Sbriglia. "Joe" is a brother of Denis O'Sullivan, and he lately came into his share of the family shekels.

Early California Romance

The news from New York of the engagement of Ben Ali Haggin, grandson of the multi-millionaire, J. B. Haggin, and Miss Robinson, revives recollections of some incidents in early California history. Away back in the early days there was a financier in this city, Harry Meiggs by name, who accumulated so many debts that he incontinently levanted to South America, leaving many disconsolate creditors behind, among them being the commission firm of Goddefroy & Sillem. Meiggs located in Peru where he became a railroad builder and grew very rich. When the news of his success reached this city, William Sillem, the junior member of the commission firm, took a trip to Peru to collect the money owed by Meiggs. The latter was glad to see him and seemed pleased to settle the indebtedness. He not only paid the sum due but consented to the marriage of Sillem with his niece, Miss Sarah Woods, with whom the commission merchant had fallen in love at sight. After the wedding, which was a big society event in Lima, the couple came to this city. Some months later Mrs. Sillem's younger sister arrived from Lima on a visit, and in short time she won the affections of Ben Ali Haggin, youngest son of the present octogenarian, J. B. Haggin, and they were married. It is their son whose engagement with Miss Robinson has been announced.

The Mourning Band

The Haberdasher of New York, which is accepted by many as an arbitre of fashions, recently published the following in response to a query as to what a gentleman should wear during the mourning period: "The wearing of a band of crepe or black cloth on the left sleeve is an affectation borrowed from England, where it was adopted for liveried servants. In civil life it is a sign of poverty, as it was adopted by men who felt they could not afford to buy entire mourning outfits. The band is proper for servants, penurious and poor people."

Tears That Are Coveted

Pearls were the ornaments worn by Mrs. William Randolph Hearst on her wedding day, and the groom's present to his bride was a rope of pearls. Evidently the old superstition expressed in the aphorism "Pearls are tears" has no terrors for the young couple. Yet even in this enlightened age, and despite the current penchant of fashionables for pearls, there are not many women that would wear them on their wedding day. However pearls are the gems of the rich, for diamonds have become common. Diamonds are worn as ornaments while being held as collateral, and most people that wear them do so to proclaim their affluence. Hence the vulgarity of them. Costly pearls are rare in this city, and yet some very handsome ones are in the possession of a few of our society people. Mrs. Walter Dean, Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels, Mrs. James Flood, Mrs. Billy Irwin and Mrs. de Young are among those who own fine pearls. George Hall has a valuable one presented to him by the Sultan of Turkey. In the boxes on a grand opera night at the Metropolitan theatre in New York pearls are more common than diamonds are in the betting ring at Emeryville. One of the most curious of pearls was the one the French traveler, Tavernier, sold to the Shah of Persia for six hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars. Princess Youssoupoff owns a pearl valued at two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. The Pope has one worth one hundred thousand dollars. The Baroness Gustave de Rothschild received from her husband a collar of fine chains of pearls which cost a million dollars.

Gladys Crocker's Marriage

So Porter Ashe's daughter Alma, now known as Gladys Crocker, was married in London last Monday to her step-father's brother, Powers Gouraud. The marriage effects a queer relationship, but a similar one was established in this city in early days, when two brothers, Wakeman by name, married a mother and daughter. It was the younger brother who became the husband of the mother. Keith Wakeman, the actress, was the daughter of the other couple. According to the despatches the Gouraud brothers have been congratulated on all sides on having captured two American heiresses, but Jackson Gouraud, who married Amy Crocker, may find that marriage with that eccentric woman is not necessarily a capture. Amy Crocker has always been a very elusive woman. It also appears from the despatches that the Gouraud brothers are the sons of Colonel E. B. Gouraud, "who was one of the first successful American promoters in England." That is a rather vague way to designate a man. Some of the most successful American promoters in England were bunko steerers. The despatches were discreetly silent on the subject of Powers Gouraud's standing in the financial and social world. I am able to throw some light on the subject, for I happen to know that a little over a year ago he was a struggling thespian on Broadway. He had an engagement with the "Beauty and Beast" spectacular musical comedy and he was just about one degree above the chorus. In those days he regaled the members of the company with stories about the grand style in which the Crockers lived.

They Are Coming Home

Several times during their four years' absence it has been reported that Major and Mrs. John A. Darling were on their way home. But they always changed their plans at the last moment, and went abroad instead of coming to California. However, Mrs. Darling writes her friends here that the Major and she are really coming back, and will be at their country-place, Edgewood, near Rutherford, somewhere about the end of May. They would have started sooner but were detained in New London because the Major desired to be present at the marriage of the daughter of one of his old friends, Artillery Colonel H. L. Haskins. Mrs. Darling has been the dispenser and recipient of considerable hospitality in New London this season. The other day she gave a "musical tea," with cards and prizes, in the old Captain Billings home in Federal street, which is the Darlings' New London residence. After visiting Dr. Clinton Hastings Catherwood in New York, the Darlings will start on their westward journey.

The Indefatigable Ella

True to her policy of rushing in where angels fear to tread, Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox has become one of the editors of a book on etiquette and fashionable deportment which I see advertised in the Eastern periodicals of modes and manners. This volume, according to the announcements, will teach people how to act, how to dress and how to look, and will—in short—undertake to metamorphose a sixpence into a guinea by the aid of several experienced lady alchemists. San Francisco is probably a jay town, and it is due to, or in spite of, this defect that many people who saw the sybil of the servant girl during her visit here declare that there is no woman in journalistic or literary life more peculiarly unfitted to inject social polish in the minds of the unmannered than is Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox. Her voice, expression and bearing, many are so cruel as to say, savor more of the kitchen than of the drawing room. It requires no more convincing example than her now famous "interview" with Mrs. Pat Campbell to show what a poor appearance the imitation lady must needs make in the presence of the real thing. As to posing as a mentor of dressmaking, I fear that Mrs. Wilcox would make a very unsafe pilot if we are to judge by the odd toilets she wore during her public appearances in this city. Be these things as they may, Ella is a professional bluffer, and to such all things are easy, even to essays in the realms of Chesterfield.

When Roberts Went Gunning for Heretics

Elder Roberts, one of the pioneers and a very pillar of California Presbyterianism, who passed away recently, was a peculiar and interesting character. Mr. Roberts caught some share of fame from Mrs. Sarah B. Cooper. He was a great believer in infant damnation and all the other dogmas of Calvinism, and when he found that Mrs. Sarah B. Cooper—whose Bible class was larger than his, by the way—did not believe that little unbaptized babies, when they die, go straight to the bad place, he promptly preferred charges against her and saw that she was tried for heresy. Of course Mrs. Cooper was merely a vicarious victim. The real person for whom the elders, including Roberts, were gunning, was Dr. Hemphill, whose orthodoxy they questioned and whom they hoped to trap into some damaging admission during Mrs. Cooper's trial.

How Mrs. Cooper Jarred Him

During the trial, Elder Roberts expressed much sympathy for Mrs. Cooper and used often to call upon "Sister Cooper." The lady, who was decidedly shrewd, even if she was the sweetest and gentlest woman that ever lived in San Francisco, became suspicious of these visits. One day she said to the elder, "Do you know what you remind me of?"

Of course the elder didn't, though he hoped it was one of the saints.

"Well," said Mrs. Cooper smilingly, "you remind me of a heavenly hound on the scent of heresy."

The elder picked up his hat, threw his cape-overcoat about him and never darkened the heretic's door again.

Visited Old Friends

Major Rathbone has just returned from a visit to the East, the first made by him in some years. He was no doubt delighted with his trip for he has among his acquaintances on the other side of the Rockies some of the most prominent men in the country. Before coming to this city Major Rathbone enjoyed the friendship of men who are today conspicuous in the army and the navy, in politics in Washington and in society in New York. He held high positions in the diplomatic service, and there is not a man in California so widely known in the East or in Europe as Major Rathbone.

The Pursuit of Glory

There is a capital motif for a comic opera in the advent of President Roosevelt to California. Could anything more ludicrous be imagined than the row between Governor Pardee and the Legislative Committee over the honor of greeting the country's Chief Magistrate? Such an exhibition of asininity was never before given within the confines of this State. Why the Legislature appointed a committee of statesmen to greet the President I have not the faintest notion, unless it was because the lawmakers felt that the State owed them a junket between sessions. Senators and Assemblymen take themselves with tremendous seriousness, and it breaks their hearts to step out of the limelight. So it was quite natural for them to seize on the President's visit as a pretext to protract their official status. In appointing the committee the Legislature undertook to usurp the prerogative of the Governor, and evidently the latter didn't have sense enough to realize that the statesmen were trespassing on his official preserves, for he negotiated with them for a seat in one of their special cars. They agreed to let him ride with them, and appeared to think they were doing him a great favor. The Governor appeared to think so, too, until somebody called his attention to the fact that he had a staff, and that he should surround himself with all the pomp and circumstance of peace on such an auspicious occasion.

The Tinsel Heroes

When the Governor's staff heard that his Excellency was going off to extend the gladhand to the President with no intention of giving them an opportunity to shine there was great indignation among them. Such oversight in their opinion was discourteous and preposterous. Fancy the indignation of such a man as "Colonel" F. E. Beck at being left behind on such a glorious occasion. No doubt he fairly writhed at the thought of missing the opportunity to expand his chest and flaunt his gayly bedecked person at Redlands. "Colonel" Beck is one of a job-lot of tinsel colonels who have been handed down from one Administration to another, and who have no difficulty in retaining their gold lace because the average citizen who can afford the luxury has no desire to make a popinjay of himself. When the Governor was reminded of his duty to his staff he promptly demanded accommodations for them on the legislative special, and the statesmen with equal alacrity demurred. They knew that if ever that cargo of gold lace and detonating uniforms got aboard their train they would sink into obscurity. They wouldn't be fit even to form a background when the Governor extended his greetings. Moreover they didn't wish to be crowded. As the State was paying for the junket they had invited their wives along, and they were going to make it quite a family affair. Hence the staff was barred.

The Governor Scared

And hence the spectacle of two trains rushing toward Redlands, one bearing the Governor and his staff, and the other laden with the hold-over junketers and their wives. Arriving at the scene of the difficulty negotiations for a compromise followed. The legislators were accompanied by their star spellbinder, Grove L. Johnson, and they had arranged a program with a view of making Mr. Pardee look like thirty cents. It was their purpose to have two speeches of welcome, one by the Governor representing the State, and one by Johnson representing the business section of the legislature. They were sure that though the Governor might eclipse them with the glory of his resplendent staff, Grove Johnson would "fade" the whole outfit with the brilliancy of his rhetoric. The Governor quailed at the prospect of going up against Johnson, and he fairly begged for mercy. What libretto writer could wish for better material for a comic opera?

When Teddy Comes To Town

Undoubtedly much more material of the same quality will be developed before Mr. Roosevelt leaves California on his homeward journey. The rush for the limelight is being made on all sides, and there are bound to be many amusing incidents to lighten the cares of the President's tedious journey. He is going to spend several days in this vicinity, and during that period he will meet some of our leading citizens who are quite interesting in their provincial way. He should not be surprised, however, at anything they say or do for we do not meet Presidents every day.

The Cleveland Grays

So great is the interest taken in the President's visit that I fear the "Cleveland Grays" who are also coming may not receive the attention they deserve. This is not only one of the most famous National Guard organizations in the country but it is also one of the oldest and wealthiest. These guardsmen are deserving of more than perfunctory attention. Their entertainment should not devolve on the Ohio Society alone. That society came nearly exhausting its energies during President McKinley's visit.

Artist Cadenasso In Luck

Mr. Arthur E. Childs, of Boston, millionaire and connoisseur, has lately become the possessor of five fine paintings by G. Cadenasso of this city. If pictures, like people, are to be judged by the company they keep, Mr. Cadenasso is to be congratulated; for his work goes to grace walls hung with choice canvases, among which is a very valuable Munkacsy. Though we lose the paintings, we keep the painter, plus a well-merited addition to his reputation. And nature in California and art in Mr. Cadenasso between them are quite competent to fill the five vacant places in the Post street studio. Mr. Childs intends to exhibit his purchases in a prominent Boston club house.

The Belligerent Livernash

When Congressman-elect Livernash was running for the Congressional job some months ago I predicted that in the event of his election he would make things hum in the National halls of legislation. Sensible as I am of his rare talents, of his flamboyant aggressiveness and predilection for controversy, I knew that if ever he attained a seat in Congress he would command attention at the very beginning of his legislative career. Livernash is no dawdler. He is a man of action, and he is a bit eccentric, but that is a mark of his genius. He has a balance wheel but it is not always well oiled, and consequently he is inclined to enact the role of the bull in a china shop. The Congressman-elect gave us a taste of his uproarious, slashing methods at the meeting last Wednesday evening in Pioneer hall, called for the purpose of reorganizing the local Democracy. It would have been a very harmonious meeting had it not been for the presence of Mr. Livernash; almost as harmonious as one held some months ago under almost the same auspices in the interest of the Congressman. But whereas Mr. Livernash was pleased at the harmony of the campaign gathering he was disgruntled Wednesday night because in his opinion it was undemocratic in the concord and unison that prevailed. So he broke in to start a row, and he succeeded. Unfortunately he lost his head, forgot his parliamentary law, resorted to insult in lieu of argument, and was floored. Even a genius has an off night. Livernash slipped a cog Wednesday night and made an unfortunate spectacle of himself.

His Ambition

The truth of the matter is that Mr. Livernash attended the Wednesday night meeting with the avowed purpose of capturing it. The Congressman like his employer, Mr. Hearst, has become ambitious. He is in favor of the reorganization of the Democracy, but he wishes to do the reorganizing. To that end he entered into a combination with Michael Casey, the political teamster, who recently gave Mayor Schmitz the double cross after accepting an appointment at his hands. The program was to stuff the meeting with employes of the Board of Public Works and McNab heelers, and it was carried out, but the plans of the conspirators miscarried. Livernash lost his head, behaved like a sulky child, excited derision by insisting that parliamentary laws should be ignored, and alienated many of his friends to whom he was indebted for his election to Congress.

The Result of His Fight

When Livernash first took the floor he had many supporters because it was believed that he represented the Examiner, and it was known that the Democratic organ approved the movement. Livernash is employed by the Examiner and was elected to Congress by the influence of that paper. Therefore it was natural to suppose that his interests were those of the paper. But Livernash prides himself on his independence, and he soon made it apparent that he had only his own interests to subserve. If he behaves in Congress as he did Wednesday night, I fear that my predictions regarding him will not come true. However, the men by whom the party is being reorganized should be pleased that he did attend the meeting, for the fight that he made served to solidify the forces that are engaged in wresting the machine from the grasp of McNab.

Hail To The Dog Manicure

Dog sanitariums, dog hospitals and special dog feeders have been in the city's canine directory for some time, but the latest professional to record her dog treatment will no doubt cause a yawp of comment in the dog-gone world of mongrels. She is the society dog manicure and she has opened a room for business in Sutter street. The word manicure does not fully describe the accomplishments tendered her canine customers. Not only does she attend to their nails, but she shampoos them, scents their coats any favorite odor, curls the hair of their coats if desirable—in short, she guarantees to turn out a veritable Beau Brummel, tubbed and scented to the hour, in the place of any old fuzzy wuzzy that may be submitted to her arts. To see this young woman going out of a morning to make her professional rounds you'd take her for a trained nurse on a "hurry call." She carries a neat little black bag that contains a set of fine white towels, an ebony backed brush, fine castile and the daintiest set of manicure implements imaginable. There is even a small jar of rosaline that gives the nails a clear, dainty tint. Dog-loving mistresses in society seem to think now that the dog that is not manicured once a fortnight, combed twice a week, bathed every other day and perfumed and crimped in one of half a score of fashionable ways is not considered fit to move in good society. The bath, however, is the main "treatment." It is a delicately scented affair with a perfume selected by the mistress. The dog is washed and dried before an electric fan —at the parlor. If there is none at his home he is rubbed and fanned till his fuzzy coat stands out like swan's down. Then he is rubbed with alcohol and powdered orris root. If his coat requires curling it is gone over with a heated iron till there is not a stray piece but what is waving in beautiful lines. And then comes the manicuring. When it is all over the pet dog is something resplendent and tonsorially to ornament the elegant and fastidious life of up-to-date society.

The Builder of the Pleasanton

The ranks of the old pioneers are being thinned out with great rapidity these days. One or two are going nearly every week. One of the latest to join the majority was Elijah Baker, who was for many years identified with the farming industries of the State. Some years ago he sold a ranch near Pleasanton and with the proceeds erected the Pleasanton hotel at Sutter and Jones streets, where he has been living with his wife ever since. His death occurred the day after the management of the hotel had changed hands. O. M. Brennan retired from the management, transferring his lease to Mr. Edgar S. de Wolfe, who has conducted the business for him for several years. Mr. de Wolfe is an experienced hotel man, and by the way he is a brother of Elsie de Wolfe, the New York society actress.

Elder and Shepard to Separate

The firm of Elder & Shepard, after several years of successful publishing, is about to dissolve partnership. Publishers, it appears, are like doctors in their inability to agree on all points, for it is a proverb in New York houses that the middlemen who are to remain happily mated for more than the space of a year are indeed blessed of heaven. Paul Elder and Morgan Shepard have remained together as long as could be expected in their business, and their separation is merely a matter of diverging policies. Shepard, I am told, ran the curio and art end of the business, while Elder was more purely a man of books. Shepard was the "outside man" and Elder the "inside man," and working thus they made a strong team. During the course of their career they have worn the mantle which was handed down by Doxey, who produced The Lark and other quaint and original creations. Paul Elder, I believe, was in the employ of Doxey before he went into business for himself, and Morgan Shepard was connected with one of the local banks. I am told that the business will continue under the firm name of D. P. Elder.

That Cowboy Dinner

I see that the Bookman for this month has run, among its notes on authors and artists, a two-column picture of the cowboy dinner which enlivened the Bohemian Club some months ago. The dinner, as heretofore reported in this department, was given by the club's artistic set to Samuel Adams, who was at that time on the Coast representing McClure's. Adams was lured into the Red Room expecting an evening of conventional enjoyment, but was surprised by a fusilade of shots from the six shooters of a dozen fully equipped cow-punchers, who set the tenderfoot to dancing by a hundred shots at his patent leathers. The story subsequently appeared in the newspapers all over the country, and this month's Bookman is the last to mention it, referring to the givers of the dinner as "most of the Californian writers and artists who are being heard from." The picture represnts Adams, a solitary figure in a Tuxedo, standing at the head of the table with both hands up, while leveled at his head from all sides of the board are the "shooting irons" of the sombreroed Bohemians. In the group are Bruce Porter, Gelett Burgess, Frank McComas, Dr. Arnold Genthe, Will Irwin, Charles F. Bryant, Wallace Irwin, Robert Aitken, Porter Garnett, Captain Howland, L. Maynard Dixon and Charles K. Field. These clubmen have made it a point to entertain visiting celebrities from the East.

The Plan that Failed

Charley Williams, Republican and Charley Yolland, Democratic candidate for Mayor of Stockton, are members of the city council. When the Western Pacific Railroad Company petitioned the council for a franchise and rights of way through the town, a lobby was organized in opposition, and a shrewd plan was concocted to secure the votes of both the men with mayoralty aspirations. Each was told that if he voted against the measure he would receive the support of the enemies of the railroad enterprise. But it happened that both came together and compared notes, and the consequence was that both voted for the franchise.

Riley in the Smart Set

Affected superiority and snobbery are so characteristic of the new-rich nowadays that it is refreshing to learn of an example of homely simplicity that bespeaks freedom from those disgusting traits. My Stockton correspondent writes me of such an example at the smart wedding last week of Miss Beatrice Welsh and Mr. Stewart Parker Elliott at St. John's Episcopal church. The bride is the daughter of J. M. Welsh, President of the Stockton Milling Company, and Mr. Elliott is a son of the late Lieutenant-Commander Elliott who was in the battle of Manila Bay. Among the guests at the church was a plainly dressed individual who was apparently a workingman, and who seemed to take a deep interest in the wedding. As the bridal party was leaving the church, and Mr. and Mrs. Welsh were surrounded by their fashionable friends, Mr. Welsh caught sight of the workingman. He beckoned to him to approach and when he did so Mr. Welsh said, "Riley, there's a carriage for you outside; I want you to come out to the house." And Riley rode in a carriage to the reception. When he isn't attending weddings Mr. Riley drives a dray for the Stockton Milling Company.

Horse and Horse

A story is told of a Stockton woman of wealth who is noted for her economies. Some church ladies called on her one day, and asked her to buy tickets for an entertainment. After a good deal of haggling and pleading of poverty she consented to take two tickets at fifty cents each. Later the ladies discovered that the dollar had a hole in it and they went back to complain of it, the economical lady meantime having attended the entertainment.

"The dollar was bad," complained the indignant ladies.

"So was the entertainment," was the complacent retort.

Upper Thirteen in Jeopardy

That highly exclusive coterie of suburban aristocrats yclept the Upper Thirteen of San Rafael is congratulating itself on having escaped contamination. However, since the revelations in the Woods-Hickmoot affair, the members feel that they had a very narrow escape. When the mysterious and altogether inexplicable Woods first appeared in San Rafael and rented one of the pretentious residences the Upper Thirteen sat up and took notice. Later on the exclusive circle was agog over the sensational report that the Woods family had two servants, and when it was rumored at the casino parties that the Woods family bought tomatoes recklessly out of season and sent the family linen to the French laundry, the conclusion was that the newcomers were plutocrats of the first order and should have the entree wherever they desired. But the circumstance that saved the elite of the village from contact with the strangers was that Mr. Woods was a student at the San Francisco Theological Seminary. It was responsible for the saving hesitancy on the part of the grand dames. However it has been darkly hinted that Mrs. Douglass Hardy said "Good morning" once, in the bus, to Mrs. Woods; that Mrs. Robert Renebome nodded to her across the street, and that Mrs. John E. Alexander bowed to her once in church. But these ladies deny the soft impeachment. But the chances are that the Upper Thirteen will be more exclusive than ever.

A Lonely Graduate

The first Commencement Day at the San Francisco Theological Seminary since the departure of Dr. MacKenzie for pastures new and more fruitful was remarkable for the size of the graduating class. It consisted of only one member and his embarrassment at having to figure as a class was quite evident. This is the smallest "class" that ever graduated from the seminary, and it is regarded by the friends of the institution as a matter of some significance. Some assert that the existing apathy in the affairs of the seminary is due to the loss of Dr. MacKenzie's influence. Others contend that the smallness of the class was due to the raising of the standard of education, and they assert that during the presidency of Dr. MacKenzie the standard was absurdly low; that the reverend gentleman was a business man first and a scholar afterward—a long way afterward. They say that he had to hire some one to do his work.

A Philanthropic Sinner

Dr. MacKenzie's friends are terribly shocked at these assertions and they point to the fact that it was he who made the seminary possible by persuading the late Alexander Montgomery, whose life had not been exactly conducive to a peaceful conscience, that the ultimate way of the transgressor might possibly be smoothed if paved with gold. This is undoubtedly true. Until the Montgomery barrel was tapped by Dr. MacKenzie, the San Francisco Theological Seminary had a hard struggle. It was located in a ramshackle structure in Lower Height street, and it was far from prosperous. Dr. MacKenzie took an interest in it, and in a very short time he enlisted the support of Alexander Montgomery. And at that time a protest was raised by those who thought that as Montgomery was not an exemplar of all the virtues his gold was unfit for use. Dr. MacKenzie defended Montgomery, and argued that the rich man had mended his ways and repented of his sins. This was denied by those who were horrified at the thought of a theological seminary receiving benefactions from a sinner. They related that Dr. MacKenzie had found it necessary to detain Mr. Montgomery almost by force, in Mill Valley, to insure his sober attendance at a certain reception. The question of the millionaire's repentance was never settled, but he lies buried beneath a fifty thousand dollar chapel at San Anselmo while Dr. MacKenzie is in possession of a fat charge in New York, and the seminary is occupying several acres of land and any number of spacious buildings and turning out a class of one each year.

At It Again

The Good Government Club and Stormy Petrel Stevenson have acquired a thirst for politics that even defeat can not quench. The election in San Rafael should have convinced the sad-eyed reformers of Marin that the community was not ripe for purification. They tried to win by trickery of the rankest variety and they failed. Nevertheless they are petitioning the trustees of the town to institute certain reforms which were incorporated in the platform of the repudiated candidates. Of course the petition will be denied.

They Protested In Vain

A great fuss was raised in London by some of the leading Anglican churchmen when it became known that King Edward intended to visit the Pope. The Church Association, which is an organization of the Evangelical section of the Church of England, sent a message to the King expressing dismay that his Majesty's advisers deemed it consistent with their duty to play into the hands of the Roman Curia by arranging for the King to formally visit the Pope, whose religion his Majesty had declared was superstitious and idolatrous. It is evident that the seed of bigotry still flourishes in London. The words superstitious and idolatrous as applied to Catholicism occur in the British coronation oath. It will be recalled that at the time of King Edward's coronation a movement was started to have those words modified or expunged, but it failed.

The Perennial Diamond

It seems that "Old Man" Diamond has celebrated one of his birthdays during the past week and, as usual, has gone through all his exhibition stunts for the benefit of the invited guests. This last anniversary, according to Diamond's count, is his one hundred and seventh, and he claims that he feels just as young as he used to be. To substantiate this claim he danced with a maiden suppositiously a hundred years his junior, on the occasion of his birthday party, sang with the young folks and performed various other youthful gymnastics. The newspaper account, also, did not fail to mention the fact that Mr. Diamond still has sufficient vigor to take a long walk every day, usually to the Cliff House and back. This annually-recurring story brings up the question, How old, actually, is this man who claims to be the champion graybeard of the Pacific slope? To lie about one's age is one of the leading weaknesses of humanity, and among prevarications it is the hardest to detect. From one to eighteen a person wants to appear older than he is; from twenty-five to seventy it is one's invariable impulse to appear younger; but from seventy on age becomes a pride to its possessor and a sore temptation to untruthfulness. There are several tribes of Indians in the West whose members claim to have attained a fabulous old age, but canny scientists have discovered that it is a custom among their old men to claim a hundred years as soon as wrinkles and gray hairs appear. It is a pretty well authenticated fact that the oldest man in the British possessions has attained to the comparatively meagre age of one hundred and ten.

The Profit of His Pose

It has been gently intimated by pioneers who are not spring chickens themselves that Diamond, like some wines and violins, has seen fit to antedate the year of his vintage for purposes purely commercial. Diamond is still young and enterprising enough, they say, to appreciate the increased market value of a book on longevity by one of the oldest men in the world. The clock-like regularity with which the newspaper reports of Diamond's birthday dinner get circulated each year point to the fact that a little judicious advertising will not come amiss in increasing the publication of Diamond's pamphlets on how to cheat death by means of diet, exercise and hygiene. The old man, I understand, is being paid a salary by a physical culture concern to pose as a living example of what gymnastics will do.

Rapid Climbing in Los Angeles

A reception was given in the private parlors of one of the Los Angeles hotels last week that was of more than the average ton. During the afternoon a first year bud from Chicago, all gush and diamonds, caused a chill that shivered the entire assembly by remarking, "I do like Los Angeles; one sees so many changes. Why, only this morning I learned that our housekeeper of two years ago is giving swell afternoon teas, and that a telephone girl to whom I was kind on one or two occasions is married to a millionaire and is now in the best set." She does not know that the chill was caused by the fact that the hostess not so very many years ago was housekeeper in the hotel in which she was then entertaining the most exclusive set, having married the proprietor.

Rockefeller's Friend Inveighs Against Capital

Rev. George Thomas Dowling, rector of Christ church, Los Angeles, a protege and personal friend of John Rockefeller, created a stir last Sunday when he delivered a caustic rebuke to the millionaires "of this age of accumulated capital and trusts." Dr. Dowling was closer to the Standard Oil magnate during the latter's trip to Southern California than any other man outside the plutocrat's party; yet the rector of Christ Episcopal church said in his sermon: "The great fortunes have been acquired by turning that into the channels of private wealth which belongs to the commonwealth. They have not been made, they have been accumulated. And there is a vast difference between those two." The question now arises and has been voiced by many members of Dr. Dowling's congregation, "What degree of sin attaches to ministers of the gospel who accept blocks of Standard Oil stock as gifts?" The question as it has been put is as inflammable as refined oil itself.

A Strenuous Week

An unsolved murder mystery, a street car strike, charges of ward politics and rock-rolling in the exclusive St. John's Episcopal church, the publication of the charge that Dr. E. S. Chapman of the Anti-Saloon League has been making speeches for the railroads instead of for straightforward prohibition, the disappearance of two prominent business men and preparations for Fiesta—these are a few of the things that agitated the public down in Los Angeles last week, and it will go down in history as one of the most strenuous ever reported.

Mobbed in Florence

This story comes up from Los Angeles from a well known vocal instructor who has been abroad as chaperon for a number of the angels of the Angel City. One night when they were stopping in the fashionable residence section of Florence it was very warm, and in the absence of the duenna the girls set out alone to quench their thirst at a nearby soda fountain. They did not take the trouble to put on hats or wraps before appearing on the street. Yet a woman to be seen in Florence at night, hatless and chaperonless, is to a Florentine what it would be to a San Franciscan to see a fair one in Market street clad in becoming green tights and white satin slippers. This the American girls learned before they had gone a block. First they were followed by urchins, then by men, and finally by a cosmopolitan crowd, shuffling along as in the van of a circus. They pushed bravely onward till they reached the confectionery store a few blocks beyond. By this time the whole detached population of Florence was in their wake, and as they entered the doors and windows were plastered with leering faces. With hysterical calmness they ordered their refreshments, but they had hardly begun to partake before the crowd began coming in and a jabbering, gawking throng was gathered at their elbows. Some of the girls were getting ready to faint, when two American men came in, and noticing their predicament helped them outside and into a cab. The next day the chaperon heard the story, and waxing indignant complained to some of the residents of the town. Her sentiments were greeted with a shrug which seemed to say, "If the American woman will persist in being mad there is no law which can protect her."

My Clever Inventions

By Elwyn Hoffman.

It is not without some doubt that I begin this narrative, revealing, as it does, that which the world is pleased to speak of as a "dual nature." That I am the possessor of two distinct characters, so to say, I presume there is no doubt. One character—that of the high minded, chivalrous man—I give to the world; the other—low, impure and brutal—I keep hidden, and take great care to conceal from man's knowledge. When I was editing the Virgin Voice the people showed their appreciation of the high moral tone of the paper by their liberal patronage. Farmers drove in many miles from their ranches to subscribe. Among my contributors was Syble Farley, a country maiden, who had a knack for writing verse. Syble used to bring her soulful verses to me at first, but later on I became better acquainted with her and got into the habit of calling at her home once a week to chat for a few delightful moments with the fair poet. She lived alone with her father in a large house at the edge of the town. Old man Farley was quite rich, possessing a deal of property in different parts of the state, beside the fine place on which he lived. I had met him several times in the course of news work, but I had not known that he had a daughter until she came to my office, as I have said. I respected the old gentleman very much, and it was with sincere sorrow that I learned one day of his sudden death by accident. Syble was prostrated by grief for some days, and did not fully recover for months, as she was of a highly nervous temperament, and anything unusual affected her greatly. During this time I was a frequent visitor at the Farley house (a distant female relative having come to stay with Syble), and I think my sympathy did much to bring the poor girl around. At any rate, she seemed to appreciate my attentions, and as I learned that all her father's property had been willed to her, I let her cherish the opinion. Subsequently, this operated much to my advantage, for when I asked her to marry me, as I did later on, she confessed that my great kindness had made her love me. Our marriage was celebrated in due time, and with becoming pomp, as befitted our high positions in society. I will not burden the reader with the worn-out story of new-married bliss, but suffice it to say that for several months we were very happy. Then one day I spoke to Syble about investing a certain sum of money in an enterprise I was interested in. To my great surprise and grief, Syble absolutely refused to allow it to be done. This caused a slight rupture of the pleasant relations between us; and somehow the breach kept widening. I saw many opportunities for investment, but it was impossible for me to take advantage of them while my wife refused her consent. This was a source of much annoyance to me.

"If Syble should die——" The thought came to me one day after we had had a prolonged discussion over a scheme of mine, to which Syble had taken a great dislike. Perhaps I was in somewhat of a bitter mood, and at the time did not feel as kindly towards my wife as I should. But be that as it may, the thought came to me and clung to my mind most tenaciously. I give you my word of honor that I tried my best to get rid of the terrible idea, and told myself that I was cruel even to think of it; but all my self-condemnations were as useless as talking sense to a Populist. So thoroughly did ths murderous thought master me that one day I awoke to the fact that I was deliberately planning how to get rid of Syble and get control of her money. After that, I no longer tried to disguise my intentions. I battled no more with fine scruples, but bent all my energy of thought to the task of evolving some plan whereby Syble could be put out of the way without causing supicion to fall upon me.

The unique, the original, always had a great charm for me. I disliked the idea of things being done in the same old way. Originality, I had always said, was the finest thing in the world. Therefore, I decided to be original in the disposal of my wife, and working towards this end, began to make several experiments in electricity. I had once seen my wife very much frightened by such a simple thing as a ray of light shining through a key-hole on to a white dress hanging in the hall—so much frightened, indeed, that she was quite upset for some time after. This incident suggested something to me, and I decided to follow the suggestion.

It took me some months, as you may believe, to secrete the batteries and fine wires around the house, and get everything fixed in running order for the carrying out of the schemes I had formed. It may strike the casual thinker as being an easy task to create ghosts by the aid of electricity, phosphorus, and natural phenomena; but if so, I wish to assure him that it is more than unusually difficult. Although I have a natural ability for invention, I found myself up against it on several occasions; and it was only after hard work, often extended far into the night, that I succeeded in getting things arranged so that there would be the maximum of certainty and the minimum of risk. Indeed, my contrivances were so intricate that it is useless for me to attempt to describe them in detail; besides, did I try to do so, I would be compelled to use so many technical terms that the ordinary person would receive no tangible impression.

There was a beautiful grove of tall trees around our house, and it was Syble's habit of an evening to walk among them, sometimes staying out until late. It was here that I made my first experiment. It was a very simple arrangement of phosphorus, but Syble ran shrieking to the house, and fainted as she reached the door. I brought her back to consciousness by liberal use of cold water, and then carried her upstairs to her room, she clinging to me and sobbing hysterically. We had but two servants, an Irish maid and a Japanese cook, and the maid was, of course, nearly as much frightened as her mistress. For a time there was a deal of commotion in the house, but after a bit things quieted down, and I left my wife sleeping with the lamp turned low.

For a day or two I let my ghosts rest, and then one evening as Syble came down the rather dim hall on her way to the dining room, I worked my second experiment. This was purely an electrical effect, but to the poor girl's strained nerves it must have seemed like "the real thing." Anyway, she screamed and fainted, and it was long after midnight before I succeeded in getting her quiet.

This second ghost had its effect on the impressionable Irish maid, for next night she came flying to my wife, screaming that she had seen a terrible ghost herself. I came down from my room when I heard the racket, and told her that it was all a delusion, but she wouldn't believe me, and gave notice on the spot. Next day, of course, the story was all over town, and many of Syble's friends came to see her. Alas! they found my poor wife in bed, and the doctor I had called said that she was on the verge of brain fever. I really felt very sorry for Syble, and it was not without a qualm of conscience that I sprung another ghost on her. It was the last. The poor girl's nerves seemed to give way entirely, and it was not long before we saw that she was doomed.

Of course, I procured the best doctors I could, and had a trained nurse; but it was all useless. People said at the time that I was making a martyr of myself, for I hardly slept an hour the two weeks my poor wife lingered.

I was with her when she died. Strange to say, she was rational at the last, and almost her final utterance was a plea of forgiveness for anything she might have said or done to make me unhappy. It was really a heart-breaking scene, and I know every one felt for me when they saw how I evidently suffered.

But Syble had a grand funeral, and after the estate matters were adjusted, I reared an imposing monument to her memory.

Don't Worry

Though not one of your fanciful schemes comes to light,
Don't you worry;
You have had the fond pleasure of thinking they might,
So don't worry.
Though your page is all blotted and thumb-marked and torn,
There's a God up above who has seen what you've borne,
And who tempers the wind to the lamb that is shorn,
So don't worry.

Though the bauble you longed for looks cheap in your hand,
Don't you worry;
Though you sink where you thought it was all solid land,
Don't you worry.
Like the baby, you see the sun's glint on the wall,
And you struggle to clasp it—you stumble, and fall;
Then you find you have gathered a shadow—that's all—
But don't worry.

Though the play is played out and the curtain's rung down,
Don't you worry;
Though the features of life wear a turbulent frown,
Don't you worry.
Though the other man wins, and you lose, in the race,
Don't you let the world know; put a smile on your face;
There are always your pistols up there in their case,
So don't worry.

WHERE TO GO THIS SUMMER.

It is easy enough to solve the momentous problem of where to go for one's summer vacation, if one consults the little booklet issued by the California Northwestern Railway. Every page bristles with information about vacation resorts. There is a place for the sportsman, the amateur Izaak Walton, the dreamer, the poet, the lounger, the one who likes to climb hills, tramp through forests, or to swim or boat. "Vacation 1903" gives a list of places that take summer boarders, their special attractions and rates.

BYRON SPRINGS ATTRACTIONS.

Nowhere is the May weather more delightful than at Byron Hot Springs. The hills and valleys still hold their spring bloom and verdure. The soft air is luring all to outdoor exercise, and visitors are reveling in the Springs' attractions.

Much interest is being manifested in the "Day and Night with the Elks," to be given by San Francisco Lodge No. 3, B. P. O. E., at the Chutes, Wednesday May twenty-seventh. In addition to special features in the theatre there will be a magnificent display of fireworks on the grounds at night.

Reflections

Over-study, over-thought, over-exertion, frequently defeat their object. A delayed arrival at a rendezvous often has the same effect upon expectant pleasure.

Over-anticipation is fatal to gratification.

Desire must be gratified at the moment of its inception. Delay in realization kills the sentiment.

A man is never too old to desire; but disappointment grows with years.

In the morning we often wonder at what absurdities we were guilty of the night preceding.

The woman with an exaggerated idea of virtue is the hardest to win, but when she forgets the traditions of her training she forgets everything.

Society breeds more La Vallieres than Montespans.

There is a kind of love founded upon mental and soul attributes similar in, and sympathetic to two natures, but that is not the love that gives us the fiercest enjoyment.

There is no man so unworthy but some woman will see in him a hero. —The Roue.

STAGE

The New Fiddle Dee Dee

Though "Fiddle Dee Dee" had a long run at Fischer's when it was first produced it has far from exhausted its popularity. It is the breeziest and brightest of all the Weberfieldian skits, and it is the one in which Kolb, Dill and Bernard do their best stunts. When it was first produced at Fischer's the chorus was not as well disciplined as it now is, for George Lask was not the stage manager in those days. He has greatly improved the stage pictures, and he has imparted more dash and color to the ensembles. The performance on the whole has been greatly improved, and it is as refreshing as a brand new show. The most catchy of the musical numbers have been retained, including the travesty on the "Florodora" sextette, which is always generously encored. The "Blushing Rosy" song is sung by Olive Vail, who is the most winsome girl that has yet appeared in the Fischer company. With a little more of the dash and abandon of the soubrette she will be able to qualify for Broadway.

Before They Achieved Fame

It is not generally known that Weber and Field, the most successful of American exponents of the burlesque form of the dramatic art, were formerly "variety performers" in this city. Years ago they appeared at the old Wigwam where Alice Nielsen used to do her song and dance, and later on at the Midway. They had a hard struggle in those days, but in the season just closed in New York they cleaned up two hundred thousand dollars. One night the stage manager of the Midway refused to let them go on because they violated some of the regulations: so they packed up and departed for the East. Another artist now under the calcium who has seen the seamy side of San Francisco is Lorraine, the composer of Ade's "Sultan of Sulu," and better known for the melodious and sensuous instrumental piece, "Salome." Lorraine for a long time copied music and did other professional odd jobs here, and all that time he was carrying the manuscript of "Salome" around in his pocket and playing it to everybody who would listen to him. It was through the graces of an Eastern publisher and an Eastern audience that "Salome" made the composer his first fame and his first thousands.

Comic Opera at the California

On Monday night, May twenty-fifth, there will be inaugurated at the California by Messrs. Gottlob, Marx & Company and Edward Ackerman, in conjunction with J. C. Duff of New York, a season of comic opera. It will embrace the most famous musical successes of New York and London, including operas that are absolutely new to San Francisco. The entire organization numbers sixty people and comes here direct from Daly's theatre, New York, with three carloads of special scenery and costumes. A special train of eight cars has been engaged to transport the organization across the continent from New York. The opening opera will be the Augustin Daly musical comedy, "The Runaway Girl," which enjoyed a run of over three hundred nights in New York, and also a prior run in London of two continuous years. The piece has never been permitted to go on tour before. The principals of the company include Melville Stewart, John Slavin, George Fortesque, Harold Vizard, Alfred Hickman, Joseph Cauto, Nellie Follis, Violet Dale, Sadie Kirby, Isobel Hall, and a score of beautiful "show girls" and a chorus of thirty-six, together with a large orchestra.

The Johnnies' Inning

There is a great treat in store for the local johnnies. The ranks of the chorus girls are soon to be augmented by a few carloads from New York. In addition to those at the Tivoli and Fischer's we are to have a chorus at the Grand when the Rogers' Brothers pieces are put on, and another at the California when the Duff opera company begins the presentation of some of the New York musical successes. There is to be entertainment galore for lovers of burlesque and light opera, and it will be interesting to watch the rival managers bidding for patronage.

Corrigan's Story

This is not a press agent story. It is related by Mr. Emmett Corrigan himself, who is playing Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde at

Gets in Readiness for Glad Vacation Time

California Northwestern Railway Offers a Long List of Special Attractions

When the vacation season begins the California Northwestern Railway Company will be ready to make thousands happy. Its lines run through one of the most picturesque regions of the State, and every here and there are ideal places for rest and recreation. Lakes and mountain streams, cosy corners in beautiful valleys, comfortable farm houses, mineral springs, natural springs, camps in the wildwood, all these are offered, and each has the advantage of being only a short distance from the city. Only a small expenditure is needed for railway fares, and in each instance the other charges are very reasonable.

In conformance with its usual custom the California Northwestern has made elaborate preparations for the glad vacation time, as is evidenced by the handsome hundred-page booklet that it has just issued. This publication, "Vacation, 1903," gives a long list of places that take summer boarders, tells of the special attractions of each place and gives the rates by the week.

For campers, there are no end of attractions. Throughout Marin, Sonoma, Mendocino and Lake counties the climate is delightful and it is a pleasure to sleep in a tent. Along the Geurneville branch of the California Northwestern, paralleled by the picturesque Russian River, are many ideal spots for camps, the river affording good boating, bathing and fishing. One of the most beautiful places on this branch is Russian River Heights, one of the most charming spots in all the West.

The booklet contains much valuable information, and all who expect to make a vacation trip this summer will do well to supply themselves with a copy before making up their minds.

the Grand this week, in a manner that exalted him in the estimation of all who witnessed the performance. Mr. Corrigan is an actor of rare intelligence and with a wonderful knack for delineating character. His story is that one night when he was playing Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde in an Indiana town, he met a young man and woman on the street. The woman was sobbing and the man was trying to quiet her. When she saw the actor she gave a terrified scream and fainted in her companion's arms. The young man explained that they had just witnessed a performance of "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," and that it had completely unnerved the young woman.

The Corrigan Thrill

Whether or no Emmett Corrigan's thrall over an audience is owing to his exertion of acquired hypnotic power, as he says himself, he certainly possesses the quality of magnetism to a remarkable degree. In "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" the thrills grow with each transformation of the inoffensive Jekyll into the monstrous Hyde. There is no need of bringing Mansfield's artistic impersonation of the uncanny dual role into comparison with that of the younger actor. Corrigan has a firm grasp of the Stevenson idea and he does not relax his hold. His weird laugh is something that will not soon be forgotten. This stage version of the novel, however, differs in many points from the Mansfield one, and the climax is far from being as effective.

Robson's First Lines

Stuart Robson, who died last week, used to tell a story about his first appearance on any stage. "It was in 1847," he related, "in a play called 'Uncle Tom's Cabin as It Is,' written by Professor Hewitt of Baltimore. The motif was the reverse of that of the Stowe drama. I had a juvenile part—the little boy who always had to do something good and virtuous. My mother in the play was weeping bitterly over the loss of some of her slaves which the Northerners had stolen from her. I have never forgotten my lines, though my impressions of my feelings on their first public delivery have faded away. The lines were: 'Mother, your little son will share your tears with you.'"

His Grand Passion

The role of Bertie the Lamb in "The Henrietta" was one of the grand passions of Stuart Robson's life. So jealous was he at the thought of any other actor playing the role, that he is said to have made a provision in his will that his wife and heirs should destroy the manuscript of the play immediately after his death. It was his favorite saying that next to his wife, "The Henrietta" was the finest woman in the world. His wife was Miss Waldron, the actress, and his real name was Robson Stuart. He was a man of many parts, as deeply interested in politics and literature as in his professional calling. For many years he was an intimate friend of Robert Ingersoll.

Robson's old partner, "Billy" Crane, now enacting to the pleasure of Columbia audiences his character study of "David Harum," made his first appearance in opera. He was cast for the Notary in "La Fille du Regiment," with the Holman Opera Troupe in Utica, N. Y. Crane says he was about sixteen years of age, and he was terribly nervous over his debut. His first speech came in the second act, when he read a legal document: "In consideration of Mlle. Marie de Berkenfeld being united to Duc de Grandtete, Mme. As Crane tells the story, "Notwithstand the fact that I felt letter-perfect in the part, I nevertheless, as an extra precaution, held the prompt book inside the document from which I was to read. As I made my entrance I tripped over my gown, and the prompt book fell to the floor. Of course the gallery howled. I was frightened, but I believe my fright nerved me to do my utmost, and the result was the rest of the performance went off without a hitch."

Lillian Coleman Arrives

Long ago I stated that a good vocalist was a rara avis in comic opera and musical comedy productions on Broadway. A New York daily recently announced that Lillian Coleman, who made quite a hit in the "Prince of Pilsen," was "the best equipped singer of her class Broadway has heard in many a day. With a voice accustomed to delicate phrasing, trained in tone production and rich in warmth and volume, it is unfortunate that she has not greater opportunities to display her natural capabilities." Local theatregoers who heard Miss Coleman at Fischer's when "Fiddle-dee-dee" was first produced will recall that though she has a pleasing voice, and fair method, she could never create a sensation in this city by her singing. However she is undoubtedly the superior in vocal ability of any of the musical comedy stars of Broadway. And it is therefore easy to understand the surprise of Eastern managers when their road stars sent to this city with "Dodo," "Florodora" and other companies failed to enthuse. They think that singing which is good enough for the transient visitors to New York should be good enough for us. Miss Coleman, by the way, is a San Francisco girl, and the only vocal lessons she ever received were given by Mr. Alfred Kelleher. On the strength of her Broadway hit she has been engaged by Klaw & Erlanger for three years.

A Realistic Ship Scene

The most realistic picture of life on shipboard ever presented on the stage is said to be given in the first act of "The Stubbornness of Geraldine," in which Mary Mannering will be seen at the Columbia. Not only has Clyde Fitch drawn with characteristic acuteness every type of fellow-travelers encountered by those who take the transatlantic passage, but every detail of the promenade deck and the superstructure of a great ocean liner is shown with absolute fidelity and by an ingenious mechanical device the entire stage is made to roll and pitch with an effect almost as dizzying as the real ocean swell, in spite of the audience watching the pitching of the deck from the unaccustomed side of the rail.

"Lover's Lane"

Fanny Young, who has been in retirement for seven years—except for her engagement in David Belasco's New York production of "Naughty Anthony"—will receive a cordial welcome when she appears at the Alcazar in "Lover's Lane" next week. The Alcazar people are making special effort to surpass the New York production of this Clyde Fitch play. Ernest Hastings and George Osbourne have the roles which they created, and Adele Belgarde is specially placed. Frank Bacon, like the man who was cut in twain by a buzz saw, will appear in two parts.

Features of Next Week's Bills

As Mary Mannering is especially popular as a matinee card the extra matinees at the Columbia on Wednesdays during her engagement will give many an opportunity to attend who will not be able to secure choice Saturday matinee seats. In "The Stubbornness of Geraldine" will appear Arthur Byron and Mrs. Thomas Whiffen, both great favorites here.

The merry farce, "Town Topics," returns to the California tomorrow night, with the same great triumvirate of farce comedy stars, World, Garnella and Mack, that had all San Francisco laughing six years ago during the memorable three weeks' run of this piece at the California. Since then the farce has been entirely re-written and still continues to be one of the biggest laughing hits on the road. The California will remain dark for the week following "Town Topics," preparatory to the opening of the Augustin Daly comic opera season, beginning with "The Runaway Girl" on Monday night, May twenty-fifth.

The Alcazar's production of "Lover's Lane" is sure to be worth seeing. Ernest Hastings and George Osbourne will have the roles they created in the original production. Oza Waldrop will be the tomboy, Simplicity Johnson. Artist Williams has been

The return engagement of Walter E. Perkins to the Grand will be pleasing news to theatregoers with whom he installed himself as a popular favorite two seasons ago on his previous appearance. Then he was comparatively unknown, but it did not take the people here long to realize that he was a very clever comedian. Since then Mr. Perkins has become a great stellar attraction and has made a success in "Jerome," the adaptation from Mary E. Wilkins's novel, which he will present here for the first time. As Jerome Edwards he is said to be exceedingly humorous.

"Fiddle dee dee" has duplicated its old success at Fischer's and will be continued. "Twirly Whirly" will follow; an airship that really floats is one of its features.

Edwin Stevens will have a hearty greeting when he makes his appearance at the Tivoli on Monday night. "Wang" is an opera with tremendous drawing powers and the full strength of the Tivoli company will be in the cast. New scenery and costumes will add to the effectiveness of the production.

A strenuous program will be in order at the Orpheum for Presidential reception week. James J. Corbett will make his debut here as a monologuist, relating some of his pugilistic experiences. "Jim" is said to be a clever and amusing vaudeville entertainer, with an easy, offhand way of talking that makes him at once en rapport with his audience. Fisher and Carroll, eccentric comedians, will be novelties here. Clayton Kennedy and Mattie Rooney, a daughter of the old-time favorite Pat Rooney, are eccentric dancers of fame on the circuit. Julie Ring, comedienne, comes straight from "Lunnun." She is a sister of Blanche Ring. Lytton and Gerald, Melville and Stetson, Harding and Ah Sid, and Olive will remain.

The Wilson family, colored entertainers, will be at the Chutes. Ormonde and Carrie Wilson are considered the brightest pickaninnies ever seen on the stage. The Loretta family of five horizontal bar performers, four of whom are juveniles, will also be new. Gaston and Harvey in a sketch abounding in singing and dancing, and Hayes and Whitehead, "the tramp piano player and his dancing friend," will be on the bill. The "Cycle Maze" will complete the fourth and last week of a most successful engagement. A one-pound baby has just been added to the family of infants in the incubators. — The Playgoer.

Antonia Dolores (Trebelli) Concerts

Mademoiselle Antonia Dolores will arrive here from Australia on the fifteenth of the month. Rarely has a singer ever made so many friends and admirers as has this clever young artist, and with each trip here her art has made wonderful strides. Today she is considered one of the world's greatest concert sopranos. Her program for her first concert is particularly interesting and includes "The Prayer" from Puccini's "La Tosca"; the "Shadow Dance" from Meyerbeer's "Dinorah"; recitative and aria, "Let Me wander," by Handel; besides songs by Rosa, Scarlatti, Buononcini, Rubinstein, Liza Lehmann, Paladile, Massenet and others. By special request the artist will also sing "Lo! Hear the Gentle Lark," by Bishop, with flute obligato played by Mr. Louis Neubauer of the Tivoli orchestra. Mr. Robert Clarance Newell will play a number of novelties, including variations on an original thing by Pachulski, and numbers by the young Russian composers, Grodzky and Arensky. This concert, which will be given on Wednesday night, May twentieth, at the Alhambra, will be for the benefit of the building fund of the California Club, and the ladies of the club are using every effort to make the affair a tremendous success. On Saturday afternoon, May twenty-third, Mademoiselle Dolores will give the only matinee concert that she will have time for on this trip, and on Sunday night she will give a grand farewell sacred and special request concert. Requests for any particular numbers for that night should be addressed to Will L. Greenbaum, care of Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, where the box office for the sale of seats for her appearances will open Monday, May eighteenth. Prices for this engagement are one dollar and a half, one dollar, and fifty cents. Tickets for California Club night can be obtained at the California Club rooms, in the Y. M. C. A. building, on regular days, and from any of these members of the committee: Mesdames Hovey, Campbell, Hertz, Warren, Newton, Coffin, Johnson, Barnes, Kinne or Tojetti.

THE BUTCHERS' BOARD OF TRADE

Exposes a Misleading Statement made by the Western Meat Company.

Local Inspection by Board of Health Better Than Government Inspection.

A more deliberate and premeditated attempt to gull and deceive the general public than the recent advertising circular issued by the Western Meat Company has never been perpetrated on the Pacific Coast. It is known to the butchering trade as the "Purple Stamp Fake," but as the majority of meat buyers may not understand the duplicity and untruthfulness of the statements therein set forth, it becomes necessary for the good of the trade and the protection of the public to expose its true nature.

To begin with, the circular in question calls attention to the purple stamp placed on its meat by the United States Meat Inspector, as a sign that "the beef was healthy and the meat fit for food." That, of course, would be the natural presumption, provided the reader did not know the true inwardness of the business. Let us explain:

Some time ago, several European Governments, particularly that of Germany, objected to the importation of American meats upon several grounds, the principal of which was the doubtful quality of the meat. Now in these same European countries, meat is subjected to strict examination by inspectors who thoroughly understand their business, and it was argued by the packers that if United States Inspectors were appointed, who would presumably examine the animal before killing and place their stamp upon the tinned goods, the governments in question would be satisfied and this vital objection be overcome. To attain this end, the Federal Government appropriated the amount of $4,500,000 annually and a staff of meat inspectors was appointed for the most part from the civil service corps, into which admission had been gained by proficiency in the ordinary rudiments of education. It will be easily understood that the men so appointed were lacking in the qualifications necessary to properly fill the position, viz.: judgment of meat and veterinary surgery; but this class of knowledge WAS THE LAST REQUIRED BY THE PACKERS. All they wanted was the stamp upon the goods, the outward and visible sign of the United States inspection. In this manner fully authorized, if not qualified ,inspectors were appointed and any packing establishment could obtain the services of one of them upon application. The Baden Company availed itself of this opportunity and its meat is now adorned with the U. S. Inspector's purple stamp, as duly set forth in the circular.

The true value of the United States Meat Inspectors was conclusively proved in the "Embalmed Beef" inquiry during the Spanish-American War, when it was clearly shown that their only use was to throw dust in the eyes of foreigners and not to condemn meat unfit for human food. These facts prove that the purple stamp is not, as stated in the circular, a guarantee of either quality or purity.

Unfortunately the worthlessness of the United States Inspectors' stamp does not cover the whole matter as far as the handlers and packers of refrigerated meats are concerned The fact is that the entire output of such establishments is slaughtered under circumstances which, taken in conjunction with the freezing process employed, renders it unhealthy food, stamp or no stamp.

It is well known that the meat of any animal slaughtered while in a feverish condition will not keep, and according to eminent physicians, causes indigestion and sickness when eaten. For this reason it is the custom of all first-class slaughterers to allow cattle to rest a week or ten days after leaving the cattle trucks. A journey of many hundred miles in crowded trucks, often without water for hours, intense heat and dust, coupled with natural nervousness of the half wild animal, is more than sufficient to set up a state of fever which would render the meat, if slaughtered at once, as is done by packers of refrigerated meats, unfit for human food. The carcass under such circumstances will not bleed freely, hence its tendency to rapid decomposition. To prevent this the packers, after having duly seen the meat purple stamped by the United States Meat Inspectors, rush the meat into the refrigerator and by the freezing process prevent it from going bad on their hands. By this method they gain from 30 to 32 pounds weight per carcass from the blood remaining in the meat, not caring how soon it decomposes in the shop of the retailer or what sickness it may cause the consumer.

In all well conducted slaughter houses, the animal is rested until in a healthy state and when killed all the blood, which then flows freely, is drained from the carcass. This is done by the butchers to insure healthy meat for the public, to satisfy the strict inspection by the Health Board. By doing so they lose not only the profit arising from the additional weight of the blood in the carcass, but also the keep of the animals while resting. The butchers know that it is the consensus of medical opinion that meat treated as it is by the packers is not as wholesome or as nutritious as in its natural state—that is to say, refrigerated. They know further that meat slaughtered and preserved as is customary in packing houses is bad for the health and liable to produce intestinal disturbances—that such meats, whether they bear the purple stamp of the United States Inspectors or not, are not equal in any way to meats in their natural state.

The circular contains a long list of known and unknown diseases, much after the style of a quack medicine advertisement. These diseases it impudently and untruthfully declares will be contracted by consumers foolish enough to buy meat undecorated with a purple stamp. Readers of this article will, however, understand that such a stamp simply certifies that the meat bearing it is artificially preserved by refrigeration and therefore inferior in digestability and nutrition to meats marketed without it. Any one desiring an illustration can take a walk through Chinatown, where much of this meat is exhibited for sale on the streets, most all of which comes from Baden.

The circular falls into an interrogatory mood on several occasions. It asks "What is the result where there is no inspection?" and again, "Why do not all abattoirs have inspection?" These questions are asked for the simple purpose of impressing upon the public that all meat placed on the market, other than that coming from Baden, has not been inspected. THIS IS A LIE BY INFERENCE, and as such may mislead those not aware that the municipal government of San Francisco and every other city in the country has a highly trained and efficient staff of slaughterhouse and market inspectors under the direction of the Board of Health. Therefore, no meat is sold which has not been inspected, although it may not bear the purple stamp. In fact such inspection by the officials of the Board of Health is so strict and thorough that packers like those at Baden prefer to carry on business in localities—in San Mateo and Contra Costa counties, for instance—where there is no Board of Health, naturally preferring the inspection of Uncle Sam's Civil Service graduate, with his little purple stamp. In our opinion, inspection like that existing at Baden is worse than none at all, because it is a fake inspection, made for the purpose of misleading the public as to the quality and purity of artificially preserved meats by the means of a purple stamp, wielded indiscriminately by an unqualified United States official.

This mendacious circular states that "If the people of the city in buying would see that the desired cut comes from a beef bearing the purple brand they would never be worried as to the quality or purity of the meat." While it is true that people are forgetful, some things make such a deep impression upon the public mind that a long time is needed to efface it. It is not forgotten that the "embalmed" and impure refrigerated meats supplied to our army in Cuba directly caused three thousand deaths, and how many lingering victims of consumption, indigestion and other stomachic troubles will never be known. The company issuing the circular under discussion was directly engaged in this infamous industry. The diseased refrigerated beef sold by a butcher of Oakland to the Eighth Regiment, U. S. V., was directly traced to it by the label or purple stamps upon this lump of impurity.

Here is another and incontestable proof that the class of inspection to which such abattoirs as the one at Baden are subjected is of no protection to the public. Therefore, the purple brand is not, as the circular claims, a proof of either quality or purity, but meat bearing it may prove, as did the Oakland butcher's meat, a mass of corruption infested with the germs of consumption.

Let the public avoid artificially preserved and refrigerated meats in spite of the blandishments of the United States inspectors' purple stamp.

Afternoon Tea at the Innuendo Club

Mrs. Smartem: Isn't it a pity that Miss Gayley—

Chorus: What?

Mrs. S.: Oh, nothing much, but I heard—you really mustn't repeat this, that—

(Entrance of maid with tea and bread-and-butter causes cessation of conversation.)

Miss White (to her neighbor): Did you see that Miss Faste refused tea? From all I hear, she would have preferred whisky and soda.

The neighbor: What! Really? Does she—

Miss W. (whispers): So I hear.

Mrs. Brown (to her daughter): I'm surprised at the fine quality of this tea.

Her daughter: You need not be. They say Mrs. Smartem can get all she wants on credit from that grocer.

Mrs. B.: You mean to say—

H. D.: No, I don't say, but that's the on dit.

(Enter Miss Gayley. Receives rather markedly chilly reception.)

Mrs. Frank: I hear dreadful things about you, Miss Gayley.

Miss G.: I didn't know I was of sufficient importance to be talked about. What now?

Mrs. F.: Oh, I couldn't tell you—here.

Miss G.: Well, save it for next time. (Drinks tea, chats a few minutes with Mrs. Smartem, and exits.)

Mrs. Frank: Now, what was it, Mrs. Smartem, about Miss Gayley? You started to tell us.

Mrs. S.: Oh, it's only that my sister told me that her maid told her that Mrs. Faste's maid said—

Chorus (eagerly): What?

Mrs. S.: Perhaps I oughtn't to mention it, but—

(Entrance of maid with sherbet.)

Miss Perte (to her neighbor): Wish it had a little rum in it, eh?

Her neighbor (in shocked surprise): Do you mean to say—? (Later she tells her next neighbor of the shocking remark of Miss Perte.)

Miss Curious: Really, Mrs. Smartem, I am dying to hear what the story about Miss Gayley is.

Chorus: Oh, yes, we're all wild to know.

Mrs. Plainspoken: And pass it on, of course.

Mrs. Smartem: Well, as I was saying, the story came to me that Miss Gayley was seen last week standing in front of Pierre's. A little later Mr. Clubroue came along. The inference was—

Miss Curious: I understand.

Chorus: Um-m-m.

(Maid enters and serves tea and cakes.)

Chorus: I always thought she looked a trifle off.

(Adieux are said.)

Chorus: Such a lovely time.

Mrs. Smartem: It's so lovely to pass an afternoon in intellectual discourse.

Mrs. Plainspoken: An afternoon of gossip (but she said it under her breath) and one or two reputations gone for good.

Miss Merry: God bless the good old Innuendo Club, I say! —The Eavesdropper.

A Soul whose soaring didn't pay.

MUSIC

Twentieth Century Club's Concert

The Twentieth Century Musical Club gave its closing concert and reception last Saturday afternoon at their club-rooms in Sutter street. There was a big crush of fashionables assembled to hear the very interesting program and incidentally to make their adieux to one another before the general exodus to the resorts. Two chorals by Praetorius for full chorus and the beautiful Passion Musik by Heinrich Schutz for full chorus and soloists were given a very artistic interpretation under the direction of Mr. Sabin. A sonate for violin and piano by Tartini was well played by Mrs. Robbins (Alice Ames) and Mrs. B. G. Lathrop. The second part of the program was devoted to the compositions of W. H. Thorley, a newcomer in the city. A group of songs finely rendered by Grace Davis Northrup and Signor Wanrell showed him to be a composer of originality and fine expressive force. Mr. Thorley also played the Sonata in G minor by Schumann with feeling and bravura. After the concert a reception was held in one of the adjoining rooms where greetings were exchanged and plans for the summer freely discussed. Among those present were Mesdames H. E. Huntington, Sidney Smith, McKittrick, Landers and Thomas Bishop, the Misses McKinstry, Smedberg, Emily Wilson, Marie Voorhies and Susanne Blanding, Shafter Howard and Burbank Somers.

The Playing of Miss Mead

From the big Strauss Sonata to the "Perpetuum Mobile" (Ries), Miss Olive Mead proved herself an admirable violinist, nothing less than that, but, alas! nothing more. In the andante movement of the Saint-Saens Concerto she did, for a rare moment or two, deserve a superior adjective. "To have color and be sober with it is an ideal," but the beautiful sobriety that intoxicates an audience, the "artistic reserve" that calls forth unreserved praise, presupposes a "fine frenzy," a drunkenness not that of wine. Miss Mead is so sober with her color as to cause doubts of its existence to arise. She does not seem to have ever been under the necessity of disciplining a tendency to musical madness into exquisitely sane virtuosity. Her bow does not act one bit as a thing inspired. She plays neither to the gods above, nor to some godlike lover below, but merely correctly, as to an audience indifferent to fine effects. To ears attuned to Kocian's technical perfection, her harmonies sounded painfully tentative. Mr. Fred Maurer, who accompanied her, has what Miss Mead lacks, feeling, imagination, and the secret of communicating them. And so artistically did he blend his piano with her violin that it required some discrimination to be sure where the thrills came from. Mrs. Cox sang in her usual pleasing manner.

The Adelphian Union Meeting

Mrs. J. B. Hume delivered her address on "The Bible as Literature" before the Adelphian Club in Alameda last Saturday. She read the paper before the Forum Club of this city and Ebell of Oakland recently and has received deserved praise for it. One reason of the favor with which the essay was received is the fine delivery of Mrs. Hume. She has a very pleasing address, and such a clear diction that not a point of her discourse is lost. Miss Una Fairweather sang several charming songs. She is one of the younger contraltos of whom great things are expected, and she is studying with view to a stage appearance in two years. Her voice is of rich, velvety quality, capable of great dramatic expression. A little pupil of Hugo Mansfeldt, Cecil Cowles, roused the audience into enthusiasm by her solos, one of which was her own composition. She is only nine years old but she has a remarkable musical temperament. Mr. Mansfeldt does not call her a prodigy, but she is certainly a very clever child. She plays as if she loved her music, and has the confidence that is rarely found among more experienced students. Little Cecil has only studied a year and in that time has overcome technical difficulties that appall older players. She gave some examples of musical telegrathy that were interesting. The Adelphian Club is in a very flourishing condition, all the sections taking up their work with energy. At the union meetings held once a month all sections unite. On this occasion the new president, Mrs. Anna Samuels, made her first appearance as presiding officer. She fulfilled her duties in a most dignified and gracious manner.

Musicale in the Mission

The pupils of Miss Helen M. Anderson gave a very delightful musicale on Saturday afternoon of last week at the residence of Mrs. William Ede in the Mission. The little people occupied the first part of the program and obtained well-deserved applause for their efforts. The older pupils came next and displayed in their playing of classical numbers all the good effects of careful training. Deserving of special mention are Miss Jean Clift, who played MacDowell's "Hungarians," Miss Cordelia Bishop who also had a MacDowell number, Miss Lulu Wegener in "The Two Larks," Douglass Soule in Chaminade's "Flatterer" and Miss Edna Sides in a Schutt valse, "A la bien-aimee." Mrs. H. P. Carlton sang in a delightful manner Lord Henry Somerset's "Song of Sleep" and Mildred J. Hill's "Smiles and Frowns." She was accompanied most sympathetically by her son, Master Sydney Carlton, who promises to excel in this branch of piano playing which is an art in itself. The various compositions were played in a correct and tasteful manner, and Miss Anderson and her young pupils have every reason to feel encouraged at the progress made.

A Juvenile Musical Concert

Miss Judith Hyman's pupil recital at Century hall on May second must certainly have brought pride to that lady's heart, for every one of the nine or ten children upon the program played with evidence of the most intelligent teaching. The juvenile pianists played compositions by Beethoven, Kullak, Rubinstein, Tschaikowsky, Grieg, Schumann, Bach, Chopin, Mendelssohn, Weber and MacDowell, and maintained the interest of the audience through their entire program. The brightest star of the little constellation was Lillian Van Vorst, a child of only eleven, whose playing revealed a remarkably artistic temperament and splendid technical ability. It is safe to predict for this child a brilliant career in the world of music, especially as her mother plans to take her to Letchetisky very soon. Though the great teacher has heretofore refused pupils under fifteen, it will be surprising if he does not make an exception in favor of this talented young Californienne. Her sister Ardelia also played with unusual brilliancy and expression. Another clever youngster was Hamlin Nerney.

Founder's Day at Mills

Dr. H. J. Stewart has dedicated more new organs than any other organist in California. His latest dedication was at Mills' College on Founders' Day, when the new two-manual tubular pneumatic organ was used for the first time. Founders' Day is the anniversary of the birthday of the late Dr. C. T. Mills, and it has been the annual custom to honor the day with a special program. The hall was crowded on Tuesday when the following programs were rendered, in the morning and afternoon: Organ solo, Fantasia on a theme of Handel (Guilmant), "Lift Up Your Heads, O Ye Gates," Dr. Stewart; invocation, Rev. Raymond C. Brooks; hymn, "Holy, Holy, Holy"; Scripture recitation, twenty-third Psalm; "The Lost Chord," choral class; address, Rev. Charles R. Brown; organ, Consolation in D flat (Liszt), transcription by Dr. H. J. Stewart; dedicatory prayer Rev. George Mooar, D.D.; "Trust in the Lord," Largo (Handel), choral class, violin obligato, Miss Tillie Finley; hymn, "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name"; doxology; benediction; organ, Grand March in D (W. T. Best), Dr. H. J. Stewart. [The choral class is under the supervision of Alexander T. Stewart.] Organ recital, Dr. Stewart: Suite Gothique, Boellmann, Choral, Menuet Gothique, Priere de Notre Dame, Finale, In Paradisum (Dubois), Minuet (Symphony in G minor, Sterndale-Bennett), Toccata and Fugue in D minor (Bach), Priere in D flat and Fantasia in B flat minor (Callaerts), Triumphal March (Benedict, transcription by Dr. Stewart).

The piano recital given last evening by the pupils of Mr. Abraham Sundland, in Maple hall, occurred too late for extended notice this week. Ten pupils took part and their work will be revewed in the next issue of Town Talk.

The Barton Choral Society, recently organized under the direction of Mr. Gerard Barton, has engaged Maple hall for a concert to be given on May nineteenth. The principal number will be the rendition of "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast," by S. Coleridge-Taylor, a work which has been highly praised throughout the musical world. This club is composed of twenty-five members.

Another Latin Quarter Story

"Lizette" is the story of a most remarkable Latin Quartier girl, and an equally remarkable art student. As chivalry is out of fashion, we may begin with the man, and account for his being in the student colony of Paris, for John Murdock is an American just graduated from college, and the only son of a New York banker who has confidently, and not unnaturally looked forward to having his assistance in business. But John announces his intention of becoming an artist, and Murdock Sr. offers neither protest nor advice, further than to counsel the young man to be "a damned good artist" if he is bent on being one. So with a sufficient sum guaranteed, young Murdock departs for Europe, and that is the last his father ever sees of him. It is rather late in the day to raise a voice of protest against the morals of the art student abroad. Whether or not they all and severally take unto themselves mistresses in the person of their favorite models, the fact remains that the studio-household and the eternal feminine are bits of stage property without which the scenes could not be set in a manner to be recognized, and we may as well accept the accessories as we do the pasteboard rocks and canvas trees of the theatre. As one critic will cry out that a book may be read in order to discover what student life is not and the next will exclaim in rapture over the perfect presentation given in the same book, we may discard that also from consideration and proceed to examine the plot and characters. Arrived in Paris without a word of French with which to bless himself, John Murdock proceeds to the Latin Quartier in the company of a commercial traveler who has been a fellow passenger on the steamer. Here he meets Lizette. While sitting in a cafe with his companions a brawl is started between two grisettes who betake themselves to the street to have it out, followed by the crowd, who form a ring around the combatants. "Murdock saw with surprise that many of them (the men who composed the spectators) bore upon their shoulders women, who were anxious to see the fight and had climbed up to get a better view than was possible in the surging crowd upon the ground. While he was watching this strange night spectacle in his first astonishment a pair of feminine arms clasped him round the neck and a soft voice murmured, 'Pardon, M'sieu.' In a few seconds more Murdock was himself the enforced vantage point from which a girl of the Latin Quarter watched the struggle. When it had ended, the girl slipped lightly to the ground and politely thanked him. As he went over to his table again she followed him as if it were a matter of course—as if their introduction had been quite sufficient. When he sat down she sat down also." Then follows a description of her graces and charms, and the assurance that there was nothing bold in her action. There they sat until the place was closing, and when at last Murdock reluctantly prepared to depart. "Vair ees eet zat you go? Yais, vair ees eet?" "I go home," was his answer. "She answered daintily, with a movement of calm, satisfied contentment impossible to describe. She linked her arm in his and said sweetly, in a way that finally settled the matter, 'Yais? I go too.'" After that it was supererogatory to go to the trouble of telling us that Lizette was without the pale, and it certainly calls for credulity on the part of the reader to accept the girl as a model of all the virtues as well as a pattern of the graces. But Lizette is given to us as most moral in her immorality, a creature apart, who has been in the Quartier but not of it, and who has handled pitch without defilement. Trilby casts a shadow beside Lizette, who neither knows nor cares that her "Pudgy" has millions at his command, and though he is phenomenally successful as an artist, will not sell pictures because he does not need to. Murdock is as flawless as his Lizette, whom he loves ardently, and means to marry, but with nothing at all to stand in the way of its accomplishment, he lives with her for four years and never finds time to attend to the matter. He is recalled to America by the death of his father, leaving the girl in Paris, and though he has apparently no more knowledge of the banking business than he has of the manufacture of dynamite, he is immediately elected president of the financial institution and becomes as successful a financier as he was an artist, and if he had been called upon to engineer a tunnel from Queenstown to New York, or erect a sky-scraper on the Jersey mud flats, the chances are that he would have done it off hand. Meanwhile, the studio is maintained in Paris and Lizette, abundantly supplied with the needful, lives on under the eye of a "student" who has been for more than twenty years a "student" studying nothing. Kentucky, as he is called, may be set down as the type of the class who, with the talent which would have made them successful sign painters or carriage stripers, go, or are sent abroad under the mistaken idea that they are geniuses, and there they stay, year after year, wasting their lives in aimlessness and dissipation when they might have been useful craftsmen at home. Kentucky takes it upon himself to come to America and command Murdock to return to Lizette, and while he is gone she is seized with a belated spasm of virtue. She decides that to permit Murdock to marry her would be to bring upon him "the ruin," so she disappears, and thereafter it is a game of hide and seek in which Murdock and Kentucky spend years in following clues and despatching detectives before Lizette is finally run down and married. The exasperating thing about the book is that one feels all the time that the author is posing to himself. He could do better and he knows it, but he trusts to the indulgence of his readers, or to hoodwinking them into the belief that his mannerisms are embellishments. There is a story in the book, and in the final analysis it is the business of the novelist to write stories. Better a story told without style than style in which no story is embedded. But we have a right to look for better workmanship from this author, whose book is issued by Lewis, Scribner & Co.

Stoddard's Reminiscences

In these days of slipshod writing and more than indifferent English, a book from the pen of Charles Warren Stoddard is marked as a white milestone. In "Exits and Entrances" he has given us another delightful volume of reminiscences, travel sketches and bright essays. There are personal recollections of Robert Louis Stevenson, Bret Harte, George Eliot, Charles Kingsley and Joaquin Miller, and a delightful account of one of Mark Twain's lecturing engagements in London. The travel sketches range from Hawaii to Cairo, and the description of the strolling players at Stratford, the home of Shakespeare, has humor aside from that of contrast. A night spent in Ann Hathaway's cottage is delightfully imaginative. This is one of the books which no review can do justice to, but the friends of Mr. Stoddard, those who learned to love him long ago for his "South Sea Idyls," do not need a guide post, and for the rest of the world, when one advises them to read the book it is all said in a sentence. The volume, which is an unusually attractive one in appearance, is published by the D. Lothrop Company. There is an excellent portrait of the author as a frontispiece.

His Own Opinion

So much speculation has been entered into concerning the possibilities and probabilities of the future of the late Frank Norris, had he been spared to have had a future, and more particularly concerning the relative merits of that last, unwritten volume of his great trilogy, that the author's own words may seem to have had a prophetic value. In discussing "An Author's Opinion of His Own Work" in the Critic for May, 1902, Mr. Norris says:

"His best novel—is the last he has written, or, and this more especially, the one he is going to write. For to a certain extent this is true of every author, whether fiction writer or not. Though he very often does better than he thinks he can, he never does so well as he knows he might. His best book is the one that he never quite succeeds in getting hold of firmly enough to commit to paper. It is always just beyond him. Next year he is going to think it out, or the next after that, and instead he compromises on something else, and his chef d'oevre is always a little ahead of him. If this, too, were not so he would be a poor kind of writer. So that it seems to me, the most truthful answer to the question, 'What is your best book?' would be 'The one I shall never write.'"

Richard Harding Davis is off for the Balkans, with an address, "The Firing Line." That probably means another "Soldier of Fortune" to which some of the carpers will make objection, but Richard Harding Davis is not likely to let that worry him as long as there are enough of his admirers to raise every book he writes to the first rank amongst the best-sellers.

Andrew Lang says no translation of verse is worth the paper it is printed on. People will believe it now, though they hardly dared breathe it to themselves when the thought presented itself without the cachet of authority. —The Bookworm.

Bank of California's Expansion

In keeping with the program mapped out at the annual meeting of the shareholders of the Bank of California, when it was voted to amend the by-laws to allow the institution to invest a portion of its surplus and undivided profits, as the directors might see fit, in the shares of other corporations, the directors have just completed the purchase of the controlling interest in the National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co. at Sacramento. While actual details of the deal are meagre it is generally understood that the majority of Mr. Mills's holdings were purchased, and sufficient stock was secured from outside parties to give the Bank of California a majority of the capital stock. The acquisition of the control of the Sacramento bank is the second move in the expansion policy of the Bank of California since the annual meeting, the formation of the Mission bank being the first. The bank of D. O. Mills was originally organized by Mr. Mills, fifty-four years ago, with a paid in capital stock of $500,000. When the Bank of California was established some thirty-seven years ago Mr. Mills became the first president, and the relations between the two banks have been very close. In all probability there will be but little change made in the affairs of the Sacramento institution. The present directors and officers are: Frank Miller, president; C. F. Dillman, cashier; D. O. Mills, Frank B. Anderson and Edgar Mills. Mr. Anderson, vice-president of the Bank of California, has just been elected in the place of S. Prentiss Smith. That the Bank of California's present policy of expansion is in favor in financial circles is clearly evidenced by the strong demand for the shares of the institutions and steady improvement in values. A sale of 10 shares was made last Tuesday at $530, the highest price on record, and the closing quotations on Exchange were $525 bid, and but a limited amount of stock offered at $600.

Gas Stock Deals

Business of the past week has been of very fair proportions with more than the usual ups and downs in prices than for several weeks. Public interest in gas lighting shares, which was apparently on the wane a week ago, was unexpectedly revived by the dissemination of several rather obscure rumors about prospective deals. Several times during the last three months this program has been followed by speculative interests and each time a liberal quantity of assorted gas shares has been floated upon an unsuspecting public at top-notch figures. The prime movers in the speculation dispose of their shares at a good round profit and under the heavy offerings, combined with an absence of anything to support the rumors, the stock naturally declines in price. As is well known many of these stocks are bought on a margin and the purchasers unable to make good their margin are promptly closed out, thus materially helping the depressing movement at the proper time. After a brief period more rumors of a prospective deal or combination are quietly spread, where they will do the most good on the street, and the speculators having bought while prices were down as low as they could be forced immediately help the boom along and are shortly in a position to again sell at a profit. This program has been repeated two or three times so it is about time the investing public should become cognizant of the true state of affairs and refuse to pay any attention to prospective deals and so-called combinations. San Francisco Gas & Electric shares, which were down to $50 and $51, have been forced up to $59, with apparently no reason whatever, beyond the report that the Eastern syndicate, which recently held an option for the purchase of the Independent Light and Power Company, had secured an extension of time upon the option, paying therefor $50,000. Whether this is so or not is known only to the controlling element in the Independent Light and Power Company. It may seem strange that this movement could affect the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company, which is a rival concern, but the friends of the latter company claim that if the Independent Light and Power Company should go into possession of an Eastern syndicate the newcomers would necessarily be compelled to head off competition by purchasing the San Francisco Gas & Electric plant. This theory, however, appears to be very untenable when the fact is known that the Independent Light and Power Company is constantly extending its plant and pipe system and is doing a profitable business, while at the same time compelling the San Francisco Gas & Electric to meet it in open competition.

The Inflation Fad

Watering stocks appears to be the principal occupation of some of the corporation managers nowadays. Last week it was shown how the Spring Valley Water Company and the Oceanic Steamship Company were preparing to double their capital stocks and issue bonds on the increased capitalization, without receiving a dollar for the new stock. The apparent success of these two schemes has induced some of the smaller corporations to devise plans for following suit. At a special meeting of the shareholders of the Contra Costa Water Company an increase of the bonded indebtedness of the company from $4,600,000 to $5,600,000 was authorized. It is reported that the money received from the sale of these bonds will be expended in improving the Pinole water supply of the corporation. Spring Valley Water shares are selling at $84 to $84.50, and as this has been the average price for some time past, the recent announcement of the reincorporation of the company and prospective giving of two shares of new stock for one share of the old has had no effect whatever in enhancing the market value of the shares. Contra Costa Water sells at $59.25 and is very dull. Marin County Water is being offered at $65 with no takers, while $64 still continues the bid for Port Costa Water stock. Sugar stocks have been very dull during the week but there have been no marked depreciations in prices. Hawaiian Commercial sells at $46.50 and Paauhau is held quite strongly at $17.50. Hutchison Sugar Plantation is only moderately firm at $15.50, while Makaweli is steady at $27. The recent report that the Onomea Sugar Company would commence paying dividends this month appears to be premature, for as far as can be learned no action toward that end has been taken. The company's advices from the Islands state that grinding commenced very late this year and thus far but little sugar has been shipped. The company has determined to pursue a conservative policy and no dividends will be paid until a good, substantial surplus has been accumulated. By adopting these means it is hoped that it will not again become necessary to discontinue regular monthly dividends. It is stated to be the belief of those interested that the sugar, though late in coming forward, will come upon a market at a higher standard of prices than would have otherwise been attained. Business in powder stocks has shown some little activity and Giant consolidated shares have been advanced. At present $71.50 to $71.75 appears to be the range in price. There are rumors current on the street that the California Powder Works has so broadened its field of operations as to cut materially into the business of the several rival companies. In order to offset this condition it is said that negotiations are pending for a consolidation of all the other local powder companies. It is hoped by this plan to so reduce the cost of maintenance and operation that the combination will be more able to meet the California Powder Company's opposition than at present. The miscellaneous stocks have been dealt in sparingly with prices well sustained. There have been quite a number of sales of bonds during the week, the transactions including more than usually the securities of many of the leading corporations. —The Financier.

Good Business and Social Philosophy

From "Letters of a Self-Made Merchant to His Son," by George Horace Lorimer:

It's not what a man does during working hours, but after them, that breaks down his health. A fellow and his business should be bosom friends in the office and sworn enemies out of it. A clear mind is one that is swept clean of business at six o'clock every night and isn't opened up for it again until after the shutters are taken down next morning. Some fellows leave the office at night and start out to whoop it up with the boys, and some go home to sit up with their troubles—they're both in bad company. They're the men who are always needing vacations and never getting any good out of them.

You will always find it a safe rule to take a thing as quick as it is offered, especially a job. It is never easy to get one except when you don't want it; but when you have to get work and go after it with a gun you'll find it as shy as an old crow that every farmer in the country has had a shot at . . . Take the first job that's offered and use it as a bait. You can catch a minnow with a worm and a bass will take your minnow. A good fat bass will tempt an otter, and then you have something worth skinning.

Adam invented all the different ways in which a young man can make a fool of himself, and the college yell at the end of them is just a frill that doesn't change essentials.

There are times when it is safest to be lonesome. Use a little common sense, caution and conscience. You can stock a store with these three commodities when you get enough of them. But you've got to begin getting them young. They ain't catching after you toughen up a bit.

Some men learn all they know from books; others from life; both kinds are narrow. The first are all theory; the second, all practice. It's the fellow who knows enough about practice to test his theories for blow-holes that can give the world a shore ahead, and finds a fair amount of profit in shoving it.

College doesn't make fools; it develops them. It doesn't make bright men; it develops them. A fool will turn out a fool whether he goes to college or not, though he'll probably turn out a different sort of a fool.

Some men are like pigs; the more you educate them, the more amusing leetle cusses they become, and the funnier capers they cut when they show off their tricks. Naturally the place to send a boy of that breed is to the circus, not to college.

If you gave some fellows a talent wrapped in a napkin to start business with, they would swap the talent for a gold brick and lose the napkin; and there are others that you could start out with just a napkin, who would set up with it in the drygoods business in a small way, and then coax the other fellow's talent with it.

Learn right at the outset not to play with the spoon before you take the medicine. Putting off an easy thing makes it hard and putting off a hard one makes it impossible.

There is one excuse for every mistake a man can make, but only one. When a fellow makes the same mistake twice he's got to throw up both hands and own up to carelessness or cussedness.

The President's Trip

Swinging round the circle is not one of the most pleasing occupations of the country's Chief Magistrate. It does not afford that relaxation from the serious and nerve-racking duties of a position of great responsibility which is usually the purpose of jaunts away from the scene of one's momentous activities. One month of circle-swinging such as President Roosevelt is now experiencing is productive of more wear and tear upon the nerves and upon the physique than one year devoted to the exhausting official business of the White House. It is exhilarating to the vanity but wearisome to the flesh. The enjoyable incidents of such a trip do not offset the annoyances and vexations. There is nothing that bores so painfully as an ironclad itinerary that enjoins compliance with the wishes of people who are more interested in the prominence that it gives themselves than in the comfort and welfare of the victim sacrificed for a holiday. It is a most severe tax on good nature and patience to subject oneself to the strenuous ordeal through which President Roosevelt is passing; to be the central figure in a series of public demonstrations, which are merely repetitions and which become stale and enervating. There were many functions arranged in President Roosevelt's honor which he undoubtedly would have escaped with pleasure. There were moments when he wished that he were alone. But the hard-and-fast itinerary kept him on the move and in the limelight. When President Harrison was out here some years ago he rebelled against being dragged around the other side of the bay, and the people, who had no appreciation of his misery, were indignant at his temporary devotion to his own physical interests. Mr. McKinley was more gracious than Mr. Harrison, and Mr. Roosevelt is a paragon of patience, a superb stoic in the most harrowing situations. However, he is a man of independence and he had the prudence to insist that he be consulted before he arrived as to the functions in which he should participate. By this foresight he was spared a great deal of annoyance. Nevertheless he has been having a strenuous time of it in California, and will not be eager to repeat the trip; not, at least, while he is President of the United States.

The Cleveland Boomlet

That Grover Cleveland is being groomed for the Presidency there is not the slightest doubt. Despite the fact that he is repudiated by the Bryanites and by influential Democrats of the Watterson type, there are powerful influences in New York striving to create a sentiment in his favor. Moreover they are industriously engaged in making political combinations in the South and throughout the East with a view of forcing his nomination upon the next convention. The leading Cleveland backers are Wall street plutocrats who usually furnish the sinews of war for the Republican party, and who are anxious to defeat President Roosevelt. They concede the futility of attempting to beat him in the convention, but their hope is to defeat him at the polls, and they are sure that Cleveland is the man to do the trick. If any other Democrat be nominated they will stand by Roosevelt, but with considerable reluctance. Their objection to Roosevelt is that he is inclined to "disturb business interests"; in other words, he does not recognize the divine right of capital. At the beginning of his Administration he caused some alarm in Wall street, but he was quickly prevailed upon to modify his views about the tariff and about trusts, and the plutocrats soon recovered their equanimity. However, they fear that he is unreliable, and they say that he is so eccentric that he cannot be depended upon to foster business interests, or rather the interests of Wall street. Hence they prefer a conservative man of the Cleveland type who is a handy Executive when labor troubles are brewing. It will be interesting to watch the efforts of Morgan and his cohorts to control the next Democratic convention. Of course their operations will be conducted under cover but it does not require more than ordinary sophistication to achieve cognizance of their methods. For instance, it is pretty generally known that Morgan dictates the policy of the New York Sun, and it is obvious that that paper is engaged in ridiculing Roosevelt into obscurity.

Catholic Influence in European Politics

The venerable prisoner of the Vatican appears to be the object of great interest at this time to the rulers of Europe. He has been visited by King Edward and Emperor William, and now it is said that the Czar contemplates paying his respects. Even President Loubet of France announced the other day that he was going to Rome shortly, and that he expected to be received by the Pope. When the news reached the Vatican Leo consulted with the Cardinals, and according to the despatches he decided not to receive the French President, and to have this decision semi-officially communicated to France, in the hope that President Loubet will not ask for an interview. It is rather surprising that Loubet should think of being received by the Pope in view of the manner in which the Catholic orders have been treated by the French government. Moreover the attitude of the Vatican toward France is significant in view of the recent visit of Emperor William to the Pope. The Emperor evidently appreciates clerical influence, and will probably be eager to have the friendship of the Papal authorities transferred from France to Germany. Some of the politicians of France, it is said, favor the repeal of the Concordat. Perhaps the Pope is also quite willing that it be repealed, for there is evidence of rapprochement between the German government and the Vatican, and if the Papal authorities were to establish diplomatic relations with Protestant Germany the influence of the church would be greatly augmented in a country in which it is now comparatively weak. At the same time it would not lose its religious influence in France, for the French people are Catholics and they are loyal to the church despite the antagonism of the present government. William is a shrewd politician and he is stealing a diplomatic march on France. He is making persistent efforts to wipe out all traces of that religious bigotry which was fostered by Bismarck thirty years ago, and the probability is that he will have the support of the Catholic party in the coming parliamentary elections. At the same time Pope Leo, who is probably the shrewdest diplomatist in Europe, is not likely to lose any points of strategic importance in the little game of politics that is now being played.

The Execrated Dime Novel

A boy burglar was arrested last week, and as usual, the newspapers attributed his "downfall" to the reading of dime novels. Now, whatsoever sins are to be laid against the dime novel, it most certainly never encouraged any boy to take to the profession of burglary or highway robbery or anything else of that kind. There is no question but that any number of ill-developed lads have been encouraged to seek an opportunity to become Indian fighters, but the brave cowboys, and boy scouts, and young plainsmen who figure in these juvenile romances as the successful heroes are invariably engaged in redressing wrongs, rescuing beautiful maidenhood, or revenging the massacre of their relatives or friends. When it comes down to the cheap detective yarn, the desperadoes are always run down in the end and victory is on the side of virtue. It may be the proverbial "stern chase, which is a long chase," but unless death steps in the law is victorious. Even then, the chances are that the end of the "bad man" is one of violence, and at best no boy is going to be encouraged to follow a life of crime when it promises nothing for him but years of dodging sleuths, with neither a chance to hoard any of his ill-gotten gains nor time to enjoy them. Whatever may be urged against the sensational novel as giving a false idea of life, dwelling too much on the shady side of existence, and keeping young and immature minds keyed up by a constant diet of excitement, there is nothing to be brought against them on the score of inculcating bad morals. So far as that part of it is concerned, the much execrated dime novel ranks higher than any other class, not excluding the old-fashioned Sunday-school book, which was enough to drive any boy of spirit to a life of crime out of a desire to escape the priggish perfections of the hateful little heroes.

Baden-Powell's Strictures

General Baden-Powell, the defender of Mafeking, came over to this country some weeks ago, and after inspecting a few cavalry regiments expressed the opinion that the American cavalryman did not compare favorably with the British trooper. He was surprised to see so many light men in the service. He thought the food of the American cavalryman was too heavy and objected to his steady consumption of coffee in large quantities. He was sure that the American was not in such good physical condition as the Britisher, because, unlike the latter, he did not take a salt-water bath every day or go through a series of gymnastic exercises. His conclusion was that Uncle Sam's cavalryman lacked staying power and would wear out before his horse. Incidentally he expressed great admiration for the horse of the American cavalry. It is surprising that the General did not adjudge the horse guilty of as many shortcomings as the rider, and find nothing to praise but the bridle. The average Englishman is constitutionally prejudiced against all foreign institutions and especially against those of America. If a British squadron were completely destroyed by Admiral Dewey tomorrow it would be easy to find a naval officer of Great Britain the day after who would pick flaws in American warships and disparage American gunners. That General Baden-Powell's strictures are absurd is evident from the fact that he underrates the physique of the young American cavalryman, because he is not as bulky as the average British trooper. It does not follow that because a man is slender he has not as much staying quality as a man of larger frame. On the contrary the little, wiry man almost invariably possesses more endurance than the bulky chap. It is the theory of the American recruiting officer that big men do not make good cavalrymen as a rule. Indeed they prefer wiry men with muscles of steel who are alert in their movements and quick of wit. The criticism of General Baden-Powell would probably have occasioned some concern had the efficiency of the American cavalry never been tested. The Britisher has evidently neglected to read American history. The feats of the American soldier in the saddle during the Indian wars and lately in the Philippines were of a character to convince those familiar with them that he is capable of great endurance, even though he isn't as bulky as his cousin across the pond.

Flick's Latest Fad

History is to be made easy to the coming generation through the medium of Mother Goose Jingles composed by Professor Alexander Clarence Flick and illustrated by one of his colleagues, Carl Tracy Hawley. Professor Flick reasons that if Simple Simon, Little Miss Muffett and Peter Piper can be fixed in the minds of infants by reason of the rhyme, anything else can be as firmly rooted in the memory, so he is going to put every incident and person of prominence, from Crœsus to Dewey, within reach of the nursery bantlings. It is another effort in the line of modern educational methods, which seek to procure ends without recourse to means, and it will end where the others have, in failure. There is just one way to accomplish anything in this world, and that is by hard work. Once in awhile it happens that some quick-brained urchin learns without apparent study, but the exception only serves to emphasize the rule. Get-education-quick schemes are no more reliable than get-rich-quick concerns. Children can be taught to rattle off rhymes or anything else, by an effort of memory, but it does not follow at all that they have learned to comprehend or that they can apply what they have apparently learned. Much as the educator vaunts himself in the matter of teaching children to observe, the contradictory fact remains that since the idea was introduced as a sort of special invention of the experts, pupils have become unable to observe the sequence of letters in the spelling of simple words, and since some crank made capital by doing away with the alphabet, we have graduates of grammar schools who cannot refer to an encyclopedia, a gazetteer, a dictionary or any alphabetically arranged catalogue, because they do not know the order in which the letters have been arranged since their invention by Cadmus. Professor Flick would be doing something sensible if, instead of thinking up schemes to help the youth to shirk the task of learning, he would devote his energy to having some of the foolishness cut out of school courses and then making children buckle down to the rest and put as much energy into it as they do into their games of football. He is not the first, by any manner of means, to attempt to teach all knowledge through the medium of rhyming couplets, and he will not meet with any greater success than his predecessors, so it is hardly worth while to call his attention to the obvious truth that children of an age to be wheedled into learning history by Mother Goose methods have no concern with Crœsus, or ninety-five per cent of his other heroes.

The Chinatown Scandal

One newspaper reporter has done more toward bringing to light the bottom facts in the conspiracies hatched in Chinatown by the murderous tongs than the Police Department has been able to unearth in all the long history of crime in the blood-bespattered district. The police have long confessed their inability to break up the tongs and discourage assassination in Chinatown. It now appears that they never tried very hard. From recent disclosures it is not unreasonable to infer that the whole criminal element, including gamblers and murderers, has been under police protection for many years. We have always believed that the gamblers paid for immunity, but we never before suspected that murders were committed with the connivance of the authorities. For the disclosures that have recently been made the public are indebted to the one Police Commissioner who does not repose implicit confidence in the Chief of Police, for if he had not co-operated with the newspaper reporter who prosecuted the investigation the facts would never have been brought to light. The fact is that the Police Commissioners of this city have long been responsible for crime in Chinatown. They have given the Chief of Police full swing, and have not required him to enforce the law. The several chiefs that have held office in the last quarter of a century have shown a very suspicious indifference to the neglect of their officers. If it was not profitable for them to do so they were too gullible to have ever been selected for the position they occupied.

Californian Waters Barred

The gentlemen in charge of the banquet to the President were guilty of a grievous injustice to the people engaged in the business of marketing Californian mineral waters. The following letter has been received on the subject:

San Francisco, May 13, 1903.

Editor Town Talk:

Permit me to encroach upon your valuable space while I address a few words, more in sorrow than in anger, to our very worthy "Citizens' Committee," who so well and ably handled the reception of President Roosevelt. No criticism will lie on the manner in which the President was received—it was faultless.

It is to the omission of any and all California mineral waters on the menu of the "golden banquet" to which I take issue and desire to enter my humble protest. It was said that was to be a typical California dinner and it was, as far as the wines were concerned, but alas! no opportunity for representation was given California's waters.

This fact reflects more discredit on the committee than on the mineral waters, for the whole world knows that this State is justly famous for the variety and number of her mineral springs. Sold on their merits alone, they have almost entirely superseded the foreign waters, and as we all know that Californians are not particularly loyal to their own products, it must naturally follow that they think the California waters are the best. Now if they are good enough to drink ourselves are they not fit to set before our guests? We judge that the Committee thinks otherwise, or else we would have appeared at the banquet. Or is it that the gentlemen in question, although using at their own tables one or another of our local waters, are too weak-kneed to acknowledge their preference in public?

Gentlemen of the committee, you have done the mineral water interests of the State a grave injustice in barring us from the banquet. In so many words you have informed our distinguished guest that there is no mineral water in the whole State of California fit to serve on his table. He has left the State no doubt duly impressed with the glories of our "sunshine, fruit, flowers," wines etc., but of mineral waters he is in total ignorance. As far as he and his party are concerned there is not a local mineral water doing business in the State. Gentlemen of the committee, will Californians ever be kind to Californians? And do you think that you have treated us, your fellow citizens, fairly?

Very respectfully, G. H. T. Jackson.

Apollinaris was the water served at the banquet, and as everybody knows that that is a manufactured commodity, it is hard to comprehend why it was given preference.

The World Work of a Woman Nation

Spiritual adventurers who love to sail the high seas of thought, in search of new truths; knights-errant of knowledge, roaming, lance-free, ever ready to have at the foul, to defend the fair, after long years of world-wandering, lose that unreasonable preference for the land of their birth which bears the time-honored name of Patriotism. Other biases—those sins of the intellect which so easily beset us—may be theirs, but not the patriotic bias; at least not in that venal degree that vitiates the reasoning of homely witted, "home-keeping youths." A choice company selected with exquisite care from "many times and lands," they call their countrymen. None the less, the destiny of their native country, as part of the destiny of man, is of pressing interest to them.

Such an one, an Irish adventurer, finds himself in California, so far removed from Ireland both in time and space, that he flatters himself he can approach it as a subject-matter for discussion in the scientific spirit, regarding it, not without affection, yet with due perspective from the impersonal point of view. The Irish "question," as it appears to him, has world-wide significance, because it has in these latter days become a part of the great woman "question"—for Ireland is feminine, its forces spiritual, not material; because it proves, with strange pathos for emphasis, that no question is settled until settled aright; that justice is not to be juggled with; that no man or nation is strong enough to do truth to death; that moral facts cannot be hung by the neck till they be dead, nor principles kept in prison; because the things of the spirit, preserved in Ireland during years of political misfortune and material failure, are rare and precious, and the notorious need of the masculine nations.

And now that the reaction against the mighty materialism of the nineteenth century has fairly set in; now that Science is introspectively asking herself what shè has done for the soul; now that wealth is shamefacedly hastening to convert itself into culture: the cult of the Celt (if one who boasts of being unbiased may call it so); the cult of the Celt, with his (or her) power of spiritual insight, his love of the artistically religious or the religiously artistic life, his haunting nearness to the other world, his friendships with fairies, his familiarity with the esoteric side of nature, is of present and peculiar importance. No political let or hindrance should further prevent Ireland from making her rich suggestive inner life largely effective, a world force. It is time that she who has served so well as an inspiration to English poets and German composers should try her fine hand at self-expression.

The daily life of the Irish nation, like that of women, was once sweet with intimate, silent music, unwritten poetry, and all those voiceless mysteries that have, perhaps, upon the soul of man more far-reaching effects than even the most perfect expression. In spite of appearances to the contrary, few nations know better than the Irish how golden some silence is. Paddy's loquacity is like the flutterings of the mother partridge, merely to divert attention while his thoughtlings get under cover. The souls of the Irish are very silent. If you have knowledge of them, you must seek it in the revealing myth or legend. However, of the old folk lore that seemed to be learned not only at the breast but from it, passing without words from mother to child, little now remains. The mnemonic blood seems to have died out, or at least lost its virtue in presence of the printing press. What legends we find in print are but pressed flowers—form, color, fragrance, life, no longer there.

One may still pick up in Ireland, it is true, curious legends; shells as it were wherein, put close to the ear, you may hear afar off faint sounds of the soul-sea of this restless, mysterious nation. But how many care enough for hidden things, for ideas that are quick to withdraw from vulgar gaze, for fancies that fall to pieces at the least rude touch, to seek them out, if haply they might find them, in retired places in a remote island?

The Irish, born mystics, naive lovers and knowers of Nature, have become—more correctly, are becoming—sophisticated, but not civilized; have half lost old spiritual powers, without acquiring sufficient new scientific ones. With them it is a case of vicarious functioning where the compensation is altogether inadequate. Had modern progress been spiritual, the "female" nations would have played the prominent parts. However today intellect itself is emphasizing the value of intuition; the brain now believes in the heart. Should the future, as seems probable, put a premium upon the things of the soul, the destinies of nations would be greatly changed.

And the destiny of Ireland, and of such as she, is not to become a political power among the nations, but a spiritual power, serving as a divine leaven to quicken the whole dead materialistic lump of modern civilization; to disseminate ideas that will call into activity and cause to grow that supreme thing, the human soul, now threatening to become as a vestigial remnant by reason of disuse.

Lane's Faux Pas

The friends of Franklin K. Lane, and especially the unsophisticated ones of the interior whom he deluded, in the recent campaign, into the belief that he is a man of high character, free from the wiles of the artful political dodger, must have felt somewhat chagrined over the expose of his chicanery by the employes of the Union Iron Works. They passed a resolution the other day thanking Mr. T. T. Williams for having been instrumental in securing for them shorter hours and more pay. It will be remembered that some weeks ago, when Mr. Nixon intimated that the demands of the workingmen would be granted, Lane, who was in the East, caused the statement to be published in the Bulletin which, though it is a Republican paper, has consistently boomed him for a long time, that it was through his kind offices in behalf of the machinists that their demands were to be granted. Of course the story was written in a way to compel the inference that the arch demagogue had labored unselfishly in the cause of the workingmen, and that he had performed a gracious and a noble act. Though I was not familiar with the facts I was so well acquainted with the ways of the pretentious and blatant job-chaser that I was quite certain he was once more arrogating to himself credit to which he was not entitled, and upon inquiry, being assured that such was the case, I took occasion to ridicule the Bulletin yarn.

Result of the Deception

It now appears that Mr. Lane overplayed his hand. He revealed his true character to the men of the Union Iron Works, and they are justly indignant at his deception. They were not slow in ascertaining the facts, and hence their adoption of a resolution acknowledging their gratitude to the man to whose activity and influence they are indebted for the concession made by the President of the Shipbuilders' Association. The crafty job-chaser, who has been ardently engaged in fawning upon workingmen and posing as their champion, and who really had ingratiated himself into the favor of some of them, now regrets, no doubt, his haste in trying to capitalize gratitude that had not been earned.

His Quick Rise

Mr. Lane is one of the most adroit fakers that ever entered the field of practical politics in this State, and he has exemplified the philosophy of Barnum, that the people like to be fooled. One of the triumphs of Oriental magic is to plant a seed and cause it to germinate, shoot upward, and develop leaf and flower before the eyes of the astonished spectators. It was with similarly marvelous celerity that the political aspirations of Mr. Lane expanded into full-grown beauty before the eyes of people who remembered that a few short years ago he was the hired advocate of prohibition employed on the stump by that Prince of Charlatans, "Vinegar Bitters" McDonald, and it was by the merest accident that he was not plucked in his final blossoming to be worn as a nosegay by the Democracy. As he happened to be running against a man who had once threatened to swat laboring men with a pickhandle, he naturally received a big vote in this city, which is the hotbed of unionism. It was not because the laboring men loved him more but rather that they despised him less than the other fellow. However the practical politicians, who are more interested in spoils than good government, think that because Lane ran ahead of Pardee in San Francisco he would be a strong candidate for Mayor of the city. Perhaps since the incident that earned for him the contempt of the men at the Union Iron Works, the same men that insulted Pardee in the recent campaign, they have come to the conclusion that the embryonic nosegay has begun to droop, and that it may not attain even the desiccated immortality of the herbarium.

An Instance of His Craftiness

That Mr. Lane is skilled in the devious ways of the practical politician, and that he has always been quick to avail himself of a strategic trick to win favor, those that know him best have long been convinced. When he was first elected City and County Attorney he gave a deputyship in his office to a man who had worked hard for him during his campaign. But before making the appointment he required the applicant for the position to obtain a petition signed by several prominent citizens. Then after making the appointment he wrote a letter to each of the men that had signed the petition informing him that upon his recommendation the man's application had been granted. That was a clever way of obligating the several men to him, but in the course of time they compared notes, and they were greatly amused at the revelation of Mr. Lane's craftiness.

A Marriage in Paris

I have received from a Paris correspondent the following account of the marriage of Miss Marion Alanna Marmion and Mr. Joseph O'Sullivan, which I referred to last week. Instead of an early May event, as the despatches announced, the wedding was celebrated on the twenty-fifth of April, at the Church of St. Pierre de Chaillot. Owing to the illness of her grandmother, Mrs. D. McD. Van Voorhies, the bride was given away by her aunt, Mrs. Le Breton, of San Francisco. She was attended by her lovely young cousin, Miss Le Breton, who has all the charm that made her mother, as "Nopie" McDougal, such a favorite in San Francisco society. Mr. O'Sullivan's best man was Mr. Herbert M. Baer. His brother Denis with his sister, Miss Mary O'Sullivan, who recently came over from San Francisco, were present at the wedding, having arrived from London just the evening before. An elaborate dejeuner followed the ceremony, at which toasts were proposed and bons-mots exchanged. Nice is said to be the objective point of the lune-de-miel. There was a civil marriage two days previous to the church affair, this being indispensable to the legality of all unions in France.

Has Archibald Hypnotized Morgan?

James Alexander Archibald is again in town. He has blown in from Venezuela, Washington and various other points of the compass and his mouth is full of eloquence concerning his deeds of prowess in many lands. It seems that the indefatigable James has been mixed up with ex-Consul General Ho Yow in divers commercial enterprises, and the Chinaman has been so impressed with Archibald's gentlemanly quality as to have made him a mandarin under the laws of the Imperial Government. Ho Yow, however, has not been Mandarin Archibald's principal concern. In spinning his travels and adventures he has been also to interest J. Pierpont Morgan in some great financial schemes which have resulted in bringing Mandarin Archibald to California with a wad of Morgan money and a fat Morgan salary. Archibald's plan deals in some way with the Morganizing of the Santa Cruz water front, whither he has gone with plans, specifications and a look of surpassing wisdom. Whether this deal will result in transforming Santa Cruz into a rival of Del Monte is yet to be revealed, but it takes no soothsayer to see that there is "something doing."

His Colossal Nerve

Archibald is a magazine correspondent, a circumstance that denotes that nerve is more essential than literary talent for magazine work. He gets the stuff and the editors whip it into shape. His knack of getting the ear of those who sit in high places is well exemplified by the manner in which he and the artist, Harrison Fisher, traveled through the British Isles some years ago. Fisher and Archibald had gone abroad for an Eastern magazine to write up and illustrate the military affairs of England, but when the two struck London the allurements of the town were so great that they lingered longer and longer, and never a story did they write or a picture did they draw. At length one day their funds got very low and Archibald suggested that they take a run through Scotland and study the coast defenses. "But we haven't enough money to buy a ticket," objected Fisher. "We'll get a ticket all right," said Archibald, and the two proceeded to the offices of the principal railroad in the British isles. There Archibald explained to the man at the window that it was customary in the States to offer the courtesies of transportation to gentlemen of the press; that he (Archibald) was a member of General Miles's staff and a representative of a great American magazine, but the man at the window only smiled politely and suggested that the suppliant see the nobleman who was president of the railroad. The nobleman, he told them, was at that moment in his castle in Scotland, but he had no doubt that a letter would reach him there. The Americans were in no state to wait for letters, so Archibald penned a telegram which explained the situation in full. They waited a week, but no answer came from the haughty laird. Archibald accordingly made another trip to the telegraph office, and he sent the following telegram:

"Sir Sandie MacDonald, Kyltiehust on the Clyde:
"We are still waiting for transportation.
"James F. J. Archibald."

I know not what magic effect this hurry-up wire had on the Scotch thrift of the railroad magnate, but the transportation was waiting at the office next day.

Californians in the Magazine Field

It is no wonder that the New Yorker has an almost superstitious reverence for the journalistic sagacity of the Californian when you consider that the editorial desks in our three leading ten cent magazines are filled by Californian men, and young men at that. I am referring to Samuel E. Moffitt, recently appointed to the editorship of the Cosmopolitan, Lincoln Steffins, for several years editor of McClure's, and Jack O'Hara Cosgrave, until recently editor of Everybody's. Of these three Moffitt and Cosgrave are San Franciscans, but Steffins did his work in Sacramento before going abroad. Lincoln Steffins studied economic and sociological questions in the European universities, and this did much toward fitting him for the campaign against municipal corruption which he is waging in McClure's under his own signature. The transfer of Everybody's from Wanamaker to Doubleday and Page has, in a way, thrown Jack Cosgrave out of a job, for Walter Page has assumed the editorship with the management. They have offered, however, to keep Cosgrave in the business, but it is understood among his friends that he will withdraw to something else.

The Gay Countess Laltazzi

The dailies appeared to have very meagre information concerning the Countess Laltazzi, who was given a hint to leave the Grand hotel after having received a man in her rooms at the dead of night. The Countess has a past, and no doubt she thinks San Francisco slow compared with the Orient or even New York, for she knows New York well, and that big place knows the Countess. The fair "noblewoman" is just out of her twenties, not very pretty but with a bubbling wit that fascinates, gowns that glitter and jewels that gleam, and an airy ease of manner and posture that made her the belle of the steamship Nippon Maru on her last voyage here from Yokohama. When the Countess boarded the Nippon she was escorted by the entire jeunesse doree of the American colony in Japan. Chief among the throng were "Pop" Heinlein, the silk merchant, and "Tom" McKay, the representative of Harriman in the Far East. With a band of musicians and many uncorkings, they sent the gay Countess from the land of the musumees in gallant fashion.

A Hot Time on the Billowy

On the steamship en route here, the popping was incessant. There were millionaires aboard, diplomats bound for Washington, army officers returning from the Philippines, and all in all a brilliant lot of men. They made the time pass pleasantly for the Laltazzi, and her companion, Mrs. Jerome of London. Kee, the night steward, was busied during the silent watches of the night in frappeing and fetching many bottles for the merry party. The Countess told of her palace on the Thames near Windsor, her establishment at Cairo, and the Count's great castle on the Neva. The Count was busy at home, she said, and she was journeying to see her mother in Rochester. She didn't deny she was the Belle Livingston Hoyt who kicked so high when Charlie Hoyt had her in his shows, and she delighted to tell of her romantic marriage to Count Laltazzi. She didn't say, though, that "Jimmy" Van Alen, of New York, friend of the Vanderbilts and owner of a yacht now in Oriental waters, had enjoyed much of her society in Japan while her husband was in Russia. But all the gossips in the Flowery Kingdom have been telling of Van Alen's infatuation for the charming Countess, and of the costly presents he lavished on her.

Told Her a Little Story

Chief Clerk McDermott of the Palace had all his rooms engaged when she and her companion arrived there a week ago. The Grand had a suite for them, though, until they were asked to leave the next morning. "We had retired about midnight," said she the following day, "and were awakened by Mr. James Simpson, a fellow passenger on the Nippon. He had an awfully good story to tell, he said through the keyhole, and feared he would forget it if he waited until morning. Of course we let him in for a few minutes and had a glass of champagne or two. Before breakfast we were presented our bills and had to move to Delmonico's." The Countess left for Rochester a few hours later. Oddly enough, I have it on unquestionable authority that she is the wife of Count Laltazzi, who is now in Europe, and that he supplies her with money a-plenty. She intends to be in London in a few weeks and will winter as usual in her luxurious Cairo mansion.

"I no longer enjoy great prestige," said George Washington's Original Body Servant.

"What's the matter?" asked the Only Reliable Descent of the Last Dauphin of France.

"Why, I've an invincible rival—the Person who was On the Spot when the Charles Fairs were killed."

Feeding the Engaged

If it were not for the engagement of Olive Holbrook and Silas Palmer our smart set would find it extremely difficult these dull May days to supply material with which to enable the bavardes of the dailies to earn their salary. Judging from the social chat with which the gushers regale their readers there is nothing doing in society except at those functions that have Miss Holbrook and Mr. Palmer for a motif. Luncheons, dinners, suppers and theatre parties have been given in bewildering succession in honor of the two young people who are engaged. I fear that if the engagement lasted much longer and society continued to feed Mr. Palmer and Miss Holbrook with the same regularity and sumptuousness with which they have been dined in the last fortnight, the bride would find it necessary to have her trousseau "let out," and that the groom would have to turn his liver over to a doctor.

The friends of Griffith Kinsey very sincerely condole with him in the loss of his mother, who died last week. "Griff" Kinsey and his mother were always seen together, at the theatre and other places. They were like two chums, instead of parent and son. Mrs. Kinsey was a charming woman, cultured and companionable.

Phœnix Rises From His Ashes

Among the gifts to be presented to President Roosevelt as souvenirs of California, a copy of Lieutenant Derby's "Phœnixiana" has been mentioned. Derby (John Phœnix) was one of the wits of San Francisco in early days. He it was who invented that famous story about Yuma's heat, which is as good as anything in Owen Wister's "The Virginian," which Roosevelt praised so highly. The Phoenix story was to the effect that a Yuma man died and went to hell, but immediately telegraphed back for his blankets.

Grant's Grandson Returns

Algernon Sartoris, grandson of the old fighter, Ulysses S. Grant, came back to the United States a week ago, and is now the guest of his uncle, U. S. Grant, at San Diego. The dailies interviewed the young man, and said that he had resigned from the United States Army to study law, and to be with his mother in Washington. Which is half the truth. Sartoris quit Uncle Sam's service because he was tired of it. He says frankly to his friends that military life has no attractions for him, and that he refused to wear out his body and soul in a corner of the Philippines in order that it might be regularly reported that he was there. "I went into the army in time of war and out of it in time of peace," said Sartoris to me this week. "I shrunk thirty-five pounds before I resigned, so that it cannot be said that I did not pay my forfeit for wearing shoulder-straps. From two hundred and three pounds I fell to one hundred and fifty before I took my pen in hand to write for release from the army. Then under the beneficent influence of fresh meat and vegetables, and an ocean voyage to the land of my birth, I regained eighteen pounds, making my total sacrifice to Mars just the weight of a fair-sized baron of beef."

His Letter to Lee

It is a pretty story how Algernon Sartoris got into the army, and I think it has not been told. Sartoris was in Washington at the home of his mother, Mrs. Nellie Grant Sartoris, when the rumors of war with Spain began to occupy all attention. Fitzhugh Lee was the popular hero then for his manly course as Consul-General at Havana, and Sartoris, who was not much over his majority, wrote to him as follows:

"If war should come and you should be a general under the Stars and Stripes, would it not be fitting that a grandson of Ulysses S. Grant should be on the staff of a Lee?"

The dougthy old Confederate penned back: "If I should lead a command for Uncle Sam, you shall ride with me."

And so it was. When Lee was made a Brigadier, McKinley made Sartoris a Captain, and Lee made him his aide. The descendant of old "Unconditional Surrender" became the intimate associate of the one-time rebel, and when he fell ill of a fever it was Mrs. Lee who nursed him back to health. Lee liked the boy, and later when the Volunteers were mustered out, he encouraged Sartoris to seek a commission in the Regulars.

Has Written a Novel

Sartoris was successful but a year was enough for him. It was no lack of bravery that made him resign. Sartoris will fight with the best of them, but the carking routine, the fearful dullness and the perpetual sight of a can-opener worried him into a melancholy which threatened to slay him. Then his blouse had a foot of slack in front, and when in his regimental trousers he looked as Abe Ruef would in General Shafter's pants. Sartoris is not certain what he will do now. He doesn't have to earn his living. A landed estate in England, left by his father to him and his two sisters, affords him an income of a few hundred dollars a month, and his wants are few. Those who have read the manuscript of a novel he has completed believe it will make him a celebrity. It deals with fashionable life in America and abroad, and is brilliantly epigrammatic. Sartoris has a reputation for wit in conversation. He has been at the Palace for a week and left a day ago for San Diego.

"This play is a direct steal from mine," said the indignant rival manager.

"Oh, go to Honolulu," returned the other, "you'd claim anything with footlights and a curtain."

The Rule of Mathews

Again there is an outcry at the Hopkins Art School against the rule of Arthur Mathews. Some of those most familiar with affairs on the hill predict that if the painting boss is not fired soon there will be no pupils to enjoy the charity of Mark Hopkins's widow. The ranks of the students grow thinner and thinner as the season progresses and the prediction is made that the exhibition of the year's work will show feeble accomplishment. The trouble appears to be Mathews. Ever since the former newspaper artist returned from Paris, his enemies say, he has been spoiled as a teacher. During the twelvemonth in Europe, instead of learning his own deficiencies at the feet of the masters, he came back to say that European art was a sham, that there was nothing worth seeing in the Salon, and that there was no school in the old countries to compare with the "Hopkins."

Whistler His Model

He became a slavish imitator of Whistler both in painting methods and in personal manner. Now Whistler is a genius, and though he is perhaps the most insulting and disagreeable man in Paris, yet for his marvelous pictures he is forgiven his brusquerie. But Mathews assumes the tyranny and impertinence of the wearer of the white curl, and has not the redeeming genius. When he returned, so crowded was the portrait class at the Hopkins that the sittings of students had to be marked out with chalk on the floor so that all might see the model. Now a handful only spends wearisome hours in trying to copy a crotchetty style of painting adopted by Mathews in a vain attempt to catch the incomparable eccentricities of Whistler.

President Theodore Roosevelt's wine is Ruinart.

Pupils Desert to Other Schools

For a year or so many stuck to the school, believing Mathews would conquer the devil of conceit in him, but after enduring his whims for months they left in sorrow. A half-dozen former pupils told me in chorus of what they suffered at the hands of the dogmatic professor. They said he slighted the beginners utterly, and that only a few favorites received his attention. He harps always on colors and the trifling details of method, to the utter neglect of individuality and of results. Many of his most promising artists have been forced to leave in fear that they would be unfitted for honest efforts, and the loss of the Hopkins Institute has been the gain of other schools. Piazzoni, the Italian whose pictures have been well received, has now a flourishing class, made up mostly of anti-Mathews men and women.

Merely a Matter of Detail

A contemporary thinks it worth while to protest because the bas reliefs which Kuhne Beveridge is executing for the memorial of the charge of San Juan Hill are not historically correct. She represents Theodore Roosevelt as leading the charge, and Lieutenant Hamilton Fish as lying at his feet, when in fact Hamilton Fish never saw San Juan, but was killed at Las Guasimas two days earlier. As to that, a military memorial is in practically the same category as a tombstone, and no one would think of investigating the cemetery records for a truthful account of the virtues of the deceased. It is like going to a historical novel for history, and after all, if the Spanish war were not so recent an occurrence, even the carping critic would not be able to make the correction. To represent Hamilton Fish as one of those who laid down his life at San Juan Hill is probably as accurate as nine-tenths of the historical events which are never doubted. It really does not make any great amount of difference, one way or the other. If, at the beginning of the twenty-first century, it comes into some one's head to establish an order of merit to which membership is limited to those whose ancestors or relatives fought or fell at San Juan, those who are interested only as lookers-on may be driven to the conclusion that every adult male citizen of the United States in the year 1898 was charging up the historic eminence.

An Old Affair of Nellie's

The announcement that Eleanor Calhoun is to marry and retire from the stage, following upon the recent marriage of William R. Hearst, recalls the time when they were reported affianced lovers. It was a good many years ago, when Nellie Calhoun was an immature actress and the protegee of Mrs. Hearst. The latter took the San Jose girl to Washington, D. C., introduced her to the swim there and made much of her. That was the time when Will Hearst was said to be the fiance of the pretty young actress. But they did not marry. Some said that it was Mrs. Hearst who wished to make the match, and that her son balked. However I have since heard a story to the effect that the case was reversed; that Will Hearst was very much in love with Nellie Calhoun, but his mother had higher matrimonial aims for him. Anyhow, the paths of the actress and the collegian diverged. Nellie Calhoun went abroad, studied French and became a favorite with the Parisian public, acting their plays in their own tongue. Lately, she was identified with a proposed Shakespearean revival in English, the Bard's works to be rendered after the original productions, with scenery and costumes such as were the mode in Shakespeare's time. Now comes the announcement of her engagement and approaching marriage to Lazarovich, a Macedonian leader and liberator.

Mr. David Weill, who recently returned from Paris, entertained a stag party of eighteen members of the Sunday Breakfast Club at dinner on Saturday at Marchand's.

Among the week's arrivals at Byron Springs were Mr. and Mrs. John Landers, Dr. and Mrs. Gardner Perry Pond, Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Linforth, Mr. and Mrs. Asa R. Wells, Miss Marguerette Burton, Mr. and Mrs. H. V. Ramsdell, Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Higgins. Mrs. George B. Sperry and Miss Elsie Sperry are visiting Mr. and Mrs. L. R. Mead at Byron. Mrs. John Coxon Klein, who has been visiting Mrs. Mead, has returned home.

A Promoter of Philanthropy

So Mrs. Maryland S. Bartlett Sheppard's methods have at length aroused the suspicion of the Associated Charities! The officers of the Associated Charities are very slow. It was nearly three years ago that I called attention to the charity industry promoted by that enterprising woman. She had just come from the East at the behest of Rev. J. A. B. Wilson, the Methodist clergyman who leavens his religion with commerce. The Rev. Wilson was doing charity on strictly business principles and he hired Maryland S. Bartlett Sheppard to push the game along. She is a dashing, prepossessing woman, and she has a happy knack for wheedling alms from flint-hearted business men. She took apartments in the Palace hotel, and flaunted a wardrobe that proclaimed her a woman of style and means. Her specialty was conducting concerts and entertainments for charity, and she was prepared to do business on commission or salary. It was not long before she established a charity plant of her own and she has been operating it ever since.

Her Successful Persistency

Mrs. Sheppard has not a personality to inspire confidence in the breast of an intelligent and discerning philanthropist. She has more the manner of a book-agent than of a woman representing the cause of charity. In cornering a victim it has been her method to enter an office, seat herself and her waifs in every chair in the room and proceed to wear out the patience of her listener by means of her persistent demands. Snubs or hints or refusals have absolutely no effect on her, and the victim would usually "pungle" for the same reason as he would pay a troublesome organ grinder to move off the block. Mrs. Sheppard does not affect the professional whine of the charity grafter, but instead wears an air of cock-sureness which makes her presence extremely irritating to benevolent individuals and renders the lot of a "little mother" anything but enviable. The circumstances which first brought her "Little Mothers' Home" under suspicion was the fact that, as reported by persons formerly connected with the institution, Mrs. Sheppard was living in some style at the Grand hotel while the Home was not giving every appearance of prosperity.

"It is said that the consciousness of being well dressed gives a woman a feeling of heavenly content such as the mere consolations of religion are powerless to afford."

"It does except when she is beset with the thought that perhaps her hat isn't on straight."

Eccentric Helen of Honolulu

Helen Wilder Craft will soon be Helen Wilder again Honolulu society will not be surprised at its most eccentric woman divorcing her husband, for it has been agreed always among the gossips that Helen was not made for double blessedness. She must be well up in her thirties now, and until five years ago, when she wedded Horace Craft, the idea of her ever having a lover never entered the minds of Honolulans. Daughter of the owner of the Wilder Steamship Company, a millionaire, she has always had her own way in everything. And it has been a queer way. Utterly disregardful of dress or appearances, Helen has worn any old thing handy. Usually it is a man's hat, a shirt waist with a man's collar and necktie, and heavy boots that would captivate a mountain climber. As a girl she was the wildest one in Hawaii, driving her half-dozen horses at breakneck speed or riding astride at a furious rate over the rough roads of the islands, to the admiration of the scurrying kanakas.

Her Humane Fad

As Helen grew older she became more and more mannish and doubtless but for her being ever in frail health she would have been the heroine of daring adventures in outlandish places. Her main hobby has been the protection of animals from the cruelty of humans, and she used to police the streets of Honolulu a-horse, wearing a glittering badge of authority, and ready to hale to prison the least offender at a moment's opportunity. She did make many arrests and prosecuted her prisoners in court with a determination that made her the hated nemesis of careless teamsters. The giddy waltz or the bonny hug had no attractions for her and she despised those little feminine frills and ways that men vote charming. The result was that Helen had no beaux and was commonly voted a man-hater until Craft proposed. He was manager of a department in a Honolulu business house then, and Helen Wilder had, as she has now, something like six hundred dollars a month for spending money. Their honeymoon may not have been as treackly as some but they seemed devoted to each other for many months. Then came rumors of quarrels, and finally Craft came to San Francisco a year ago. They have not met since.

Helen's Butterfly

When Helen was in her early twenties she acquired a butterfly. It was done by a famous needle artist in vivid colors, and is said to be one of the finest specimens of tattooing in the world. Nowadays it is the custom of men and women that visit the Orient to have pretty designs tattooed upon their persons, but Helen Wilder pioneered the fad in Honolulu, and naturally her butterfly occasioned a deal of gossip. It gave rise to an amusing story to the effect that once upon a time when a scientist of Berkeley visited Honolulu in pursuit of bugs, he was advised to see Helen Wilder's rare butterfly. It was said that he visited her and explained that he desired to examine her diurnal Lepidoptera.

When Teachers' Certificates Were Sold

The latest Civil Service scandal is reminiscent of the School Department frauds of the middle '70's. Men and women who were involved in the big scandal precipitated when the discovery was made that teachers' certificates were virtually sold on the public streets have since attained some prominence in other activities. And no doubt they wouldn't care to have the whole story told at this late day. In the decade between 1870 and 1880 teachers' examinations were held quarterly, and the questions used throughout the State were uniform. Suspicion was aroused over the circumstance that graduates of the high schools and the University of California either failed to gain the seventy per cent which would entitle them to the lowest grade of certificate, or else barely scraped through. At the same time a number of "cramming mills" were established in which a three-months' course enabled pupils who were fresh from the grammar schools to come out with high percentages. The questions propounded, especially those in mathematics, were of the catch and puzzle variety, in which an ordinarily bright applicant had a bare chance to gain the requisite fifty per cent. Five out of ten problems were fairly reasonable, but the remainder were either puzzles outright, or such as required special statistics that people do not carry in their minds. It was finally discovered that the "cramming mills" were in league with crooked officials, and that they put their patrons in the way of getting the questions. An investigation was held and for awhile it looked as though San Quentin would have to be enlarged, but there were too many big heads to fall into the basket.

A Musical Discord

The San Francisco Music Club is composed of ambitious amateurs, a few of whom are talented. Like all women with fads they are ardent hero-worshipers and they are fond of collecting tufts from the tails of lions. When MacDowell was here they entertained him, and one of the ladies who was on the reception committee—she is one of the few club members who play very well, by the way—finding herself alone for a few minutes with the bright evening star undertook to entertain him and made a break which will long be remembered. She knew that MacDowell had written an Indian Suite and that he was professor of music at Columbia, and there her knowledge ended. Turning to him she remarked sweetly, "Mr. MacDowell, do you play?" When informed of her serious blunder, the lady caught herself very neatly and turned a mental handspring which would have delighted the most accomplished male reparteeist. "Well, Mr. MacDowell," she said jocularly, "you will probably forget all these other women but you'll never forget me." At last accounts MacDowell had not forgotten her, for he was still telling the story through the East.

Financier Chase

The enterprising Realty Syndicate company of which "Borax" Smith of Arbor Villa, Oakland, is the head and front, is about to open a bank at Emeryville. This is the company that operates a newspaper and several railroads across the bay. Its bewildering financial schemes, promoted with millions of borrowed money, are being watched with pop-eyed wonder by financiers on both sides of the bay. It is said that the financial schemes of this company are remarkable for their ingenuity and that many of them were evolved in the fertile brain of John M. Chase, a man of varied experience and an interesting past. Years ago he was a Presbyterian minister at Vallejo, but pointing the road to salvation was too tame an occupation for a man with his talent for the acquisition of money. Later on he appeared as the keeper of a boarding house for naval men at Vallejo, but that enterprise was not a financial success. Next he opened a boarding school for girls in Vallejo, and finally he launched out as an enthusiastic seller of mining stock. He soon established a reputation for erratic financiering, having planned some enterprise by which thirty per cent could be paid on six per cent securities. But it was probably not a success for this Napoleon of finance went to New York, where he organized a real estate com-

Tobin-Welch Engagement

The announcement of the engagement of Miss Ethel Tobin and Aloysius J. Welch was not a surprise to their intimate friends. It was hinted at some months ago. Miss Tobin is the daughter of Mrs. Mary B. Tobin, widow of Robert Tobin, who at the time of his death some years ago was a prominent capitalist of this city. She is a graduate of the Sacred Heart convent of this city, and also of the institution conducted by the sisters of the Order of the Sacred Heart in Paris. She recently returned from abroad. Mr. Welch is the youngest son of Mrs. Bertha and the late Andrew Welch, and a brother of Mrs. Eugene Lent, Andrew Welch and Charles J. Welch, who married Miss Livingston of New York. He is to graduate at the end of this month from Columbia Law College and then he will come to this city to practice law.

Two Bright People to Marry

The most interesting engagement that has been announced recently in art circles is that of Miss Marian Holden and Mr. Charles Pope. Miss Holden is among the most, if not the most talented of the young women artists of the Coast, and although she returned from Europe less than a year ago her work has caught on here. Miss Holden is more ambitious in her painting than her sister artists, for she has been at work for the past several months on a great allegorical frieze which is to occupy a prominent place in the new public library at Oakland. Miss Holden went to Europe through the Hearst scholarship and studied at the Beaux Arts and under Whistler. Mr. Pope, who is a civil engineer by profession, is a graduate of Stanford University. He is a son of the late Colonel Pope of the Army. The sad circumstances of the death of Colonel and Mrs. Pope are still remembered. Some two years ago Colonel Pope died in the Philippines, and while his wife was bringing his body over on the transport she also succumbed.

Democratic Reorganization

All the Democratic politicians in town are on the qui vive for developments in the struggle for control of the machine. The reorganization meeting last week at which Congressman Livernash undertook to capture the works, and was out-manoeuvred by James H. O'Brien, provoked lively discussion in both Democratic and Republican circles. Some people thought that the row precipitated by Livernash was in the nature of a hippodrome; that the Congressman was there as the representative of the Examiner, and that O'Brien was doing the same stunt. But it was a bona fide mill. There was no faking. Livernash is a Hearst man; at least for the time being. But he objects to O'Brien and his friend as leaders. They were his friends in the late campaign; indeed, they were about the only friends he had when he started out, but since election they failed to consult him about running the party and therefore he resolved to oppose them. And as a consequence Livernash has been forced into an alliance with the McNab-Phelan element. That was the element that tried to beat him for Congress.

Hearst to Keep "Hands Off"

It now looks as though O'Brien has the situation well in hand, but the McNab people are still urging Livernash on in the hope of accomplishing something. At the same time they are circulating the report that Hearst has agreed to keep "hands off." It is said that during his recent visit Mr. Hearst extended the olive branch to both McNab and Phelan, and that those two politicians expressed a willingness to compromise on any old terms. Even Max Popper, who was around denouncing Hearst a few months ago, availed himself of an opportunity of an audience with the newspaper proprietor, and he was quite penitent. Hearst is interested solely in having a solid delegation sent to the National Convention.

An Opportune Time

The one item of political interest that overshadowed all others at Los Angeles during Fiesta week was the banquet given by Thomas Flint, Jr., of San Benito to his political partisans in Los Angeles county. The wine was perfect, the hot birds were done to a turn, the oratory was lurid, and the pledges of support in the next gubernatorial contest were heartfelt and sincere. Everything was lovely when the host of the evening rose to express his thanks, etc. Nothing was lacking except a policeman to arrest the leader of a German band across the street, which at the exact moment that Tom began speaking began to play the "Dead March" from "Saul." Just who gave the signal to the windjammers is not known, but the man who hired the band said it was cheap at half the price. It was awful while the practice and the speech lasted.

Charles Bryant Has A Great Chance

Young Charles Bryant who was stage manager at the Alcazar, but who has been called East to assist David Belasco—the Belasco—in the production of his elaborate stage productions, has a great chance. Bryant is but twenty-six years old and he is bubbling over with new ideas. Almost the first detail given to Bryant was to go to Scotland, where he will get local color for Belasco's magnificent production of "Macbeth," in which Mrs. Carter will star. On this trip he will take with him his wife, Miss Convere, to whom he will be married next month. Miss Convere will be remembered as the slender Southern girl, with much manner but little dramatic fire, who appeared at the Alcazar some months ago. Her sister married one of the Brugieres, so both found husbands during their San Francisco engagements. Bryant will have a large salary, and as he has unlimited money at his command will doubtless have a great success as well. His departure is but the beginning of the exodus of a lot of brilliant San Franciscans. Wallace Irwin and Mrs. Irwin are going. Will Irwin has an offer from New York which he will accept, if not this year, certainly next; Charley Aiken is going and so is Robert Aitken, the sculptor. It will be San Francisco's loss, but New York's great gain. All these men are friends.

May Lose Genthe, Too

San Francisco may lose Dr. Arnold Genthe. Mrs. "Pat" Campbell was photographed by him many times, with and without Pinky Panky Poo, sometimes in one of Genthe's Chinese costumes, sometimes in the magnificent things she wore in "The Joy of Living." Several of the pictures, especially a posterish one, were great successes, and Mrs. Campbell gave an order which aggregated seventeen hundred dollars and which is the largest single order since Melba's thousand dollar purchase. Mrs. "Pat" was so enthusiastic over his work that she urged him to come to London, where she said he would surely make his fortune, or where she would make it for him. Genthe gets all the celebrities who come to town but how he managed to slip up on Mascagni, who fell a victim to the photographer next door, is a tale that has never been told.

Society Bookbinders

Two of our young society girls, Edith Cheseborough and Lutie Collier, have followed in the footsteps of that fashionable Chicago matron, Mrs. Chatfield Taylor, by studying bookbinding until they have become quite expert at it. Miss Cheseborough divides her time between bookbinding and golf and little Miss Collier refuses many invitations to luncheons and teas, so absorbing has the fascinating craft become to her.

It isn't "rubber" any more. They say "peninsula" now. Why? Oh, a long stretch to see, of course.

Bars Down in the Century Club

The bars are down in the Century Club and so many new members have recently been elected to this so-called most exclusive organization of women in this city, that the old members scarcely know where they are at. Many of the new members are not society women but they doubtless supply new blood, of which the club was much in need, it having remained such a close corporation that it was likely to run to seed as do the European royal families who marry their own cousins exclusively. The Century Club needs a little racy touch of the soil. Mrs. Fred Sanborn is making a very successful president, I hear.

Mrs. Helen Walker Tay is domiciled at her country-place, "El Nido," near Redwood City, for the summer.

A Prelate of Exceptional Personality

Monsignor Falconio, the Papal Delegate who arrived this week, is a man of charming and graceful personality. He has the art of presiding like an ideal host at a dinner table, though himself the guest. One cannot resist his original and fascinating ways. The mere wave of his hand is filled with a significance acquired only in a land prodigal of hospitality. Indeed, the Delegate breathed in his person the air of old Italy, clad, as he often was, in his pearl-gray cassock and red beretta or perhaps a crimson skull cap. He is an indefatigable worker, and refuses all artificial stimulants. At a little supper in his honor, while offering the amber wines of Italy to visitors of the laity, he abstained himself, though appealing to all by the delicacy of his wit. He is a true prince of men, and brings to a country of sunshine the dream and poetic repose of another Italy over-seas. Monsignor is a lesson in civilization. One cannot meet him without realizing the true grandeur, the age and dignity of his country.

The annual reception of the Alumni of the University of California was held on Wednesday night at the Hopkins. Last night the pupils of the School of Design held their commencement exercises, with the usual interesting program, and a reception with dancing following. The annual exhibition of drawings and studies of the pupils is now under way in the Searles Gallery.

Our President

Many amusing incidents have attended the visit of President Roosevelt to California. It is so rarely that we have such a big lion in our midst that we get rattled at the thought of meeting him, and in our nervous eagerness to pay him the deference due we are inclined to do all sorts of fantastic tricks. It is easy for people to make fools of themselves in the presence of Roosevelt because of his native manliness and common sense courtesy. He doesn't encourage "company manners." He prefers the simple dignity of the plain American citizen. He doesn't like people to slop over. He is a man of impressive individuality and he never betrays the slightest trace of artificiality. His manner is that of a good fellow, and of a man who does not not regulate his conduct upon any theory as to what people might think. I saw him in the Press Club when he was being rushed from one room to another, catch sight of an impressionistic sketch of a dashing female on one of the walls. He fairly devoured the picture with his eyes, and kept them riveted on it as he passed through the door, giving his final look over his shoulder and almost throwing his neck out of joint. The room was crowded with men but he was oblivious to all of them.

He Can Stand a Josh

The President loves a joke even when it is on himself. The members of his party had their little joke out of school hours on the trip up from Los Angeles. His race suicide theory has been one of the principal targets for their wits, as may be seen by the following doggerel which was penned by one of the distinguished tourists to while away the tedium between stops:

There was an old woman who lived in a shoe,
She had so many children she didn't know what to do,
"O Teddy, dear Teddy," she tearfully cried,
"I think that I'll soon commit Race Suicide."

True to the Rough Riders

Characteristic of the President was his treatment of one of his Rough Riders, Trooper C. C. Bull, who rode four days through Arizona in order to meet his former Colonel at the Grand Canyon. When Roosevelt met Bull he would not let him return but made him go to Southern California with him as his guest. The President is true to the men of his old regiment. T. D. Fennessy, a Rough Rider, went to Riverside from Los Angeles to see his former Colonel and have him change the arrangements made by the Los Angeles fiesta committee to have the six Rough Riders who were to be in the parade sidetracked and General Last and staff act as escort. Fennessy happens to be a labor union leader and when he arrived in Riverside was pointed out by Teddy's Terrors to the secret service men as a good man to watch. It was with difficulty that the Rough Rider finally got into the presence of the President and only after the secret service men had felt him over carefully for bombs and revolvers. When President Teddy saw Fennessy he stopped his conversation with a man standing near and rushed toward the "dangerous character" with his arms outstretched. When the President reached Los Angeles and General Last and his staff rode up to act as escort Roosevelt ordered the carriage stopped and asked that the Rough Riders be sent to escort him. "They were my boys once," he said, "and they are my boys now." Though this was not what the committee had planned the General was sidetracked for "the boys," to whom the President shouted as his carriage rode off, "Come and take lunch with me, boys."

Just a Few Solecisms

General Otis of Los Angeles distinguished himself by presenting the President with a cane. The presentation was made in broad daylight, and the hero of the Rubicon was attired in full evening dress with a lot of glittering medals pinned to his breast. Assemblyman Siskron of the legislative party made his appearance at high noon in evening dress, but his confreres rushed him off to the hotel to change his clothes before the President saw him. He subsequently appeared in a sack coat and silk hat. However such a solecism on the part of a mere assemblyman is not to be so seriously deprecated as that of the Governor of our State, who appeared in the parade with a "crush" opera hat and a sack coat. However, thanks to the foresight of the Citizens' Committee in instructing the prominent cits who solicited invitations to the banquet at twenty dollars a throw as to what they should wear, not a single man appeared in a red flannel shirt. But as a consequence of the committee rule President Roosevelt was made conspicuous by not appearing en regle. He was the only man that wore a black waistcoat.

Wheelan's Failure

The feature of the banquet, by the way, was the failure of Mr. Fairfax Wheelan to make good. Mr. Wheelan has something of a reputation as an after-dinner speaker, and he was expected to sustain it. The toast and the occasion were propitious to that end, and as Mr. Wheelan said, in the course of his rambling remarks, "This toast is worthy of the best efforts of any man." Mr. Wheelan's best effort was almost soporific in its effect upon his hearers. His friends regret that he missed such a splendid opportunity.

Sabbath-Breaking in Berkeley

I have been wondering that some religious person did not make a pow-wow over the fact that the men engaged in making the wonderful amphitheatre where President Roosevelt spoke on Thursday in Berkeley have been working every Sunday these many weeks. The amphitheatre was the idea of Mr. Hearst and he was here so very lately that, after the plans had been completed, work had to be rushed with all possible speed. As a result panting men and panting horses have worked many extra hours every day and the men have earned fine extra pay and the horses fine extra rations. All day Sunday the sound of the dump-cart has been heard in the land, but the place was ready for occupancy, though not completed, on the all-important day. The stage and the Ionic columns will be completed at leisure and when you look upward at the tiers of seats rising all around, you are reminded instantly of the Coliseum, and you look at the spectacled maids and matrons of Berkeley to see if they are turning down their thumbs.

A Garden Where Women May Not Walk

The metropolitan papers have been publishing photographs of President Roosevelt and his party in the garden of the Santa Barbara Mission where, it is stated, "No woman has ever entered." This is not true. Two women have set foot in that Eveless Eden—Princess Louise, daughter of Queen Victoria and wife of the Marquis of Lorne, and Mrs. Grant, wife of the General and President. Ordinary women, to be sure, are not permitted to enter the garden where the fathers take their recreation, while any common, ordinary man may tread the dusty paths and see the red fish-geraniums and breathe their stifling breath on a hot, still, summer afternoon. The women who have been admitted were distinguished visitors for whom the precedent, for it is that rather than a law, was broken. It cannot be that they were admitted on the grounds of purity of character, for however irreproachable Mrs. Grant, Princess Alice had quite a record of youthful escapades which, for a young woman, was doing almost as well as her brother, Albert Edward, did for a young man.

Those Colored Troops

Of course the Presidential parade wouldn't have fulfilled expectations if it hadn't raised its quota of teapot tempests over various points of form and preference. For instance, the Southerner wants to know why did President Roosevelt give a negro regiment of cavalry the place of honor in the line of march when there were plenty of white soldiers available? The reasons given are numerous. The more rabid declare that the black fellows were put at the head of the procession by the direct order of the President, who wished to keep up his pose on the race question. It is a matter of history, however, that the negro horsemen who succeeded the Presidential carriage are the Ninth regiment, the same fellows who saved the Rough Riders from extermination in Cuba. By some it is supposed that Roosevelt gave these men the place of honor because of gratitude as well as to satisfy his inborn love of the dramatic. Those familiar with military affairs, however, give another interpretation to the prominence of the Ninth cavalry in Tuesday's demonstration. It is said that the Black Ninth is the only crack body of horsemen on the coast at present, and as the Chief Executive is a lover of the man on horseback the Ethiopian guard was pressed into service for the parade. Be these things as they may, the display which these fellows made on Market street was the most impressive military drill ever seen in San Francisco.

Some Parade Incidents

The other point of discussion is, What became of the bluejackets and marines of the Grafton who were supposed to have been invited to participate in the procession? It was the general rumor that Rear Admiral Bickford's men would be a star feature, and great was the disappointment expressed at their non-appearance. Some declared that it was no less than an affront to the British flag to have neglected the crew of a visiting battleship, but those who talked so much on the subject merely showed their ignorance of international law. Only by the request of the British sovereign or others high in power in Britain could an armed body of English troops have been allowed to parade on our streets. Even if this favor had been granted the crew of the Grafton would have been disarmed before being permitted to march in an American city. Had the favor of military display been asked by Admiral Bickford—which it was not—his men would have presented the humiliating spectacle of walking, hands at sides, behind the armed American troops, like captives following the chariot of Cæsar. One of the humors of the parade occurred when the First Congregational cadets were passing in review and the President complimented their drill, which was really fine. An Irish policeman heard this and remarked, "It ain't so bad for a set of damn Congregationalists." About the same moment a daylight Japanese bomb was shot into the air and when it burst it represented a Gorgon's head with shaky streamers on all sides. "It looks like an octopus," remarked a spectator. "It is," said the "cop"; "that's the Southern Pacific's tribute."

At the De Youngs

When President McKinley was out here the Henry T. Scotts monopolized the social honors, but the big social coup of the Roosevelt visit was made by the M. H. de Youngs. And of course they excited a lot of envy. The only private hospitality accepted by the President was that dispensed at the De Young home in California street, on which occasion Mrs. de Young proved herself the graceful hostess that she is. Her experience abroad in entertaining diplomats and representatives of the nobility has well fitted her for the flattering duty which devolved on her on the occasion of Mr. Roosevelt's visit. But there were several society matrons who would have been very willing to assist her. The absence of the Eugene Schmitz's on the occasion of the dinner was remarked. It was Mayor Schmitz who made it possible for Mr. de Young to carry off the honors attending the President's visit, and he was not vouchsafed the opportunity of presenting Mrs. Schmitz to the nation's Chief Magistrate at the De Young home. But I understand it was not due to any oversight. President Roosevelt named the only guests invited, and he overlooked the Mayor, probably because he had him so incessantly with him after his arrival. It was remarked that probably Roosevelt felt that a little of Schmitz went a long way.

Doesn't Forget a Face

Nearly all men who have achieved great success in politics in this country were gifted with a wonderful memory for names and faces. James G. Blaine was a most remarkable man in that respect and so is Teddy Roosevelt.

The latter's faculty for recalling a face was instanced the other day when he met Frederick O'Brien, managing editor of the Manila Cablenews, who by the way sails today for Hongkong. The President had met O'Brien only once and that was seven years ago when the latter was one of the star interviewers of the New York Herald. That was the time when, as a Police Commissioner, Roosevelt made a great record by prying into the blackmailing methods of the men of the department. People concluded that he wanted the nomination for Mayor, and O'Brien was sent to interview him on the subject. He found the future President in "The Chimney Corner," a beer saloon frequented by socialists to which he was accustomed to go in search of atmosphere, and to get in touch with the sentiments of its habitues. "You can tell your editor," said Roosevelt when questioned by O'Brien, "that I am interested in nothing but my official duties just now." When they met the other day the President put out his hand and greeted the reporter he had not seen in seven years as "Mr. O'Brien."

Though the President did not attend the Bohemian Club affair on Wednesday night, a personage of importance was there. It was Joaquin Miller, in picturesque attire and jovial mood, and the gentlemen of Roosevelt's party who were there expressed their delight in no measured terms at meeting the Poet of the Sierras.

The President at Del Monte

It is safe to say that the President had one of his best times at Del Monte, where he was not rushed to death with parades and speeches. He had a good chance for relaxation during the comfortable seventeen-mile drive, and also at the hotel. He remarked that he had never been in a more restful spot, or where the senses were more pleasantly lulled. Society is seeking Del Monte with more than usual avidity this spring. Mr. Phelan, with Lieutenant Hobson, spent a few days there last week. Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Moore, accompanied by Miss Starr, reached the hotel Sunday after a pleasant trip from town in their big Winton touring car. The Heintz cottage has been rented for the summer by Ethyl Hager. A large new auto has been purchased by Miss Hager, and touring parties will help to enliven the summer. Miss Dolbeer, J. A. Folger and family, and Mrs. Louise La Montagne expect to spend the summer months at Del Monte. Fred Greenwood, the Pinckards, E. Avery McCarthy, Mrs. J. H. Glide of Woodland and the E. J. Bowens were among the week's arrivals.

The Man with the Bucket

The humblest member of a union nowadays is as haughty as the boss of a job formerly was. One day last week one of the contractors engaged in the construction of the St. Francis building met one of his employes walking out of the building with a bucket in his hand.

"Where are you going?" asked the contractor.

"I'm going to get a bucket of beer for the gang," was the reply.

"Well, I think your hours are short enough; you better go back to work," said the contractor angrily. The man with the bucket heeded not the suggestion. A little later the contractor met the man on one of the upper floors. The bucket full of beer was on a girder and the man was blowing a whistle to summon the thirsty gang down to take a drink. The contractor, indignant at the thought of work being stopped until his employes quenched their thirst, kicked over the bucket of beer. Thereupon all the men put on their coats and quit work. Then the contractor was worried. There was a time-limit in his contract and a forfeit would be imposed if the work were not finished. He sent for the men and pleaded with them to go back to work. They agreed to do so but stipulated that they should be permitted to drink when thirsty. The stipulation was made. Then the men thought of the lost bucket of beer and they further stipulated that the contractor should buy another. And he did.

Society's Fad

Society people are always learning some new way to lighten their household cares. They no longer, for one thing, feel it incumbent to hold formal functions at their own homes. Lately, St. Dunstan's grill has become a favorite place for dinners, luncheons and teas, not only given by guests of the house but by outsiders. Mrs. Edmund Rice gave a breakfast on Tuesday, just before the parade, to a number of Army ladies, and held a reception in the officers' honor later. Dr. and Mrs. E. A. Younger gave a large dinner Tuesday evening in honor of Mrs. Younger's sister, Miss Russell, and George A. Webster, whose engagement was recently announced.

MINING EXCITEMENT AT LONE MOUNTAIN.

No country adjacent to Tonopah is attracting more attention at the present time than Lone Mountain. During the past week several rich strikes have been reported.

Early in the week another rich strike was made in the shaft of the Princess Maude Gold Mining Company, but how rich or extensive it was has not been learned as yet, the assay returns have not yet been received at the Company's office. There is little doubt as to the future of this property as they had a strong ledge of good ore on the surface and the ledge has been getting richer as depth has been gained.

JEWELER

Evolution of a Climber

San Francisco, April 10, 1902.

Dear Madge,

Well Madge, I have some real interesting news for you at last; something that's bound to hold you for awhile. It's not exactly a chronique scandaleuse, but like Mercutio's wound, it will suffice. Dr. Tom de Vere, the confirmed bachelor, as we all supposed, has taken unto himself a wife, and the lady is none other than Isabel Shores. I can hear you exclaim, "Impossible!" Nothing is impossible these days, so far as matrimonial alliances are concerned. Of course he shocked all his friends. Though he isn't rich, possessing nothing but his talents, which have always earned him a good income in his profession, he could have married any one of a half a dozen of the best girls in society, as you know. As he was never a giddy fellow, but rather severely proper, nobody ever suspected that he would fall a victim to the wiles of such a woman as Isabel Shores. She has been gayer of late than before you went to New York. She had no social connections, and that is the strange part of it, for none of us can understand how Tom, who was so exclusive, ever met her. The marriage is the sensation of the hour. It's too bad, for the doctor was a popular fellow at the club, and of course now he will be cut dead. It will probably be hard for him to understand why they are not invited out. But of course she is impossible. Only a few of his bachelor friends and one or two married men and their wives, who knew the doctor merely a professional way, attended the wedding. Most of his society friends were "out of town." The wedding was a frost and the smart set was on a broad grin.

Yours as ever, JANE.

San Francisco, April 27, 1902.

Dear Madge,

Glad to hear you enjoyed yourself in the Adirondacks. It's awful dull in this provincial town. One meets the same stupid people every day. The only amusement I get is in reading the social columns in the daily papers edited by social climbers, and hired boosters of the rich. They're boosting the same people every day, and their sycophantic gush is positively nauseating. Every time I'm mentioned I feel ashamed of myself, because I think perhaps I'm suspected of seeking notoriety and social prestige. By the way, Mrs. De Vere is occasionally mentioned. I think she is climbing. She attended a club luncheon the other day given by a Mrs. Bolton in honor of the wife of a visiting lion who had been entertained by Doctor De Vere. I suppose the lady requested that Mrs. De Vere be invited. However, Mrs. Bolton, as you know, isn't the most desirable of hostesses, and of course there were only one or two society people of any prominence present. They went on account of the lion. Mrs. Bolton, as you no doubt remember, is said to have been the mistress of her husband's father. She has only one leg over the rim of society. Yours as ever, JANE.

San Francisco, May 25, 1902.

Dear Madge,

It may interest you to know that Mrs. De Vere has turned out to be a climber of the first order. She is using her husband's social prestige for all it is worth, but of course she never can get in. She attended a dinner given the other night at one of the French restaurants, by the Jim Flushems in honor of the Will Shekels, who recently returned from their honeymoon trip. The Flushems, you know, have been in fairly good society ever since Flushem Sr. went into partnership with old Blublud, and made a fortune in salt. Of course the Flushems are not of our creme de la creme, but nevertheless I'm surprised that they invited the De Veres, although the doctor is their family physician. You know Mrs. Flushem comes from very common people. Her father held a state office in early days and was a defaulter, and it was said that her mother used to work in a hurdy-gurdy on the Comstock. Among the people at the dinner were the Walter Parkers. You remember young Parker, who married Miss Jones, the child claimant to the celebrated Jorkins estate. It was an awful, unsavory mess, but she won the millions and married the scion of an old Southern family, so now she has the brand of the elect. The Boreums were also at the dinner and were probably the only real dyed-in-the-wool aristocrats in the bunch, with the exception of the buxom and stalwart Miss Juger, who is so sure of her position that she doesn't care where she goes or whom she meets. She has been going into homes lately just to give them tone. She distributes social prestige as though it were charity and she expected her reward in heaven. Yours as ever, JANE.

San Francisco, August 31, 1902.

Dear Madge,

So you are interested in the progress of the De Veres. I was afraid that I was boring you, but I am glad you are interested for I have nothing else to write about. And there hasn't been much news concerning them. However they are going out a great deal but they haven't arrived yet. They attended a Presidio dance the other night, but as you know the army has become common since the war. I read about them very often in the social columns so I presume they are not indifferent to the importance of the boosters of the press in social evolution. I hear a great deal of talk about snubs in store for them ,and they are surely destined to meet some obstacles. The McBriars are waiting for them. The McBriar twins are tremendously exclusive. As they are only a generation removed from plebeian stock I cannot account for their presumption, but you know how fearfully bourgeois San Francisco society is. Pretenders with wealth and nerve can accomplish almost anything. Depend on me to keep you posted. Yours as ever, JANE.

Dear Madge,

The De Veres are climbing. They attended one of the Monday night cotillions recently and mingled with the real blown-in-the-bottle elite. I hear that the doctor had to pay for the entree, but there are others of the swim who had to put up in the years agone. They appeared to have many friends at the dance, so I presume they have made good progress. Mrs. De Vere spent a deal of time with Mrs. Flashleigh whose daughter married young Millions lately. Of course you are familiar with Mrs. Flashleigh's eventful past. Well, everybody has been trying to forget it since her daughter's marriage. You know young Millions has a handsome brother, and there are several mammas who have their eyes on him. So the Flashleighs are strictly in it.

Yours as ever, JANE.

Dear Madge,

The De Veres have arrived. There's no doubt about it. I met them at the Flashleighs last night, and the very elect was there. And by the way I never knew that Mrs. De Vere was such a charming woman. I can now account for her social success. She is a woman of culture, and in San Francisco's 400 she easily shines by contrast. She discusses art and music and politics in a most entertaining way. And by the bye I was told by Mrs.

Smartem, who was Mrs. Gayleigh when you were out here, and who figured as co-respondent after her first season, that the stories about Mrs. De Vere were very much exaggerated. And after all I've concluded that she is a more desirable acquaintance than most of the women one meets in the smart set. It is conceded that she is devoted to her husband, and that is more than can be said about some of our flirty matrons. Adieu.

Yours as ever, JANE.

Overheard at the Song Recital

"Madeline Poyser Smythe! How much better that looks on the program than plain Mrs. Smith!"

"I wonder if she is ashamed of her husband's name. And lately married, too."

"Hush! Here she comes. That's her wedding dress, isn't it? (Mrs. Smith finishes her number and bows herself off. Applause. Enter Mrs. Langhorne Jones.)

"I wonder how she can afford to take singing lessons. I know for a positive certainty the Joneses can't pay their grocer. Did you ever see such a gown? The skirt looks as though it were made out of an old lace-curtain." (Mrs. Jones receives but two bouquets.)

"I suppose poor Jones couldn't afford to send her any more."

(Miss Sybil Dollars appears.)

"They say Sybil has been taking lessons on that one song for six months. It is the only thing she can sing."

"She can't even sing that. One would think she had her mouth full of butter."

"No matter, she has money to burn. I understand that her grandmother took in washing."

"Did you hear that young Needy is desperately in love with her?"

"With her money, you mean. Lend me your glass. I want to take a good look at her frock. A dream, isn't it? Did you notice that diamond pendant?"

"Just see those flowers, a whole cartload. The Professor is helping her to carry them off. Let's clap. They want an encore."

"No use, she can't sing another thing."

"Then she will have to repeat that. Isn't she perfectly lovely?"

"Now it is Adele's turn. I'm glad she's the last. I get awfully tired at these things, don't you?"

"Adele looks like a picture with that rose behind her ear."

"I think she is a little bold, don't you?"

"Oh, she knows how to please the men. You couldn't get me to stand up before an audience and sing a thing like that."

"Well, I'm glad there's no more of it. We'll go to Masker's and have an ice."

(Later, in the vestibule):

"Perfectly lovely. I enjoyed your singing so much. So kind of you to send us tickets!"—The Eavesdropper.

The Murder

Creswell stood motionless for a moment, holding the smoking revolver in his hand—a hand whose nervous steadiness matched the cold glitter of his eye. Mechanically he examined the weapon. Yes, there were three chambers empty. Evidently all the shots had taken effect in the slight, beautiful form which lay at his feet. The struggle of death was over and the smoke had cleared away, yet the cold, quiet man did not yet seem to realize the seriousness of what he had done.

He dropped to one knee and, quite reflectively, stroked the soft hair, now foul with ugly red stains. He had caressed her so often before, and there seemed no touch of the murderer as he passed his hand along her hair. Yet no emotion stirred his pallid features until his gaze caught the stare of her dead eyes, and in them there was accusation, the accusation of helplessness by treachery undone. Then across the face, a moment before as moveless as the dead face before him, there came a twinge of sudden agony which he seemed to control by the fierce fires within.

"It was necessary, only necessary," he muttered as he arose and thrust the pistol into his pocket.

And as he stood thus the quick debate which ever confronts the man who slays was warring in his mind. To escape, or hide the deed and dissemble? The shots would certainly be heard by the police, but he had still time to fly. Or perhaps he might conceal the body among the weeds in the corner of yonder lot.

He moved to act—too late! Already he could hear the step of the constable on the board walk outside. The truth swept like a flood over his being. According to his deed so must he suffer. The police would not believe, the world would not understand the motives, the necessities that demanded her blood.

The steps drew nearer, nearer, and yet the man did not waver. The gate clicked, and when the blue-coated officer entered Creswell was still standing as he had stood, her blood still on his hands, the calm of justice in his face.

The officer looked at the quiet man, then at the corpse at his feet.

"What d'ye mean," he said, "by shootin' that there cat inside the city limits? If ye wasn't a dam dood ye'd git sixty days." —The Humanitarian.

A Successful California Promotion.

In connection with the illustration on the front page, Town Talk takes pleasure in giving its readers a short account of the history and surroundings of the Abalone Packing Company of 326 Post street, San Francisco. This company, which is an assured success (since it starts out with all the orders it can fill), is one of the promotions which have made the Pacific States Mining and Investment Company of San Francisco deservedly celebrated from one end of the United States to the other.

It suffices to state that, from the time the proposition of promotion was accepted, up to the time the Abalone Packing Company's cannery started up at Cayucos, Cal., two weeks ago, less than six months elapsed. In these few months a sufficient amount of stock was sold to justify the erection of the cannery and a wharf, the hiring of divers, the purchase of most complete modern outfits for the divers and the equipment of the cannery with up-to-date machinery and special appliances by which the cans are varnished, labeled and boxed at a single operation, with the speed of thought. In the work of promotion Mr. W. E. von Johannsen, the secretary of the Pacific States Mining and Investment Company, was aided by the National Underwriting and Trust Company and by the Pacific States Investor, a leading western financial newspaper with office in San Francisco.

The beginnings of the Abalone Packing Company came about in this way. Some years ago, J. W. Gayetty of Oakland, a native son of San Francisco, was attracted to the operations of the Chinese and Japanese fishermen at Monterey. Mr. Gayetty found that the Japanese and Chinese fishermen at Monterey were making use of the meat or flesh of the abalone, as well as of the handsome shells, well known to the lovers of curios and to the jeweler. It occurred to Mr. Gayetty that the Orientals might know a thing or two that had escaped the attention of the white people, so he kept his eyes open and his mouth shut. He found that immense quantities of the abalone meat, either dried or rudely preserved, were being shipped to China and Japan. He sampled the product and decided that, though it was not palatable as crudely prepared, there was a piquancy and flavor which oysters and clams did not possess. To find a process by which the Abalone meat might be made a delicacy for white people was the problem which Mr. Gayetty set to work to solve and with pronounced success. He obtained sufficient financial support to start a small cannery in a rockbound cove at Carmel Point, just below Monterey. The product of this cannery sold so fast that a much larger enterprise was contemplated, but circumstances occurred by which the control of the cannery passed out of Mr. Gayetty's hands. The result was that the enterprise collapsed, for the men who had taken hold did not know Mr. Gayetty's secret and the Abalone food put on the market under another name was a failure.

About a year later Mr. Gayetty became satisfied that the demand for the original Abalone food, as prepared by him, still existed, and, in fact, that his process was a valuable thing. He was led to apply to the Pacific States Mining and Investment Company to finance his enterprise by the excellent reports he had received of other concerns which that company had placed on a paying basis. The result was satisfactory and today Mr. Gayetty is president of the Abalone Packing Company, with a going cannery at Cayucos, San Luis Obispo county, Cal., and with offices at 326 Post street, San Francisco. The cannery stands on its own wharf, which is built out from the regular wharf at Cayucos, a port of call for the steamers of the Pacific Coast Steamship Company. The possibilities of having to enlarge the cannery have not been overlooked and the capacity can be doubled at any time. The position of the cannery on the wharf, at which steamers will call regularly, places it in immediate connection with the markets of the world.

The abalones may be compared to a gigantic marine snail, having only one shell, which covers it above like the carapace of a tortoise, turtle or terrapin. It is a tenant of the deep water and especially of a rocky bottom. The average depth at which it is obtained by the divers is from twenty to one hundred feet. The contents of a large abalone shell will weigh as much as two pounds. The meat is absolutely free from impurities and has a delicious flavor when properly prepared. If heated or boiled in the ordinary way the product is tough and horny, but by Mr. Gayetty's process it is made as soft as a clam or oyster, perfectly white and extremely nutritious and digestible.

The supply is practically inexhaustible, for the abalone is not a shore product like the oyster, mussel or clam, but comes in from the deep ocean. As fast as a section of abalone fishing ground is depleted, it is re-populated, so to speak, in a few weeks or months by new arrivals from old ocean. The entire coast of California, from Monterey to Cape St. Lucas teems with abalones, but the catching of them has hitherto been effected solely by Chinese and Japanese and then only for the shells and the meat, prepared for shipment to China and Japan in a condition unpalatable to white people and with a large amount of waste. In the cannery at Cayucos not an ounce is wasted. The viscera, which are easily detachable from the flesh of the abalone, furnish the finest kind of glue and are specially cared for. The shells are worth from thirty-five to one hundred and sixty-five dollars a ton, according to size and quality. A special market exists for them in Europe, where the beautiful iridescent interior of the shell is manufactured into articles of jewelry, inlaid work on furniture, buttons, etc.

Cayucos is about one hundred and eighty-five miles southeast of San Francisco and it augurs well for the success of the cannery that nearly every citizen in the place has taken stock in the enterprise. In employing the necessary help, preference has been given to local residents, and property in the town is already rising in value with indications that quite a little boom will be given to San Luis Obispo county by the success of the enterprise. It is worth noting that the chefs of the first-class restaurants and large hotels of San Francisco have tested the product of the cannery and have become so enthusiastic as to promise regular orders and a place for abalones on the bill of fare. Like oysters, abalones are good any way, fried, stewed or in fritters. An abalone cocktail is an ideal appetizer, and for chowder, the abalone beats clams, "all hollow." Occasionally very valuable pearls are found in the interior of the abalone shell, equal in every respect to those found in the pearl oyster and due to the same cause. The company will take due care to secure these pearls, for which a ready market is assured.

STAGE

The Thrill That Never Came

Clyde Fitch of New York is principally noted for his industry. He is the most prolific of American playwrights, but of late he has betrayed pronounced symptoms of brain-fag. Indeed, after seeing "The Stubbornness of Geraldine" one is inclined to believe that the disorder has developed into paresis. It is hard to believe that the author of "Beau Brummel" was ever guilty of such anæmic dramatic writing as revealed in the play in which Mary Mannering is appearing at the Columbia. It is said that the men who are writing plays for New York audiences these days seek to produce one great thrill. They feel that if they can achieve that they have attained success. But it is usual to spring the thrill in the third act. I tolerated three acts of "The Subbornness of Geraldine," waiting patiently for the thrill that never came, and then I silently stole away muttering imprecations on the head of Clyde Fitch for having bored me through a whole evening. Perhaps the thrill comes in the fourth act. I needed it very much; almost as much as the unfortunate actress who actually fainted not for theatrical effect but in reality on Wednesday night, needed a stimulant, but I could not wait for the fourth act. The three acts had exhausted me. I felt that if the fourth act afforded a thrill that was as powerful as the concentrated thrills of three Pinero plays, six by Henry Arthur Jones and ten by Clyde Fitch, it would not compensate me for what I had endured through three acts of "The Stubbornness of Geraldine." They are the three talkiest acts that ever dragged their weary length along in this city, and there's not a line that rises to the dignity of an epigram in the three of them. If Mr. Fitch would confine himself to the writing of such plays he would never be threatened with brain-fag, even though he should turn them out to the capacity of his typewriter. It is not fair to criticise the work of Mary Mannering in the role of Geraldine Lang. However it may not be amiss to suggest that if she and the other young women of the company took lessons in enunciation from Mrs. Thomas Whiffen it would be easier for their audiences to comprehend just what Mr. Fitch was writing about.

Clyde Fitch Above the Realities

Clyde Fitch is evidently above bothering about mere realities, however fond he may be of realism, with his rocking ships and his trunk-set stages. How, I would like to know, would an impecunious count, in the second cabin at that, procure a fresh white rose the last day out on an Atlantic liner to lay in the steamer chair of his beloved? History explaineth not.

The Return of Stevens

Monday night's performance of "Wang" at the Tivoli had all the joyousness and good cheer of a family reunion. Edwin Stevens made his reappearance after more than a year's absence and was enthusiastically received by a large audience—the largest and most enthusiastic since Mascagni. On the stage there was a warmth of friendliness and good spirits that radiated over the footlights, and the popular actor's admirers, who occupied every seat, clapped and stamped until he was compelled to make a speech. "Wang" is probably the most congenial character in Stevens's comic opera repertory.

At the Orpheum

After witnessing such an inane and utterly meritless vaudeville sketch as "He, She and It," which Emily Lytton and William Gerald use as a pretext for the display of their talents, one wonders why people who are capable of writing meritorious trifles of that species are not engaged in supplying the demand for the vaudeville stage. The Orpheum has a fairly good show this week, but "He, She and It" is not a praiseworthy feature of it. The star of the week is Mr. James J. Corbett, formerly of Hayes Valley, who has developed into a clever monologue artist. Corbett tells some good stories, but the point of the stories lies in the fact that they are about Corbett and that he tells them. They are stories of some of his amusing adventures in the days when he was the champion pugilist. Corbett has a good sense of humor and he tells the stories well. Fisher and Carroll, the eccentric comedians are, next to Corbett, the big hit of this week's bill.

"Lover's Lane"

Ernest Hastings is always at his best in a character part. As a society lover he never quite satisfies, but when the lover is a "character" then Hastings never fails to please. "Lover's Lane" is charming in this Alcazar production, and gives one a very different idea of the Clyde Fitch drama from that we obtained when it was lately produced here by a road organization. The play is distinctly rural in its surroundings and characters, and the beautiful scenery is not a slight point in its makeup. The several pairs of lovers have their individual niche, and strike a sympathetic chord, in which the wild little transplanted orphan, Simplicity, introduces some striking notes. Oza Waldrop has the role of Simplicity, played by Millie James in the original New York production. I believe Miss Waldrop could please Broadway with her impersonation, which is strikingly natural. The cast as a whole is one which one would not ask to be changed in any particular. The fine drill of the stock is shown in the way in which not even a "walking" part is slighted. Osbourne, Fanny Young, Bacon, Miss Creighton and Miss Gordon all score. Fanny Young's reception, after her long absence, on Monday night was equal to a Roosevelt ovation.

"Jerome" and Perkins

Of a different cast from "Lover's Lane," though as distinctively rural, is "Jerome," the Grand attraction. Adapted from Mary Wilkins's story of the same name, the adaptor has managed to retain in the dialogue much of the peculiar Wilkins flavor that makes the New England writer so popular with magazine readers. "Jerome" has scenes with novel settings. The sitting-room in Squire Merritt's home, for instance, in the second act, is a duplicate of what one may still find in old New England farm houses, haircloth furniture and all. The third act has a startling mill wreck scene, not however of the buzz-saw drama order. There is the inevitable mortgage, without which a New England play would seem incomplete. The birthday party is one of the prettiest scenes that have been introduced into any play of late

Gets in Readiness for Glad Vacation Time

California Northwestern Railway Offers a Long List of Special Attractions

When the vacation season begins the California Northwestern Railway Company will be ready to make thousands happy. Its lines run through one of the most picturesque regions of the State, and every here and there are ideal places for rest and recreation. Lakes and mountain streams, cosy corners in beautiful valleys, comfortable farm houses, mineral springs, natural springs, camps in the wildwood, all these are offered, and each has the advantage of being only a short distance from the city. Only a small expenditure is needed for railway fares, and in each instance the other charges are very reasonable.

In conformance with its usual custom the California Northwestern has made elaborate preparations for the glad vacation time, as is evidenced by the handsome hundred-page booklet that it has just issued. This publication, "Vacation, 1903," gives a long list of places that take summer boarders, tells of the special attractions of each place and gives the rates by the week.

For campers, there are no end of attractions. Throughout Marin, Sonoma, Mendocino and Lake counties the climate is delightful and it is a pleasure to sleep in a tent. Along the Geuneville branch of the California Northwestern, paralleled by the picturesque Russian River, are many ideal spots for camps, the river affording good boating, bathing and fishing. One of the most beautiful places on this branch is Russian River Heights, one of the most charming spots in all the West.

The booklet contains much valuable information, and all who expect to make a vacation trip this summer will do well to supply themselves with a copy before making up their minds.

years. There is something about it that reminds one of Rosina Vokes's little plays, and Antoinette Walker as the Squire's daughter acts with a spirit that recalls the much-lamented Rosina. This is the first chance Miss Walker has had to show her ability, and she looks as pretty as a rose in her old-fashioned frocks and blonde curls. Mr. Perkins has the title part, a rural hero of old comedy build, and he invests it with interest. He is a modest hero, and lets the other characters have as much chance as himself for distinction. Gilbert Gardner as the villain is exceptionally good, and Fred Butler has an admirable part in Colonel Jack Lamson. H. D. Byers as the father of Lucina is also excellent.

That One Night Performance

"The Circus Belle," that had one appearance before a local audience, is not such an absurd thing as one would have imagined from its disastrous end. I have seen the manuscript of the musical comedy, the libretto of which was written by Frank Robinson and the music by several local composers, and it reads very well. It is clever, and the lyrics are catchy and bright. But the first performance was such an awful fiasco that it is doubtful if the "Belle" will ever secure another metropolitan production. It didn't get half a chance on that first night, for the chorus had been so hastily drilled that it fell down on its first number and that started the audience to guying the show. The chaffing kept up until the final curtain. Then the prima donna, who was a young woman of seven years' stage experience, unfortunately stumbled on her entrance and that gave the audience another cue. It was a foolhardy thing for a manager to put on a half-trained company at a theatre like the Republic, and few productions could have survived the ordeal. But "The Circus Belle" is a good musical comedy. It may get another chance some day, on the road if not in town.

Dillon Goes to the Grand

Gerald Dillon, the veteran press agent, has transferred his services from the Belasco & Mayer theatres to the Grand Opera House, and he will soon begin the booming of the Rogers Brothers' attractions. The importance of the press agent as a factor for success in the theatrical business is becoming more generally recognized every day. However the industrious and clever press agent is often entitled to credit he does not receive. He creates reputations for players and playwrights, and stimulates popular interest in performances that otherwise would have received little attention. The only successful press agents are those that have the confidence of the critics and of the newspapers with whom they deal. Critics and newspapers, like the people, can be fooled, but not all the time. The sensible press agent is a candid one, who has had newspaper experience and who, like the trained reporter, has a "nose for news." Mr. Dillon is of this class, and the management of the Grand should be felicitated upon having secured his services. He handled the press work for Will Greenbaum during the past season, and he distinguished himself during the last Grau grand opera season by his work in behalf of the famous impresario and his stars.

The last concert of the present season of the Loring Club will be given in the Theatre Republic next Thursday evening. The club has engaged Mlle. Antonia Dolores (Trebelli), who, in addition to singing the important solo part in Schubert's "The Almighty," which is written for soprano solo and male voice chorus with the accompaniments of orchestra, piano and organ, will also sing three groups of songs. There will be several other good numbers.

Mr. H. B. Pasmore will give a pupils' invitational concert at Y. M. C. A. Auditorium next Wednesday evening. The program embraces songs by Schumann, Mendelssohn, Massenet, arias by Handel and Meyerbeer and part songs by Garrett, Arthur Fickenscher and John Harraden Pratt; also "The Night," by Rheinberger, with flute, violin, viola, cello, and piano accompaniment.

Adelaide Birchler, who will debut at the Orpheum next week, is a contralto of local renown. She has sung in church choirs, and also appeared at some of the Pasmore concerts.

Connoisseurs of perfect goods appreciate "Jesse Moore" Whiskey for its purity and delightful flavor. It is without a peer.

There is no more refreshing drink at this season than a high-ball of Chapin & Gore

The new season of the California theatre will open on May twenty-fifth with "The Runaway Girl." When Alice Neilsen was last at the Columbia, the one member of her company who made a notable hit was John Slavin, "the little fellow of the trio of comedians." From the first night he won unbounded popularity and his comedy work was the talk of the town. This same John Slavin comes to the California as a member of the Augustin Daly Musical Comedy Company which is to present the Daly musical pieces here for a season of eight weeks. Slavin is one of the highest salaried comedians on the stage.

ARIF SAVAY, the High Priest of the Amritist Society

Mr. Arif Savay, the editor of that brilliant journal, The Iconoclast, and high priest of the Amritist Society, of which that paper is the official organ, will deliver a series of lectures in this city on interesting topics. The first will be given at the Alhambra theatre tomorrow (Sunday) night, May seventeenth, and the subject will be "Success." This lecture will be free to the public, and tickets can be had on application to the office of the society, Room 306, Parrott building, at Kohler & Chase's, and at the theatre on the evening of the lecture. There will be no collection taken up, nor fee of any kind, as this lecture is simply to introduce Mr. Savay to the public. Other lectures will be delivered on Sunday nights at Steinway hall, and the prices for these will be one dollar for a course of three, and general admission fifty cents. The subjects of these lectures will be announced later. Mr. Savay is an American by birth, but descended from one of the royal families of India.

The recent productions of "The Bells of Corneville" for the benefit of the Presentation Convent at the Native Sons' hall, and in Berkeley, were so successful that a repetition has been demanded. Native Sons' hall was so crowded that many were unable to see the pretty opera when given here, and it is to satisfy the demand that another production will be given some time near the end of the month. Three of Mr. Joseph Greven's pupils—Mrs. Lenore Greven as Germaine, J. Beatty as Grenicheux and F. W. Huber as Gaspard—scored hits in the production.

Mary Hampton in a playlet comes soon to the Orpheum. Mary has had a good rest since her last essay here as leading lady at the Alcazar. She went to the Alcazar, it will be remembered, from the Frawleys, the step being taken shortly after the famous war of the three Marys—Van Buren, Scott and Hampton.

That the public likes good music better than trash is proved by the manner in which the trio from "Faust" is received at the California this week. It is injected into "Town Topics" and on Monday night had to be repeated to satisfy the audience.

Homer Henley will sing with the "Heartsease" sextet at the Alcazar next week. He sang in the Henry Miller production of the play.

Features of Next Week's Bills

Mary Mannering in "The Stubbornness of Geraldine" will remain another week at the Columbia; Wednesday and Saturday matinees.

The special summer engagement of the popular actor, White Whittlesey, begins at the Alcazar in the romantic comedy, "Heartsease." From the time that he was coached by David Belasco for the Greek play, "Electra," Mr. Whittlesey's advancement has been rapid. He has supported E. H. Sothern, Julia Arthur, Ada Rehan and Henrietta Crosman and gained distinction in Augustin Daly's company. Next season he is to appear in the great revival of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" which Nat C. Goodwin undertakes at the Knickerbocker, New York. In the meantime the Alcazar will have him for awhile.

In the revival of "On The Quiet" at the Grand Walter Perkins will be given opportunity to compare his work with that of William Collier. The play itself is a succession of laughable complications, resulting from the conditions imposed by a will and the entanglements of a love affair between the hero and heroine. The scenery is all modern and the last act represents the yacht Coryphee.

"Wang" will remain at the Tivoli, its run being good for several weeks. "El Capitan" will come next.

The statuesque beauty, Helene Montrose, is going to sing "Rosey Posey" on Monday night at Fischer's. "Fiddle-dee-dee" is too popular to take off the boards, though "Twirly-Whirly" is almost ready for production.

The Whitney brothers, composers of the "Mosquito's Parade" and other popular music, will begin a limited engagement at the Orpheum in a novel act, including a musical stair-case, a collection of water pitchers from which "Mr. Dooley" is extracted, a base-burner in full blast, filled with chimes, and xylophones concealed in blackboards. The brothers Freydo, expert and clever acrobats imported direct from the Circus Busch in Berlin, will be new. Martini and Max Millian will also be new. Martini is an expert conjurer and performer at legerdemain while his partner, with clever comedy, exposes every trick. Miss Adelaide Birchler, a contralto of great richness of voice and thorough schooling, will make her vaudeville debut. Corbett will stay another week.

At the Chutes the newcomers will include Athan, Wilson and Clarke, comedy sketch artists, Zarelli, silver wire walker, and Katherine Fuller, mezzo-soprano. The Wilson family will remain. Ella Burt will coast the Chutes on a bicycle every afternoon and evening after the performance in the theatre. The original Pepper Ghost Show, direct from London, is the latest novelty at the Chutes. —The Playgoer

A Notable Function

The Presidential visit was made the occasion of several dinners and receptions, among which a notable and most pleasant one was the breakfast given by the Pacific States Mining and Investment Company to its friends and patrons. The offices of the company at 326 Post street were converted on short notice into a banqueting hall, being spacious enough to accommodate all the guests and leave room to spare. The breakfast was timed to occur immediately after the unveiling of the monument in Union Square, commemorative of Dewey's victory at Manila Bay on May 1, 1898. The windows of the offices of the Pacific States Mining and Investment Company are immediately opposite the monument, at the distance of not more than one hundred feet, and they also faced the triumphal arch so that the guests enjoyed a splendid view of the ceremonies.

The menu at the breakfast was a triumph of culinary art and included as a novelty "Abalone soup," the abalones being provided by the Abalone Packing Company from the cannery at Cayucos, just completed and now in active operation. The Abalone Packing Company is one of the many successful promotions effected by the Pacific States Mining and Investment Company. Baron W. E. von Johannsen, secretary of the company, was the host and acquitted himself to admiration, maintaining his reputation for bonhomie and geniality. The following was the menu: Canape of caviar, oysters on the half shell, abalone soup, terrapin a la Maryland, vol au vent of sweetbreads, Roosevelt punch, spring chicken, German sauce, pate de fois gras en gelee, Romaine salad, dessert, biscuit glace, cakes, almonds, pecans, candies, cafe noir, liqueurs. The breakfast was served by the Ludwig Catering Company of San Francisco. Among those who accepted invitations were: Colonel and Mrs. Charles L. Pierce, Rev. Father Sebastian Dabovich, Miss Mary Dabovich, Mr. and Mrs. Clement Wilder, Mrs. H. M. Parker, Dr. H. R. Arndt, Paul Freygang, W. A. Richardson, James A. Devoto, T. J. Crowley, Miss Ethel Hunt, J. Bacheller's Latest Romance

It is an old saying that one must spoil two children in experimenting before being competent to bring up the third properly. It would be too much to say that Irving Bacheller's two previous novels are spoiled brain-children, but his third, "Darrell of the Blessed Isles," is decidedly the best of the trio. Like those of its predecessors, the scene is laid in the St. Lawrence Valley, in the early years of its settlement, and like them also, the interest centres about the relations of a quaint, elderly character and a growing youth, but Darrell is neither Eben Holden nor D'ri in a new costume. On the contrary, he is altogether unique and original, and more lovable than either, which is saying much. If the advent of Willie, carried in a basket on the back of "Uncle Eb," attracted such wide attention, what is to be said of the little chap in this latest book, who comes to the Allen homestead strapped upon a little red sled drawn by a dog which had been stolen from the farmer some time previous? It is when this waif, named Sidney Trove and adopted by the childless couple to whom he is so strangely brought, has reached the age of fifteen or thereabouts that Darrell, the traveling clock tinker, makes his appearance, and the friendship which springs up on the moment is continued through life. Rhoderick Darrell is a man of parts, mainly self-educated. He is without family connection, and though far from being a recluse, is to some extent a solitary man. He is a student of Shakespeare, Milton and the classic authors, and in the pursuit of his calling, which leads him over solitary roads and through the silent woods, is in the habit of beguiling his time by reciting long passages from his favorites. The result of this pastime is that he has unconsciously adopted the phraseology of the seventeenth century, and this, with his slight flavor of Irish brogue and his own native wit and humorous philosophy, adds to the charm of his personality. In his first chance meeting with Sidney, Darrell introduces the lad to Shakespeare, and rouses his ambition. Later, when Sidney goes to the neighboring town of Hillsdale, in the pursuit of an education, the intercourse is renewed in the oddest and quaintest place, the workshop of the clock mender, where, surrounded by tools and timepieces, he learns the way to the "Blessed Isles of Imagination," where one may have all things for the asking. In addition to Rhoderick Darrell, who easily claims precedence, there are a number of other quaint characters such as are to be found only in primitive settlements, and the pictures of life in the middle of the nineteenth century are enriched by their preservation. "Working his way" was not, in those days, accomplished through the assistance of a scholarship in athletics, and Sidney's expense account for a week should make the modern luxurious youth sit up and make comparisons. What a district school was made under the oversight of a good teacher is another picture, and the almost forgotten industry of buying bands of cattle to dispose of on the hoof, leading and driving, and finding a market without the assistance of railroad or telegraph, is also recalled. There is a pretty love story which comes to a proper end, though the road is not without ruts, and the mystery of Sidney's ancestry and advent, as well as the explanation of some of Darrell's peculiarities of life, are well hidden till the end. It is a foregone conclusion that this book will duplicate the success of "Eben Holden," and "Darrell of the Blessed Isles" will have a stage presentation. But Darrell is so altogether natural and lovable, that the demonstration which is sure to greet him will be in direct contrast to that occasioned by recent presentations of stage Irishmen. Lothrop, who was the publisher of Mr. Bacheller's previous book, also stands sponsor for this one.

"A Joyous Heart"

Vella Carruthers ought to have been a most pathetic and melancholy child and a grief-stricken maiden and mother. When she was an infant of but a few months of age, her father was killed in an accident, and her beautiful young mother died because she did not care to live. The baby went to the care of distant relatives, her only kin, strange, silent, loveless people, and later on the little girl was sent to boarding schools. She should have, by all precedent, wept and grieved and fallen into an early decline, but Vella had a "joyous heart." She was glad to be alive—and when the time came, glad to die. Though the time in which the scenes of "A Joyous Heart" are set was just before, during, and after the Civil War, and the location the middle region of Tennessee, the plot deals with the fortunes of the Osborne family rather than with that of the Union or Confederacy, and though the battle of Murfreesboro was fought so near at hand that the homsstead was used as a hospital for some of the wounded Confederates, there is very little of the carnage dragged across the pages of the book. The Osborne family consisted of a widowed step-mother, a transplanted Puritan, born two hundred years too late; Fanny, young, cynical and self-seeking, and Elmore, headstrong, self-confident, and as egotistic as his sister, in a different way There is an uncle, Bourke Osborne, "once the handsomest man, the best dancer and the deadliest shot in the county, and once, you may be sure, loved of ladies and imitated of youth," but now old in middle age and crippled by rheumatism. Elmore Osborne immediately falls in love with Vella, but his narrow, jealous nature, which demands that the women of his household shall hold themselves a little higher than the angels, does not foreordain happiness to her, or to any other woman who might become his wife. Since he makes his beginning by imagining that Vella has become in some intangible, invisible way, besmirched through having spent a year in Philadelphia, the rest may be left to the imagination of those who do not discover more for themselves by reading. Perhaps no more sorrowful history has ever been conceived, but it is only at the end, when one takes a backward glance, that this is realized, for the bright, sunny nature of the girl and woman pervades everything. Through an ill-assorted marriage, and early widowhood, a motherhood which should have been, by all human rule, a long grief, and in the end, when life seemed at last to promise happiness, the faithlessness of another, Vella kept courage, and there may be "here and there hearts to live their lives out a little stronger, possessing something more of sorely needed fortitude and cheer, because of the blithe harmony of the most ill-fated soul they have ever known," even though the acquaintance be made only through the perusal of this optimistic story, in the days when pessimism and dissatisfaction is the rule. Readers of the higher class of magazines has long since met Viola Roseboro' through the medium of her short stories, and they will not regret her essay into the field of the novelist. ["A Joyous Heart" is published by McClure, Phillips & Co.]

Another Braddon Novel Coming

"Miss Braddon" is about to publish another novel, after a silence of several years, but the event will not be so much of a sensation as the recrudescence of Augusta Evans, since the English writer has not been in retirement for anything like the the sixteen years which marked the lapse of time since the last book of Augusta Evans before "The Speckled Bird" made its appearance. "Miss Braddon," who is Mrs. Mary Maxwell, but who prefers to keep her two characters entirely separate, is well past her middle sixties, and she has published more than sixty successful novels. Her literary career began early, and her reputation was made by "Lady Audley's Secret," which made its appearance when she was twenty-five, and is today more alive than some of the best-sellers of this time last year. Although it was as a "sensational novelist" that "Miss Braddon" made her reputation, her later works are not to be classed in that category. In her character of Mrs. Maxwell, the writer takes no interest in "Miss Braddon's" novels, and neither talks of them herself nor cares to hear them discussed. "Miss Braddon" is equally unconcerned about the social duties of Mrs. Maxwell, who rejoices that the only picture of "Miss Braddon" that was ever printed was taken so long ago that no one would now recognize it. Probably no other woman has made so much money out of her books as has "Miss Braddon." Her business affairs are in the hands of her son, and she usually receives twenty thousand dollars for the English book rights of her novels and as much more for serial rights. She has lost count of the number of editions into which "Lady Audley's Secret" has passed, but there have been over fifty. More than three million copies of her works have been sold in the cheap edition alone, and there is no abatement of their popularity. —The Bookworm

With the Money Makers

To Increase Its Capital

The latest move of the directors of the Bank of California is to call a meeting of the shareholders on Wednesday, July 15, to consider a proposition to increase the capital stock of the institution from $2,000,000, composed of 20,000 shares of a par value of $100 each, to $3,000,000 with 30,000 shares of $100 each, and as a close canvass among the shareholders has already been made by the directors, it is almost an assured fact that the proposition will be carried. The new shares will be offered to stockholders at $300 per share in the proportion of one share for each two shares owned; in this way $3,000,000 will be added to the capital and surplus of the bank. With the undivided profits which amount to something like $3,750,000 the bank will have a capital on which to transact business in the neighborhood of $10,000,000.

Industrial Shares in Favor

Industrial shares have shown a fair measure of activity during the week and there has been comparatively little fluctuation in prices. Generally speaking investors are showing a little more partiality to railroad and manufacturing stocks than for some time past. These securities are regarded as being of the most substantial character and more likely to be regular dividend payers at no distant day. Stocks of manufacturing corporations are in a better position today, than at any time in the history of the State, because of the solution of the fuel problem. This has been the bugbear in the pathway of California manufacturing industries ever since the State was admitted into the Union. But now, with the rapid development of electric power and the increasing yield of crude petroleum, the manifold resources of the State can be utilized at home at a low cost of production. This has increased the manufacturing industries and the shares of stock in these corporations are being eagerly sought for by investors. Speculative traffic in shares during the week has been quite general in character but for two or three days lighting shares held the boards as centres of attraction. The primary cause of this activity in gas stocks, as far as can be learned, was solely due to a revival of the reports that Eastern capital was still seeking to secure control of the electric and gas lighting plants in the city. Whether anything of a definite character has transpired since the alleged renewal of the option on the property and plant of the Independent Light and Power Company cannot of course be known except to the parties immediately interested. This, however, has not interfered with speculative interests alternately booming and depressing the price of shares of the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company. As that company has the most extensive producing plant in the city, it is claimed that any combination would of necessity be compelled to purchase this plant in order to head off competition. On the other hand it is stated by those who are in a position to know that even though the Independent and other companies might be absorbed, the new owners would be totally indifferent as to the existence of the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company. During the early part of the week the shares of the latter company were held quite steady for a brief period, but it was impossible to stop the downward tendency in prices. Ever since the first reports of prospective combinations, operators and dealers in shares have been eagerly watching for some possible fulfillment of speculative rumors, until now with the lapse of time and no development, it takes more than mere rumor to uphold prices to the level to which interested parties force them. This accounts for the downward tendency in prices at the present time. San Francisco Gas & Electric shares have eased off a little each day so that now $55 and $56 is about a full price with buyers rather backward and not inclined to handle the stock except in small quantities. The shares of the Pacific Gas Improvement Company have also experienced a depressing influence for the same reasons as set forth in the foregoing paragraphs. The decline in price has not been very great, but it has been sufficient to plainly show the weakness of the situation. Equitable shares have been selling in a small way from $4.50 and $4.75, the latter for the most part being the asking figure. Mutual Electric Light has been steady at $9 and Pacific Lighting Company has been held at $56.50, although buyers have been loath to offer more than $55.75. While it is known that negotiations and conferences have been held relative to possible combinations of local lighting interests it is evident that nothing definite has been accomplished and apparently there is little probability of any tangible result being reached. Street rumors make many claims for both sides but it seems to be very difficult to effect any settlement whereby conflicting interests can be satisfied, meanwhile the war in gas rates goes merrily on. Powder stocks hav shown very little change during the week, although Giant has developed a strength which by some was wholly unexpected. Sellers are demanding $71 and $72 per share for small parcels, but buyers are rather backward and do not seem inclined to offer more than $70. This strength is doubtless due to the reports of prospective consolidation of interests of the powder companies controlling the local field. Spring Valley Water shares have been selling slowly, the lots changing hands being of small proportions. Sellers are asking $84.50 to $85, but there are few buyers who are willing to pay more than $84 as a maximum figure. Oceanic Steamship shares are held quite steady with $9 as the best bid, and $10 as asking price. These prices seem very low for stock upon which $100 per share has been paid in. It is probable, however, that after reorganization the securities of the company may develop a high standard of valuation. Bank of California shares have taken another leap upward and $625 per share is now the asking price. There have been no sales at this figure, but with the persistant demands of buyers and the firmness of sellers it is not improbable that this will be the market value before long. Sales of bonds have been fairly extensive and while some Spring Valley 4 per cents have changed hands the bulk of transactions has been in electric lighting and railway securities.

—The Financier.

The May issue of the Pacific States Investor is especially strong in editorial and original articles, one of which will be read with general interest on account of its reference to the financial stringency which some believe to be impending. The Central American situation receives masterly treatment in the editorial columns, and the article dealing with illumination of interiors will be read with avidity by all who recognize that in great cities this is the most important problem of the time and the one which promises the richest rewards for solution. The "Notes by the Way" are timely, pertinent and invaluable to investors.

DIRECTORS

E. P. Heald S. C. Denson Bert Schlesinger W. F. Kane
S. C. Wright Col. F. G. Head A. E. Hall

If you are looking for a conservative investment in Tonopah mining stock look into the merits of the Princess Maude Gold Mining Company; they have four claims in the now famous Lone Mountain District; have a well-defined ledge cropping on the surface that carries high values; are sinking a shaft on the ledge and with every foot in depth gained the ledge is getting larger and the ore richer.

The Superintendent's latest report states that the ledge is now eight feet wide, and of six assays taken across the ledge the average was over $100 per ton, while some of the samples gave returns of over $450.

The property was incorporated under the laws of Nevada for 1,000,000 shares of a par value of $1 each. 400,000 of these shares have been set aside for development purposes, and only so much of this stock will be sold as will be absolutely necessary to place the property on a paying basis.

You will never have to pay assessments on this stock, as it is non-assessable.

The remainder of the first block of treasury stock is offered at 25 cents per share.

This is a conservative mining proposition, with conservative men behind it; is being developed solely on its merits and the stock will not remain long at its present price.

The Stewart Concert

One man to thirteen women was the proportion of vocalists at the pupils' concert of Dr. H. J. Stewart last week. The man was Mr. William Hogg, who gave an uncommonly good rendition of Vulcan's song from Gounod's "Philemon et Baucis." Of the ladies who furnished the remainder of the long entertainment, the first and last on the program were perhaps the best of the baker's dozen. Miss Camille Frank had the opening number, three songs from Felitz's "Schongetlein." Miss Frank has a mellow voice which she uses with sympathy and expression. At the end of the program came Mrs. Wallace Wheaton Briggs, who had two striking Chadwick songs which she rendered with good spirit. Mrs. Briggs's articulation was excellent and she put life and spirit into her rendition. Mrs. E. J. Jolly had a trying Weber number with which she struggled bravely; she was much better in the song which she gave as an encore. Miss Adele Shaw has a piquant manner, and was extremely pleasing in "A Woodland Madrigal." Mrs. Carrie McLaine Mason committed many vocal and other sins in Liszt's "Lorelei," not the least of which was her deplorable pronunciation of German. Mrs. Florence Darby was not adequate to the requirements of her Verdi aria. I have heard Mrs. L. Snider Johnson in better voice, but she was very effective in the song composed for and dedicated to herself by Dr. Stewart, "A Winter Love Song." Miss Helen Pettigrew was pleasing in her two program numbers, "Si mes vers avaient des ailes" and Bemberg's Venetian Serenade. Her voice is pure and she sings intelligently. The concert opened with two movements from Mozart's Sonata in A, violin Mr. Nathan Landsberger and piano Dr. Stewart. At the close of the vocal numbers the same artists gave the minuet and allegro from Beethoven's Sonata in G, both selections being worth going a long way to listen to. Dr. Stewart accompanied the pupils' songs on the piano

The Sundland Pupil Recital

One of the most interesting pupil recitals I have ever attended was that of Mr. Abraham Sundland last Friday night. Maple hall was scarcely large enough to accommodate the large audience, and many were compelled to stand during the entire program. It was, however, worth standing through, for the numbers were all interesting and well-chosen. The pupils taking part ranged from Sadie Epstein, a tiny tot of perhaps seven years, to advanced players. The program began with simple selections rendered by the children, and ended with a brilliant bolero by Moszkowski, executed by the two Millers, Annie and Mary. All of the players showed a fine knowledge of the technique of piano-playing. Mr. Sundland has always ranked among the most scholarly of our pianists, and his pupils have managed to acquire much of that brilliancy which his own work shows. While one cannot mention individually every participant in a public recital of this kind, still I cannot refrain from mentioning the number of little Mildred Abraham, who played the Mozart rondo in D major. This little girl played with less dash than some of the others, but she showed a remarkable grasp of her theme, and much sympathy of interpretation. Madeleine O'Neill and Annie Miller, of the older girls, played their numbers with almost Hofmann-like elan. The program in full was: Dance of the Gnomes, Jean Faber, Helen and Rena Stuparich; Slumber Song, The Fair, Gurlitt, Sadie Epstein; Gipsy Rondo, Haydn, Fred Bissinger; Rondo, D major, Mozart, Mildred Abraham; Gavotte, Godard, The Butterfly, Lavallee, Mary Miller; Valse, Durand, Rena Stuparich; Turkish March, Beethoven-Rubinstein, Valse, op. 34, Moszkowski, Madeleine O'Neill; Tannhauser March, Wagner-Liszt, Annie Miller; 'cello solo, "Triste," "Joyeuse," Squire, Fred Bissinger (pupil of Mr. Theodore Mansfeldt), accompanied by Rena Stuparich; Polonaise, Rogers, Kitty Lichtenstein; Tarantelle, Sydney Smith,

Comic Opera, Once and Now

"It may sound pessimistic," writes Lewis M. Isaacs in the current Bookman, "to say that the golden age of operetta is gone; but when, after considering the present outlook of musical comedies and farces, one turns back thirty years and sees how a former generation fared in this particular, the remark seems justified by the facts. * * * Can public taste have so degenerated as to demand pieces of the calibre of The Silver Slipper in preference to the kind of a generation ago? It is improbable that the public have made a deliberate choice. A more reasonable explanation of the evolutionary phenomena is the inconstancy of the general public on whose favor this genre of entertainment is mainly dependent for its existence. They have an insatiable desire for something new. * * * If the public at large are properly prepared for it, there can be no doubt of the successful issue of an extensive revival of operetta." This is what I have often asserted. The operas of Offenbach, Lecocq, Audran and Planquette could, I am sure, be revived and if well produced, with clever artists in the principal roles, would soon dash from their pinnacle of popularity the trash that now masquerades under the name of comic opera. The German comic operas and some of Gilbert and Sullivan's are worthy of being included in such a revival. One can look back ten years or so to the time when the Tivoli was the home of real comic opera, and the productions always drew crowded houses. Of course there are no Alice Oates's, Aimees and Judics now, but there might be some to rise and take the place of those famous artistes. The Tivoli managed to secure substitutes for those stars, and they were not bad substitutes, either. Let us pray for the revival that Mr. Isaacs wishes.

Irving Institute Commencement

The graduating exercises of Irving Institute will occur next Thursday evening in Golden Gate hall, and a very fine program will be their accompaniment. Hermann Genss will render a Schubert march and other piano numbers will be given, by Margaret Vernet Weinmann, Eleanor Sybil Esther McLennan, Agnes Maud Heywood, Josephine Olive Fairchild, Mary France McDermott and Frances Alice Graeter. There will also be songs, solos and chorus, and the Rt. Rev. Bishop Nichols will award the diplomas.

At Steinway hall on the evening of May twenty-ninth pupils of Mrs. Marriner Campbell will present Pergolesi's "Stabat Mater." This work is rarely produced because of its difficulties in vocalization and its presentation is therefore of unusual interest.

Homer Henley, Herbert Williams, Mrs. Scott-Basford, Mrs. Marian E. B. Robinson, Mrs. Carpeneto-Mead and Miss Ruth Weston will take part in the production of S. Coleridge Taylor's "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast," at Maple hall next Tuesday evening. This work will be a complete novelty here. The second part of the program to be rendered at this first concert of the Barton Choral will consist of songs and part-songs composed by Gerard Barton. Mr. Barton, a recent comer among us, is a composer of rare ability whose songs have been given on various programs lately. His wife is a pianiste and accompanist of rare excellence.

At the U. C. Alumni reception on Wednesday night at the Hopkins an orchestral promenade concert under Henry Heyman's direction was a pleasing feature of the entertainment provided for the guests.

Miss Goodsell's Pupil Recital

Last Saturday evening, at the residence of Mrs. W. F. Shattuck, 2821 Steiner street, Miss Dorothy Goodsell's pupils gave a delightful recital. Sixteen pupils participated in the program, some coming from Palo Alto, Redwood City, Oakland and Berkeley to join the San Francisco representatives. Miss Goodsell has a studio in each of those places. The program was well rendered, ease and freedom in breathing and clear, distinct articulation being particularly commendable in the singers. The program was: Nazareth, Gounod, Mr. Shattuck; The Woodpecker, Mighty lak a Rose, Nevin, Miss Foster; Out in the Open Meadow, Stewart, Miss Upham; Japanese Love Song, Carrington, Mrs. Hastings; O! Love Divine, Geo. Nevin, Saphic Ode, Brahms, Mrs. Meek; A Song of Spring, Neidlinger, Mrs. Stubenrauch; Just for Today, Abbott, Little One a-Cryin', Speaks, Miss Kirkpatrick; Songs My Mother Taught Me, Dvorak, Villanelle, Dell 'Acqua, Miss E. The Antonia Dolores (Trebelli) Concerts

The first of the Dolores concerts will take place next Wednesday night at the Alhambra. The program is interesting and varied and begins with a group of Italian songs—"Star Vicino" by Salvator Rosa, "Se Florindo" by Scarlatti, and "Per La Gloria" by Buononcini. A group of songs in English follows, consisting of "May Dew" by Bennett, "The Tear" by Rubinstein, and "Oh, Tell Me, Nightingale" by Liza Lehmann. French composers are represented by a Russian Song of Paladile's, and a serenade by Massenet. The operatic numbers include a recitative and aria from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba," the Shadow Dance from "Dinorah," and the prayer from "La Tosca." By special request the beautiful English song, "Hear the Gentle Lark," with flute obligato played by Louis Neubauer of the Tivoli orchestra, has been added to the program. The sale of seats will open Monday morning at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, where tickets may be purchased for all three concerts. The Saturday afternoon concert will be the only matinee at which Dolores will sing in the city. The Sunday night concert will be devoted to sacred music and special request numbers. Requests for any particular numbers should be sent to Will L. Greenbaum.

At Philomath Club's annual meeting (board of directors) on Monday afternoon Mrs. Hume read her paper on "The Bible as Literature," and Miss Pauline Hess gave two recitations. Her selections were the favorite "Oh, Sir" and "A Telephone Conversation" which were very cleverly rendered, the reader showing considrable dramatic talent.

A PLEASANT LAXATIVE NOT INTOXICATING

Other People's Ideas

From "Knight of Gwynne," by Charles Lever:

When Cupid is bankrupt, there is no use in attempting to patch up his affairs by any composition with the creditors.

The most insufferable assumption of superiority is never half so chilling in its effect upon underbred people as the calm quietude of good manners.

Daly: I know of no cruelty in savage life that has not its counterpart amid our civilization, and for the rude virtues that are nurtured there, they are never warmed into existence by the hotbed of selfishness.

Daly: When people talk of suffering virtue, believe me, the element of courage must be wanting; but where the stout heart unites with the good cause success will come at last.

It is a fact not only well worthy of mention, but pregnant with its own instruction, that persons who have long enjoyed all the advantages of elevated social position better support the reverses which condemn them to humble and narrow fortunes, than do the vulgar-minded, when, by any sudden caprice of the goddess, they are raised to a conspicuous and distinguished elevation.

Miss Daly: I hate pity. It is like a recommendation to mercy after the sentence of an unjust judge.

From "The Mystery of Orcival," by Gaboriau:

Hector: Life is only a succession of broken friendships. What is a friend, after all? One who can and ought to serve you. Ability consists in breaking with people when they cease to be useful to you.

There are times when the armor of hypocrisy becomes so burdensome that one is forced, cost what it may, to throw it off if only for an instant.

The logic of life, alas, fatally enchains all our determinations to each other. Often an indifferent action, little wrongful in itself, is the beginning of an atrocious crime. Each of our new resolutions depends upon those which have preceded it, and is their logical sequence just as the sum-total is the product of the added figures. Woe to him who, being seized with a dizziness at the brink of the abyss, does not fly as fast as possible, without turning his head; for soon yielding to an irresistible attraction, he approaches, braves the danger, slips, and is lost. Whatever thereafter he does or attempts he will roll down the faster, until he reaches the very bottom of the gulf.

From "The Forest Lovers," by Maurice Hewlett:

Friar Bonaccord: Let me tell you this, from a man who knows what he is talking about, that if you think to escape them by neglecting them, you are going the devil's way to work. If you wish them to let you alone, speak them fair, drop easily to your knee, be a hand-kisser, a cushion-disposer, a goer on your toes. They will think you are a lover and shrug you away. Our Provincial Boasting

Pertinent to the general aftermath of the Roosevelt visit is the question whether it is not high time to quit boasting about our hospitality. We invariably receive our notable visitors with chest and glad-hand simultaneously extended, and scarcely do we bid them welcome before we begin extolling our generous hospitality. When the State plays the part of a host it should conform to the same rules of politeness that govern the individual in like circumstances. No gentleman ever bores his guest with a long dissertation on the reputation that he has achieved for hospitality. A man's hospitality speaks for itself, and there is no need of his impressing his guest with the quality of his graciousness by telling him about it. The ideal host acts as though he feels honored that he has the opportunity to appear in the role. Hospitality is most appreciated when the effort it involves is least accentuated. California became famous for hospitality in the early days of her history, when the owners of the old ranchos entertained with a lavishness that was almost royal. The spirit of munificence that stimulated the hosts of those days is now little more than a memory. The infusion of a little of the essence of Yankee thrift into the veins of the community has wrought a change in the temperament, and the consequence is that though we like to live up to the reputation of the founders of the State, and to that end make spectacular splurges on certain occasions, we cannot refrain from the Yankee habit of boasting of our virtues. It is evidence of our provincialism, and we should try to improve our manners in that respect.

The Roosevelt Progeny

Since President Roosevelt made it clearly understood to a certain class of writers that he did not wish the sayings and doings of his children, whether real or imaginary, to be turned into copy, there has come about the other extreme, in which "Teddy," "Archie," "Quentin" and "Kermit" figure in all sorts of burlesque adventures, such as awakening guests at the White House by appearing in their night gowns and emptying pitchers of water over the sleepers, taking flying leaps over the stair balusters and landing on the shoulders of diplomats, who are obliged to carry them about the grounds under penalty of having their ribs drummed by sturdy heels. Of course no one in America is quite foolish enough to accept the yarns, but the unwarranted indulgence with which the average parent treats his offspring is such that it will not be at all surprising to discover that foreigners, especially those who have come into contact with specimens of the ordinary type of Americanus Juveniles, will accept them as genuine. From what we know of the President and Mrs. Roosevelt in other connections, there is every reason to believe that they are gifted with at least ordinary common sense, and that the children are under as much restraint and discipline as can well be enforced in a household of healthy boys. The children whose parents happen to occupy the White House are not public characters. It is not their fault that their father is President, and they should not be made to suffer from it. The exploitation of "Baby McKee" during the Harrison administration was carried to such an excess that those who like to attribute obvious effects to obscure causes might give it place amongst those which have led to the so-called "race suicide." President Cleveland succeeded in keeping his children in the background, and to this day no authentic picture of them has ever been published. Even such malicious inventions as that the eldest child was deformed, idiotic, and a deaf mute drew neither contradiction nor denial, nor, what was probably the thing aimed at, a chance to interview the dwellers in the nursery. The Roosevelt children are older, and not so easily secluded, but they are entitled to protection from the antics of the clown journalists.

The Charges Against Wood

During one of his speeches in this city President Roosevelt took occasion to commend the work of his friend General Leonard Wood. President Roosevelt is as loyal to his friends as was General Grant, and like General Grant he will no doubt be willing to shield an undeserving friend from harm. It is a noble sentiment that prompts a man to be steadfast in his friendship even when all claims upon him have been forfeited by betrayal of confidence. But unfortunately the State often suffers through the friendship of individuals. The loyalty of a friend in a high place has saved many a corrupt official from the penalty that his misconduct incurred. General Wood, who was so highly complimented by President Roosevelt, has been under fire for months, and it has been pretty clearly proved that as Governor of Cuba he countenanced some very discreditable transactions. Moreover it appears that if it were not for his pull at Washington an investigation would have been held which might have resulted in some damaging disclosures. His record is badly clouded, and if he were jealous of his personal honor he would demand an investigation. The charges against him are accumulating. The latest scandal in which he is involved grew out of the publication by the North American Review in February, 1900, of an article attacking General Brooke's administration in Cuba at about the time when Wood supplanted Brooke in supreme command at Havana. The article attacked Brooke, the superior of General Wood, in the most unmeasured terms. The article was so plainly a violation of military decency and discipline that Secretary Root ordered General Wood by cable to call its author, Lieutenant Rucie, to account for it. Rucie was on General Wood's staff, and in consequence of the article he was removed from several commissions and offices in which, according to Wood, he was doing valuable work for the Military Government. Now it appears that Lieutenant Rucie was merely the nominal author of the article; that the real and responsible author was Leonard Wood. If this charge is true surely General Wood should be court-martialed, for he not only made an attack on a superior officer in order to supplant him but he concealed his part in the affair and permitted his partner, a subordinate, to be punished for it. The man who would do such a thing is unfit to be an officer of the United States Army.

Titles Abolished in Italy

There has been a wholesale housecleaning in the Italian Heraldic Office and all those titles which could not show a clean pedigree have been cleared off the books. This makes a clean sweep of the "Black" nobility, whose honors were conferred by the Popes. With them go those titles granted by the Kings of Naples, as well as all those bestowed by the fugitive and deposed Bourbons. Henceforth an Italian title, to be valid, has to come from the Italian King. At first sight this looks as if the industry of dealing in Italian titles for matrimonial purposes had received a knock-out blow, but when people who have money are willing to exchange it for a title, it is going to require more than a mere revocation to effect anything of an improvement. An Italian whose family once had a title will be in no worse condition than the French nobility under the Republic. Even if there is a prohibition against using the title in Italy, there can be nothing to prevent its being sported elsewhere. It may make the American rich father a little more cautious of the quality of a coronet he purchases for Mary Ann, but when an English Countess, supposed to be as infallible in detecting the real thing as a magnet is in differentiating iron filings from sand, can be deluded into accepting a coachman, even the decree of the Heraldic office will not protect the American heiress from the bootblack or barber. But there is no occasion to waste any great amount of sympathy on the victims of the swindles. Usually these marriages are simple matters of barter. Without the title the man would not be considered for a moment. Without the money, the woman would not even be glanced at. The marriages are generally "arranged" with reference to these matters alone and after an acquaintance of the briefest duration. What is really needed is some sort of insurance company which will make good the loss if the title is imperfect.

The Hypocrisy of Reform

It has been the experience of almost every large city in this country that the professional reformer is always more bold and reckless in his questionable practices than the practical politician who regards public office as a private snap. There has seldom been a Reform administration that has not made itself ridiculous by misdirected effort, or contemptible by cant and hypocrisy. The present Reform Administration of New York recently ordered that evidence be collected against gambling and disorderly houses. Policemen were detailed in plain clothes to collect the evidence, but instead of going to disorderly houses they visited the well-conducted palaces of sin to which they could not gain an entrance without an introduction, and the bills that they put in are a scandal to the Administration. Such items exploited by the newspapers as "two women, twenty-two dollars," "six rounds of refreshments for twenty inmates, ten dollars and eighty cents," "breakfast for two females, officer and self, four dollars and a half," point to systematic lewdness for its own sake. It appears that prosecution seldom followed these fleshly raids which are reminiscent of the Parkhurst excursions into the haunts of vice, and the inference is that public decency as represented by the police was a huge joke. Never in the reign of Tammany did an Administration in New York fly in the face of decency as did the police detailed by Mayor Low to gather evidence against disorderly houses. And never in the days of Buckley did corrupt officials carry on their nefarious enterprises with the boldness that has characterized the conduct of some of the men that have served under Phelan and Schmitz.

The Eclipse of Miles

General Miles has ceased to be a thorn in the side of the Administration. Since the publication of his report on the outrages perpetrated by our soldiers in the Philippines he has been interviewed a few times but nobody has paid any attention to his utterances. General Miles has suffered eclipse. Having missed his opportunity in the Spanish war when all our soldiers were making records in the field, he is no longer taken seriously. A grumbling, scolding soldier cuts an awkward figure, and that is the role that General Miles has filled for several years. He achieved his exalted position in the army through political influence, passing over the heads of men who had rendered more conspicuous service to their country, and who were far more deserving of recognition. Yet he was not satisfied. He wished to become President and he proceeded to boom himself at the expense of others. As a consequence he made many enemies and soon lost prestige. He went to the Philippines on a political mission, and accepted the testimony of prejudiced natives as foundation for aspersions cast by him on his brother officers. He was ready to incline his eager ear to any yarn of army persecution that a native might tell, and consequently it was easy for him to gather material for his official report. No doubt he thought that it would so startle the War Department that Secretary Root would try to suppress it, and thereby give him the opportunity to censure the Administration. But Secretary Root promptly gave the report to the public, and that was the end of it. We all knew that outrages had been perpetrated in the Philippines. We do not think that our army is far more humane than the soldiery of other Christian countries, but we do not care to be reminded of its shortcomings by the disgruntled Commanding General.

The Suicide Cult

One of the questions occupying the attention of the statistician is the increase of suicide, and all sorts of absurd and far-fetched reasons are brought forward to account for the undeniable fact. The reason is not so obscure that it may be laid at the door of early strawberries or late peaches, for it is to be found in the modern plan of education, which places egotism and the ease of the individual above all else. The children who were subjected to the old-time "spank-cure" and made to assist in the household and farm labor were not given to shuffling off the mortal coil whenever every circumstance was not exactly to their liking. The modern youngster, who is coaxed and coddled and pleaded with, and who is sent to kindergarten to be amused, and lifted and carried through the grammar school with the least expenditure of labor on his own part, is not apt to develop much fortitude. The eclectic system, which permits the high school and university student to omit from his course anything that does not please his fancy, will not help him to imbibe any serious ideas with respect to duty, especially when, from the cradle, he has been emancipated from any task which was not primarily an amusement. With all the thorns removed from the roses, all the stones picked from the path, he never learns the satisfaction of overcoming obstacles. He is capable of a spectacular display before an admiring audience, but not of sustained effort, and the spectacle of a brawny football player crying over his defeat is a perfect picture of the way in which the modern man meets reverses. Instead of shutting his teeth, clinching his hands and going at it again, he gives up and bellows. For the slightest pain or physical inconvenience there is a resort to drugs, and for even so simple a matter as the extracting of a tooth, there is a demand for some anæsthetic. The number of children who put an end to their own lives is simply appalling, and the fact that they are so ready to throw themselves overboard from the ferryboat because they are forbidden to attend the theatre, or resort to firearms unless they are free to attend the Chutes, is not so much an evidence of the harsh and cruel treatment of the parents as it is of the incorrigibility of the children. It is incontestible proof that they have been sadly in need of restraint and that it has not been applied in time. The man who commits suicide because he has failed in business, and is not willing to begin at the bottom, has little if any compunction about leaving his wife and children to struggle along as best they can. He thinks only of himself and his own ease. The woman who resorts to carbolic acid is apt to be spiteful, and to be so taken up with the gratification of her temper, and in making things as unpleasant as possible for others, that for the moment she forgets her own sufferings in the contemplation of the annoyance she can cause. The forger or embezzler gives no consideration to the additional disgrace he is bringing upon his relatives. He cannot bear to face the music, and so he leaves it to others. It is the complete relaxation of wholesome discipline which is to blame for the increase of suicide, the inability to take hard knocks. There is a lot of preaching on the subject of quitting, but we are short on practice. It is not talking about what ought to be done, but doing it, which will give practice. Cutting up the family firewood was good practice toward clearing forests, and working out the hard problems in fractions and square root in the old arithmetic went a long way toward preparing for the tackling of the problems of life. Life is no harder now than it ever was. If anything, it is easier. The fault lies in the methods of preparation for meeting the hardships. With the whole trend of mental and moral training in the direction of shifting responsibilities, doing only what is perfectly easy, and shirking duty, it is no wonder that the only way the modern man knows how to meet a contingency is by turning his back and running away from it.

Be Strenuous and You'll Be Neurotic

From Dr. Oliver T. Osborne comes a warning against the dangers of "The Strenuous Life." He delivered an address on that subject before the American Therapeutic Society at Washington the other day, and he stated that neurosis of the heart or debility of its muscles, causing degeneration of the circulatory system, menaced those who were too ardent and persistent in their pursuits. Much of the neurosis of the day is due to the resourcefulness of modern invention—the scores of devices to compass time and annihilate distance. The fast elevator that stops with a jerk and the automobile that is pulled up suddenly to avoid running over a pedestrian are responsible for much of the strain that seriously damages the heart. In our daily routine impetuosity is characteristic of our conduct. We try to do everything on time, and we go through life with a watch in hand. We rush up long flights of stairs, we run for a car, we dash out of a theatre before the performance is over, we bolt our meals and we are always filled with anxiety. We can accomplish all that is necessary if we are reposeful, providing our brain is active, and we do not overtax our capacity. The strenuous life, like a fast one, is short. It plays havoc with the nervous system, and when one's nerves are shattered a halt must be called. Exponents of the strenuous life lose a lot of time trying to recover from the effects of their haste and intrepidity. There is much in the reposeful life to commend.

THE HEAD OF MURIETTA

Livid head and blackened hand
  Severed from a bandit chief,—
Hand that wrought what head had planned
  For assassin and for thief.

Face of fiend, illumed by Hell,
  Through whose Gorgon eyeballs shine
Hate and craft no death can quell,
  As they glitter into mine!

Safely prisoned in the glass,
  Dream of bloody orgies still;
Through that head what thoughts must pass!
  How that hand must lust to kill!

Fleshly orbs and mirrors black,
  Still the scenes where men did die,
Still the blood that marked thy track,
  Redden in each demon eye.

Lo, the hacienda's flame
  Tells the ruin of thy raid,
And a place, that knows no name,
  Knows the wailing of a maid!

Oft his gold the gamester stored
  Warm beside his cunning hand—
Oft thine own received his hoard
  With a short and sharp command.

At the gay fiesta's ball
  Maiden laughed with cavalier,
Till a shudder shot through all:
  "Murietta: he is here."

Seemed betimes thy courage lost,
  Faint with mountain-weight of crime—
It was but a ride at most
  Where the Mission bells held chime.

But a swift ride by the moon
  Where the pale adobes shone,
Craving from the Christ a boon—
  And the Virgin carved of stone.

Sunk on peaceful knees to pray,
  Thou and all thy robber horde
Did kiss the rudest cross where lay
  The mangled body of the Lord.

It is said that thou didst give
  Ravished riches to the poor,
So to thee, when fugitive,
  Opened each his sheltering door.

Some do say thy soul was crazed
  By a grief too great to bear—
By a happy homestead razed
  And a butchered wife and heir.

If these things be true, O may
  Prayers of priests and poor men's tears
Count for thee on Judgment Day
  'Gainst the sum of thy arrears.

But nor prayers nor tears could stay
  Heavenly vengeance when it fell,
When thy mates were swept away,
  When thy soul was flung to Hell.

Murietta, bandit chief
  Of the dim days long ago,—
Robber, murderer and thief,
  Wolf of lawless Mexico!

It was long, oh, long ere fell
  Thy fierce head beneath the Law,—
San Benito's hills may tell
  What that day the vultures saw.

Safely prisoned in the glass.
  Dream of bloody orgies still;
Through that head what thoughts must pass!
  How that hand must lust to kill!

Hearst Promoting Harmony

In the furtherance of his political plans Mr. William R. Hearst has undertaken to straighten out a very intricate tangle in local politics, and to secure a united delegation from California to the next National Convention he appears to be willing to distribute olive branches in every direction. The work of establishing the entente cordiale in the interest of Mr. Hearst has assumed a very wide scope. Mr. Phelan is not the only man that has been conciliated, but Mr. McNab, too, has been taken into camp. And as a consequence a serious hitch arose in the plans of reorganization. All went smoothly until Congressman Livernash undertook to capture the first meeting. He was easily handled but it appears that on that occasion he was representing a certain clique that has an influence among the political labor leaders. They claim control of a large element of organized labor which they are using for various purposes. They had hoped to dictate the policy of Democratic reorganization, and to be permitted to name the men of the inner council. They objected to the men in control at the Pioneer hall meeting because they knew that they could not handle them. Hence the activity of Congressman Livernash, and his wild efforts to stampede the meeting.

Carvalho Smoothing the Way

Some days ago Manager Carvalho of the Hearst enterprises, political as well as journalistic, made his appearance in town. Mr. Carvalho is Mr. Hearst's chief of staff with headquarters in New York. He directs the policy of all the Hearst newspapers and at present he is devoting most of his time to promoting his employer's political aspirations. He came to town to look over the situation, and he has interviewed everybody from Max Popper, the chief hammer thrower of the Iroquois tribe, to Jimmy Phelan. He intimated that his purpose was to cement all factions, and he said that the Examiner was not going to boost any clique, or attempt to crowd anybody out of the party. It was on account of his presence that a halt was called in the work of reorganization. The visit of Mr. Carvalho has afforded some consolation to Jimmy Phelan and Gavin McNab, who had about given up hope of breaking into the reorganized Democracy.

Hearst Meets Mr. McNab

It should be interesting to watch developments and observe to what extent McNab and Phelan have been reinstated in Examiner favor. As the representative of organized labor the Examiner may find it embarrassing to whitewash the two men who were responsible for the police being engaged in the intimidation of the striking teamsters. However there is no limit to capacity for forgiveness when stimulated by political ambition. No man ever defamed another more brutally than Gavin McNab did when he published an open letter some years ago abusing William R. Hearst. There were some vicious charges in that letter, but McNab did not feel sufficiently revenged until the assassination of President McKinley. He was the first man in San Francisco to charge Hearst with responsibility for that crime. And yet I hear, on first class authority, that during the recent visit of the Examiner's proprietor to the city, he sat down with Gavin McNab and they discussed politics together.

McNab's Abuse of Hearst

Perhaps Mr. Hearst was never informed of all that McNab said and wrote about him in his bitter hatred, and at any rate forgiveness is divine but what do Mr. McNab's friends think of the canny Scot now? If Gavin McNab believed all that he wrote and said about William R. Hearst in the last three or four years, and yet sat down with him within a month, in friendly converse, to discuss ways and means for booming the newspaper proprietor for the high office of President of the United States, then he is an unprincipled scamp, unfit to associate with decent men. If his abuse of Mr. Hearst was merely the expression of a malignant spirit then he should be ashamed of himself and he should seek to make reparation, but not behind closed doors or by seeking to lick the hand of his victim that forgiveness might follow fawning.

No Denials to This

Just a few months ago "Bob" Mien was denying his engagement with Miss Mae Perkins, the erstwhile fiance of Mr. Bew, an Alameda druggist, and daughter of U. S. Senator George C. Perkins. Now Mr. Mien has been credited with another fiancee, and this time has not denied the betrothal. Miss Adelaide Deming, who will become Mrs. Mien in October, if neither of the parties to the engagement balks meanwhile, is a twin-sister of Alice Deming, who married Harry Corson Clarke. Their cousin Florence married young C. K. Harley a year or so ago. Mr. Mien's fiancee is a strikingly handsome girl, and she always dresses with taste and distinction. She is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edmund Orr Deming, and will have a good-sized dot.

HAVE YOU BEEN THERE?

Mabel Hopkins's Marriage

My predictions rarely go amiss. A long time ago I mentioned the fact of Charlie Quinn's devotion to Miss Mabel Hopkins, and predicted it would lead to the altar. The prophecy came true the other day. Mabel Hopkins is a cousin of the three dazzling matrons, Mrs. Gus Taylor, Mrs. Will Taylor and Mrs. Fred McNear, but she does not move in their set. She is a stunning looking girl and is very much in love with her bridegroom. Mr. Quinn is the well-known turfman.

She's suitors as many as twenty,
  She'd dukes and she'd earls at her feet,
She'd bouquets and billets a-plenty
  And offers both tempting and sweet;
For her hand Mammon bid against Cupid
  And sued for her smiles, but alack!
She made all the prophets seem stupid
  When she skipped with a knight of the track.

Ah Fate, how abruptly thou liftest
  The veil from Society's eyes,
When the race is sometimes for the swiftest
  And the dark horse trots off with the prize;
She was booked for a marriage of station—
  Too late now to whistle her back—
Her finish was sure a sensation
  When she skipped with a knight of the track.

Good matron, o'er proud of your daughter,
  Lean back on your cushions and think.
You can lead a fair filly to water
  But you cannot compel her to drink.
Without Cupid's hosts you may reckon,
  And argue that white must be black,
But should Cupid happen to beckon
  She'll skip with some knight of the track.

The Lion Balked

Mrs. Eleanor Martin dearly loves a social lion, and there is nothing that pleases her more than to entertain some one of great distinction. It is probably her hospitable nature that prompts her to provide entertainment for distinguished visitors, but in these degenerate days the worthiest motives are misconstrued. Last week Mrs. Martin planned a social coup that would have approximated in importance that of the De Youngs in securing President Roosevelt as a host. But it miscarried. Mrs. Martin contemplated having for her social lion no less a personage than Monsignor Falconio, the distinguished Catholic dignitary. She sought him after a service at the Cathedral and extended an invitation to dinner at her home. Monsignor Falconio smiled pleasantly, and expressed sincere regret that his time was so incessantly occupied as to render it utterly impossible for him to accept Mrs. Martin's hospitality. Mrs. Martin was sorry, too, but she was familiar with Monsignor Falconio's itinerary and she knew that he was going to visit a church near her home on a certain day. It would please her very much for him to drop in to tea that afternoon. Again the polite Italian clergyman smiled pleasantly. Perhaps if he had been invited to drop in to cafe noir he would not have been so surprised, but a tea! However he expressed his regrets just as though he felt he was going to miss a great treat.

Why Mrs. Scott Wasn't There

A "Constant Reader" has written to me for information about the Burlingame luncheon in honor of the President. "Constant Reader" wants to know, among other things, whether Mrs. Henry T. Scott absented herself from that formal, semi-public function on account of the recent bereavement of her family. I am surprised that a "Constant Reader" of Town Talk should be unaware of the departure for Europe, some time ago, of such a prominent woman as Mrs. Henry T. Scott. As she is in Europe now of course she was not absent on account of any bereavement. Moreover if she had been in town she probably would have attended the luncheon. It was her husband's brother who recently passed away, and Mr. Henry T. Scott was very much in evidence on the occasion of the Burlingame luncheon. Indeed he was the host, and in the absence of his wife, his daughter, Mrs. Walter Martin, occupied the seat of honor. The Scotts were not so conspicuous during the Roosevelt visit as they were when Mr. McKinley was here, but it was not their fault.

Joaquin Miller Reported Dead

The report was published in New York last Wednesday that Joaquin Miller had died suddenly in his mountain home near Oakland, after an illness of only twenty minutes. The poet's wife, who is sojourning at Saratoga, wired out to her husband's secretary to verify the report, and she received this reply: "Joaquin is in perfect health; report of illness false." It was on Wednesday night of last week that the Poet of the Sierras made his appearance at the Bohemian Club in his usual picturesque attire and with an unusually picturesque package which he could not have carried had he not been in sound physical condition. The poet was the object of much interest to the members of the Presidential party who attended the club that evening. Never before was he in such a communicative mood. Feeling that he was the whole show he took the centre of the stage and talked and talked until everybody begged for mercy. The report got out that he had talked himself into a comatose condition, and somebody evidently put an exaggerated account of the incident on the wire.

Why Bromley Demurred

Though Poet Miller was in exuberant and other kinds of spirits at the club that night he wilted somewhat when "called down" by Chairman Phelan. That the flow of a poet's soul should be stemmed by the hand of commerce in Bohemia's sacred shrine was to his notion a damnable outrage. So he quit the jinks room in high dudgeon, and muttering his disapprobation of the treatment he had received, he hied himself to the wet-goods department below and told his troubles to the sympathetic barkeeper. Upon his departure Mr. Phelan called on "Uncle George" Bromley.

"What do you wish me to talk about?" asked "Uncle George."

"Talk about the wild and woolly West," suggested Mr. Phelan.

"I don't like to talk behind anybody's back," said Bromley. "The wild and woolly West has just gone down stairs."

Hobson's Bad Break

Miller's package was not the only embarrassing feature of the Bohemian jinks. Richard Pearson Hobson caused some uneasiness among the members. All unmindful of the presence of a British Admiral, the hero of Santiago iterated and reiterated the supremacy of the American navy, whereupon various British officers who were present as guests shifted uneasily in their seats. But the rest of the evening went smoothly enough and delightful after-supper speeches were made by Horace Platt, Secretary Moody, who was very happy, and President Nicholas Murray Butler, who is both graceful and a wit.

An Aztec Jinks

The next jinks of the Bohemian Club should be an interesting one. It is to be an Aztec jinks, quite on the order of the last one, which was an Indian jinks and the most successful ever given by the club. Dr. Jack Shiels is to be the sire, the scenic effects will be furnished by Amadee Joullin who is au fait in Aztec matters, the words will be by Louis Robertson, the poet, and the music by Dr. H. J. Stewart.

No Engagement Announced Yet

Ernest A. Wiltsee, who once cut such a wide social swath in San Francisco, is back from Mexico with the charming widow, Cornelia Baxter Tevis, and still no engagement is announced. It is scarcely conceivable that Wiltsee would let the grass grow under his feet in announcing the betrothal if such a one existed, so it is reasonable to suppose that the Mexican trip has failed. Wiltsee invited the widow and some other people to make a three weeks' tour of Mexico in a private car with him. He had been there before and he knew how romantic Mexican moonlight is and what an admirable love-light it is. It is said that he fell in love during his first Mexican trip. The widow accepted the invitation, but that seems to be all she did accept. I am afraid Cornelia is coy, as she has every right to be. There's nothing on earth so independent as a widow with money, and why she should want to marry any one, even the seven-foot Wiltsee, no one can see.

Georgia Sullivan to Marry

Bachelorhood for maids seems to be going out of fashion. There are few left of the "old guard," and that few is constantly diminishing. Miss Georgia Sullivan, whose engagement is just announced, was thought to be one of those who preferred eternal liberty to the thralldom of the marriage tie, but she has fallen a victim to Cupid. The happy man is a Washington, D. C. lawyer, Louis Wright by name. The details that have been received here are meagre as to his personality. "A prominent lawyer" seems to be all that is known of Mr. Wright. Georgia Sullivan is a vivacious and happy tempered young woman. She is a sister of Mr. Frank J. Sullivan, the well known attorney and energetic Park Commissioner, and also of Miss Ada Sullivan, whose engagement to Mr. James D. Phelan has been frequently rumored.

Miss Voorhies's Friend

At a luncheon given the other day by Miss Mollie Phelan in celebration of the anniversary of the marriage of the Frank Sullivans, the conversation drifted to the topic of ancestry. This is a topic that is usually eschewed in local society circles, but on this occasion it was learned that several people present could trace their family tree back several centuries. Marie Voorhies was one of them, but she said she had a friend who had a record of her ancestors that extended back many years before Christ. It is said that she dragged her unknown friend into the controversy to discourage others from putting too severe a tax on their imagination.

Jack London Has Oakland by the Ears Again

Jack London has again shocked Oakland society. It seems that he was invited to address a fashionable woman's gathering over there, and true to his viewpoint that if you can't attract attention by your writing, you can by your clothes, he appeared before that fashionable throng in a sweater. Whereupon several of the matrons arose and left the room. Why is it that the habit of writing should interfere with one's daily baths or the wearing of conventional clothes? The climate and the law decree that one must be covered, why not with the appropriate thing as well as by the inappropriate?

An Indiscreet Rector

Nowadays the pastor of a church must be a paragon of discretion and suavity if he desire to enjoy the good-will and approbation of all the people to whose spiritual salvation he ministers. When the Rev. Dr. Lacey went to his new cure in Brooklyn, the Vestry of Christ church, Alameda, felt that it would be a difficult task to find a suitable man to fill the vacancy. When a man crosses the bay every day in the week he likes to be permitted to take his religion easily on Sunday. Dr. Lacey was a considerate man in that respect and therefore he was a success. The vestry wanted a man of his leisurely ways, and after a good many "try outs" it was decided that the mantle of the departed rector should fall upon the shoulders of the Rev. Mr. Guthrie whose French and Scottish ancestry bespoke a satisfactory mixture of tact and shrewdness. But many of the parishioners of Christ church are now of the opinion that the Scotch temperament predominates in the rector's character, and that tact is not one of his distinguishing traits. As soon as he entered the Alameda vineyard the Rev. Mr. Guthrie became very active and he soon organized a number of societies to co-operate in the church work. But in the course of time his plans conflicted with those of the women of St. Agnes's Guild. This is an old established society in Christ church, and many of its members have passed into the sere and yellow leaf period, but the organization has always retained the name which was adopted when its founders were blushing maidens. Not long ago the minister took occasion in one of his sermons to question the propriety of using the name of St. Agnes for an organization of mothers and grandmothers, and hence the disfavor in which the clergyman is held by some of the women of his church, who have discovered that he is very theatrical in the pulpit and that he rolls his eyes unnecessarily.

Exit Sybil Sanderson

Now that Sybil Sanderson has passed away in the far-away city of her triumphs her old San Francisco friends are filled with poignant regret at the recollection of the indifference of their attitude toward her when she was last here. It was known to some of her intimate friends that she was sorry she had visited the home of her childhood. As an artist she was severely criticised, and as a woman she did not receive the treatment a woman expects. Emma Eames was lionized but Sybil Sanderson was shown comparatively little attention. It was said that the frigidity of her reception was due to the fact that in Paris she did as Parisians do, but that is hardly the correct explanation. San Francisco society never draws the line at a woman's past unless she occupies a very obscure position. Our smart set is not intolerant of those that sneer at the decalogue, for they have entertained the heroines of some very salacious escapades. Sybil Sanderson was a very unconventional woman, but many of the stories of her private life were pure fiction. She never took the trouble to contradict any of them. It was at the home of a San Francisco matron that she made the remark about her jewels that was quoted all over the country. The matron observed that Miss Sanderson's jewels must be worth a fortune.

"Oh, did you think my jewels were real?" laughed the prima donna. "Don't believe me as bad as that."

And she explained that the magnificent brilliants she wore in the operas were stage jewels.

President Theodore Roosevelt's wine is Ruinart.

Her Success Abroad

Opera-goers in this city were disappointed in Sybil Sanderson, because they had read so much of her success abroad, and could not understand how it was made with a voice of such small volume. But in Paris they can enthuse over a clear, light soprano with well rounded high notes, especially when it is possessed by an artist with such beauty and chic manner as Sybil Sanderson possessed. She never sang in any of the heavy operas in Paris. Massenet created roles to suit her organ; also her figure, for the Sanderson bust was as much a feature of her impersonations as her voice and acting. She was a charming actress, as all who saw her in "Manon" and "Romeo and Juliette" conceded. It was pique at her failure to enthuse an audience in her old home that made her refuse to sing again after her two performances.

Her Girlhood Days

Her early girlhood here is well remembered together with many of the episodes that shocked the prudes of other days. She was just out of her teens when she planned an elopement with an operatic star. One story goes that her father locked her in her room and prevented that flight, while another version was that the singer paid a visit at the Sanderson home one day after he had dined. He had eaten freely of the favorite Italian relish and the fair Sybil, detecting the odor of garlic, bade him leave her forever. Sybil Sanderson's first appearance on any public stage was at the Grand Opera House in a comic opera performance by amateurs. She made an instantaneous hit, as did her friend Ruth Holladay, who afterwards married Blackwell, the British pickle man, and after his death, Mr. Brooke, also of Great Britain. With all her faults of omission and commission and errors of judgment, Sybil Sanderson was a lovable woman. She was very generous, and provided for her family with lavishness. After Judge Sanderson's death, his widow and daughters would not have had very much had it not been for the eldest of the girls. Their house at Sacramento and Octavia streets, near Holladay Heights, was sold. Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Williams afterwards occupied it and continued the hospitality that it had dispensed during Judge Sanderson's time. Mrs. Hearst chaperoned Jennie, the second Sanderson girl, on a trip to Washington, D. C., and was a sort of fairy godmother to her. Jennie is now Mrs. Herrick, and there are two other girls, Edith and Marion. For many years they, with their mother, have been living in Paris.

Berkeley Students Josh Wheeler

The students of Berkeley are a most irreverent crew. Nothing is too sacred to enjoy immunity from the shafts of their sarcasm. Even the dignified President of the university comes in for his share of ridicule at the hands of the students. President Wheeler enjoys the confidence and respect of the regents, but the students do not take him seriously. They admire him for his scholarship but not for his shiftiness in side-stepping responsibility. They have noticed that when there is any disagreeable duty to perform it is saddled on one of the committees of the faculty. Hence they are inclined to regard him as an invertebrate executive. The senior class produced an extravaganza last Tuesday, and one of the characters was Benjamin Ide Wheeler. Mrs. Wheeler was in the audience and she was heard to remark that it was altogether too personal. There was also a character in the extravaganza known as "Victor," Ben Wheeler's "lackey," who was easily recognized as a burlesque on Victor Henderson, private secretary to President Wheeler. Mr. Henderson is sometimes referred to facetiously as the Vice-President of the university. He is a graduate of Berkeley, and some time ago he undertook to conduct a course in journalism. His knowledge of journalism was acquired in an experience of two weeks on an interior paper. The course in journalism soon petered out because the students regarded it as a joke.

The Absent Host

It is customary for President Wheeler to give a reception in Commencement week to the senior class. He gave one this year but he did not swell his record for hospitality. He gave about half an hour to the reception and then disappeared. It was a case of Hamlet with the melancholy Dane conspicuous by his absence. Naturally the students felt that they had been treated cavalierly, but they attributed the withdrawal of their host to the fact that he had been leading a very strenuous life in the wake of his friend Theodore Roosevelt. However the incident provoked a deal of gossip in Berkeley, as did also that overflow luncheon on the occasion of Roosevelt's visit to the university.

Wheeler's Remarkable Omission

Though President Wheeler is not noted for his tact, and though he has been subjected to severe criticism from time to time, he never did anything to provoke so much unfavorable comment as was heard anent his failure to include Mrs. Phoebe Hearst and her son in the list of donors to the university read by him at the last Commencement exercises. He has been accused of having intentionally omitted their names, and one indignant individual, in an open letter to the Oakland Tribune, denounced him as a cad and a snob. He added that if Mrs. Hearst would state that she had requested Mr. Wheeler to make no mention of her name he would apologize. However, the editor of the Tribune stated that Mrs. Hearst did not request President Wheeler not to mention her name. It is incredible that he would deliberately abstain from giving credit to Mrs. Hearst and her son for their philanthropy in behalf of the university merely because of the presence of President Roosevelt. I know that on a previous occasion Mrs. Hearst did request him to quit harping on the subject of her generosity, especially when she was present. However President Wheeler's explanation of what appeared to be an oversight is quite plausible. He said he merely read the names of donors that had not been previously mentioned, and that it is customary to read the names of the latest donors on Commencement Day.

His Lack of Courtesy

The explanation does not satisfy some people, who think that as the Hearsts have contributed more than all others they should have been mentioned on that occasion, especially as the exercises were held in the magnificent new amphitheatre for which the University is indebted to William Randolph Hearst. Besides, on that same day Mrs. Hearst had placed her Berkeley residence at the disposal of President Wheeler for the entertainment of his guests. Notwithstanding President Wheeler's handsome salary he has declined to furnish the commodious residence built for him by the State, and as his home is not large enough to accommodate a big party he availed himself of the hospitality of Mrs. Hearst for the overflow. And among the overflow, by the way, was Admiral Bickford, representing the British government by order of the King. It was probably characteristic oversight on the part of President Wheeler that was responsible for the exclusion of the Admiral from the presence of President Roosevelt during the luncheon. It was also due to his oversight that Mayor Olney of Oakland was invited to neither the amphitheatre nor the luncheon, though Mayor Schmitz of San Francisco was invited to both. Of course the people of Oakland were sore at the slighting of their Mayor. So poor Benjamin Ide Wheeler has troubles of his own these days. He scored beautifully over his friend Jordan in securing Roosevelt for the commencement exercises, but Dr. Jordan had the tact to provide carriages for the visiting newspaper men in the Presidential party, and they wired to their papers all over the country a fine account of the visit. They gave Palo Alto a splendid advertisement. At Berkeley all the politicians were provided with carriages but the newspaper men had to walk through the dust to the university, and the consequence was that they devoted very little space to the affair.

Jordan the Educator

When President Roosevelt told the students of Stanford how helpful the head of their university had been to him, he paid the great educator a compliment that is worth considering, because of the nicety shown in the choice of terms. Helpfulness is the sine qua non of successful teaching. And Dr. Jordan is pre-eminently helpful. Not only does he possess first-rate ability, or rather abilities, but the art of making them effective is his also. He spends himself freely for the benefit of the public. He believes that an educator exists for the use, first of immediate students, then of the community at large; and he honors his belief by living up to it. With the possible exception of his poetic gift, not one of his many talents is kept wrapped up in the napkin of the parable. His philosophy is practical, a sort of hygienic hedonism, exceedingly wholesome, and especially appropriate for the use of healthy youths, with ruddy faces as yet unsicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought. There are many forces in California now cooperating to make here a mental and moral climate to match in gloriousness the physical climate for which the country is famous; and one of the most potent of these is David Starr Jordan.

The Smiths Overlooked

Over nothing that occurred across the bay has the talk run more spiritedly than the overlook given the Borax Smiths of Arbor Villa in allotting the places of honor in the Oakland parade. A dash of humor was lent to the parade by the conspicuous efforts of these enterprising people to make a place in the line not provided in the program. Although Mr. Smith was a member of the reception committee, when it came to making up the procession, he was left to spar for position along with Tom Pearson, the colored lawyer who "butted in" on the strength of the Booker Washington dinner, and the lesser fry who scrambled in the breach he had made. Neither was "Borax" Smith bidden to the Wheeler luncheon at the university, nor was he invited to ride with the President in the car furnished by the Transit Company to take him from Berkeley to Oakland. And yet it was Mr. Smith's company that furnished the car for the occasion. Now the "Borax" Smiths are considered the biggest toads in the Oakland puddle. Mr. Smith is the head of the borax monopoly. He makes his servants wear livery. He is the kingpin of the Realty Syndicate, which is doing a lot of ground and lofty financiering. He is the leading spirit in the Oakland Transit Company, which has just issued another three million dollars of bonds, and also in various other allied corporations with a large capitalization. It therefore caused remark in the vulgar crowd to see such great people as the "Borax" Smiths waiting among the common, unsyndicated folk at the university gate for the President to come out from his luncheon.

Barred Off Their Own Car

When the car on which the President was to ride came with the Oakland committee, Mr. Smith gallantly helped Mrs. Smith and her two daughters aboard. Why not? Was not the car the property of one of the Smith corporations? "Ah," the crowd whispered, "they are going to ride with the President." But it was not to be. Some one of the committee significantly mentioned that no women were to be included in the Presidential party. Thereupon Mr. Smith helped his family off again. Now this incident is still the subject of comment in Oakland. Some people think that such a representative citizen as "Borax" Smith should have been permitted to butt in, but others uphold the action of the committee.

Successfully Sparred for an Opening

At Oakland Mr. Smith had better luck. Once in his own carriage he began a unique series of manoeuvres to get into a strategic position in the parade. Twice he tried to break into the line, but was compelled to fall back under a fire of sarcastic remarks. One of the President's party observed the Smith campaign for position and exclaimed, "Why don't the police arrest that man?" But he did not know of whom he was speaking. Fancy an Oakland policeman touching "Borax" Smith! At last Mr. Smith "bruk the square," and rode in triumph to the high school. But there, alas! he was slighted again, for he was given the glassy eye by a husky doorkeeper when he tried to make his way in among the elect.

Some Sins of Omission

Though the reception to the President in this city was a triumph for Mr. De Young and the whole Citizens' Committee, there were some sins of omission that have been seriously regretted. The most flagrant was the indifference to the officers of the British war vessel who came many miles o'er seas, at the command of King Edward, to represent the British government. According to well established rules of international etiquette they should have been shown the highest consideration on all occasions, but they were not treated in some instances with ordinary courtesy. Our manifestation of provincial rudeness was largely due to the fact that everybody was so intent on getting into the limelight that he had no thought for the courtesy or deference due to the distinguished visitors. On the occasion of the dedication of the Dewey monument no attention whatever was paid to the British officers. They had to elbow their way through the crowd, and when the affair was over they had to walk back to the wharf, no carriages having been provided for them. Another sin of omission that provoked a great deal of criticism was the failure of the committee that had charge of the parade to invite the League of the Cross cadets, one of the best drilled bodies on the coast, to participate.

He Missed Wilson

The President's stay in Yosemite was one long chapter of laughable contretemps so far as the Commissioners were concerned. Jack Wilson, who spent much time and money in preparing fireworks, food and various entertainments for the President, to say nothing of an elaborate khaki trousseau for himself, never saw the President at all, and had not caught up at last accounts. The President calmly cut all the fireworks, the searchlights, the bombs, etc., and went off on a camping trip of his own. Jack Wilson is being subjected to an unmerciful guying which he takes quite good-naturedly, and reminds his hearers of the story he told on himself when he came home from his last trip to Washington. He knew he was to meet the President and he had prepared a long address, and as he clasped the Presidential hand he opened his mouth and began to tell that he knew "Van" Stow, etc., etc., when a major domo touched him on the arm and said, "This way, sir," and he found himself just going out the main entrance—the reception quite over and the address unsaid.

The President's Table Manners

Those who had the pleasure of breakfasting, lunching, dining or banqueting with the President and who are not too overawed by the presence of greatness, are saying now that his table manners are not all that they ought to be. The Roosevelts are an old Dutch family and have been rich for generations and they should have been possessors of that leisure which is supposed to lead to culture, but the President chews with his mouth open and he has such very long and prominent teeth as to suggest the carnivorous animals rather more strongly than is pleasant.

Impressions of Roosevelt

Politicians and newspaper men who came in close contact with President Roosevelt during his tour have declared him more pleasant as a hero than as an individual. Like many another picturesque phase of nature he is better to admire from a distance than close at hand. Politicians and newspaper men are a cynical lot, and they do not give two snaps for what a man is or does so long as he is not personally agreeable to them. President Roosevelt has had his own way probably more than any of his predecessors and the strenuous microbe and the war lord microbe with which he has become inoculated since his accession have made him somewhat positive and dictatorial in his demeanor, and whereas the populace love a dictator the court usually detests him. However, none of them accuse him of anything petty or peevish, but if he has a fault it is that of willfulness and the inability to take himself otherwise than seriously. Still he would doubtless have smiled had he heard the comment of the messenger boy who stood on the side lines Tuesday when the parade passed. "Hi, Arthur!" he shouted, "there goes Teddy." "Whereabouts?" asked Arthur. "Aw, don't you see him?" said the kid, "he's the guy standin' up and wavin' his dicer. Gee! Git onto de smile—just like an octave of pianna keys!"

Where Was Dr. Lung?

Members of the University Club are wondering what has become of Dr. George Lung who, when he was last in San Francisco on his way home from the Orient, stopped at the University Club and told his intimates there that he had just been appointed to the Marine Hospital in Washington—next to Surgeon-General Rixey's the best billet in the navy, including as it always has, attendance on the White House and the President and his family. Dr. Lung went on to fill the appointment and was exceedingly popular with the Roosevelts and in Washington society, where he lived at one of the fashionable clubs and entertained much at delightful little teas. Being a young and handsome, as well as a cultivated and polished man, his popularity rapidly increased. He accompanied the President on several short trips and expected to come west with him. But just before the Californian trip was commenced a blow fell. Even the President does not know what happened but Dr. Lung found himself ordered to the sleepy city of Philadelphia and it was announced that Rixey would accompany the President. It is supposed that Dr. Lung was too popular, but if this is the case, it is certainly the President's loss, for the most unattractive man of his entire party was Surgeon-General Rixey.

Battlefield Repartee

Brigadier General Humphrey, who returned this week from the Philippines, is a good fellow as well as a general and he had not been long in town before he was surrounded by a group of military friends and admirers. The talk naturally drifted to events of the late campaign and the General grew reminiscent. Shortly before the Spanish capitulation of the Islands, according to the General's story, the Spanish and Insurgent lines were opposing each other, and at the head of the Spanish forces was a general who bore the strangely un-Castilian name of O'Neal. Commanding the insurgents was General Pilar del Mar, who, was originally a cab driver in Manila. During the fighting the insurgents got considerably the better of the Spanish, and Pilar, with characteristic native sarcasm, penned the following note to O'Neal and sent it across the lines:

"Pilar del Mar sends his compliments to the honorable Generalissimo O'Neal and asks if he can, in any way, be of service to him."

The haughty Spaniard was not long in sending back the following message:

"General Juan Maria Ferdinando O'Neal sends his compliments to del Mar and wishes to say that, when he is in need of a coachman he will be pleased to call upon him."

Bride Looted at the Altar

Though the story of the Thaw-Yarmouth marriage in Pittsburg was hinted at by the dailies at the time of its occurrence, they have never exploited the details of that abominably sacrilegious ceremony by which an innocent, inexperienced girl became the wife of the most unconscionable, fortune-hunting blackguard that ever came to this country. While it was generally known that the Earl of Yarmouth came to America in search of an heiress, and that his marriage with Miss Alice Thaw, a mere child, was the result of a cold-blooded bargain, the papers have refrained from giving publicity to the facts that stamp the bankrupt nobleman as a sordid and degraded wretch. After ensnaring his victim with his theatrical blandishments, he imported an English solicitor to examine her father's will and to enter a settlement. It was first decided that the Earl should have a written contract by the terms of which he would receive five thousand dollars a year for his personal expenses, all others to be provided by his wife. But he was not satisfied with this arrangement. However he pretended to be satisfied until the final hour. He waited until the guests were assembled, when the organ had heralded the coming of the bride and the minister was at the altar and the best man in the vestry-room. Then it was that he chose to demand a settlement that doubled the amount fixed by the contract and provided for the reversion of his bride's entire fortune to the Hertford estate, which he represented. He made the demand under penalty of refusal to go on with the ceremony. The girl's brother remonstrated, but the Earl stood firm. Finally the lawyers representing both sides were summoned from the body of the church, and the papers were drawn up to suit the contemptible rogue. Meanwhile the situation in the church had become intense, the organ repeated over and over again the strains of the wedding march, but the bride came not until the lawyers finished their task. Harry Thaw, who was to have given his sister away, left the church before the ceremony and his younger brother was substituted. Did ever a more vulgar performance take place in a Christian church?

Ogden Hoffman's Latest

As exemplars of the strenuous life, the younger generation of Hoffmans has always played to standing room only; but Ogden Hoffman's latest performance surpassed in thrill and exciting incident anything which that Johnny-on-the-spot young man has heretofore attempted, including that famous South Sea cruise for pirates' treasure. In the beautiful canon of the Lagunitas, over in Marin, Miss Alice Hoffman maintains a hunting lodge, and there "Og" Hoffman and his brother Jack rusticate, during the close season for pirates, be it understood. While fishing one day this week, the brothers discovered a still, deep pool, in which basked three gigantic steelheads. These whoppers persistently declined to respond to the allurements of the Hoffman fly-hook. "I bet you I can catch one with my hands," said Ogden. "I'm on for a five spot," replied Jack. In an instant, Ogden's clothes lay on the bank and that exponent of muscular activity was groping among the big fish, ten feet under water. As soon as a noble fourteen-pounder felt that inquisitive hand, he lashed out and dealt the diver a stunning blow between the eyes with his broad tail and then proceeded to climb all over him. The two smaller salmon joined in the mix-up, while Jack danced up and down, shrieking his approval from the bank. Honors were easy for the first two rounds and then, just as Ogden had succeeded in pinning one of the fish in a crevice, the bank caved in and precipitated Jack Hoffman and all of Ogden's clothing into the stream. The worst of it was that the current bore away a specific article of his wardrobe which is never de trop, save at a Caledonian picnic, and on reaching the lodge where Miss Hoffman was entertaining guests at an al fresco luncheon, Ogden unostetatiously betook himself to the hayrick, while Jack, arrayed in dry clothing, told the stirring tale to an accompaniment of popping corks, echoing laughter and the muttered execrations of the unwilling prisoner.

The Wheeler-McEnerney Tilt

The legal fraternity is much interested in the Sanford case, which has been made notable by Charley Wheeler's efforts to grill Garrett McEnerney. Wheeler did a good deal of hinting at unprofessional conduct which greatly amused members of the bar. Not long ago Mr. Wheeler, who, by the way, is Tom Bishop's partner, addressed the Bar Association at its annual banquet on the subject of "Legal Ethics," and the address was regarded in the light of a practical joke. Lawyers usually take themselves very seriously, but there is a keener sense of humor among local practitioners than most people imagine. In the Fair case that paragon of professional propriety, D. M. Delmas, put Charley Wheeler on the stand for the purpose of exploiting that gentleman's morals, and on that memorable occasion Mr. Wheeler experienced more than one bad quarter of an hour. Professional ethics are somewhat mythical. They are honored in the breach in proportion to the eminence of the attorney who ignores them. In the Sanford case Mr. Wheeler failed to smirch his brother attorney. Lawyers are generally considered to be bad witnesses, but McEnerney is an exception. His mind works like chain lightning, and he seemed to anticipate every question.

At Del Monte

There is some talk of making Monterey a naval station. If it had a naval station from which to recruit social beaux to co-operate with those of the army already there, it would become the gayest social centre of the West. Though the season is young Del Monte is already bubbling over with gayety, and any number of brilliant happenings are under way for the coming season. Among the visitors this week are Count Louis Bonaparte Primola of Rome, Doctor James H. Hepburn, the army surgeon, ex- Governor Tuttle of New Hampshire, Mrs. S. S. Sewell and family of Augusta, Maine, Major and Mrs. J. R. Williams, U. S. A., O. J. Salisbury, the Utah mining man, with his family. The Salisburys intend staying for some time at the hotel. Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels are going down for the summer with their children. E- Speaker of the House D. B. Henderson was one of last week's distinguished arrivals.

There are to be merry times this summer in the Dickinson cottage at Sausalito. It has been rented by that rollicking trio, Clarence Follis, Will O'Connor and Ed. Tobin. They will undoubtedly do some lively entertaining over there.

Reckoned Not with the Habitues

The Open-Air League, of which Mrs. Lovell White is president and which devotes its time and energies toward making the earth, and especially this corner of it, a garden spot, had an amusing adventure the other day. The ladies had been working hard all day planting young trees and vines on Telegraph Hill, the terrible scars of which they are womanfully trying to cover. After working hard all morning the ladies went down the slope to get a little luncheon at a Spanish restaurant, and scarcely had their skirts ceased swishing when a half a dozen or so of goats, that had been quietly waiting, came up over the brow of the hill, and in ten minutes not a leaf or twig of green remained. Moral: When you want to do a thing begin at the right end. First tie up the goats.

THE PLACE FOR BRIDES.

Hotel Vendome at San Jose has ever been a famous place for spending the honeymoon, but it's gaining a fame better than that —for matrimonial match-making. There, in the cosy corners of the corridors, or beneath the shading elms, lurks young Dan Cupid, and he even ventures boldly out upon the tennis courts, or trips over the bunkers on the golf links. The Vendome is growing in popularity every season, and the number of young men and young women who go there is the principal reason for it. No other resort possesses so many features to attract and entertain as Vendome. Every year something has been added to meet society demands. The latest improvements include the new annex, adding forty rooms to the hotel, each with long distance telephone; the lanai, giving a sheltered idling place; and the enlarged swimming pools. The annex, extending northerly at an angle which gives the best results of sunlight and air, is a welcome addition. It provides not only many attractive suites, but it gives a sweep of hallway through the hotel which will be a delight for evening promenades. The big swimming pools offer here all the sport of the seaside, and in the same building are the best bowling alleys in California. Tennis, croquet, automobiling, and horseback riding are on the list of things entertaining, while days on the golf links or coaching to the Lick Observatory are events that ever allure. At the stables connected with the hotel, carriages and riding horses may be secured, and the new automobile house has helped to make this attractive resort a favorite rendezvous for those who speed over the shaded roadways in horseless runabouts. You'll make no mistake if you go to Vendome. Write Geo. P. Snell, Manager Hotel Vendome, San Jose, California.

A Corner in Cups

The Rev. Charles Hitchcock, principal of a military academy over in San Rafael, has just discovered that it is a far simpler undertaking to teach a given number of youths the 'ologies and a quantum suff. of Greek or Latin, than it is to manage a school athletic tournament. He announced his enterprise some weeks ago and the parents and guardians of the budding Sandows—the Pinckards, Griffins, Maillards, Baums—chipped in so lavishly for mugs, cups and tankards, that the display entirely filled the show window of a firm of silversmiths. The plan at the time the money—about one thousand dollars—was subscribed was that each of these costly prizes should become the absolute property of the strenuous youth who won it, but Dr. Hitchcock's revised version is that the victor must content himself with having his name emblazoned on the trophy, which will adorn the Hitchcock sideboard until next field day. Then, a new appearance, a new inscription, and—back to the sideboard! But the youthful athletes will not have it that way and some have declined to compete, while more than one paterfamilias who pungled has expressed dissatisfaction. Of course every man who paid felt in his heart of hearts that his boy held a first mortgage on some particular mug—and hence the wail of woe.

Across Continent to a Ball Game

Mrs. George M. Pinckard has left her beautiful San Rafael home for a trip East, which, as she planned it, is destined to be the briefest on record. Her son Ayer, a well-built youth of eighteen, is preparing at St. Mark's School to enter Harvard; and, quite incidentally, is devoting considerable attention to athletics. A recent letter apprised his fond mamma that he had been elected captain of the school nine, that there was to be a match game of ball for the inter-school championship at the end of the term, and that he wished to goodness his parents could be present to see his team wallop their competitors. Mrs. Pinckard determined to surprise her son and forthwith started on her long journey across the continent. She will remain East only three days, one of which will be devoted to the ball game, and will then return with Ayer to California.

The Morgan-Davis Betrothal

Mrs. W. P. Morgan is said to be highly pleased at her younger daughter's engagement with Horace Davis's son. With Therese's known penchant for following her own free will in everything, and her confessed delight in Bohemia and its devotees, Mrs. Morgan was never quite sure that she would not get a penniless artist or briefless barrister for a son-in-law. Norris Davis is all that the most exacting mother could wish—young, rich, good-looking and well born. Being the grandson of Rev. Thomas Starr King, the eminent divine, he is of the genuine blown-in-the-bottle purple brand. He is also a popular youth. Therese Morgan is probably the most popular girl in her set. She is not a beauty, but her wholesome blondeness is more attractive than mere line regularity and roseleaf complexion. She is clever, but does not indulge her wit at her friends' expense. She is very enthusiastic about everything, and never affects that blase air that is considered the correct thing by many society girls. Miss Morgan's chief characteristic is her outspoken sincerity. She never evades. When she took up smoking, for instance, she did not indulge her fancy for little Egyptians and Turks sub rosa. All her friends were told what a tonic for nerves a cigarette is, and though the prudes professed to be shocked they could not but admire Therese's fearless frankness.

Nuptial Mass at the Cathedral

St. Mary's Cathedral was filled to overflowing Wednesday morning, with well-wishers who assembled to witness the marriage of Miss Kathryn Ivancovich and Harry Sullivan. The ceremony was performed by Bishop Montgomery and afterwards there was a nuptial mass celebrated with all the impressive pomp of the Catholic service. Father Cottle was the celebrant and he was assisted by several clergymen. The decoration of the altar was the loving tribute to the bride of the Sisters of the Holy Family, one of whom is the bride's only sister. The bride, a handsome brunette, was girlishly lovely in her white satin wedding gown and long tulle veil. The bridesmaids were charming in pink and white, and the maid of honor, Miss Gertrude Sullivan, a beautiful blonde, was radiant in white with a white picture hat. The queen rose in this bevy of youthful beauty was the mother of the bride, who gave her away. It is scarcely an exaggeration to call this handsome, distinguished looking widow the most beautiful woman in San Francisco. She wore a magnificent gown of heavy pale pearl silk and point lace and a dainty pearl gray hat with a brim faced with pink roses. On all sides as the throng left the church could be heard comments upon the great beauty of the bride's mother. Young Mr. Sullivan is the son of Jeremiah F. Sullivan, one of the most eminent and highly respected members of the local bar.

Emil Steinegger is on his way home, after some years' absence in Vienna. He left the Austrian capital on May eleventh and will go to Switzerland, France and Italy before taking the Gibraltar route home. "Mrs. Pat's" Other Double Another San Francisco beauty who, with Mrs. Carolan, may dispute the distinction of looking like Mrs. Patrick Campbell is Mrs. Gaston Ashe. Mrs. Ashe, beside the white skin and raven tresses that have made the English actress famous, has something of Mrs. Campbell's distinguished carriage and the soft grace which makes one suspect that her bones are fashioned of velvet. Fortunately for San Francisco, however, she lacks the Campbell rudeness, for she is a very gracious woman. Mrs. Ashe proves the contention of some of Mrs. Campbell's critics that the latter lady is not a typical English beauty. Mrs. Ashe comes of an old California Spanish family, having been Miss Bolado before her marriage, and those who know her best declare that her charms are distinctly Castilian.

Mr. Isaacs: "Sigismundo, I am going to puy you a leetle sister."

Sigismundo: "Vy not puy dwins, fader, while you're apout id? That would pe a petter pargain."

Adams or His Double?

Henry Austin Adams, the Episcopo-Catholic convert who has made a more or less fat income on the lecture platform telling the dear public how it feels to do sensational things, is in trouble and plenty of it. Adams is now in Auckland, whither, it is rumored, he fled with a young girl who had become infatuated with him in other capacity than that of lecturer. Adams, however, has written to various members of the cloth and laity explaining that any stories connecting his name with that of the young woman are damnable lies and black slanders. Adams appends to all these epistles pathetic appeals for money, explaining that the late scandal has unbalanced his mind and that, while in a trance, he fled to Auckland and changed his name. If these circumstances are not suspicious. Adams is certainly a much libeled man, and he has the right of redress allowed to any citizen so musused. And if these tales be untrue it is no less than miraculous how many stories of an equally pungent nature were circulated about the platform religionist before his final hegira. When the gentleman was on a recent lecture tour here it was whispered abroad that he had been one of the principals in a "wet night" in a suburban hotel, that the glasses had clinked till all hours and that the sounds of feminine laughter had indicated that there were many Eves to one Adams. If Mr. Adams had been, like Elbertus Hubbard, engaged in idol-cracking and God-defying, and, like the Roycrofter, had confessed to loving "many women—one at a time," the rumored escapade would have made little stir, but to a man of his godly profession the whispers were menacing indeed and but served as a preface to the storm which seems to have driven the religionist into the wilds. His friends, however, insist that he is innocent and intimate that he is the victim of a malignant double.

Mrs. Stanford's Conversion

Once more the report is current that Mrs. Jane Stanford is about to join the Catholic church. In late years she has devoted a great deal of her time to the study of religious questions, and she has sought instruction from a clergyman of the Catholic church. It is believed that her recent decision to withdraw from active participation in the management of affairs at the Stanford University was in a measure due to her contemplated change of religion. Nearly a year ago the first intimation of her impending conversion was given in a paragraph published in a New York paper.

Mrs. Monroe Salisbury, who is bossing things generally in connection with the fete at the Presidio which is to be held there today, has been using every endeavor to eclipse the garden party held at Fort Mason last Saturday. While one was a civilian affair merely, the other is in aid of a button institution—the sailors' club house at Vallejo. It is under the patronage of the wearers of gold lace in both branches of the service, who are, it is understood, determined to make it a brilliant affair.

Mrs. Henry Wetherbee arrived at Byron Springs this week. Others at Byron are Dr. George Terrill, W. H. Hammond of Visalia, Mrs. B. Triest, Miss Triest and C. A. Merrill of Stockton.

The McCalla Boom

The social boom of Mrs. McCalla, wife of Captain McCalla of Vallejo, has been launched, and it is now under forced draught. It is interesting to note the progress of a new candidate for social honors. Madame La Bavarde, who is probably the most industrious of all our social boosters, is attending to the case of Mrs. McCalla, and she is surely rendering good service. Scarcely a day passes without Madame La Bavarde pouring forth a little gush on the subject of Mrs. McCalla. On Friday of last week she became positively eloquent in her apotheosis of the naval officer's wife, and all because the latter delivered an address to President Roosevelt at Vallejo. Of that address Madame La Bavarde wrote, in one of her characteristic. Caesarian sentences: "Not a word too much—every period well rounded—every point well made, with a bearing so intensely womanly, and at the same time so dashing, it was a sight that thrilled every one present, and upon the conclusion of her presentation cheer followed cheer with a degree of enthusiasm—not second to the demonstration following up Roosevelt's emphatic, ringing speech, which was fine, clear and logical." Isn't that a beautiful sentence? I cannot say of it, however, as Madame La Bavarde said of Mrs. McCalla's speech in her own peculiar English, "Not a word too much"; nor yet can I say not a dash too many.

More of the Gush

Perhaps the personality of Mrs. McCalla is such as to justify the hysteria of Madame La Bavarde. As she is the wife of gallant Captain McCalla I have no doubt that she is an estimable and a sensible woman, and therefore I presume that the bavardian gush about herself must have pained her fearfully. It reads so much like the romantic flattery of a hired press agent that the subject of it was no doubt inclined to blush at the thought of being suspected of courting it. In that same article the readers of the Bulletin were told that no one who saw and heard Mrs. McCalla will ever forget the beautiful, graceful woman; that the honors fell to Mrs. McCalla and her three handsome daughters, each of whom has inherited the willowy grace and the sweet voice of the mother as well as the instincts of a gracious hostess; that the right people were brought together, and each and every one carefully attended to, et cetera. And then followed a list of the "right people" that Mrs. McCalla had brought together.

Is Miss Lawlor the Magnet?

Dr. Harry Tevis has announced his intention to take a trip to Europe in September, and on the heels of the announcement comes the rumor that the purpose of the trip is to join Miss Lily Lawlor in Paris. It will be remembered that during Miss Lawlor's recent sojourn in this city Dr. Tevis was so attentive to her as to create the impression that he had begun to find bachelorhood a bore. Miss Lawlor deferred her trip abroad so many weeks that some people thought she was waiting for the young millionaire to screw up his courage, and now there is suspicion of a mutual understanding having been reached.

Talented Belles of Stockton

The story comes to me from Stockton that Miss Genevieve Peters, one of the belles of that town, has a strong desire to enter the newspaper profession. She is possessed of considerable literary talent, and her epigrams have contributed to the gayety of many a social function in the slough city. I hear that when Elbert Hubbard visited Stockton he met Miss Peters and put in a plea for a photograph. Another very bright young woman of Stockton is Miss Jean Reed who is also one of the beauties of that burg. She has a rich contralto which has been well cultivated, and she has sufficient talent to justify a public appearance. She is to make the Alaskan trip this summer with her sister, Mrs. Henry Hewlitt.

Persecution of the Jews

It is now three-quarters of a century since Macaulay, smug, typically British, provincial alike in politics and religion though he may have been, wrote his magnificently noble essay on "The Civil Disabilities of the Jews"; turning against the oppressor, in behalf of the oppressed, the full force of his telling antitheses. In spite of the intervening years of Christian civilization, Russia of today calls loudly for a pen of equal power with that of Thomas Babington, equally inspired with righteous indignation—the pen of some ready writer who hates blind hate, to whom intolerance is intolerable. And but yesterday the Dreyfus case in France had the ear of the world. And even Ameri-

Swinburne's Indictment

Great is the injustice of Christian to Jew the world over, great also the ingratitude, making the injustice all the more damnable. The first Christian—the only Christian, I might say—was a Jew. It is vice; it is folly, to forget that. To the wonderful Semitic race we owe that inimitable literature, the Bible, and all that it means, directly and indirectly, to the world. The debt of Art, of Philosophy, to the Jew is, like that of religion, incalculable. To fail to appreciate him is a fault; to feel intolerance for him is a crime; to persecute him, to do him hurt is—well, find a hint of what that is from this sonnet of Swinburne's:

O Son of Man, by lying tongues adored,
By slaughterous hands of slaves with feet red-shod
In carnage deep as ever Christian trod,
Profaned with prayer and sacrifice abhorred
And incense from the trembling tyrant's horde,
Brute worshipers of wielders of the rod,
Most murderous even of all that call thee God.
Most treacherous even that ever called thee Lord;—
Face loved of little children long ago,
Head hated of the priests and rulers then,
If thou see this, or hear these hounds of thine
Run ravening as the Gadarean swine,
Say, was not this thy Passion to foreknow
In death's worst hour the works of Christian men?

An Up-to-Date Heathen

Wong Fook, the king pin of the Chinese "Eight Statesmen" who have been marking for death the members of a Chinatown club that have stood for progress and refused to be blackmailed, is probably one of the funniest products of a mixed civilization who ever dwelt in this town of weird contrasts. Wong, who is a tough native-born Chinaman, has shed his pigtail and wears American clothes of a Tehama street cut. Both in character and outward appearances, indeed, Wong has modeled his civilization on that of the ward politician, and Eastern tourists who are in search of a really, truly Highbinder chief receive a curious shock when Wong is trotted out for inspection. He is the owner of some half-million dollars' worth of property, most of which he has acquired through fan-tan joints and other unlawful means, and the tourists who stand in with the right party get a chance to go through Wong's palatial gambling resort at the corner of Dupont and Jackson, and of hearing how an emperor of hatchet-men actually talks, which is something as follows:

"Poker? Well I guess I takes a hand now and then just fer ducks, see? But gamble—not fer yer uncle Dudley. I let the Chinks gamble and I rakes in the receipts—savvy? Of course once in a while I drops a few bucks on the ponies just to keep my hand in, but as far as plunging, I ain't that kind of a dam fool. Yes, I let a few of my friends play fan-tan here just to pass away the time, but I don't take no money out of it—only just enough to help pay the rent, that's all. What are you taking, gentlemen? whisky?"

Summer Sale of Smart Millinery

One of the best opportunities offered modish women this season to secure smart and exclusive styles in millinery, at prices never before quoted in San Francisco, will be Mrs. Caswell's sale, opening next Monday, May twenty-fifth, at 28 Post street. When "Caswell" is marked on a hat everybody knows it stands for the proper thing in millinery, and the rare Caswell sales are as important to a society woman as a social function. Many of the hats, toques and bonnets are from prominent Parisian makers, and these exquisite patterns will be sold at five, ten and twelve dollars, not a third of the original figure. The entire stock, including ribbons and flowers, will be offered at prices far below cost. The doors will be opened at nine o'clock Monday morning for the sale.

Gair-Sweeney Engagement

The wire to Seattle was hot this week with the felicitations of the friends of Mr. Edward F. Sweeney on his engagement with Miss Essie Louise Gair of Brooklyn, New York. Mr. Sweeney is the vice-president and general manager of the Seattle Brewing Company, and he is one of the most energetic and popular of the business men of the Northwest. Moreover, his activity has been felt in this city, for he invaded the local market in a way that startled his rivals in business. His fiancee is the daughter of the Robert Gairs of Brooklyn. Mr. Gair is one of the largest and wealthiest manufacturers of that city. Miss Gair is a cultured and beautiful young woman. The marriage is to take place at the Gair home in Brooklyn on June first, and the honeymoon will be spent on the Atlantic seaboard.

Mrs. Marriner Campbell has issued invitations for a rendition of Pergolesi's "Stabat Mater," to be given next Friday evening in Steinway hall.

Remember Thee

Remember thee! The earliest morning beam
That breaks my slumber brings thee back to me;
Then through the long and lonely day I see Thy haunting beauty, till my soul doth seem Lost in the glamour of a glorious dream
That keeps me ever constant unto thee;
And when Night comes, God, how I burn to be Blest with thy passion, peerless and supreme.

Forget thee? No. Recall the glowing hours
Whose golden wings oft wafteth us away
To where our mingling souls in rapture met
And breathed the blissful fragrance of the flowers
That Love gives to its devotees who stray
Where we have strolled—then ask if I forget.

"I've come to the conclusion that there is considerable stern reality about that ancient joke on the characteristic plumber's bill."

The speaker stood in the lobby of the California hotel Tuesday night looking at a throng of claw-hammered men wearing jeweled paunches and stall-fed jowls.

"Why have you come to that conclusion?" asked his friend.

"Because I've been looking over these prosperous fellows, and I have been informed that they are all Master Plumbers."

A Snap-Shot

It is midspring: midday. My house is set on a hill, overlooking life. My door is wide open. Just below me a kid gambols on the slope, while its mother sits drowsily chewing the cud in the shade of a honeysuckle that has strayed in sheer wantonness across a garden fence. A gorgeous butterfly zigzags over the fence and is lost to view among its fellows, the flowers. A humming bird poses for me a moment, then drops on a clothesline. On a shingled roof a pigeon follows his coy mate with amorous persistence. Fresh puffs of fleecy smoke rise languidly from a chimney. Some one has put coal into a kitchen stove. At the foot of the hill, in the same lot with a cottage, is a cow-shed. A broken-down cart leans against the white-washed wall. In the cart sits a red-haired girl nursing a baby. Now she stands up to watch a passing funeral. In the middle foreground workmen are getting down from the roof of a stone church in process of erection—in spite of its newness, a bit of granite mediævalism planted firmly there, as if for all time. I can distinguish among them the black coat of the priest, who is architect. An electric car is rushing past the church. And beyond it dashes an express, and is gone. In the background, a college, a convent, a car-house, a red-brick shoe factory, and the mansion of a millionaire stand out in bold relief amid the innumerable houses, the incongruous colors of which are harmonized by the haze. In the dim distance the bay blends with the gray sky, which shades off into a pale blue above. . . . I begin to doubt the reality of what I see, and to dream of what I do not see. What an infinity of roofs!—hiding I know not what kisses, what crimes, what feasting, what fasting, what laughter, what tears! Oh, blessed opacity of wood and stone! . . . Thank God the roofs are not of glass! Harry Cowell.

Life has four blessings: Wife, children, friends and near at hand a bottle of Jesse Moore "A A" Whiskey.

The Wires Were Crossed

"Hello! hello! Yes, this is Mrs. Newriche. Who is it, please?"

"This is the Daily Gush office."

"Oh, is that you, Madame Boostheclimber?"

"Yes, Mrs. Newriche; I wanted to know if you had anything new for me tonight."

"Oh, sure. I'm going to the mountains for a few weeks, and I'm having a lot of new dresses made—exquisite confections, and they're going to cost an awful lot of money. But you can say that I imported them from Paris, and by the way, I should like you to repeat that notice you wrote about me a month ago, the one in which you said how young I looked, and how graceful and aristocratic."

"All right, I shall be delighted."

"That's a dear good woman. I'll invite you up to spend a few days with me in the mountains."

"Oh, thanks; that will be jolly. What day shall I come?"

"I'll let you know later. By the way, did you hear that Mrs. Smartem is going to give a tea next Thursday? Yes. You can run the names of all the people that were at Shekels' tea last week. The same people will be there. And old Mrs. Gotrox is going to give a theatre party at the Columbia tomorrow night, to Miss Snobley. Just run in the same old gang for that, too, and just say after it's over that I looked radiant as usual. I'm sorry that I haven't more news for you, but really there's nothing doing these dull days, but if you want you may go to lunch with me today at the Grill just to make a paragraph. Will you go? All right. I'll meet you at twelve-thirty. Good-bye."

"Good-bye." —The Eavesdropper.

Today's Royalist

I'd like to have lived in the time of Queen Bess
When duels and battles were rife,
When swords were the popular form of redress,
And insults were paid for with life;
I'd like to have lived when the commoner dwelt
Apart, in a world of his own,
And died ere the time that he voiced what he felt
And placed his own spawn on the throne.

I'd like to have felt the self-satisfied thrill
Unlimited power can afford;
I'd like to have lived when the gentleman's will
Was urged at the point of his sword,
Instead of today, when "Equality's" rule
Puts "Rights" in the mouth of the clan,
When works of the sage can be jeered by the fool,
When master's no better than man.

I'd like to have lived when the ermine embraced
None other than royalty's form;
I'd like to have lived before caste was effaced
Beneath the mob's leveling storm;
I'd like to have lived when the form of restraint
Held commonwealth under the man,
And felt what it was to be free from the taint
Of "Liberty's" plebiscite ban.

Chief of Police Wittman's

Endorsement of the Three=Day Liquor Cure Institute

San Francisco, May 6, 1903.

Three-Day Liquor Cure Institute, 295 Geary Street, City.

Gentlemen: I am pleased to inform you that Mr. Rule of this city has written to me that he has been entirely cured from his old appetite for liquor. This is the gentleman that I recommended to your institute some time since for treatment for the Liquor Habit.

From all the evidence at hand the treatment in this case has been an entire success.

Very respectfully,

(Signed) GEORGE W. WITTMAN, Chief of Police

Rule's Thirst for Whisky Cured by Our Treatment

San Francisco, California.

Three-Day Liquor Cure Institute, 295 Geary Street, City.

Gentlemen: Through the earnest solicitation of my wife and the recommendation of the Chief of Police, George W. Wittman, I consented to take your treatment. I frankly admit that I was skeptical, but now, thank goodness, I have no desire nor do I feel like taking another drink. I have been a periodical drinker for a period of thirty-five years, but can state now that I am freer from the craving for liquor than I have been at any time during that long period. My appetite is good. I can go to bed and sleep and enjoy it. In fact, I feel like a new man. Wishing you a prosperous future, I am yours truly, (Signed) J. H. RULE.

These letters are fair samples of the thousands of testimonials testifying to the efficacy and reliability of our treatment. Every drinking man who will talk for a few moments with any of our ex-patients will be thoroughly convinced that our treatment is an absolute cure for alcoholism. The following city officials have vouched for the reliability of our cures: Judge Fritz, Judge Cabaniss, Chief of Police Wittman, and hundreds of prominent business and professional men, whose letters we have at our offices. Our treatment has never failed to restore to full vigor and manhood the most stubborn cases. Every patient who comes to our Institute is carefully examined and personally treated by Dr. E. A. Hawks, who has for eight years made a specialty of Alcoholism, and has permanently cured over 4,500 victims of the disease. No hypodermics or poisonous drugs are employed in our methods. Patients are not incapacitated for duty while undergoing our treatment. We effect a cure in three days by the use of internal remedies taken into the system by natural methods. Every possible precaution is taken to insure our patients absolute privacy and secrecy.

STAGE

Theatrical Plans Projected

All sorts of important theatrical plans are maturing these days. One hears that Harry Bishop, who has secured the lease to the Bouvier theatre now in course of erection, has made some combinations by which he expects to secure some very big attractions. It is said that he intends to run the theatre independent of the big syndicate and that he will play Hackett, Mrs. Fiske and several other great stars there. Other plans involve the future of the oldest of all our playhouses—the Tivoli. It has been frequently announced that Mrs. Kreling intended to tear down the old building in which music lovers have been regaled with light opera for a quarter of a century, and that she purposed building a fine modern theatre on the historic site. So often has the announcement been made that when it was last heard some months ago a cynical individual was heard to remark that it sounded as familiar as a Hartman joke. Now it is said that Mrs. Kreling intends to move her theatrical Lares and Penates over to the Olympia, and that an office building is to be erected on the Tivoli site. The Olympia is a substantial building and can easily be metamorphosed into a fine, commodious opera house. It is probably owing to the fact that Mrs. Kreling has been somewhat uncertain as to her future plans, and that she contemplated closing in order to build, that the Tivoli company has not been kept up to the old standard, but I hear that the new era in the history of the Tivoli will be opened in magnificent style, and that thereafter the house will maintain its reputation for enterprise in securing the very latest operas and musical successes. San Francisco has been music hungry of late, despite the presence of Mascagni and other stars. In the old days we heard new comic operas in the Tivoli almost as soon as they were produced in New York, and sometimes before, as in the case of "The Mikado," but in recent years we have been dreadfully behind the times. "San Toy" which is coming to the California is a delightful little opera which I heard in New York two years ago. "The Runaway Girl" is a musical comedy, even older than "San Toy," and there are several others such as "The Country Girl," "The Emerald Isle," "The Silver Slipper" and "The Chinese Honeymoon," which we have not heard yet. But let us hope that when the new Tivoli is born "Wang" and the perennial "Toymaker" will be permanently sidetracked, and we shall have the latest and the best, and no longer have reason to feel that we are off the theatrical map.

Graduates From Various Fields

Theatrical men are not usually born to their business. They jump to the stage or the box office from all walks of life. Sol Smith Russell was a printer, I have heard. George H. Broadhurst was a newspaper man. And George H. Davis, whom Belasco and Mayer have just promoted to be the manager of the Central theatre, came into theatricals from a down town commission house in which he was a partner. He was treasurer of the Central, became popular with the theatre's patrons when serving in that capacity, and now he is the manager. Charles Cook, whom Mr. Davis succeeds, has been in poor health for some time past. He has had wide experience in the theatrical line, and was for many years in the Hayman forces. At one time he was manager of the Macdonough. Ernest Howell, of the Central stock, was a reporter and then a real estate clerk when he thought he'd try acting awhile. Nobody thought he would stay long at his new occupation, but he has been on the stage long enough now to know it was what he was cut out for. He has the fattest part he has yet attempted in "The Romany Rye," a silk-hatted secondary to the principal villain. Charles Francis Bryant, who is to go East to assist Dave Belasco, was not bred to be a stage manager. George Lask did some newspaper work before he found his proper bent.

A Star and the Star

A great star of rosebuds was one of the floral offerings heaping the stage after the third act of "Heartsease" on Monday night. It was a neat tribute to the first appearance of White Whittlesey as an independent stellar attraction. Mr. Whittlesey had made a little speech in the first act, after the applause that accompanied his entrance, but he had to make another to go with his floral reception. He stammered a bit, and finally said he had been prepared with a speech, but he couldn't think of a line of it, so in a few unaffected words he thanked his audience. When Whittlesey was here before, he was always an adjunct to Florence Roberts, and though he made many friends he never could be quite sure that the plaudits coming to him were not meant for the feminine star. But his reception on Monday night should be evidence enough to him that he has many strong admirers here. The house was packed. "Heartsease" was always a favorite in Henry Miller's repertory, and every Miller season here the public insists upon at least one performance of the Klein-Clarke romantic comedy. It is a play packed full of heart interest and does not depend upon snappy epigrams or risque situations to make it go. The Alcazar people fit even better into their parts than was expected of them. Henry Shumer moved over from the Central to play the part of the villain, Sir Geoffrey Pomfret, and proved that the managerial judgment did not err when it gave him the part. Albert Morrison as the young Irishman is like a hero from one of the Agnes-Egerton Castle tales. George Osbourne gives a strong impersonation of the irascible father. and Miss Adele Belgarde is effective as Lady Neville, though if she had a better command of facial expression she could make a more satisfactory climax to the scene in which she listens rapturously to what she believes to be the avowals of love of Eric Temple. Of Mr. Whittlesey it should be said that he does not suffer by comparison in the role of Eric Temple with Mr. Henry Miller. The Miller interpretation may be more subtle but it is not more virile.

The Idol of the Girls

The matinee girl has polished up her lorgnette and replenished her caramel box, now that White Whittlesey is back at the Alcazar. There is no drama of romanticism that affords a greater plenitude of more wholly satisfying weeps than "Heartsease," and no actor whose personal pulchritude moves the feminine heartstrings to more violent agitation. When Whittlesey parts the portieres and steps into the limelight of the stage picture it is as if the fabled prince of the fairy tale stood revealed in proper person, and the matinee girl gasps and sighs and wishes that Heaven had made her such a man. Fortunately the fascinating Whittlesey has been endowed with brains, as well as good looks. There is fine intellectuality in his work and a freedom from the vain arrogance and affectation which the homage of weak women usually inspires in the object of their admiration. Whittlesey, younger than Drew and Belasco, more forceful than Faversham, as handsome as Hackett and less lachrymose than Miller, stands well the test of comparison with any and all of these flagrant and unblushing heartbreakers. The Alcazar people are going in for big productions of high class plays for Whittlesey. We are to see him later in "The Tyranny of Tears," "The Tree of Knowledge," "D'Arcy of the Guards" and other congenial comedies and dramas.

Gilbert Gardner carries off the honors in the production of Augustus Thomas' "On the Quiet" at the Grand this week. As Dr. Wolcott he does the best work of his long engagement in the stock company. His interpretation is well thought out and portrayed with infinitely more finish than we would expect from a comedian at a theatre where the bill is changed every week. Walter Perkins did better work as Jerome than as the eccentric hero Robert Ridgeway; however, he stirred the risibles of the audience almost as effectively as Willie Collier, for whom the part was made to order.

Flapdoodle and Criticism

The sprightly theatrical criticisms and interviews of Mr. Ashton Stevens have been missed by readers of the Examiner for two weeks. Mr. Stevens is taking a vacation in San Rafael. With Mr. Stevens away, theatregoers that like to read something more substantial than mere perfunctory booming of plays and player-folks after first night performances, have some difficulty in achieving gratification. In my opinion theatrical managers should be more pleased with honest criticism, even though it be severe at times, than with the stereotyped flapdoodle that passes for criticism in most of the dailies nowadays. Uniform praise of every old thing that comes along leads to indifference on the part of the public as to what is written by those that never condemn even when condemnation is justified. But when the critic who damns occasionally with more than faint praise, enthuses ecstatically over a performance of exceptional merit, the effect is immediately felt in the box-office.

Writing a Drama for Barney

Barney Bernard will never be satisfied until he is out of burlesque. His ambition, like that of all comedians, is to make people weep as well as laugh, and he is eager to follow in the footsteps of Dave Warfield by appearing in legitimate comedy. He recently heard a story full of dramatic interest that developed during a trial in one of our courts, and he has engaged a local playwright to dramatize it.

Not the least feature of E. H. Sothern's production of "If I Were King" are the pictures to be presented of old Paris. It was originally intended by Mr. Sothern's parents that he should be an artist and for a number of years he studied painting in some of the most celebrated studios of London. This early training helped him greatly in his stage career and while Justin Huntley McCarthy's researches into history have laid the foundations for the different scenes, Mr. Sothern's artistic insight has helped to give them form and color.

Margaret Anglin is to come to San Francisco, after all the talk con, with the Henry Miller company. Probably when she comes the truth may be learned as to whether she is or is not to marry Miller, in case his wife grants him legal freedom.

Mary Hampton played the daughter in that memorable production at the Baldwin of "Aristocracy" in which Blanche Walsh was the wife, Barrymore the American husband and Faversham the foreign nobleman.

Wm. B. Hooper, Manager San Francisco

Just a little while ago the London gossips were talking about Lawrence Irving's devotion to Alice Neilsen, and now Sir Henry's son has married one Mabel Hackney. Young Irving and Ethel Barrymore were once engaged, but the latter's melancholy temperament did not go well with the buoyant disposition of his fiancee and they broke their engagement.

Her Great Promise

With a voice of rare quality, and not a little technique at her command, Mademoiselle Antonia Dolores (Trebelli) arouses expectations to which she does not quite come up. The hearer never is, but always to be, thrilled; and the end is disappointment rather than delight, the heart becoming sick by reason of the deferring of hope. During the "Lo! Hear the Gentle Lark" number, with its flute obligato, expectancy was at its height, and the recall had that passionate ring in it that is ever pleasant to hear. Throughout the whole performance (or should I say, promise?) the applause was generous; the audience being very willing to pay its praise in advance. If a capacity for taking infinite pains is the first attribute of genius, Mr. Newell is not a genius. His work is damned by indolence, indifference. He gives you the impression that he could play well if he thought it (or you) worth the trouble. To assume such an attitude toward an audience is, to say the least, impolite, impolitic and inartistic.

The news has gone forth on the Rialto that the Nance O'Neil company will shortly be here, direct from St. Paul, to play a six weeks' engagement at the Republic. The company has been touring since leaving here, taking in Los Angeles, Portland, Seattle, Salt Lake City, Denver, Springfield and other cities. There was plenty of artistic success all along the line, but not such a great financial triumph as was expected.

L. H. Bishop, one of the stockholders of the Grand Opera House, and for a long time past the theatre's business manager, has resigned, I hear, from that post to go into the theatrical advertising business with the Al Dodge Co. Mr. Bishop is one of the most popular theatrical men on the coast.

Features of Next Week's Bills

Mary Mannering originally intended to produce a new play for the final week of her engagement but she has deemed it advisable to keep the Fitch comedy on. Matinees will be given Wednesday and Saturday of "The Stubbornness of Geraldine." E. H. Sothern in "If I Were King" comes next, and Mr. Sothern will hold you for awhile. Theatregoers will find the Sothern engagement to be one of the greatest treats they ever had.

Everything is in readiness for the opening of the pretentious season of musical comedy at the California. The Augustin Daly musical company of eighty people, direct from Daly's theatre, New York, arrived on Thursday by special train. The opening piece will be "A Runaway Girl," a musical comedy that has been famous for its phenomenal runs and its tuneful qualities. The house is practically sold out for the opening night and the audience promises to be as smart a one as has turned out to a theatrical event this season. The pieces to follow "A Runaway Girl" will be "The Circus Girl," "A Gaiety Girl," and "San Toy."

"Heartsease" goes for another week at the Alcazar.

"My Friend from India" will be the vehicle in which Walter E. Perkins will say au revoir to San Francisco. The Du Souchet farce is exceedingly popular here. Sunday evening, May thirty-first, the first production of Rogers Bros.' musical eccentricity, "In Washington," will be given in this city. The Rogers Bros.' productions pack the Eastern theatres in which they are presented. The Grand Opera House management has purchased the entire scenery and costumes used in the New York productions, and have brought from that city a splendid company, which is headed by Raymond & Caverly. Among the other features will be a chorus of fifty beautiful girls, specially selected by Charles H. Jones, the famous stage manager, from the "Florodora," "King Dodo," "Nancy Brown" and "Princess Chic" companies. The orchestra will consist of twenty-one picked musicians, and the leader of it will be Geo. P. Towle, late musical director of Daly's, the Casino and the Bijou theatres of New York. Seats will be on sale at the box office of the Grand Opera House Monday morning.

Edwin Stevens will be heard in the Hopper role of Don Medigua, Arthur Cunningham as Don Cazarro and Annie Myers as his daughter. Webb is the chamberlain, Pozzo, and Caro Roma is the wife of Medigua. Bertha Davis is cast for Isabel, the heroine, and Lee is the young lover. The opera will be beautifully costumed and there will be a number of elaborate marches.

As much interest has been displayed regarding "Fiddle Dee Dee," since its revival at Fischer's, as on the occasion of the first production here. The box office is literally besieged with orders for tickets and it seems as if all San Francisco were once more flocking to see the burlesque. "Twirly Whirly," the last one of the Weber & Field's successes, will follow, and it is going to be another big production.

At the Orpheum Mary Hampton will appear with a competent company in a satirical comedietta by Edmund Day, "The Melodrama"; during the action of the piece she will appear in three distinct characters. The Permane brothers, English clowns, direct from the Folies Bergere, Paris, will appear for the first time in America in their original act, "The Nightingale's Courtship." Zelma Rawlston, character impersonator and "fashion plate," comes back after a three years' success in London and Eastern cities. Kartelli, crack wire performer, comes highly praised by the Eastern press. The Baileys, a colored comedy sketch team, will be new. The Whitney brothers will change their selections, Martini and Max Millian will present a new illusion styled "The Mysterious Automobile," and the Freydo brothers will continue their acrobatic act.

At the Chutes Kraton, who has been creating a sensation in the principal Eastern vaudeville houses, will make his first appearance in this city, as will also Christy and Willis, the "tramp juggler and the premier danseuse." John J. Welch, dancing comedian, will show the latest steps and Jessie Dale, the California baritone, will sing illustrated songs for the first time here.

From Frawley to Irving

Another California girl has broken into the charmed circle of the English stage. Elizabeth Stewart, who left here with the Neill-Frawley company last August, has been engaged by the management of Sir Henry Irving's company to play in the cast with the great Englishman. Miss Stewart is not only the first Californian to attain the distinction of an engagement with Irving, but she is perhaps the first American woman to enter the London dramatic arena through the back door. She was playing in India with the Frawleys when an agent of Irving made her the offer to proceed to London and join the famous company there. Needless to say she accepted at once, and despite the loss to Frawley, he allowed her to sever her contract, and all her associates bade her Godspeed from Rangoon. Miss Stewart and Miss Eva Dennison were the two pretty girls of the Frawley company in its present Oriental tour. I except Miss Mary Van Buren, for a torrid sun has played havoc with her looks, and though at last hearing she still preserved the magnificent plenitude of charms which made her figure so attractive, yet her complexion is utterly gone. Three months of Manila, with other months in Burma, Siam and the Straits' Settlements are enough to ruin any skin. The Frawleys have sailed for Australia, I understand, and will play a long time in that country. They had a rather successful trip in India after a disastrous one in Manila, and anticipate a paying stay in Australia. They will return here by way of Honolulu.

In the Bard's Plays

There is to be a great revival of Shakespearean plays next season. Our old favorite Wilton Lackaye, who was once a matinee idol, but who has been devoting himself to character work of late years, is to be starred in "The Merchant of Venice." Those of us who saw his Rabbi in "The Children of the Ghetto" should be quite confident of his ability to play Shylock. Viola Allen is to appear in "Twelfth Night." Warde and James are to produce "The Tempest," "Othello" and "Julius Cæsar," and they are to attempt a Broadway run. Heretofore they have been content to appear in the provinces. The nearest they ever got to Broadway was the Harlem Opera House. Mrs. Fiske is to appear in "Macbeth" and "Much Ado About Nothing." Nat Goodwin will make his second Shakespearean attempt but not in anything so serious as "The Merchant of Venice," in which he once appeared with sad results. He is anxious to produce "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and play Nick Bottom the weaver. Mr. Sothern will play "Julius Cæsar" and Henriettta Crosman will open the season in "As You Like It."

The Kicker Had Kicked

In Mr. Robert Edeson's supporting company is a young man who has earned for himself the title of the "Genial Kicker." Strangely enough he is possessed of a distinctly agreeable disposition and a nature commonly alluded to as "willing." Nevertheless when requested to perform some additional task he raises innumerable objections, then, after he has relieved his mind, placidly does what is asked of him. The other night Mr. Edeson called him to his dressing-room to inform him that Mr. Harris, his manager, had assigned him an extra bit of work in "Soldiers of Fortune."

Mr. Edeson, astonished, exclaimed, "Why don't you kick?"

"Mr. Harris told me about it today," he replied.

"Oh, then you have kicked," said Mr. Edeson.

Dorothy Dorr, who is to be a prima donna in a new opera next season, is in private life the wife of Harry J. W. Dam, formerly of San Francisco, now of London and New York. Miss Dorr is a Boston girl, daughter of an Army surgeon, but she made most of her stage successes in England. She played an engagement as leading lady at the Alcazar a few seasons back, but she did not catch the favor of the theatre's patrons. They thought her too mature for the roles given her. She is a handsome woman, with a figure running somewhat to excess of avoirdupois.

Lily Langtry has become what on this side of the Atlantic we call a "syndicated star." In her South African tour she will be supported by local stock companies in the cities where she plays.

Sothern in "If I were King" and Amelia Bingham in "The Climbers" are near Columbia futures. —The Playgoer.

MUSIC

Ragtime vs. National Airs

Professor Georg Eduard of the Northwestern University says that the day of "America," "The Star Spangled Banner" and all other national airs is past, and that ragtime has supplanted them. "'Hot Time' today stirs the hearts of Americans more than any other tune," declares Professor Eduard; "American soldiers have sung it around the world. The charge up San Juan hill was made to its music, the band played it when the United States troops were entering Peking, and today they are singing it in the Philippines." They also sang it at the golden banquet given in honor of Roosevelt, and the President joined in with vim. But ragtime was not more popular than national airs at that banquet. Henry Heyman directed the music and he chose most of it with a view of keeping the guests' vivacity at white heat. He gave them "Marching Thro' Georgia," "Suwanee Riber," and "The Star Spangled Banner." He also gave them "God Save the King," which was that to the Britishers present, and "America" to the Americans. The President himself requested several of his favorites. The orchestra, by the way, was a picked one, selected from our best musicians, who with their leader came in for many compliments on their artistic work.

The Carrick Recital

Miss Mary Carrick, pupil of Hugo Mansfeldt and a graduate of Notre Dame College, will give a Liszt piano recital in Steinway hall on Monday evening. She has devoted much study to the works of the Abbe; her execution is said to be very facile and her power of interpretation remarkable. Miss Carrick is a San Francisco girl. The program to be rendered at the recital will include: Praeludium C dur, Schubert's "Du Bist die Kuh," Legende St. Francois d'Assise—La Predication aux Oiseaux (first time here), Mephisto Walzer No. 2, Grosses Konzert, solo E moll, eight movements (first time here), Etude de Concert, Lied transcribed by Hugo Mansfeldt, Tarantella, Venezia e Napoli, Romanza from "Tannhauser," Waldesrauschen, Hungarian Rhapsody No. 8. Such a program sounds ambitious for a young, inexperienced woman, but Mr. Mansfeldt says Miss Carrick can play it. He is a great Liszt exponent himself and was a pupil of Liszt at the same time Rosenthal studied under the great master.

The Barton Concert

Maple Hall was well filled on the occasion of the first concert of the Barton Choral Society, and the appreciation of the audience, in conjunction with the artistic character of the performance, augurs well for the future success of the society. The first part of the program consisted of songs composed by Gerard Barton and rendered by well known vocalists. The part songs were especially successful, the beautiful blending of the voices bringing out the harmonies in a fine manner. Miss Marian Robinson was excellent in the two Shakespearean songs. "A Lover and His Lass" is really one of the triumphs of song-making. It is the true lyric spirit and the lilt of the refrain is wonderfully catchy. It is one of those rare instances where the music does full justice to the words. Ruth Estelle Weston gave a charming interpretation of "The Rosary." Her voice is sympathetic and her method better than the average. S. Homer Henley was effective in his sea song, "The Man at the Wheel," words by Robert Cameron Rogers. Mr. Barton has furnished a ringing, swinging melody, and the whole has a breeziness which ought to make it a favorite song with bassos. The four-part "Serenade," words by Samuel Minturn Peck, was a beautiful number. The second part of the program consisted of the cantata of "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast," music by S. Coleridge-Taylor. The barbaric opening chords on the piano at once challenge attention, and the peculiar swinging rhythm of the vocal part holds it to the end. The work is mainly chorus, and is somewhat of a recitative, the most melodious part being the one solo, which fell to the lot of Mr. Herbert Williams, the tenor. Mr. Williams's pure and expressive voice did full justice to the beauty of the part. Mr. Gerard Barton directed, and Mrs. Carolyn H. Barton accompanied in a masterly manner. The part songs were in the hands of Grace Marshall and Mary Carpeneto Mead, sopranos, Marian E. B. Robinson, contralto, Herbert Williams, tenor, and S. Homer Henley, basso. Many of Mr. Barton's songs are new and still in manuscript.

Madame Eugenia Mantelli, the celebrated grand opera contralto, will arrive here shortly prior to the opening of her Pacific Coast concert tour, which begins in Los Angeles on Tuesday of this week. She appears in a series of operatic recitals such as in which she has won renown in three continents. She will appear in evening dress and in costume, singing excerpts from "Carmen," "The Barber of Saville," "Samson and Delilah," "The Huguenots," "Faust," and "Mignon," as well as several beautiful English selections. Madame Mantelli was for five years a leading Italian contralto with the Maurice Grau opera company. When the organization was last in California she did not come with it as she was specially engaged that season as prima donna of the Royal Opera in Lisbon. Next autumn Mantelli will sing in opera in Berlin, Hamburg and Vienna, where she is a great favorite. She recently returned from South Africa where she sang in Buenos Ayres, Rio Janeiro, Montevideo, Valpariso, Santiago de Chili, Lima and other cities of importance.

A piano recital will be given on Tuesday evening in Steinway hall by Gertrude Fleming, a ten year old pianist, a pupil of Mr. Rudolf Forster. Little Miss Fleming has been studying music since she was six, and her repertory includes such composers as Chopin, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Bach, Mozart and Scharwenka. She also sings, and at her recital will render Gounod's "Ave Maria."

An interesting musicale, and very largely attended, was given recently at the College of Notre Dame in San Jose by Mrs. H. H. Sherwood and her three children, May, Avis and Warner, assisted by Samuel Adelstein. The Sisters and their guests thoroughly enjoyed the program, which included instrumental quartets, 'cello, violin, lute, mandolin, piano and soprano solos. It was a well chosen and well rendered program.

At Paul Elder's book shop this evening will be given "An Evening with Wagner," by Miss Annie Wilson, pianiste, and Warren Hastings Olney, baritone.

The concert under Mr. Pasmore's direction on Wednesday night, and the Loring Club concert on Thursday, occurred too late in the week to be reviewed in this issue. —The Music Critic.

"The Lieutenant Governor"

Now that "The Lieutenant Governor," which made its appearance in the Smart Set last January, has been brought out in book form, it is attracting general attention and causing more comment than so short a story usually occasions. It is a sort of "Lady or the Tiger" proposition, and one that no man would care to have forced upon him for solution. In the State of Allegania, a reform party of young and enthusiastic men has developed sufficient political strength to make itself troublesome to the heretofore dominant Labor Party. The result is what it often is, a compromise in which the inexperienced reformers are led to believe that they are getting a share of the plums and a chance to prove themselves. The successful State ticket is made up of Elijah Abbott, a practical politician, a Labor candidate, who expects and intends to spend the rest of his life in a comfortable berth, and John Barclay, a Reformer, young, enthusiastic and ambitious. It does not take Barclay long to discover that in spite of his office as Lieutenant Governor, he is as powerless as a cypher. Rathbawne, the proprietor of the mills upon which the city of Kenton practically depends for existence, is a just, fair man. He has spent the principal part of his life in building up his business, and at the time that the story opens he and it are prosperous, and his hands content. Fifteen recent additions to its force were incompetent, and were discharged, and McGrath, labor leader, demands their immediate reinstatement, with the alternative of a strike. Rathbawne is obstinate. He claims the right to conduct his business in his own way, and the strike is called. Barclay, the Lieutenant Governor, is engaged to Natalie, the daughter of the mill owner, and Governor Abbott, urged by McGrath, attempts to coerce Rathbawne through Barclay. But Barclay refuses to be made a tool. Then follow the usual results of a strike, drinking, disorder in the streets, and inflammatory newspaper articles. Rathbawne applies to the authorities for protection for his property and is refused on the grounds that he is in no danger, and as the Labor party is in power, he is informed that he can put an end to the difficulty by conceding everything. The mills are set on fire, and the fire department is as slow in responding as were the police, and things go from bad to worse. The Governor is petitioned to send the militia to restore order, but he denies that there is anything which calls for interference, and the reign of terror continues. At this juncture the Deus ex machina appears in the person of Spencer Cavendish, a former suitor of Natalie Rathbawne. He has tasted the depths of dissipation, and it is owing to the friendship of the Lieutenant Governor that he has been restored to something like respectability. Since Rathbawne will not surrender to the labor union and Governor Abbott will not protect the Rathbawne mills from destruction, the only way to end the struggle seems to be to remove one of the opponents. Cavendish shoots the Governor dead, leaving the way open for Barclay to succeed him and rescue the community. From a remark made by Cavendish at the moment of the tragedy, taken in connection with his dissipated habits, there is some reasonable doubt as to his sanity. Only Barclay and Natalie know what Cavendish referred to and that he was probably never more sane in his life. Now comes the problem. Cavendish has been sentenced to death. The day of execution is at hand, but a petition for commutation of his sentence has been circulated and has received a large number of signatures, both from doubts as to his responsibility, and from the acknowledgment that in spite of the crime he was a public benefactor. Now, what should John Barclay do under the circumstances? Should he be governed by the law and his own knowledge, and let the execution take place, or should he temper justice with mercy, and reprieve the prisoner? What would you or I do? What Barclay did readers must find out for themselves, but Guy Wetmore Carryl has given them an opportunity to do some sober thinking.

"Mr. Claghorn's Daughter"

Hilary Trent's novel, "Mr. Claghorn's Daughter," has made its appearance in the very nick of time, apropos of the revision of the Westminster Confession, which it is now decided shall be undertaken immediately. The story concerns chiefly the fate of the daughter of one Mr. Claghorn and the son of another. The Claghorns are an old New England family, descendants of a Mayflower ancestor, Presbyterians of the bluest dye, and following the ministry as a calling. The Mr. Claghorn who had the daughter started in the traditional way, with a family name and a course at a theological seminary, but having inherited a comfortable fortune, he left home, name, and calling, and became as French as circumstances would permit. His daughter he brought up without religious instruction of any kind, and it was her fate to marry a cousin who had all the New England traits and family traditions intensified. While Natalie's father believed that since evil could not be exterminated, the wisest course to pursue with children, who sooner or later, must make its acquaintance, is to give them a judicious knowledge of facts, Leonard has been trained under the opposite course, being kept isolated and ignorant. Which proved the more rational in the end is one of the points which Mr. Trent has elucidated by example. The religious problem, whether any one conscientiously believing and accepting the doctrine of election and foreordination and the damnation of infants who have committed no transgressions, can conscientiously marry and become parents, is somewhat forcibly put in Amelia Barr's "Prisoners of Conscience." Her characters were Celtic fishermen, while Mr. Trent deals with educated New Englanders, but the effect is the same, as far as conscience is concerned. Though the Westminster Confession is put on trial avowedly in this book, the extremely high branch of the Episcopalian high church is also pilloried. Leonard Claghorn's professed acceptance of the last comma and period of the Presbyterian creed and "Father" Camoril's affectation of practices which were ultra-doctrinal and beyond the man's capacity to keep come to grief alike, but it is not to be concluded from this that religion is in any sense derided or decried in the book. Those who have no interest in doctrinal points will find plenty to interest them in the wifely devotion of Natalie, the innocence of Paula, and the shrewd common sense of Achsah, the New England spinster, or Mrs. Joe Claghorn by marriage, and her ambitions, matrimonial and otherwise, for her son Mark. How the portions dealing with religious questions will be received is a matter of how much of the Westminster Confession is accepted. Those who, like Leonard Claghorn, believe or think they believe in it, will probably cry aloud at the sacrilege, but those who have professed no allegiance will pass the matter over as of no particular consequence. [Published by J. S. Ogilvie, New York.]

The Ella Wheeler of London

The essays which Mrs. Flora Anne Steele is contributing to the London Saturday Night are attracting widespread attention for a peculiar reason. Mrs. Steele is so well known as a writer of fiction, and so justly admired for her work in that field of literature, that when Saturday Night made its announcement that she would be a regular weekly contributor, readers sat up and wiped their spectacles, prepared to enjoy an exceptional feast of good things. But Mrs. Steele has not come up to expectations. Even the least exacting are forced to admit their disappointment and to wonder how she can manage to be so weary, flat, stale and unprofitable. In both matter and manner her essays resemble nothing so much as a "letter from the people," in which a demand is made for some reform on the principle that the thing is wrong and "somebody ought to know about it." One of the latest of Mrs. Steele's contributions concerns the substitution of the trained nurse in the place of the wife and mother. The article has been copied in whole or in part and widely commented on, but the personality of the author has been of such small consequence that in every instance it has been attributed to some disgruntled male, who, in all likelihood, has been catalogued as one of the army of John Bulls who "write to the Times about it" every time they lose the tags from their boot laces.

The New Mining Exchange

The first session of the recently organized San Francisco and Tonopah Mining Exchange was held Monday morning in the Exchange room on the ground floor of the Mills building. The remarkable development of the Tonopah mining district is shown in the large number of mining companies already on the call list and the opening session of the board was characterized with spirited bidding for shares, which resulted in a good volume of business. The new organization started under most auspicious conditions, with seventy-four members. Henry C. Cutting is president; Emile E. Kahn, vice-president, J. S. Ewen, treasurer, and Louis Hagen, secretary. Two open sessions are tto be held daily, at 11 a. m. and 2:30 p. m., and investors as well as the general public are invited to be present.

The Gas Stock Flim-Flam

Trading during the past week has been of good proportions with noticeable activity in gas and powder shares. Transactions have been quite general, however, and while sales of some stocks have been comparatively light, the greater portion of the list has been fairly well represented. Prices remain quite steady and with few exceptions the fluctuations have been kept within narrow limits. The usual periodical boom in San Francisco Gas & Electric shares has been successfully worked on the public once more and the speculators have the gold coin and the people the certificates of stock. In the course of a few days it may be expected that the speculators will again have the shares of stock, but at reduced figures, the people, as usual, standing the loss. It does seem remarkable that this scheme can be worked so frequently on the public as during the last three months. Judging from the volume of business and the reports on the street the losses to the investing public must have been enormous, while the gain to the speculative interests has been correspondingly great. Early in the week certain speculators proceeded to create a demand for San Francisco Gas & Electric shares by circulating the report, in an apparently quiet way, that negotiations were again resumed and under way for a consolidation of all the lighting plants. About this same time certain orders to buy San Francisco Gas & Electric shares were conveniently placed and acting under the impulse of what appeared to be a nice inside tip, the investing public commenced to bite and seek shares of this stock. This sent the price upward again and the speculative interests which had bought liberally during the period of depression a week before had stock to sell, of course, at an advance. The outside people bought extensively and when the speculators had disposed of their stock and pocketed the proceeds the rumor gained currency on the street that the proposed deal was again off. This, of course, weakened the price of shares and with the downward movement in price, many buyers who purchased for a quick turn sold so that the loss would be as small as possible. This will further weaken the stock and enable the speculators to buy it in again at the reduced figures. It will doubtless be but a short time before some more shadowy rumors are upon the street tending to show that more negotiations are in progress. This will be the sign that the speculators have again got the stock in hand to float upon the unsuspecting public as soon as the buying orders of the latter assume sufficient proportions to force prices upward. Within a few days these same speculative interests who are manipulating San Francisco Gas & Electric shares have caused the statement to be given out that all negotiations were off as far as the Equitable Company is concerned. It was stated that the holders of the Equitable option were exorbitant and so forced those who were to finance the operation to withdraw. From the most reliable sources this is known to be absolutely false, and as a matter of fact the deal thus far has not fallen through. It is said that the balance of the indebtedness of the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company to the San Francisco Gas Light Company has been paid and that the directors of the latter corporation will hold a meeting within a few days and probably declare a dividend of $1.50 a share.

Other Stock Gossip

Giant Powder stock has been very firm and little can be had at less than $74.50, while most holders are asking $75, with few disposed to sell at the latter figure. The proposition for a consolidation of the various local powder companies is said to be making very satisfactory progress. From an inside source the plan is said to be to appoint appraisers to value the plants and assets of the various corporations, to estimate the earning power of each, and with this as a basis fix upon a price to be paid shareholders in their respective companies. By such a consolidation there is expected to be a marked reduction in the cost of maintenance, and also less expense incident to the cost of marketing the product. It is also believed that in consequence of the large increase in the cost of both labor and supply that the price of powder is too low and that the best way to effect an increase in the price, without compelling the consumers to pay higher rates is to reduce the cost of production by consolidating competing companies. Sugar shares have developed considerable strength during the week, and while transactions have not been extensive the paucity of business has been more due to the strong confidence of holders in future valuation rather than to any lack of demand for shares. Hawaiian Commercial has sold in small parcels at $47.75 to $48, but there is scarcely any of the stock to be had at less than $48.50. In the same way $18.50 is the asking price for Paauhau and while there is good demand at that figure the offers to sell are very light, Makaweli is held firmly at $26 with most holders demanding $27. Hutchison Plantation is steady with $15.50 bid and $15.52 1-2 asked. Onomea is wanted at $22.50, but the lowest asking price is $23.50. Bank of California shares have been steadily advancing and the lowest price is $650 per share. Other bank shares remain about steady. Spring Valley Water stock is a shade stronger and sells from $84.75 to $85. The company paid a dividend of 42c. a share on the 20th. Oceanic Steamship shares are offered at $8.75, but no one seems willing to buy at anything above $8. Sales of bonds have been moderate and prices have been generally well sustained, with fluctuations small and unimportant.

A Revolutionary Puzzle

The following is taken from a collection of odd rhymes and curious stories. It can be read in three different ways. First, read the whole as it is written; second, read downward on the left of the comma in the middle of each line; third, read the lines downward on the right of the comma. By the first reading the Revolutionary cause is condemned, by the other two it is praised:

Hark! hark! the trumpet sounds, the din of war's 'larms,
O'er seas and solid grounds, doth call us to arms.
Who for King George doth stand, their honors soon shall shine.
Their ruin is at hand, who with the Congress join.
The Acts of Parliament, in them I much delight,
I hate their cursed intent, who for the Congress fight.
The Tories of the day, they are my daily toast,
They soon will sneak away, who independence boast.
Who non-resistant hold, they have my heart and hand,
May they for slaves be sold, who act a Whiggish part.
On Mansfield, North and Bute, may daily blessings pour,
Confusion and dispute, on Congress evermore;
To North and British lord, may honors still be done.
I wish a block and cord, to General Washington.

Thackeray on Death

In one of his letters Thackeray wrote: "I can't pity anybody who leaves the world, not even a fair young girl in her prime; I pity those remaining. On her journey, if it please God to send her, depend on it there's no cause for grief, that's but an earthly condition. Out of our stormy life, and brought nearer the Divine light and warmth, there must be a serene climate. Can't you fancy sailing into the calm? Would you care about going on the voyage, but for the dear souls left on the other shore? but we shan't be parted from them, no doubt, though they are from us. Add a little more intelligence to that which we possess even as we are, and why shouldn't we be with our friends, though ever so far off? * * Why, presently, the body removed, shouldn't we personally be everywhere at will—properties of Creation, like the electric something (spark is it?) that thrills all around the globe simultaneously? and if around the globe why not Ueberall? and the body being removed or elsewhere disposed of and developed, sorrow and its opposite, crime and the reverse, ease and disease, desire and dislike, etc., go along with the body—a lucid Intelligence remains, a Perception ubiquitous."

Other People's Ideas

From "The Under Side of Things," by Lillian Bell:

An idol of the people is on so insecure a footing that it behooves one who aspires to that slippery elevation to look well to what sort of a cushion is beneath him, unless he likewise aspires to broken bones and bruised feelings, for by a single 'Thumbs down' he is apt to find himself shaken up, out of breath, and dizzy from his fall. A social idol, a belle, is, perhaps, in the most precarious situation of all.

A man with a conscience will sacrifice his head and his bodily comfort to his ideal of duty, but he clings tenaciously to his heart's desire, and yields that last of all. A woman with a conscience often makes a burnt-offering of her heart from pure altruism. Men call such a woman a saint—or cold.

It is queer, what a curious effect daylight has on love, and odd, how many of the kinks the moon puts in that the sun takes out.

Is anything more maddening than to go ambling peacefully along in life, smiling at the world and harming nobody, and suddenly dash your head against the stone wall of provincial virtue and lie on your back for awhile seeing red and green stars?

There is an element of viciousness in the virtue of a small town which is worse than loose-slippered liberality.

It really would be a delightful as well as a most instructive thing if a man occasionally could exchange places with the woman he loves and view his actions through her eyes. Perhaps he might better understand her causeless jealousies and her unreasonable way of holding him to account for quite harmless diversions. He might see how the moments he spends with other girls seem to lengthen out into the basis of a good quarrel—so different are men's eyes from women's. It would benefit them in the same degree that a year's travel benefits a provincial youth. He learns a new point of view.

Our Wide-Open Town

San Francisco has been a wide-open town for some months and nobody appears to care whether it be reformed or not. The reformer is evidently in a state of hibernation; his vocation is gone. In prosperous times, when people are happy, they have no use for reformers. The reformer is of the grumbler species, and contented people regard the grumbler as a bore. However the phenomenon is worth noting that San Francisco is today enjoying all the freedom and privileges of a wide-open town, and that not a protest is uttered against the various forms of vice that are permitted to thrive, by either press or pulpit. The festive gambler is abroad on the highways and the byways looking for victims, confidence operators are operating with impunity, the deadfalls of the slums are in full blast, and nobody cares a tinker's imprecation. We are evidently growing more tolerant of vice, and less suspicious of the authorities. The public conscience is off duty. And in view of the popular quiescence there appears to be no occasion for the sounding of an alarm. It is the modern notion that in a seaport town vice should not be altogether discouraged, but if so, laws should be passed granting license to those that provide entertainment for the vicious and the unwary. The vice that is tolerated in a wide-open town is not to be deplored so much as the evils that flow from a lax administration of the law. When the authorities are no longer inspired by a sense of duty to enforce the law, and when it becomes optional with them to enforce it or to permit infraction thereof, they soon take advantage of the looseness of the situation and profit by the freedom of action they enjoy. Enterprises conducted in violation of law usually yield great profits to those engaged in the illicit business and the authorities that permit the unlawful traffic do so in most instances because they have been paid for immunity. The police, for instance, permit crime when they are bribed to do so, and when the police authorities of a great city are corrupt personal and property rights are in jeopardy. There is no reason why the consequences that have flowed from police corruption in Chinatown should be confined to the denizens of that district. Originally the Chinese paid for permission to gamble, but we have lately learned that to fully enjoy the special privilege, they deemed it advisable to engage in the wholesale assassination business. The police winked at murder as easily as they did at fan-tan and Chinese lottery. What reason have we to suppose that the police may enter into co-partnership with the white lottery dealers and the crap gamblers, without promoting other and more serious crimes? Of course we have no positive proof that the police authorities are in league with the white gamblers, but the evidence is sufficiently strong to convince any sane person. It would not be admissible in a properly constituted court, but before the bar of Public Opinion it would undoubtedly secure a verdict. The police authorities are neither fools nor children. They know that the white lottery business is conducted openly in this city. They know by whom it is conducted, and they know that four thousand dollars a month is paid by the lottery gamblers for advertising purposes in the daily newspapers. Is it reasonable to suppose that the police grant them immunity through a spirit of charity? Among men about town it is pretty generally understood that no gambler would dare open a crap game without first obtaining permission to do so from the Chief of Police. There are half a dozen crap games running in this city, and Chief of Police Wittman is a wise police officer. To assume that he does not know that those crap games are running is to discount his sagacity. If we assume that he is permitting them to run then we must believe either that he is corrupt or that some one higher in authority is sharing in the profits of the gamblers.

Rockefeller's Unclean Coin

The Examiner thinks that popular opposition in Nebraska to the acceptance of John D. Rockefeller's gift of sixty-seven thousand dollars to the State University is unwise. Many people think that Standard Oil money is not clean and that an institution of learning ought to reject it as polluting. The Examiner says this is a counsel of perfection, too lofty quite for guidance in practical affairs; that no matter how Mr. Rockefeller obtained his money, it is in his possession, and if he wishes to do good with some of it, that wish, in justice, should be set down to his credit. Unfortunately the position taken by the Examiner is the attitude of the public toward all successful crooks. It is only the convicted rogue that suffers. So long as a prosperous rogue keeps out of jail he enjoys social recognition even from people who know him to be a malefactor. Social ostracism is not the penalty imposed on wrongdoers. Every day we meet men that fattened off illicit perquisites in public office, and we do not shun them. Therefore we do not discourage corruption in public office save by laws that cannot be enforced except when legal evidence of guilt is obtained. If the people of Nebraska believe that Standard Oil money is unclean then they should not accept favors from Mr. Rockefeller, for by doing so they would assist in building up for him a reputation for philanthropy. No community should contribute to such a reputation by accepting ill-gotten funds. There is a principle of public morals involved which is of more importance than the pecuniary profit to the commonwealth.

Mr. Rockefeller and all men of his class should be forced to shrink from the withering blast of public scorn, that others might be deterred from following their unwholesome example. If Mr. Rockefeller desires to enjoy the consciousness of good deeds let him make anonymous contributions to charity.

Widespread Labor Troubles

Must capital take a holiday? is the question propounded some days ago by the New York Sun anent the announcement by the Lehigh Valley Railroad of the abandonment of plans for extensive improvements which had been invited by the growth of trade and the accumulation of profits. It does seem as though capital is preparing to take a holiday. It also seems that a crisis is approaching in industrial affairs. The Lehigh company abandoned its plans for improvements because the profits of the corporaion were threatened with diminution through an increase of burdens imposed by organized labor. Social agitation and strikes are seriously interfering with the usual methods of distributing wealth in the East, and capital is threatening to take a holiday all along the line. If capital retire from the field industrial activity will cease, and the troubles of organized labor will begin. Clashes between labor and capital are occurring with great frequency on the other side of the Rockies, and the strain is becoming so intense that a break must soon occur. Lynn, Mass., is suffering from one of the bitterest labor wars that have ever been waged. It has been in progress since January, and no question of wages is involved. Moreover the labor agitators have no grievance against capital. It is a fight of organized labor against organized labor, resulting from a difference between two unions. In Chicago a food famine looms up by reason of a strike of butchers, bakers, confectioners and waiters. There is a teamsters' strike in New Haven and Yale students are acting as scabs. There are fifty-two hundred men on a strike in Denver. The subway laborers are on a strike in New York, but the contractors are filling the places of the strikers. There is a street railroad strike in Bridgeport, Connecticut, but the cars are being operated by scabs. There is a tie-up of the builders' trades in New York, and a defensive organization is being organized by the employers. So it is evident that dissatisfaction is widespread, and that the labor problem is as far from solution as ever. If capital should decide to take a holiday the walking delegate would find it expedient to do the same.

Our Slow Mails

When the authorities at Washington finish the investigation of the postal frauds in all their ramifications we shall take great pleasure in suggesting that they endeavor to improve the postal service in this city. Moreover, we shall make an urgent appeal that something be done toward facilitating work in the local post office. The postal service in this city is deplorable. It is worse, for it is a disgrace to the government. If Postmaster Montague filled the orders received in his stove store with no greater despatch than he exhibits in distributing the mails he would soon be compelled to retire from business, for his trade would drift away. The local officials appear to be utterly incapable of handling the business of their department. It appears that somebody is trying to make a record for economy, and to that end public convenience is sacrificed. The service so far as second class matter is concerned is especially deplorable, and as a consequence subscribers to periodicals are constantly complaining. It is not infrequent for a paper mailed in this city for local delivery to reach the person to whom it was addressed four days after it was deposited in the post office. There is evidently something radically wrong, for though the local officials are extremely courteous, and always prompt in investigating reports of repeated negligence or miscarriage, they appear to be powerless to get the mails into good working order. If the Republican party thinks that a thorough investigation of frauds is essential to preservation of the prestige of the Administration it should be equally important to correct serious abuses such as exist in the local post office.

Catering to the Elect

Beerbohm Tree says we are all wrong in our treatment of the drama. Instead of having stage performances in the evening they should be viewed with minds fresh after a night's rest, and in his opinion half-past six in the morning is the ideal hour for a performance to begin. Beerbohm Tree evidently belongs to the class who imagine that all the arts are for the elect, and that instead of an audience made up of "the common people," in search of recreation or amusement, there should be a select attendance of the cognoscenti and of those who care more to be doing the correct thing than for the thing they do. It is on this principle that art galleries are open, as a rule, only at such times as suit the convenience of the idlers, while the workers must spend their days in toil, and starve for lack of opportunity to nourish their æsthetic senses. It is the same spirit which prattles so prettily about "the elect" who keep literature alive, and "the indiscriminating public," but in the last analysis, it is the "indiscriminating public" which pays the price, buys the books and keeps the theatre doors open. No doubt my lady languid, in her silks and furs, her diamonds and her carriage, and her late arrival, makes a great stir in an audience, but she does not come to see the play or hear the actors. It is her own triumphs, not theirs, which engross her attention. A bevy of gaily clad damsels, flitting through an art gallery, munching candy and chattering gossip, is a more flattering picture to the custodian than a horny-handed laborer who spends half an hour before the one picture that appeals to him; and the matron who "teas" the latest literary lion, whose books she has borrowed from the library, makes a greater impression than the merely common herd who read and understand and appreciate. But Mr. Tree's half-past six in the morning audience would be mainly made up of those who best appreciate what costs them nothing, and unoccupied seats and an empty treasury are not the best stimulants for enthusiasm amongst the stage folk, any more than social recognition helps out the struggling genius of art or literature. No doubt it is extremely flattering to feel above "the masses," but in the long run it is the masses that count. In the last essay written by Frank Norris he lays down this proposition: "It is all very well to jeer at the People, and at the People's understanding of the arts, but the fact is indisputable that no art that is not in the end understood by the People can live, or ever did live in a single generation. In the larger view, in the final analysis, the People pronounce the final judgment. The People, despised of the artist, hooted, caricatured and vilified, are after all, and in the main, the real seekers after Truth." And when Mr. Tree and others of the exclusives can have their performances at an hour when only the æsthetics and the cognoscenti can witness them, when the common people are excluded, not by law but by conditions which are more iron-bound than any law, Mr. Beerbohm Tree and his associates can lock the doors of their theatres and seek some other method for gaining a livelihood, as well as for displaying their ability.

Egoism of the Unmarried

Mrs. John Van Vorst, in her recently published book, "The Woman Who Toils," cries out in more than one passage against what she terms "the egoism of the unmarried American woman." This egoism is displayed in a variety of ways, most glaringly perhaps by her love of clothes and gewgaws, her restlessness and dissatisfaction, her passion for independence, and by her disinclination to marry and become the mother of a family. To be sure all these are very reprehensible traits, especially when displayed by working girls, still it is worth while to pause and consider the matter from both sides. It must be conceded that the American girl of all social ranks is an egoist. But then, we have educated her to be one. For a generation economists, moralists, and pulpiteers have preached it into her. She has been counseled to scorn dependence; she has been co-educated, college educated, business educated. She has been fairly driven out into the press and stress of the business world. And it is safe to say that woman no less than man in the world of business, needs egoism, push and self-assertion. The qualities for which the modest violet is distinguished do not make for success there. One reason for the working girl's inordinate love of dress may be discovered in this connection. A good appearance is part of her stock in trade. A New York shop girl asserted lately that ninety-eight per cent of her success depended upon her appearance. The proportion may be exaggerated but the fact is not. A stenographer who recently answered an advertisement in this city was told by her prospective employer that he expected her to present a stylish appearance. The girl answered that she endeavored at all times to look neat. "I did not say neat," the man explained. "I said stylish." In one of Zola's best works, "Au Bonheur des Dames," the self-sacrificing Denise who is the very opposite of an egoist is almost a total failure in the department store where she obtains employment, because she ignores the arts of the toilet. Moreover the whole genius of American civilization and progress is egoism, the triumph of the individual over class distinction and the traditions of the past. The working girl of today may be the lady of tomorrow. She is taught to consider herself as good as her betters. If the rich woman can wear sealskin and velvet the poor one can at least don cheap imitations of them. It would no doubt be better for wage-earning girls if public opinion or class restriction prevented their indulging such foolish ambitions as the wearing of lace boleros, fancy buckles, picture hats and other finery referred by by Mrs. Van Vorst in her book. They could save more money and buy themselves better food. But this is America, and our watchword is liberty and equality. Our ideal of success is a material one and is expressed by luxury, show and possession. Our ideals are part of our national character and they have contributed to our national success. We are materialistic, positive, strongly individualized. In a democracy, what written or unwritten law can proclaim these qualities praiseworthy in one class and blameworthy in another? Mrs. Van Vorst herself appreciates this view of the matter, for she says: "The Perry factory girl is separated from the New York society girl, not by a few generations but by a few years of culture and training. In America, where tradition and family play an unimportant part, the great educator is the spending of money. It is through the purchase of possessions that Americans develop their taste, declare themselves, and show their inherent capacity for culture." The other point insisted upon by Mrs. Van Vorst, namely, the disinclination of the American working girl to marry and raise a family, arises from the same traits fostered by prudent counsel from her mentors. To be prudent, to look ahead, to think twice before she sacrifices her independence, to beware of early marriage, this is the advice she has been receiving on all hands, and certainly from a material point of view it is good advice. It has been part of the stock in trade of political economists for a generation. A large family means a diminished share for each out of the family budget. For the wife it means more work, more care, less leisure, less amusement. Altruistic indeed must be those who would, for the sake of the race, thus burden themselves as individuals; quite inconsistent, too, with that doctrine of enlightened selfishness which has been made so much of by certain teachers. There is no use in blaming the American unmarried woman. She did not create her ideals or the conditions under which she exists. We have demanded of her self-assertion, cool-headedness, calculation, financial independence and physical well being, and she has done her utmost in answer to our demands.

HAVE YOU BEEN THERE?

A Nameless Essay

By Harry Cowell.

Man is a reed shaken by the wind, and though here and there a Pascal deserves to be remembered for his thoughts, the average specimen of the human race redeems his reediness" with but little thinking. On the contrary, he has an instinctive antipathy to thought. He eats for himself, but will allow almost any one to think for him. How many men do you know who think three times a day? When Pascal by inference defined man as a reed that thinks, he unthinkingly had his usual thoughtful self in mind. The use of observation instead of introspection would have led him to conclusions less flattering to his fellows. Thought does not sufficiently characterize the wind-blown human reed to justify its use as the mark that distinguishes man from the rest of animals. He who is intellectually and morally his own man is so rare as to seem other and more than man. Aided even by electric lights, the Diogenes of today has a hard hunt. Deathless hope—hope, "the despair of heroes"—should be his who seeks a man, a reed redeemed by thought. The mind of Richard Roe is merely a petty part of the "mob mind." Not one per cent of invention relieves the monotonous imitation of the average man. Any ape can copy; it takes thought to create. Flaubert was right. People hate style because it forces them to think. Of all high passions, the love of thought for thought's sake is rarest.

This disastrously prevalent intellectual laziness, this distaste for the thought-provoking phrase, this preference for pap, is due, no doubt, to weakness or lack of development of the rational faculty. For as the strong muscled delight in physical exercise, so do the strong-minded in mental exercise. In the attitude of the masses toward the things of the mind there is something pitifully infantile or valetudinarian. The effort necessary to make that individual declaration of intellectual independence which every adult freeman of the mind is called upon to make, is ever too much for their strength. To be a man—to think for oneself, to be self-moved in the direction of a reasoned out ideal—is a dignity seldom attained; seldom desired, even. How much inoperative knowledge the ordinary person possesses—knowledge, that is, without its appropriate effect upon conduct! How few men one meets who qualify their statements to fit facts, who feel any necessity of making nice distinctions! How few dare to delight openly in a book, a play, a picture, or a musical composition, which the critics have condemned! How often one who treats impartially a discredited doctrine is held to advocate it! Joseph Jacobson is a Jew; accordingly this, that or the other quality which is supposed rightly or wrongly to be a racial characteristic, is attributed to him as a matter of course. Let a man, in answer to a customary question, give Ireland, say, as the place of his birth, and at once it is inferred that he has an especial fondness for potatoes. This scion of nobility, because of his good birth, passes incredibly long as a gentleman, in spite of notoriously obvious evidence of the fact that he is an unmitigated cad. A thinker happens to express a belief in which the Dashists share. Forthwith he is dubbed a Dashist, and all the irrational beliefs of that sect thrust upon him and the measure of his mind taken. To say that one is of the opinion that two and two make four may serve as basis enough for being classified as a materialist, or even atheist.

Nowhere is thought more conspicuously absent than in the relations between men of different races and of different creeds. Love at home has commonly for its correlative hatred abroad; and when patriotism in practice proves to be a synonym of prejudice, its moral limitations ought to be evident to the least observant. When men act en masse, there is almost invariably a confusing of responsibilities and a consequent lowering of conduct. A crowd has no conscience. "Mob mind" is a very mindless thing. Now and then a man thinks; a nation, never. The mass as such is a thoughtless savage; and its thoughtlessness shocks more than its savagery. The stupidity of war is its most stupendous horror. Folly is the worst of vices. If men's feelings were less often at fault, taking thought would not be so imperative a social necessity. Faulty feelings call for corrective reason. He is a happy man who possesses what may be termed rationalized emotions. A [illegible] made ten years ago in a similar connection is near enough to my present thought to bear repeating: "The savage instincts which men, even in the most advanced societies, still retain, are ever prompting them to pursue courses of conduct which their civilized intellects condemn—thus causing them to be at war with themselves. "Do this," suggests the nearsighted savage instinct; "Nay, this," opposes the far-seeing civilized intellect; and though much ensuing conduct is in the nature of a compromise, yet the commands of instinct are obeyed oftener than those of reason. Hence the saddest and strangest of all anomalies; men who know what is good and do what is evil." It is in the conduct of the crowd that this anomaly is most painfully conspicuous.

But it is when Christians in the name of Gentleness do harsh deeds that the climax of stupidity is reached, and the lack of thought becomes absurd, laughable. To talk then of brutality is to insult the tiger; to be obvious; to show oneself devoid of the saving sense of humor. Let the thoughtful reader look at the incongruity of the thing, and laugh. Thus only may he preserve his sanity.

Hearst's Queer Policy

The old proverb, "Politics makes strange bed-fellows," is being amusingly exemplified in this city as a result of the Hearst policy of conciliation. So intent is Mr. Hearst on having a united delegation to the next National Convention that he is willing to make concessions on all sides. Some weeks ago when the work of reorganizing the Democracy was started by enthusiastic Hearst boomers it looked as though they would not have the slightest difficulty in capturing the machine. So disgusted were the majority of the practical politicians with the McNab-Phelan regime that there was a general hegira toward the new camp, and the work of reorganization made splendid progress. McNab made several efforts to stay the disintegration of the old machine but in vain. Presently the tip got out that a certain powerful influence that manipulates union labor politics was opposed to the new organization because it threatened to divert the labor vote to the Democracy. It appears that a little clique of union labor agitators are intent upon compassing the downfall of Eugene Schmitz, and that they purpose holding all their votes together for use at the primary election. Therefore they prefer that there should be no fight in the Democracy. They would rather see McNab and Phelan left in control of the works. Indeed, notwithstanding their bitter denunciation of McNab and Phelan for the part played by them in the teamsters' strike they are now willing to play into the hands of that pair in order that revenge might be more easily wreaked on Mayor Schmitz.

The Opposition to Schmitz

It was that labor clique of which Michael Casey is the head and front, and in which Pin Head McCarthy as the tool of Phelan is silent partner, that detailed the treacherous and erratic Livernash to undertake the task of capturing the reorganization meeting at Pioneer hall. Livernash and the other labor agitators figured that as Hearst relied for his main support on the workingmen of the country he could not afford to antagonize the men that controlled that element in this city. And they did not err in their calculations. Therefore it was that Mr. Carvalho, representing Mr. Hearst, came all the way from New York to seek to harmonize all factions, and it was about that time that the wily McNab, the execrated of all sincere labor union men, was inspired with a gleam of hope. Prior to the interference of the labor agitators he had ceased to be an influence in municipal politics, but his temporary resuscitation was accomplished by them. It is suspected that a little of Phelan's money went a long way toward invoking their aid, but that is another story, which will probably be told some day, when erstwhile bitter foes become political bedfellows of the future. When Carvalho arrived he was much alarmed over the situation and he counseled peace and harmony. He admitted that McNab as a factor in politics was of no importance, but that as the labor agitators objected to the reorganization movement, since it might cripple them in their fight against Schmitz, it would not be advisable to engage in a row.

No headache, no gastritis, follows the use of "Jesse Moore" pure whisky. It does one good. There is none other to equal it.

Reorganization Work Resumed

A halt was called by the reorganizers pending developments, but when the story leaked out that the advisers of Mr. Hearst had formulated a conciliatory policy there was a demand on all sides that the movement be pushed to a finish. Meanwhile McNab was chortling over what he believed to be the discomfiture of the Hearst boomers. He resorted once more to his whispering tactics, circulating the report that the Hearst boomers had received the double-cross, and that the movement was about to peter out. He undertook to organize clubs in two districts, and Jim O'Brien, the leader of the organizers, took a hand and captured both of them. The followers of O'Brien decided to go ahead with the work of organization regardless of the conciliatory tactics of Mr. Hearst's foreign advisers, and this movement has gathered such strength that there is no likelihood of its being overcome. It has for its purpose the breaking down of the barbed-wire fence erected around the local Democracy by Phelan and McNab.

Hobson Dallied With the Stockton Belles

Limelight Hobson, the hero of the merry smack, made quite an impression on Stockton's belles during his recent visit to that town. The beaux of the slough city went away back when Hobson took the stage centre and struck his characteristic attitude. When the spectacular hero put in an appearance the fair ones were very much agitated, for it is not often that Stockton has a lion to coddle. And they were just a bit piqued when they learned that Elsie Sperry was a member of the Hobson party on the way up, for that captivating young woman seemed to have an air of proprietorship. So all the festivities in the dashing lieutenant's honor were expanded to include Miss Sperry. There was a dinner given by Mr. and Mrs. W. M. S. Beede, and a tea given by the Misses Clary, but at neither affair did the Stockton girls take a back seat, notwithstanding the presence of Miss Sperry. On the contrary there was keen rivalry for the hero's favor, and he whispered sweet nothings in the shell-pink ear of more than one coquettish damsel. Indeed Miss Sperry appeared to be quite overlooked at times, and the Stockton gossips say that she betrayed signs of uneasiness. A swimming party was arranged one morning and Miss Sperry proposed a walk to the baths, but the lieutenant preferred to ride, a circumstance that afforded the local belles who accompanied him much gratification. Later on one of them, who looks ravishingly pretty in a bathing suit, fairly dazzled the lieutenant in the water, and so devoted was he to her that a certain young woman who didn't go swimming almost fell into the tank in her efforts to divert his attention.

The Snubbing of Stockton

Mr. Elwyn Hoffman depicts in verse the woe of Stockton over the snubbing the citizens received at the hands of President Roosevelt, who ignored an invitation, in a handsome case made of the bark of one of the Big Trees, and also the gift of a valuable dress-suit case made of home leather. The citizens blame Congressman Wood for having said mean things about Roosevelt, and they are now sorry that they didn't accept the proposition of a house mover to move a house across the railroad track, and break the cable in time to stop the train. These are the poet's lines:

Poor Stockton! Wretchedest city of the plain,
Where wealth and beauty waited Teddy's train
To give him welcome, thinking he would stay
An hour, at least, ere going on his way,
But waited vainly,—aye, and worst of all,
Forewarned by Loeb, dared not cheer or call,
As, never pausing, sped the swift train by
Lest sleep be startled from the Chieftain's eye!

Sweet, guileless village! Too much trust was thine
In "home-made leather," and a Power divine!
Thy dress-suit case, thought doubtless worthy goods,
Availed thee nothing in the hand of Woods;
Thy invitation, on its card embossed,—
O, whither went it? Lost, dear Heaven, lost!

Ill fares the town, to proud ambition prey,
Wherein the President declines to stay;
Speeches and banquets doomed to never be
May pass forgotten without tragedy;
But a people's trust, and a city's civic pride
When once destroyed, can never be supplied!

But past is all this now. The very spot
Where Stockton waited with its speeches hot
Is quite deserted. There the depot stands,
And there the S. P.'s sign-post lifts its hands;
'Tis all that's seen. The mighty crowd that came
To greet the President with loud acclaim
Has fled forever; and all bare the ground
Where Stockton's statesmen posed with mein profound.

Vain, transitory splendor! Could not all
Reprieve the pride of Stockton from its fall?
Good Heaven! what sorrows gloomed the night
In which the flying train was hid from sight!
When the poor people, every pleasure past,
Hung round the depot, gaping to the last,
And took a long farewell, and wished in vain,
That they had let the house-mover stop the train!

Glad-hand Jordan

Frank Jordan, the clerk of the Supreme Court, cast his hypnotic spell over the members of Oakland's Grand Jury one day recently. Jordan is the most remarkable happy-go-lucky individual in this State. Nothing feazes him. He is imperturbable in the most embarrassing situations, and there is no politician in the State so gifted as he in the art of converting an enemy into a friend. All other glad-hand artists are tyros and bunglers compared with Jordan. He has an elastic conscience that enables him to owe money with complacency, and an alluring way that fills a hopeless creditor with delight at the opportunity to increase the indebtedness. It was no trick for Jordan to hypnotize the Grand Jury. He was summoned before that body to show cause why he shouldn't be indicted for misfeazance in office during his term as county clerk of Alameda. It will be remembered that while filling that position he bought stationery enough to last the county for twenty years. Nobody thought that Jordan could ever convince anybody that he acted conscientiously in the matter. But he did. He convinced the Grand Jury that in anticipating the needs of the county for twenty years he rendered a great public service. He explained that he purchased the stationery from publishers of newspapers engaged in the printing business throughout the country, and that if he hadn't patronized them they would have suspended. As they were engaged in booming the county he felt that they should be kept alive. The jurors believed him.

Making a Great Record

Jordan is now the clerk of the Supreme Court, and he is likely to remain a fixture in that office for many years. Though his record in Alameda may have been shady he is undoubtedly making a brilliant one in the Supreme Court. He is conducting the office in a way calculated to put every lawyer in the State under obligations to him, and it is safe to predict that when he runs again the entire bar will be behind him. He keeps track of the court calendar and notifies every lawyer that has a case coming up in time to prepare him for the hearing. He even wires lawyers the news of an important decision, and he has compiled and published data about court affairs for the information of lawyers. There never was a more courteous public servant than this same Frank Jordan, and he is surely making a great hit.

The Keeneys in Mourning

The death of Mrs. William Alvord will throw several families into mourning. Mrs. Alvord was twice married, her first husband having been Dr. Keeney of the Army, and her second William Alvord of the Bank of California. Her sons are both married and have families. The elder, Charles M. Keeney, married Miss Spotts, daughter of the Admiral. Ethel Keeney, who married Charles M. Tomlinson of New York, is a daughter of the Charles Keeneys. Mrs. Alvord's younger son, Dr. James M. Keeney, married Miss Jones, a daughter of Mrs. O. C. Pratt. Mrs. Alvord was a very handsome and distinguished looking woman. She was a Daughter of the American Revolution, and one of the charter members and first officers of Sequoia Chapter of that order.

Our Fashion-Plate Pedagogue

Aside from the similar tendencies of Dr. David Starr Jordan and Dr. Benjamin Ide Wheeler to get into the public prints, there are very few points of resemblance between the two university presidents. Dr. Jordan appears in public and on the campus in a slouch hat and a weather-beaten frock while President Wheeler's public audiences are carried on amidst all the pomp and circumstance of a royal levee. Dr. Wheeler is a great stickler for dress, and while on the other hand Dr. Jordan has been criticised for his personal carelessness Dr. Wheeler has often been referred to as the sartorial President, and his fondness for dress in himself and others has been commonly remarked. It has been complained by undergraduates that, in an interview, the president has a somewhat disconcerting habit of examining a man's get-up from head to foot and letting his eyes linger on such details as strike him as unmodish or outre. This, perhaps, is a wholesome stimulant to men of independent fortunes who attend the university for the purpose of learning how to appear as gentlemen, but to the poorer students, of whom there are a great number at Berkeley, this habit of Wheeler's is embarrassing in the extreme. Shortly before graduation, I am told, a self-supporting student in a shabby coat applied to the President for an instructorship in the university. Now in making such an application the student bumped up against another of the president's fads which is that nobody shall teach in the University of California who has not first taken his master's degree. President Wheeler questioned the applicant closely and found that he was not yet entitled to the M. A., so he dismissed him saying, "I will be pleased to give you an instructorship, sir, when you have obtained your master's degree—and a new suit of clothes."

Jordan a Convert

Speaking of Dr. Jordan's simplicity as compared with that of Dr. Wheeler, I may remark that Dr. Jordan's appearance at the baccalaureate services at Stanford last Sunday clad in the robe and purple hood of the Doctor of Laws has created nothing more or less than a sensation at the university. And well it might, for this act seems to have marked a turning-point in the tenets of this strong-minded thinker. He has ever stood for Puritan simplicity in all the academic life and has expressed himself strongly as regarding the pomp and display of the English universities as mere relics of barbarism. But a splendid university quadrangle, costing millions piled upon millions, and a magnificent memorial church, grand with the sensuous ritualism of an old world, do not tend to a Spartan plainness in public demonstrations. Every tile and stone of Stanford University is redolent of form and ceremony and the cap and gown are bound to come as aids to the stage picture. Probably the main reason, however, for Jordan's sudden reversion to what he has hitherto been fond of calling mediævalism, is Mrs. Stanford's wish. It is a well known fact that her eye always lingers fondly on that which savors of display, and her High Church leaning would prompt her to do everything in her power to encourage the cap and gown. It is not saying too much to augur that, within a few years, Stanford will outdo Berkeley in the gorgeous pageantry of her commencements.

Counterfeiting Work of Local Artists

A certain art dealer in town has for some time been employing an expert copyist to make fac similes of the work of various prominent artists. It would scarcely be supposed that San Francisco was large enough for this industry, which has proved so successful in various European capitals, but the other day a very good fac simile of Charles Rollo Peters was sold in a local gallery for forty dollars, and one or two passable imitation Cadenassos are hanging on the walls of certain wealthy homes. They sold for a mere bagatelle of twenty-five dollars apiece. The local artists are naturally furious, picture-selling being slow enough in San Francisco without this to make it worse.

A Mortgage on Artists

A prosperous business man in town bids fair to have a very fine picture gallery before many years have elapsed. His method of accumulating pictures is unique. He has a well-known artist whose southern pictures have attracted much attention of late, engaged in lending money on the canvases of those who find themselves in need. As it is pretty certain that many of the artists who have thus pawned the products of their brush will never be able to redeem them the man of commerce is certain to become the owner of many pictures obtained far below their value.

Imperturbable Dickman

Charlie Dickman is imperturbable. At his last sale of pictures, he remarked philosophically, "Well, if we don't sell something here, the sheriff will come down and sell us out, so something is bound to be sold anyway." But as the artist sold two thousand dollars' worth of pictures, the visit of the sheriff was deferred, temporarily at any rate. Dickman, however, gave a big luncheon to the other artists to celebrate his good luck, and some of his shekels went in champagne. Such has ever been the way of the artistic temperament.

The Adams Scandal

The Rev. Henry Austin Adams, who recently turned up in New Zealand, will have a hard time convincing his friends in this city that his disappearance was not premeditated, or that it was not a guilty passion that prompted him to desert his wife and four children. Before his departure the distinguished lecturer published, for private circulation, a pamphlet entitled "The Brief of My Client's Case; a Story of Tristan and Isolde," and it is evident that it was intended as an explanation of his disappearance. Though his friends sought to recall the entire issue there are three copies that have not been recalled. In this pamphlet he attempts to justify unlawful love, and said that men and women should, by the very nature of things, be as free as the birds and bees. It bears the inscription, "Being the last words to a few friends who knew the real me," and at the top of the page are these words: "Does the great God think I shall clasp air and kiss the wind forever?" The brief is prefaced by some verses, among them being this passionate rhapsody:

We climbed, we two, the "Mountain wrapt in Peace."
  The benediction of the night lay on the sea:
The pent up Love of Life longed for release,
And rapture decked a throne for you and me!
The storm-swept ocean of my Past grew calm:
  Stillness and rest lay shadowed at my feet.
Night's unseen choirs began their vesper psalm,
  While evening's acolytes swung censers sweet.
And we were there! We two, alone, unseen;
  Above life's lie; escaped from duties cold,
We two alone save for the stars serene,
  Those friends who keep the secrets they are told.
Then when the hush had deepened into pain,
  You broke the breathless silence with a song
So infinitely sweet in its refrain
  I wished each note were infinitely long.
Then from life's utmost deeps surged wild Desire.
  To have! To hold! To make that moment ours!
To make it yield us All, nor dare expire
  Till we had plucked the eternal Passion Flowers.
Pressing my lips to yours I bade you sing
  The very heart of song into my soul.
The stars above our heads began to swing!
  The crag on which we leaned began to roll.
Borne on the heaving flood of bliss we went,
  Heedless of clouds that warned fierce Passion Gales,
Which soon raged round us, and, their fury spent,
  Forced us to hoist our consciences for sails!
With which we made what way we could to land,
  Back to the ports of Sanity—and loss.
To Duty's shores where wise men understand
  Life's law is sacrifice—its key, the cross.

On the Eligible List

Dr. Eugene Zeile was one of a house party at the Rudolph Spreckels's ranch this week, which included Ethyl Hager and Virginia Jolliffe, and it has suddenly occurred to some people that the doctor ranks with Jimmy Phelan and Dr. Tevis as one of the most eligible bachelors in town. He is young, handsome and rich. When he was a student at Berkeley some years ago he was the idol of the co-eds, but he was so deeply interested in his studies that he appeared to have no use for girls. He went abroad after his graduation and took other courses at foreign universities, returning home a very learned M. D. He is a brother of Fred Zeile, who is one of the most liberal art patrons in San Francisco.

President Theodore Roosevelt's wine is Ruinart.

Cosgrave Retained as Editor

When the recent change in the management of Everybody's magazine occurred the report reached this city that Mr. J. O'H. Cosgrave, formerly proprietor of the Wave, had ceased to be the editor of that bright periodical. Mr. Cosgrave's many friends in this city will be pleased to learn that the report was without foundation. He has been retained as editor by the new management, the magazine has been enlarged and many new features have been added. It is now owned by the Ridgeway-Thayer company. Mr. Ridgeway was formerly associated with Munsey's magazine and Mr. Thayer was associated with the Ladies' Home Journal. That they know their business is evident from the fact that they have decided to retain Mr. Cosgrave as editor.

The Pilfering Habit

Pre-natal influence is manifesting itself in Oakland's high school. Oakland society has been very much agitated by the pilfering that has been going on in the smart set for some time, and now it appears that kleptomania has been inherited by many of the children, for thievery has been rampant in the high school for several months. Books, purses and articles of clothing have been stolen. The pupils of the high school are representatives of some of the first families across the bay, and it is among the first families that the activity of the kleptomaniac has occasioned a great deal of complaint of late.

"Shapes of Clay"

Though that most scholarly and brilliant of all American journalists, Ambrose Bierce, is now but a sporadic contributor to the Hearst papers his trenchant pen has not been idle. He is about to publish another book of poems, and I am quite sure that posterity will not forget the year this book was born. Its author's calm indifference to fame was overcome by his friend Herman Scheffauer, who prevailed upon him to put the poems into the hands of a publisher. "Shapes of Clay" is to be the title of the volume, and Mr. Scheffauer informs me that it comprises poems of the purest and most exquisite and lofty sentiments, and humorous and comic verses as only Bierce can write them, scintillating with that wit, satire and mighty, overwhelming invective for which that distinguished writer is famous. Bierce has dedicated the volume to his two San Francisco friends, Herman Scheffauer and George Sterling, men who have written poetry that has received praise that would encourage any literary genius, for it was the praise of Bierce. Some years ago Sterling wrote a Memorial Day poem which Bierce ranked higher than Lowell's Commemoration Ode.

A Poet's Judgment

Scheffauer, by the way, is also about to publish a volume of poems, entitled "Of Both Worlds," comprising most of the better work that he has done in the past nine or ten years. This gifted young Californian, whose work is now eagerly sought by the editors of all the leading magazines, began writing when he was only seventeen, at which time his acquaintance with Bierce began, oddly enough, through a satire written on him. In response to a letter of inquiry from me regarding his forthcoming volume, Mr. Scheffauer preferred to discuss "Shapes of Clay." He wrote: "Had my own work an equal chance for immortality I were well content. This book, to Those Who Know will be one of the very few that will survive. Every line is cut in granite with a glittering diamond. Above the muddy and wreck-strewn flood of modern English literature, stormed and howled over by the shrill, discordant voices of its multitudinous frauds and clamorous incapables, there arises a rock that oceans of ink cannot submerge, and that rock is the lasting work of Ambrose Bierce."

"I presume that trusts will be the great issue of the next campaign."

"Oh, no; they will be denounced in the platforms of all parties, and consequently they cannot be an issue."

A Dog Story of London

Jack London's new Klondike book is going to enter him in another class. It is to be an animal story, somewhat after the style of the Seton-Thompson animal biographies, but there is no likelihood that the resemblance will extend further than the subject. The theme is a St. Bernard dog, stolen in the early days of the "rush" and carried to the North to work on the trail, and if one may hazard a guess at the animal from what we know of his masters, as seen through the eyes of Jack London, it will show the value of breed and blood. It will not be the first dog story that Jack London has written, for, amongst his fugitive contributions to magazines, which have not yet been gathered into a volume, there is at least one other powerful tale in which a dog is the real hero. "The Call of the Wild" is to be issued early in the summer, by the Macmillans, who promise the "Kempton Wace Letters" immediately. The latter is to be issued anonymously, but as far as California is concerned, it is an open secret that Jack London and Miss Anna Strunsky have collaborated in the production of the documents, and the interest here would be heightened by the avowal, rather than by the suppression of the names of the authors.

"Though I've been abroad for years, as soon as I saw Mrs. Climber I knew that she had broken in."

"How could you tell?"

"By her temperature. It was below zero."

Hail to the Knocker!

No sooner does an artist lift his head a hair's breadth above the average of his fellows, than Envy's ill-begotten brat, the "Knocker," camps upon his trail. If you wish to learn of the successes of your Bohemian friends, hark diligently to the noise of the knocker;—the harder the knock, the greater the success, you may be sure. So long as a man is in the struggling stage, while Fate is finding out if he be of the stuff that artists are made of, the professional knocker patronizes him. The praise of such a one is sufficient evidence of the fact that the praisee has not arrived. Yesterday one of the "profesh," who up to that time had spoken hopelessly well of Smith's work, gave him a knock that you at once recognized as a masterpiece. Forthwith you flew up to a certain attic four steps at a time. "Smith, old fellow," you cried breathlessly, "let me congratulate you. At last you have placed a novel!" (or sold a picture, or what not). Be of good cheer, then, children of the garret, when like Poe's raven the knocker comes rapping, rapping at your chamber door.

She Has Grit

Miss Clara Alexander, who has made a hit in the homes of the Huntingtons, the De Youngs and others in her clever dialect impersonations, demonstrated in rather a sensational way, Friday of last week, that she is made of the stuff that wins, especially in any branch of the dramatic art. Miss Alexander had been engaged to appear at a reception to be given by the Los Amigos Club of Sausalito. The affair was to begin at three o'clock, and with the exception of a song or two, her recitations were to be the whole show. She was to leave from this side on the two o'clock boat, but great was her dismay upon reaching the ferry to find that she had missed the boat by about forty seconds. She knew that if she waited for the next boat the show would be over before she could reach Sausalito, so she began casting about among the boatmen, peanut venders and orange men on the wharf for somebody who would convey her to the promontory across the bay. At last her search was rewarded by a seafaring man who, for a hire of ten dollars, offered to take her across in his gasoline launch.

Clara On the Spot

The wage was paid, the launch manned and the party started full steam out into the stream, but the boat had scarcely passed Alcatraz before something happened to the engines. The wind was blowing a gale and the craft refused to budge except with the tide. The boatman set about mending the cranky engine and Miss Alexander remained in the stern, quiet and determined. "You've got plenty of nerve, miss," said the sea dog. "Most girls would o' been hollerin' bloody murder by this time." After a delay of several precious minutes the machinery was set to rights and the launch puffed into Sausalito with very little time to spare. Meanwhile the ladies of Los Amigos had gone on with their entertainment and trusted to luck for the impersonator to appear. They used up all their songs and all their stunts, but still no Miss Alexander. Finally the lady president arose and said, "Owing to some unforseen reason, Miss Alexander will be unable to appear." "Oh yes, she will," said the young woman, entering as patly as the heroine in a melodrama. So she took off her coat and hat in the presence of the audience and the show went on as tranquilly as if nothing had happened.

Sport at Del Monte

Golf is not to be cast entirely aside this summer to make way for a great tennis revival, as has been rumored. That golf is still high in favor is proved by the enthusiasm taken in the sport at Del Monte even so early in the season. With the finishing of the additional nine holes on the golf links, another attraction will be added to the beautiful surroundings. The links now stretch far over the hills and valleys, forming natural hazards and bunkers, difficult enough to test the ability of the finest players. Another sport that is pleasing Del Monte visitors is the trout and salmon fishing, now at its best. Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Moore were among those enjoying the sport this week. J. J. Van Alen, the Newport millionaire, is among the many at the hotel; other guests are Miss Liddle, Miss Cayce of Virginia, Mrs. Atherton and Miss Chandos-Pole.

BORJES & BENSON, 1001 Market Street, corner of Sixth, carry none but the Finest Imported and Domestic Wines and Liquors. Polite treatment, quick service, fine goods and popular prices have made this house one of the favorite resorts of the city.

On With the New Love

Mrs. Jean W. Bowers, of Los Angeles, who enjoys the distinction of being the Pacific Coast golf champion, has found another man she is willing to marry. Mrs. Bowers was unfortunate in her first matrimonial plunge and that is probably why she is so deliberative over the second venture. A few weeks ago her engagement to Lionel Roberts was announced. Mr. Roberts is a wealthy Riverside orange grower, and Mrs. Bowers's friends congratulated her on having made a good match. But the report of the engagement was followed in a few days by the announcement that it was off. About that time rumor had it that Edmund Taylor Perkins, of Washington, D. C., who had been hovering about the golf links ruled over by the pretty Jean, was responsible for the change of heart which she had experienced. Now this rumor is verified by the announcement that they are to wed. And as though to forestall another change of heart on the part of the brassie wielder the wedding has been set for June. Mrs. Bowers is a bonny creature on the links, where she is seemingly invincible, as our own Miss Cheseborough and Mrs. R. Gilman Brown discovered during the recent tournament in Los Angeles.

Its Right Name

Charles D. Willard, one of the best known reformers in Southern California, is now secretary of the Los Angeles Jobbers' Association. The last reform movement that occupied Mr. Willard's attention was the organization of the Los Angeles Civil Service Commission. Last Monday a man in search of the Civil Service Commissioners was instructed to look up Mr. Willard at his office. When the inquiring statesman was handed one of Mr. Willard's cards, which gives his title as "Secretary of the Jobbers' Association," he gave a gasp and ejaculated, "Well, I'll be darned if I thought Willard was nervy enough to call the Civil Service Commission by its right name."

Why Hellman Withdrew

The withdrawal of Herman H. Hellman from the vice-presidency of the Farmers' and Merchants' National Bank of Los Angeles occasioned considerable surprise in banking circles. Mr. Hellman's statement that his resignation was due to a desire for more time to devote to his private interests was not given credence by some, who have suspected that differences existed between the Hellman brothers. Mr. I. W. Hellman is the autocrat of the Hellman institutions, and he insists on running them as he sees fit.

Eccentric Helen Wilder

The idiosyncrasies of Helen Wilder, who recently obtained a divorce from her husband, Horace Craft, would fill a large book. She has kept Honolulu on a broad grin for years. When she was engaged to the fascinating Frank Unger, some years ago, it was believed in Honolulu that he was actuated by love of money, but no one quite understood what influenced her passion for the clever, polished Frank Unger had nothing in common with the eccentric, short-haired Miss Wilder. However the engagement dragged along and though no one thought Miss Wilder would marry Mr. Unger, every one wondered that she should lack the nerve to break it, as she apparently lacked nerve in no other direction. One day a letter from Unger reached her informing her that he would be down on the next steamer and that he would like a speedy consummation of their matrimonial plans. What did Miss Wilder do but quietly prepare to sail for this city, and when Mr. Unger's ship was making harbor the Moana was sighted bound for San Francisco, and the errant lady love was one of the passengers. Mr. Unger waited several months in the islands but his fiancee did not return. As soon as she received the tip that he was to leave she made preparations to pass him en route once more, and pass him she did. Later she broke the engagement by letter.

Scandal Over Bible Smuggling

A correspondent writes me from Manila that quite a fuss has been raised over there by the discovery that the Young Men's Christian Association has been smuggling goods into the Islands. Not long ago a consignment of goods that bore the triangular mark of the Y. M. C. A. was received at the Quartermaster's depot. The goods were consigned to the American Library, which is for the exclusive use of the soldiers, but they were called for by a representative of the Y. M. C. A. The Custom House authorities became suspicious, seized the goods and found that among them were many Bibles which are dutiable. Upon investigation it was learned that the Y. M. C. A. was in the habit of shipping goods in that fashion, the purpose being to evade transportation costs, to fool the customs inspectors and to secure free drayage to points of destination in the city. The revelations have caused quite a scandal.

Lively Church Politics

There was some very fine political wire-pulling in the Presbyterian General Assembly in Los Angeles, to secure the election to the moderatorship of Dr. Robert T. Coyle. The reverend candidate reached Los Angeles, a correspondent informs me, a week before the Assembly opened, and was interviewed by all the papers. That he was not unprepared was evident from the fact that he had several photographs of himself in his suit-case. He rounded up his followers, and with the assistance of a member of his church, and the Rev. Aguilla Webb of the First Presbyterian church of Los Angeles, the campaign was opened and delegates were buttonholed on their arrival. Dr. Coyle's leading opponent was Dr. C. W. Mateer who was thought to be entitled to the highest honor in the church on account of his record of forty years as a missionary in China. Dr. Coyle's friends argued that Dr. Mateer was stale and behind the times. Dr. William H. Roberts was also a candidate, but his friends were alienated by the circulation of the report that he was a member of the Union League Club of Philadelphia. As this is not a prohibition club Roberts was beaten and Coyle was elected. The Assembly was much shocked when it was discovered that the session was being held in a State which manages to prosper without a Sunday law, and wherein the Sabbath is desecrated by theatrical performances and peanut venders.

Nuns Graduated

Four nuns constituted an interesting feature of the recent Commencement exercises at the University of California. They took degrees in pharmacy. They wore their habits, of course, and occupied front seats on the stage, the black and white of their gowns mingling almost unnoticeably with the mortarboards and gowns of the other bachelors. This is said to be the first instance of cloistered women taking degrees in a co-educational institution.

A Woman's Work

It is an interesting fact, not generally known, that a woman had charge of the construction of the great amphitheatre at Berkeley where Roosevelt spoke and which has evoked so much praise. The theatre was included in the original Bernard plans and is lofty in conception, but during its construction Mr. Howard, who is in charge of the Hearst building, was away and the actual superintendence devolved upon Miss Julia Morgan, a University of California girl and a recent graduate of the Beaux Arts in Paris. Miss Morgan has been back only a few months and this is her first important work. She is a sister of the wife of Hart North, Immigration Commissioner.

A Garden Wedding

Los Angeles is to have a unique wedding next month, when Miss Laurine Harding marries William Bayly, Jr. It will be a garden wedding and the ceremony will be performed in the beautiful grounds adjoining the Harding residence in exclusive Chester Place. Miss Harding has little patience with many of the set rules of society and decided that instead of having a hot crush the guests should be comfortable while she was taking the leap from maidenhood to wifehood. John Posey, the son of O. P. Posey, the mining millionaire will be best man and Miss Belle Coulter, a member of another family prominent in the South, will be bridesmaid.

The Passion Play

Though Clay M. Greene is a successful dramatist, and has written many plays that yielded substantial profits, it was not until he completed the task of dramatizing the grim tragedy that marked the beginning of the Christian era that he achieved a real triumph. "Nazareth," the Passion Play of Santa Clara College, will perpetuate the fame of Clay M. Greene. The dramatist has come into his kingdom, and Santa Clara College has a play that should be the motif of pilgrimages to that institution as long as the Jesuit fathers shall devote themselves there to the education of youth. With all due respect to the craftsmanship of Mr. Greene, I seriously doubt whether he could have written that play, revealing as it does his profound, unerring knowledge of the sacred theme, and palpitant as it is with an atmosphere that inspires with reverential awe, had he not enjoyed while at his task the calm seclusion of the old college walls, the companionship of the venerable priests, in a word an environment peculiarly conducive to the mood and temperament for the building of his masterpiece. In this play Mr. Greene shows a technical mastery, a grasp of realities that invoke the highest enthusiasm. Like much that is great in art, "Nazareth" is a painful play; it presents as painful pictures as are to be found in the small gallery of the world's greatest art, but their effect is to inspire with awe, with reverence and with religious fervor. The faculty and students of Santa Clara College deserve great credit for their masterly production of this masterly play. The stage management is superb and the work of the actors is effective. The Judas of John Ivancovich is an especially fine impersonation.

Boycott Notices with Milk

The drug store war is going merrily on and the patent medicine fiend is the victim reaping the greatest salvage in risking his life in the eminently deadly breach. It has settled down into very much the same peculiar fight as in Los Angeles, where the Times newspaper is the only one in the country standing out against unionizing its office; here there is practically one firm, The Owl, defying the entire drug store combine. The drug store combination has succeeded in getting practically all the labor unions to support its side of the fight and all sorts of boycotts have been declared against the outstanding firm till it shall agree to come into the combine and sign a scale of higher rates at which all druggist's wares shall be sold. The milkmen post notices on their bottles asking their customers not to patronize the recalcitrant firm. The hackmen's union won't drive any one up to the boycotted store. Physicians have been warned by certain patients that they must not get their prescriptions filled there on pain of losing custom. All sorts of pulls and devices are being used to bullyrag the independent firm into the fold of the drug combine. If a union man is caught patronizing the place he is fined. Business men who go there are warned that if they continue to deal with the firm they must expect to lose some of their own trade through retaliating boycott. Meanwhile Manager Miller of the Owl is enjoying the fight. He is doing a greater business than ever, for it is generally believed that the boycott was dictated by the drug combine, and that the labor agitators are being used to force submission.

A Tonopah Magnate in Millbrae

Though Charlie Dunphy's polo pony is no longer seen dashing along the Millbrae road, there's no lack of horseflesh in the stables where the famous pony was formerly housed. Dr. Alonzo Lee Hudgens, the purchaser of the Dunphy place, knows a good horse by instinct, and he has some highbred beauties in his stables. Dr. Hudgens recently moved to Millbrae with his family, which consists of his wife and her unmarried sister, both charming brunettes. They have made no attempt to storm society in San Mateo county and indeed have expressed no desire to do so, though they enjoy entertaining congenial friends at small house-parties. The new owner of the Dunphy place is one of the richest of the Tonopah magnates and owns a whole or part interest in several of the mines. He recently, I am told, put thirty thousand dollars into the Millbrae mine.

The Chartreuse Monks

According to the despatches the monks of La Grande Chartreuse were among the last of the religious orders to shake the dust of France off their feet, and there is now much curiosity as to the country in which they will establish their future home. The monks of La Grande Chartreuse are objects of great interest in France because of the liqueur which they manufacture, and which flows in a rich stream throughout the world. As it is made from certain Alpine plants the probability is that they will not wander far from their old home, for of course they will continue to manufacture the delicious cordial. They have held the recipe for the famous liqueur since 1735, when they received it from their brethren, the Chartreuse of Paris, to whom it had been confided by Marshal D'Estrees in 1607, and who tardily recognized that it would be easier to obtain the requisite Alpine plants from the Grande Chartreuse than from Paris. During the French Revolution one of the Superiors of the Order fled with the recipe. He was arrested and deported, but carried off the recipe concealed in his sandals. It was subsequently transmitted to the Vicar of the Chartreuse and eventually returned to the small number of monks who found their way to the Grande Chartreuse in 1816. Under the direction of Pere Garnier, whose name still appears on the bottles, the manufacture of the liqueur was actively carried on, but it remained practically unknown except in the locality in which it was produced until 1849, when some French soldiers stumbled on the monastery and tasted the green fluid. They made it widely known and since then it has been a source of great profit to the Order.

The Murderous 'Mobe

The great International Automobile Race has scooted by and left a rich red carpet of French aristocrats strewed all along the course between France and Spain. It is a significant fact that the nation which has maintained the bull fight as a national pastime and the country which holds the Reign of Terror as a dear tradition should set their respective feet down and declare that the International shall be stopped on the grounds of brutality.

The Age of War is past and done;
No more outbooms the fatal gun.
Now rival nations set the pace
In a long-distance auto race.
The French tri-color now is seen
Midst seething clouds of gasolene.
Castile's proud lions ramp and roar
In a red devil built for four,
Columbia's Yankee eagles scream
Above the hissing of the steam.
See in what tame and loving sort
They ply this peaceful modern sport,
How autos scoot across the day
And dying peasants strew the way,
How armored cars by twos and threes
Collide with stumps and stones and trees
While Chauffeurs, flying free and fair,
Up soar like rockets through the air,
How little children flat are smashed
And soldiers into bits are mashed—
Then hail this gentle time of peace
When nations' brutal battles cease!
The Age of War is past and done;
No more outbooms the fatal gun.
Now rival nations set the pace
In a long-distance auto race.

The Genius and His Appendix

After having been wined and tead to the limit in San Francisco the Ernest Peixottos were supposed to have betaken themselves Eastward, for they ceased to be heard of in our midst, but it turns out that the great artist and his talented wife are still in the State and are living quietly in Oakland. It seems that, but a few hours before their departure for the East, Mrs. Peixotto was stricken with appendicitis and was obliged to remain for an operation. Although she has been severely ill she is now recovering rapidly and it is expected that they will be able to resume their journey in a short time. The illness of Mrs. Peixotto brings up the unpleasant fact that appendicitis is becoming a regular thing for California geniuses who return here for a visit after a residence in New York. The lamentable death of Frank Norris is still fresh in our minds, and it is to be remembered that the Norrises had not been long in our State before Mrs. Norris was first taken down in their country home at Gilroy. President Harriman's sickness from the same malady this week, as well as the more remote death of Max O'Rell and the threatened operation upon the King of England, cause us to wonder if the vermiform appendix is not outdistancing the auto race in the work of depopulating the globe.

Those Prize Cups

Denial is made of my story of last week relative to the retention by the authorities of the Hitchcock Military Academy of San Rafael, of cups that had been donated for prizes in athletic events. I am assured that the only basis for the story was that two cups were donated to the school for the purpose of preserving tradition and keeping a record of the best athletes. There were many other cups and they were all distributed to the winners.

Some O'Rell Philosophy

If the late Paul Blouet (Max O'Rell) had not syndicated his aphorisms, they would likely have been more highly treasured as literature. But by putting himself on the daily platform with Ellawheelerwilcox and Dorothydix, and working his typewriter overtime, he injured his reputation as a man of letters. Nevertheless in that daily stunt he wrote a good many brilliant sentences, from which I cull the following:

Marry a woman who can see a joke, who has a sense of humor and who looks at the bright side of things.

Lunatic asylums are full of men who have tried to argue in matrimonial life.

Many women are stoves with marble tops.

The most charming part of a love affair is the beginning. No wonder that so many people find pleasure in beginning again.

Love is a comedy in seven acts. You see her, you love her, you swear it, you prove it, you quarrel with her, you hate her and you leave her. Sometimes you marry her, and then it is a tragedy.

Flirtation is a promissory bill with a signature that is intended to be dishonored; love is a promissory note which is generally settled before it falls due.

The man who throws himself at the head of a woman soon finds himself under her feet.

There are women, rare but delightful women, who add to all the qualities and refinement of a perfect lady all the instincts of a perfect gentleman.

In his ways, as in his thoughts, O'Rell was a thorough Parisian. As he said himself, "The Parisian world is France and France is Paris," and "the kindhearted Parisians pity from the bottom of their hearts the man who was not born in Paris or who has denied to him the privilege of living in Paris." M. Blouet lectured all over the United States and became familiar with Americans and their life, but he could write about them only from his Parisian standpoint.

The Noted Cissie

The coming of Cissie Loftus appears not to have created even a ripple on the surface of things theatrical. Every day we see pictures of theatrical nobodies staring us in the face from the columns of the dailies, and yet scarcely any notice is taken of the fact that this gifted English woman, the ex-wife of Justin Huntley McCarthy, the distinguished playwright, is about to make her San Francisco debut in a drama written by her former husband. Cissie Loftus is one of the notable women of the stage, though she is far from being one of its greatest artists. It is her personality with its girlish charm that has brought her to the front. She first made her appearance in this country as a mimic in vaudeville, and the newspapers enthusiastically accepted her as a remarkable stage personage. A little later she appeared in drama, and after a brief experience Henry Irving engaged her to fill the vacancy caused by the defection of Ellen Terry. Though the London papers praised her they refused to accept her as the successor of their idol. Her divorce from Justin McCarthy provoked a great deal of newspaper gossip, and now I hear that it has been predicted that they will remarry.

Porteous Club Entertainment

A dramatic and vaudeville entertainment is to be given next Tuesday evening at Native Sons' hall under the auspices of the Porteous Club, an organization of working girls founded by the women of the California Club and fostered by them. The entertainment will include a sketch "The Littlest Girl," a dramatization of one of Richard Harding Davis's Van Bibber stories. Orval Payne, Guy D'Ennery and Walter Kohler will appear in the sketch. Signora Matildita, the Spanish dancer, Else Krebs, a whistler and Beatrice Bell, a young vocalist, will contribute to the success of the entertainment, and a sketch by Maud Marion Taylor will be produced with Beatrice Bromfield, Hortense Steinhart and Wallace Hunt in the leading roles.

Smooth Faces of Yesterday No More

You don't see so many smooth-faced men in society or at the clubs nowadays as you did last year. The fact is that moustaches are in again. They came in slowly, it is true, but they are here. It is the army style of moustache, however, that is the proper thing. It is cut close, and has a scrubbing-brush effect in the way it is chopped off over the lip. But it's the right kind of a moustache to wear. It looks fierce enough to scare a Filipino maiden but it is what they like in the Orient.

Has Czar Ned Abdicated?

That old gag about Ned Greenway's sceptre being about to be wrested from him has been revivified. Lansing Mizner, brother of the ebullient "Addy," is the man mentioned as the new Czar. Mizner of late has gone quite a bit into harrylehring, and the rumor is that he is to be the leader of the ton next winter if he does not elect to spend the frozen season in Dawson. Greenway was never much of a Lehr in his social ideas; rather is he of the Ward McAllister type of Czar. Mizner, on the contrary, has a penchant for sensational stunts.

In the same church, Grace Episcopal, where his parents were wedded twenty-eight years ago, Samuel Montford Wilson was married this week. Miss Alice Findley, who will be married to Captain Cloke of the Army in Christ church, Sausalito, on the ninth of June, is also of pioneer ancestry. Her mother, Lottie Young, was the daughter of Thomas Young, an early day merchant. She was a belle and a beauty when Thomas Findley, at that time State Treasurer, wooed and won her in 1858.

The Passing of Melone

Drury Melone, who died at his handsome home, Oak Knoll in Napa county, a few days ago, had a life of vicissitudes, before he attained the rank of country magnate. The estate which he so improved and beautified came to him through his lucky marriage with Miss Sarah Woodward, whose fortune was made by the founder of Woodward's Garden. Melone first came into notice when acting as hotel clerk for old General Hutchinson at the St. George in Sacramento in the late fifties. Later he engaged in other occupations, far from lucrative, until he was taken up by the late Lloyd Tevis as a figure-head for many of the transactions that crafty financier did not wish the general public to know he was connected with. Mr. Melone was married twice, his first wife being the daughter of W. S. Mesick of Sacramento. They were divorced in 1872.

The Miller Hoax

The news of Joaquin Miller's death, which some unknown person put into circulation last week after the poet had had his protracted say at the Bohemian Club, caused a commotion not only in Eastern newspaper offices but also in the editorial rooms of the local dailies. Biographies of the picturesque poet were rushed into the composing rooms of all the papers, and some of them were in type before it was discovered that the report was a hoax. The next day Miller was made happy by the receipt of congratulations from all parts of the country. I understand that he is very indignant over the story that floated out of the Bohemian Club about his conduct on the occasion of the reception to the Presidential party. He is quite positive that he was in none but exuberant spirits.

The Accommodating Ambassador

I recently had the good fortune to hear the real reason why Ambassador Choate shocked the Democracy by appearing at court in a fancy costume which differs from the plain, long black of his predecessors. It seems that Choate had been present at a grand levee at which he was the only Ambassador ununiformed. When the affair was breaking up a young British officer, taking Choate for a waiter, walked up to him and said, "Call me a cab." "Certainly," said the American, "you're a cab." The officer was horrified at the discourtesy on the part of a servant, so he hastened to his host and said, "Your man over there has insulted me." Then the host, equally horrified, hastened to explain that his "man over there" was none other than the American Ambassador. So the Englishman hastened over and apologized and Choate remarked: "If you had been a little better looking I would have called you a hansom cab."

The Society Sponge

The methods of the society sponge are interesting. Not long ago a prominent man who had frequently furnished luncheons and dinners for an attractive but impecunious youth who hangs around fashionable clubs and grills at meal times, said cold-bloodedly to his whilom guest:

"Well, who are you going to do for your luncheon today?"

"Just watch me," responded the youth, nothing abashed.

He attached himself to a party of girls with but two men just entering the grill, made a joke or two, was promptly invited to luncheon and, in a moment, waved his napkin at his friend from the largest table with the prettiest flowers in the room.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Xavier Rolker will leave today for Colorado Springs on a two months' vacation trip.

The Cold Blooded Lumber Barons

Whatever may be said on either side of the labor question there is no doubt that Mr. Hearst is carrying on the work of justice and mercy in turning the vials of wrath on the Union Lumber Company. I had recently a talk with an unprejudiced gentleman, a man in easy circumstances, but leaning in his views toward neither socialism nor monopoly, and who, three or four years ago, spent several months among the lumbermen of the Mendocino county redwoods. "The Union Lumber Company's camps," he said, "were at that time some twelve or fourteen miles inland from Fort Bragg, a distance that had either to be taken a-foot or traversed on the company's log trains. The majority of the men were swampers employed at twenty dollars a month and board, with loggers, lumbermen and engineers receiving as high as forty-five dollars and board. I sailed from San Francisco to Fort Bragg in the little lumber packet Soquel River, and with me were thirty or forty laborers who had paid Murray & Ready two dollars apiece for employment with the Union people. They were crowded like merchandise in the hold of the vessel, and from the time they left San Francisco till their arrival at Fort Bragg—some twenty or twenty-four hours—not more than a half dozen of the number had been given food.

"This fortunate few had been able to beg some scattered morsels from the cook and crew. It was winter when we arrived and I found the labor conditions amounting to nothing more or less than slavery. The men who boarded with the company, and had accepted jobs from Murray & Ready with the promise of twenty dollars a month and board, found that from three to five days out of the week they were laid off on account of rain, and that on those days they were given no wages, but on the contrary were charged fifty cents a day for board. I found on every hand men who had been working for the company for months and years, yet had not been able to lay aside a cent, and whose debts were enormous at the company's boarding house and store. The latter was one of the greatest abuses in the Fort Bragg woods. On account of the isolated position of the place, the laborers were obliged to patronize the company's store exclusively, and here bonanza prices prevailed for the bare necessities of life. I knew one college boy who worked there all winter and came away with fifteen dollars in his pocket, but he had accomplished this feat of financiering by absolutely refusing to patronize the company's store."

The Self-Advertising Art

Today, to have ability is nothing. To have the ability to market your ability is everything. To be a master of one of the fine arts is not enough. The modern artist must needs be past master in the foul art of self-advertising. If he have not the ignoble knack, or cannot acquire it, he puts himself into the hands of an imaginative manager and takes his chances along with breakfast foods. As for the public, it will swallow anything that is picturesquely advertised, be it good, bad or indifferent. Few things are more easily befouled by "filthy lucre" than the fine arts. The dollar diminishes the artistic value of everything it touches. The prevalence of paid write-ups causes honest criticism to be discounted. The undiscerning, who are in need of education in matters of art, are fooled to the top of the titillative manager's bent, and finally acquire, instead of taste, "the artistic ethics of the soul," a befogged feeling.

"Jinks says that he has been very successful in love."

"I don't see how he makes that out; he has been married to three women."

"But that isn't the way he puts it. He says he's been divorced from three women."

Why Armes Wouldn't Budge

On the occasion of the recent visit of Edward Bok of the Ladies' Home Journal and George Doubleday of the New York publishing house of Doubleday, Page & Co., some of the literati of the Bohemian Club gave them a progressive dinner. It was intended that each of the Bohemians should change places with every course that all might fondle the manes of the lions. All the members except one carried out the program. The exception was William Dallam Armes of the English department of the State University. He insisted upon retaining his seat beside Mr. Bok during the entire meal. The other men were disgusted but they are saying that Mr. Armes was trying to persuade Mr. Bok to accept some of his manuscript and that it naturally took some time.

Congratulations from Chicago

Dr. Joe Marshall Flint, professor of bacteriology at the Affiliated Colleges, has been receiving congratulations from Chicago on his coming marriage with Miss Anne Apperson, one of the numerous nieces of Mrs. Phoebe Hearst. Professor Flint's Chicago friends believe that he is going to marry a great heiress, who is destined for a liberal share of the Hearst fortune. Professor Flint was formerly a favorite of the buds of Kenwood, where he lived after winning football laurels at Princeton. His brother, Mott Flint, is professor of English in the University of Chicago.

Latest Aspect of the Servant Question

The latest aspect of the servant question is an exceedingly interesting one. Teas are growing scarce now, but at an informal one the other afternoon the ladies had such a charming time that they stayed late, and as five o'clock was the hour, some of them did not get home until after half-past six, and by the time they were dressed for the ceremonial meal of the day, dinner was a half-hour late. In one household the cook and the maid promptly gave notice, and now there is a scurrying homeward at half-past five, as most of the teas are thinned out at an early hour.

Our Mrs. Malaprop Again

The Mrs. Malaprop of the local smart set was being pressed to partake of a cocktail at a dinner dance the other evening, by a young navy officer who is famous for his skill as a mixologist. After refusing the concoction repeatedly, she said coyly, "Well, you might give me an infantesimal dose of it." "Better make it 'adultesimal,'" responded the officer, "it will do you good."

Ate Eighty Fried Eggs

A bunch of good fellows were gathered in a prominent cafe rolling all kinds of intellectual balls when a side roll carried the conversation to eating, and each gave his likes and dislikes in every-day dishes. One liked oysters, any kind of oysters. "Give me oysters by the dozen and I don't care how many I eat or who pays the bill." Another said fruit was his strong suit—he could live on it. The third claimed that no dish in the world could beat a good fat cut of sirloin topped with mushrooms. He could enlarge on several pounds of such provender and still cry for more. "Give me fried eggs," exclaimed "Teddy" Hartman, smacking his lips. "that's my favorite. Many's the time I've eaten eighty fried eggs and a slice of ham without being egged on."

"That's a cheerful lie," put in Fletcher Barbier of the mail service. "I'm something of a champ. in the egg line myself, so I can expert any such proposition. But eighty fried eggs at one sitting! Great Incubator, man, that story won't go down me any more than the eighty eggs will go down you."

"Oh, I don't know," said Teddy, modestly, "I've tossed off too many to doubt my ability to reach the eighty limit. If a man can once pass the fifty-sixth egg the work somehow seems to come easier. At least, that's always been the experience in my case."

"You're bluffing," declared Barbier, "I'll go you fifty you can't eat eighty fried eggs at one sitting."

Didn't Call for Roc Eggs

"Done," said Teddy, and they all adjourned to a restaurant across the street. While the bunch were seating themselves and Barbier was getting out a pencil and paper to keep tally Hartman whispered something to the waiter. They were still discussing the preliminaries when the waiter came in and set down a plate of fried ham and shad roe before Teddy. Barbier saw the eater slide about four hundred eggs into his mouth on one fork. Then he sat back with a look of consternation on his face. "What kind of a sucker do you think I am? Those aren't hen's eggs."

"No," said Teddy coolly, "and they're not elephant eggs, or roc eggs, or crocodile eggs, but they're plenty big enough for me when I tackle a contract to eat fried eggs by the hundred at one sitting."

"Go to Hades!" shouted Barbier, wrathfully, and he grabbed his hat and rushed from the place.

They were still laughing at the joke on him when the door opened and Barbier sheepily entered. "I'll apologize, boys," he said, "it's one on me. There, waiter, fix up these sandbaggers and I'll see you five extra if you work in a couple of gallons of knock-out-drops on 'em."

With triple coats of Hail Columbia's brag.
Heroes marine and heroes military
That shall out-tale the Vallambrosan leaves,
Heroes of sans-culottes like Tom or Jerry,
Heroes of politicians, chap-men, thieves.
Nor must our haughty-stepping dames be slighted,—
Let us have female heroes so the breed
Of our heroic hearts be expedited,
Bearing a race of Jasons from our seed.
They say we have few great men, scarcely any,
Who are the greatest people and the best!
We have not many great but a great many
Poets and statesmen, soldiers and the rest.
They say we have no heroes;—let us "fake" some!
They say we have no great men;—let us make some!

Barriers

Shadow thou art; a dream of my heart
Forever beyond me.
I may not press you
Close to my breast; may not love nor caress you.
The passionate glow
Lighting your eyes 'gainst your reason and will Sent through my being an answering thrill,
Transient and swift
As light through a rift;
Not until then could we measure the cost—
Eden forbidden, elysium lost.

"Miss Marguerite Fashion is visiting the Swells at their country-place, Ashmead in Sonoma county. Next week she will visit the Smarts at their ranch near Bakersfield."—Society Note in Daily Paper.

II.

From Miss Fashion to Her Chum.

Ashmead, May tenth.

Dearest Edith,

I am having the most delightful time, and it is so nice to think it is not costing me a cent. The Swells will not permit their servants to receive tips, so I am not in for that form of expense. When I was lunching at the Grill the day I left town I met Tom Climber, and he asked me if I would mind if we took the same train to Strawberryville (the station near Ashmead), as he is also of the party this week. Of course I was delighted. He paid for my lunch, and also my ticket, and as I gave him my trunk check he also paid the transfer man. He said he always liked to save a woman such little annoyances. Didn't say anything about saving her a half-dollar, too, but that was the best part of it. I will be able to save enough this summer for a new evening gown when I get home. Isn't it nice that our people are dropping on to the pleasure to be extracted from house-parties? It's such a boon to young women whose fathers are on salary and whose brothers just manage to make a living for themselves. Write me soon, Edith, and tell me all about the Springs. I wish I could afford a trip there, but am afraid I can't this summer.

Your own and only Marguerite.

III.

Smarts' Ranch, May thirtieth.

Dearest Edith,

I had the best luck imaginable. Mrs. Climber, Tom's sister-in-law, was coming to Bakersfield the same day I started, and she invited me to share the Railways' private car which Mrs. R. had placed at her disposal for the trip. We had a heavenly trip, and everything was right up to date. Of course I shall have to invite Mrs. Climber to call on me at the Smarts, when I've been here a few days, but I can manage it. I'm solid with the Smarts, for they are only just two-thirds "in" themselves, and are only too delighted to have a representative of the real Southern Aristocracy visiting them. Mrs. Smart gave me a new shirt waist, today, and is sending to the city for a white Indian mull and a pink organdie for me. I did not bring one thin frock with me—just fancy my thoughtlessness. But I thought a short skirt and a few shirt waists, with my lace evening gown, would do for a ranch party. However Mrs. Smart thought otherwise, and I'm not too proud to accept a few little things like that from a woman like her. Are you still at the Springs? Oh, these roasting hot days down here, how I long for a mineral bath! But I suppose I must take what I can get.

Your ungrateful,

Marguerite.

IV.

Smart's Ranch, June eleventh.

Dear Edith,

Of course I'll come. How utterly sweet of you to ask me. If I didn't know you are the very best friend I have on earth I'd think you invited me because I hinted at it. But you know, darling, that I'm too proud ever to accept anything like a forced favor. How generous of your father to send me my ticket, too. I'll be up as soon as I can pack my trunk. Am delighted to leave here. The Smarts, while decent enough people to know in town, are horribly plebeian and awful bores when seen close to and every day for breakfast, lunch and dinner. By the way, Mrs. Climber has invited me to visit her at Del Monte in August, a whole month, fancy. Now with you at the Springs for the rest of June, I have only July to provide for! Until we meet, dear,

Your rapturous

Marguerite.

From Miss Fashion to Her Chum.

San Jose, July eighteenth.

Ma chere Edith.

What a lovely time I have had since the summer began—at least I have had some lovely times. I enjoyed my visit with you so much, and only regretted the hot weather was too much for me after two weeks of it. Springs are all right if one is in delicate health, but a strong girl like myself must take less sun in hers. How dear of your mother to take me to Lake Tahoe with her. We had the sweetest time—she would not let me pay for anything, and, Edith, I'll tell you, you have the most generous mother alive. She gave me a beautiful linen suit all embroidered in acorn pattern, which is newer than the grape design you have. But you're such a dear, you won't be envious. And I know you're having the darlingest time in town with your husband. Wasn't it nice that he should return from New York just as I left, and you two could enjoy a second—or is it fourth? honeymoon together. We poor single woman have no such consolations as you enjoy, dear Edith. But I see no signs of a hubby in sight for dot-less me. You had fifty thou., you know, Edith, not to speak of your bonny face. Well, I am thankful I have some good friends. After we returned to town, your second cousin invited me down here. I met her at Tallac, and she is so sweet. Next week I am going on a driving tour with some people I met here. We're going to travel a whole week. Then comes Del Monte with Mrs Climber. And in September I'm invited to go to Yosemite with Jack Millions and a big party. He puts up for everything.

Your sincere friend,

Marguerite.

A Modern Fairy Tale

The Clever Wife.

Once upon a time there lived a young Queen. She was married to a jolly young King but she was not happy. Her mother had brought her up on old-fashioned rules. One of them was that she must be very economical, spend her husband's money carefully, and never give him a chance to dispute her millinery bills.

The young Queen was very pretty and amiable and for a long time her husband was devoted to her. She followed her mother's advice and ran the Palace household on an economical plan. She saved a lot of money, but it did not make her husband's private bank account swell to any extent.

The reason of this was a simple one. What the Queen saved, the King spent.

And, by and by, he began to find his pretty, amiable Queen rather an old story. He visited other Palaces and dallied with Princesses of low and high degree.

The poor little Queen staid at home and wept.

One day there came to visit her her sister from a neighboring Palace.

"Why, what ails you, my child?" she questioned; "here you are married to a nice young King; you are still as pretty as in your bud days, and yet you cry your eyes out. What's the matter?

Between sobs, the Queen explained the unhappy situation.

"Why, you're a little fool," said her sister, at the end of the tale of woe, "but then I did the same when I was first married. Our mother, you see, is a trifle out of date in her ideas. Now, brace up, take my advice, and in a short time your King will be dangling at your apron-strings, and won't want to get away, either."

"But what shall I do?" asked the younger Queen.

"Go to work and spend money, that's all," said her sister.

"But there's none to spend now. My lord and master buys flowers and sweets and jewels for his friends, and it keeps me busy saving—"

"What!" interrupted the elder Queen, "didn't I tell you, you simpleton, to follow my advice? Don't you see that if you spend, there'll be nothing left for him?"

The little Queen was not lacking in quickness of wit. After her sister's departure, she consulted her account-books and emptied the toy-bank of its contents.

All happened as the Queen's sister had predicted. Not all at once, of course. The King blustered and whimpered, and tried his coaxing tongue. But the bravest King is no match for a woman—when she is pretty and amiable and has a fine taste in dress.

In a few months there was no milder-mannered King throughout the land than the husband of the young Queen.

And when one day her mother came to visit her, and remonstrated at the extravagance displayed in her daughter's wardrobe and apartments, the young Queen laughed at her parent's horror and said:

"You belong to the old world, dear mamma. I belong to the new. There's only one way to keep one's expenses down and one's husband in subjection. Do all the spending yourself." —The Romancer.

How It Is Done

The Old Story of the Pump Drama.

Mr. Clydefitch receives a note from Manager Uptodate:

"Dear Fitch,

"My wife has a pet pug of which she is fond and I'm thinking to please her by having a drama written around the beastie. What can you do?

"Yours, Uptodate."

"P. S.—Might work in a bench show. U"

Mr. C. (on receiving the same): "By George! The best thing yet. I already see the bench show—howling dogs—heroine with pet pug—rival with French bull—man gives a collie for engagement gift. Plot? Oh, I can get that up on the old lines. The dialogue simply rushes through my head." (Calls his stenographer and dictates):

"Every bark has its own tree.

The Heroine: Of two evils always choose the worse.

The Cynical Hero: Then I will kiss your maiden aunt instead of your pug dog.

A dog in time saves a cruel father's shoe-leather.

The Heroine: Every dog returns to his own bone.

Her Rival: Yes, I see your pug nestles close to your neck."

Mr. C. (to his stenographer): "That's enough for today. Go and bring the dog food man to me, also a dog surgeon and the secretary of the bench show. I must have facts to mingle with my epigrams. (Drinks two gin fizzes.) How fatiguing it is to satisfy the public taste in dramas!"

STAGE

A Runaway Girl

There is daintiness, there is chic, there is beauty, there is art and there is some catchy music in this week's performance at the California, but it is all subdued, and none of the charms of "A Runaway Girl" incites one to rapturous rhapsody. Though it lacks the sumptuousness that we have always regarded as characteristic of a Daly production it is pleasant to contrast the refinement of it all with the blare and brummagen of the pretentious musical comedy companies that have lately come to town. It is a polite company that resorts not to parade of voluptuous charms, and refrains from attempts at establishing intimate relations with individuals in the audience. All the mummers attend strictly to business and under discipline that makes team work apparent in everything that is done. The ingenue role of Winnifred Grey is played by Marie Doro, a deliciously dainty girl who has a voice so child-like and faint that it reminds you of Fanny Rice in her precocious infant imitations. But when she sings the whole company holds its breath and stills its muscles so that the pianissimo utterances of the small voice may be heard. You feel that if the comedian should bat an eye he would drown a note but he doesn't. Such forbearance on the part of the comedian is phenomenal. It bespeaks commendation for the discipline that is enforced. And notwithstanding the smallness of Miss Doro's voice you applaud her lustily, not so much for her noble effort at being audible as for the grace and charm of her manner. The prima donna of the company is Miss Isobel Hall, who has a very sweet soprano, and to whom you must be grateful for the clearness of her enunciation. Her best number is "Listen to the Band," a song made familiar to us by the Tivoli, for it was interpolated in "Manila Bound." After hearing it at the California and noting the breezy business that accompanies it you at once realize that Impresario Leahy didn't miss a trick when he saw "A Runaway Girl" in New York. One of the most talented of the women in the company is Miss Violet Dale. She plays the maid with great dash and with all the art of the true comedienne. Miss Dale has a wonderful pair of educated legs. The proficiency of their education is apparent when she gives her first kick. There is another comedienne in the company in the person of Sadie Kirby, who plays the part of Carmenita, one of a band of wandering musicians. She is a spirited soubrette, and in one of her songs she is reminiscent of May Irwin though she uses a Cockney accent. The principal comedian is Mr. John Slavin, who has the audience with him from the moment that he makes his appearance. He isn't much more than a yard long, but his humor is all infectious. George Fortescue, the other comedian, has a Broadway reputation which he sustains in a role that doesn't afford him much opportunity. Mr. Alfred Hickman is satisfactory in the juvenile role, but he lacks the voice to win success in musical comedy. However the company is short on voices. Mr. Thomas Gore easily carries off the honors from the male singers, but vocal talent is not the company's strong suit. Nevertheless it is abundantly supplied with other kinds of talent, and it gives a most enjoyable performance. The piece is a spirited farce, and there is more plot and substance to it than can be found in the average musical comedy.

Dan Frohman Was a Newspaper Man

This has been a good year matrimonially for divinities of the footlights. Stage beauties have captured more than one rich, and thought-to-be confirmed bachelor. Daniel Frohman is the latest. The veteran manager is fifty-two years of age, and Miss Illington, his fiancee, is said to have just entered her twenties. She is also said to be a beauty. As she comes here with Sothern next week we shall be able to judge of that for ourselves. Those who know Daniel Frohman by sight know him as a slightly built man, bald-headed and wearing a short-pointed beard. He has a pleasant, gentle way with him, and a very particular manner of transacting his business. It would be natural for him to take time in choosing a life-partner. Dan, in his day, was a hustler in the theatrical business, always hustling however in a well-bred way, but a few years ago he ceased his strenuous labors in behalf of theatricals and let his younger brother Charles take up the work. The story of the rise of the three Frohman brothers, Daniel, Gustavus and Charles, is, by the way, an interesting study of American life. They were born in Sandusky, Ohio, but when Dan was eleven he went up to New York to school. He helped out his expenses by working outside of school hours, and when he was fourteen years old found himself in the Tribune office. He continued there for years, becoming finally one of Horace Greeley's secretaries. He was also private secretary to Albert Richardson, the Civil War correspondent of the Tribune. When John Russell Young started the New York Standard he took Dan Frohman for his cashier. But after Young left with General Grant for his round-the-world trip, Frohman went into the advertising department of the Daily Graphic. His health suffered from constant office work, and his doctor ordered him to travel.

That was the road Dan Frohman took to the theatre. To follow his physician's prescription he became traveling manager and director of the J. H. Haverly touring companies. He liked the business, and in time had John McCullough, Fanny Davenport, Mary Anderson and other stars under his management. Charles, who was nine years younger than Dan, also came up to New York and went into the Tribune office, following closely upon his elder's heels. When he was seventeen he went West with John Dillon's "Our Boys" and a year later was managing Haverly's Mastodons in Boston. Daniel Frohman's chief success was the Lyceum theatre, with its famous stock. Charles's name has always been associated with the Empire. The home life of the Frohmans has always been remarked upon as being of particular refinement, harmony and charm. No one ever thought Dan would marry because he was so devoted to his maiden sisters.

She Was Not a Divorcee

Fanny Gillette Stevens, who recently obtained a divorce from Landers Stevens, the actor, has written to me from New York to deny that she was a divorcee before her marriage to him. "'During the six years spent in California," she wrote, "I made many friends, and would greatly dislike having them think I had deceived them as to my character or antecedents. Divorce at best is the confession of failure on the part of one or both parties to it, and I am thankful to have but one to acknowledge."

Rejuvenation at the Tivoli

After enthusing over the vaudeville stunts of Eastern musical comedy successes it is refreshing to drop into the ramshackle opera house on the little side street, and lend the ear to real music as played under the baton of Paul Steindorff. Now that the old Tivoli is drawing to the close of its checkered and at times brilliant career, it is well that it should make a spurt, as it does this week, to maintain the prestige that it has long enjoyed. The production of "El Capitan" is one of the most creditable things that it has done for a long time. Seldom have I witnessed greater enthusiasm in the Tivoli than was evoked by the finale of the second act, Tuesday night, when the audience compelled the repeated raising of the curtain for the repetition of that rollicking chorus with Edwin Stevens striking an attitude and waving Old Glory. It was a scene worth treasuring as a tradition. There is abundant snap and ginger in the performance, and the youth, beauty and grace of the chorus are a revelation. The Tivoli chorus has at last been brought up to date in the matter of physical charms. Its legs are slender and symmetrical, and it looks well in tights. Mr. Stevens is the greater part of the show this week, a circumstance that is undoubtedly pleasing to the comedian, and he sings as he never sang before; that is, he does for an act, but the wear and tear became apparent toward the close, when fortunately for him he is supposed to become intoxicated, a circumstance that he seeks to impress upon the audience by drinking with apparent gusto from a tankard that he had drained. This is a solecism even in an intoxicated comedian. Annie Meyers, too, is in good vocal form this week and contributes much to the success of the performance. By the way, before the old Tivoli is deserted wouldn't it be a good idea to give a farewell memorial performance?

Great Talent at the Grand

The new season at the Grand Opera House will begin tomorrow, Sunday night, with the great Eastern musical sensation, "In Washington." The production will be exactly the same as that used by the Rogers Brothers during their lengthy season at the Knickerbocker theatre. The company is an exceedingly strong one, the close of the Eastern season having enabled the management to select from the most successful musical attractions of the past twelve months. The most distinguished members, Raymond and Caverly, clever German dialect comedians, head the list of artists. The others are Cheridah Simpson, the well known prima donna, and late the bright particular star of the "King Dodo" company, Louise Moore, the Dolores of one of the New York productions of "Florodora," Anna Wilks, a popular singing and dancing soubrette, Olive Ulrich, who as a singing and dancing comedienne, made a hit with the Rogers Brothers at the Knickerbocker theatre, Martha D'Roy, a very handsome girl who has been one of the features of Klaw and Erlanger's musical productions, Monte Blair and Ella Welsh, who were very popular members of the "King Dodo" company, the Esmeralda sisters, graceful dancers, who have just concluded a season with the "Nancy Brown" company, Harold Crane, a sweet baritone, Budd Ross, a clever comedian, Charles W. Allison, a great character actor late of the "Burgomaster" company, Herbert Sears, who starred in "A Texas Steer," Geo. P. Towle, musical director of Daly's, the Casino, the Bijou and other leading New York theatres, and Charles H. Jones, the Amazon March King. There will be a beautiful girl chorus of fifty, an excellent male chorus of twenty and an orchestra of twenty-one musicians.

To Call This His Home

White Whittlesey has decided to make San Francisco his home; or, at least, the place he will in future call home. An actor is doomed to much travel and the varied discomforts of hotel life. On the road all hotels are bad, the only distinction being that some are worse than others, and Whittlesey has determined that he shall have a real home when the exigencies of his profession demand not that he be the patron of the hostelries. Therefore he has sent to Connecticut for his mother and sister and they will soon set up their Lares and Penates in this city.

Florence Roberts is now playing the coast cities, and will not begin her San Francisco season until September. She was in Fresno last week, where the public gave her a rousing welcome, and the critics many pleasant words. Miss Roberts has "The Adventure of the Lady Ursula" and "The Unwelcome Mrs.

Gods, Dreams, Girls and Snows

In the back part of this week's Town Talk appears one of the Villon poems that Sothern recites in "If I Were King." And in the third act he recites this:

I wonder in what Isle of Bliss
Apollo breathes ambrosial air,
In what green valley Artemis
For young Endymion spreads the snare,
Where Venus lingers debonnair,
The wind has blown them all away
And Pan lies piping in his lair—
Where are the gods of yesterday?

Say where the great Semiramis
Sleeps in a rose-red tomb; and where
The precious dust of Cæsar is,
Or Cleopatra's yellow hair;
Where Alexander Do and Dare;
The wind has blown them all away,
And Red-beard of the Iron chain,
Where are the dreams of yesterday?

Where does the Queen of Herod's kin,
Or Phryne in her beauty bare;
With Rhodope and Tomyris,
And Sappho and Campaspe fare,
Where Guenevere, the world's despair,
The wind has blown them all away,
And Helen, fairest of the fair,
Where are the girls of yesterday?

Alas! for lovers! pair by pair,
The wind has blown them all away,
In vain we seek them here and there,
Where are the snows of yesterday?

Belasco to Revive "Macbeth"

Dave Belasco is the latest theatrical manager to decide on a Shakespearean revival next season. He is to star Mrs. Leslie Carter as Lady Macbeth. It is becoming more and more evident every day that the Shakespearean drama is to enjoy a theatrical renaissance next season for the first time since the season of 1888-89, when there occurred revivals of "Macbeth" by Mrs. Langtry in New York and Mr. Irving in London, of "Richard III" by Richard Mansfield. At the same time Booth, Barrett, Frederick Warde, Louis James, Madame Modjeska and Miss Julia Marlowe, who was then a newly discovered star in the theatrical galaxy, were appearing in all the old familiar Shakespearean plays. For many years the popularity of Shakespeare upon the stage was defined by very narrow limits, but what have been regarded as insuperable barriers are breaking down. It is discovered that the majority of Shakespeare's plays present no serious difficulties to the skillful adaptor. Such is the universality of the genius that has left its stamp upon the work of this most practical of all dramatists that, despite the growth of stage tradition and the development of stage methods which intervene between the little Globe theatre of Elizabeth's time and the most modern of San Francisco playhouses, we can still enjoy seeing "Hamlet" or "Macbeth" presented almost scene for scene, with far more relish than some of the up-to-date products of our modern playwrights.

The Malvern trio of acrobats, with the Landmark touring company, made a great hit at the benefit performance at Fischer's. They are nimble athletes and do an exceptionally fine turn.

The whiskey of the particular — Chapin & Gore.

Mary Hampton plays a triple role in "The Melodrama," the clever sketch in which she makes her debut before an Orpheum audience. Miss Hampton is looking well physically and she acts with her old charm and grace. Her supporting company of two ably second the star. Kartelli, the slack wire star, is another brilliant in this week's bill at the Orpheum.

Among the novelties to be introduced into "Twirly Whirly" at Fischer's is a real airship, an automobile that explodes and a monkey who can act and dance.

N. C. Goodwin follows E. H. Sothern at the Columbia with his latest success, "The Altar of Friendship." Julia Dean has made a name for herself with the Goodwin organization.

Features of Next Week's Bills

If there's any one star who has always done just what he said he'd do, on a road tour, that one is E. H. Sothern. When he takes to the road, he takes his Broadway company with him. "If I Were King," at the Columbia, will be seen with the original scenery, cast and costumes. Cecilia Loftus, who as "Cissy" Loftus made her first essay at fame as a mimic, plays the heroine. George W. Wilson will be King Louis VI, and Margaret Illington, Rowland Buckstone, William Harris and Henry J. Carvill are included in the huge organization of one hundred and twenty people. Owing to the play's length, the curtain will go up at eight sharp. There will be matinees on Wednesday and Saturday.

One hundred and eleven times when it was originally produced, and thirty-six times more for the revival, is the marvelous record of "Fiddle Dee Dee" at Fischer's. It looks as if it would run for a whole year, but pursuant to the decision of the management not to tire their regular patrons, the burlesque will be taken off the stage in a fortnight. So this is the last chance the people will have to see it.

At the California "A Runaway Girl" will go another week, and on June eighth "The Circus Girl" will be put on, with Slavin in his original role of Biggs, the waiter.

"El Capitan" will run another week at the Tivoli. "The Isle of Champagne" comes next.

In "The Tyranny of Tears" next week at the Alcazar, White Whittlesey will be put to the test of comparison with John Drew, who scored one of his best successes in this delightful comedy. The play is by Haddon Chambers. Whittlesey will personate the husband, Bertha Creighton the weeping bride, Juliet Crosby the typewriter, Albert Morrison the cynical friend and George Osbourne the father-in-law. On June eighth comes another play, "D'Arcy of the Guards."

The Grand will have a brilliant attraction in the Rogers Brothers' show.

Direct from the Folies Bergeres, Paris, to the Orpheum, comes M. and Mlle. Paxton's Living Art Panorama, a distinct novelty here. It includes a large corps of Parisian artists' models, remarkable for their beauty, form and grace. The three marvelous Rixfords, world-famed acrobats from London, will make their first appearance here. The Lutz brothers, styled the "twentieth century marvels," will also be new. One of them is without arms, but is an accomplished musician and expert marksman. Harry LeClair, the celebrated character artist, known as the "Bernhardt of the vaudevilles," will make his reappearance after an absence of six years in his handsomely costumed satirical impersonation of famous actresses. By request the English clowns will retain "The Nightingale's Courtship" in their act.

At the Chutes the Spraguellos will present their unique musical entertainment, "Satan's Pastimes"; Connors and Connors, a singing and dancing duo, will offer a clever specialty and Richard and Maggie Leoni, known as the "silver athletes," on account of their magnificent stage apparatus, will appear for the first time here. Richard Leoni is the only person in the business who hangs by the heel of his bare foot to a flying trapeze. H. B. Burton, a character artist, will contribute a novel turn. A Bohemian glass blowing exhibition is a new feature at the Chutes. —The Playgoer.

Of More Than Ordinary Merit

"Life's Common Way" is a distinctly twentieth century story. It makes no particular difference where the scenes are laid, for the incidents might have taken place in any community of sufficient size, and as to the characters, the women especially, they are so typical that they can be called by name. The story does not concern the smart social set, but the class who take themselves seriously, and imagine that their finger-in-the-pie clubs help to turn the wheels of the universe a little faster and a great deal better. The meeting of the Committee of Ten, with which the book opens, is so well done that one might fancy that the author had transcribed the minutes of an actual meeting. There is Mrs. Ingledew, the perfectly correct and altogether immaculate, but none the less decidedly aggravating matron; Mrs. Blankenship, shallow, insincere, subordinating everything to correct form; Mrs. Roberts, who never "speaks out in meeting," but finds fault and criticises every one and everything, when it is too late; Ursula Keith, clear-sighted, shrewd and sarcastic, but genuine, and with a delicious sense of humor; Teddy (Theodora), the only daughter of Mrs. Blankenship, crude, slangy and unformed, with the makings of good or bad in her, according to her environment, and in contrast Mrs. Somerford, an elder sister of Mrs. Ingledew, belonging to another generation and other traditions. The men occupy about the same positions of relative importance in the book that they do in life. They are absorbed in making money for the women to spend. Hutchins Ingledew is a king of finance, a trust manipulator, whose one rule of morality is, "the law can't touch it." Morcraft is his able lieutenant, and Blankenship a bustling and busy broker whose only excuse for existence is to furnish the money for his wife and daughter. Hayward Engham is as much of a contrast to the other men as his half sister, Mrs. Somerford, is to the women. Incidentally to the wrecking of a tramway company in order that the property may be absorbed into the maw of a trust, there are some graphic pictures of a strike and we are taken behind the scenes, where we see the wires pulled and the puppets juggled. People are married and given in marriage, and there is both tragedy and comedy in about equal proportions. The conversations are bright and witty without being unnaturally brilliant, and the parlor lecture, Nature Study, the Penny Provident Society, the supplying of flower seed to school children, and all the other fads and foibles of the hour are so neatly touched up that even if the book had no other merit, it would be worth reading for them alone. A book of more than ordinary merit. [Published by A. S. Barnes & Co.]

The Reason Why

The author of a somewhat lengthy article on the subject of books for the young, more especially boys' books, remarks that: "Three great favorites of the boy of twenty years ago—Captain Mayne Reid, Oliver Optic and Jules Verne—are now, for whatever reason, no longer writing stories." Two of the trio ceased for the very best of reasons, because they died. Oliver Optic, Captain Mayne Reid, Horatio Alger and George A. Henty, all deservedly prime favorites in their day, have passed out of existence within the last two or three years, and Jules Verne has reached an advanced age which, in connection with failing sight, makes writing more of a task than a pleasure. The surprising thing is that any writer sufficiently interested in boys' books to write about them, should not know it, and that some one officially connected with the Atlantic Monthly did not call his attention to the fact before the article appeared in the magazine.

Matthew Arnold had the not uncommon habit of making extracts from the books which pleased him. These are now to be published by his daughter, and the name, Arnold, will probably secure a sale for them, but other people's selections and excerpts are apt to prove as unsatisfactory as other people's children. The only value which detached sentences and paragraphs can have, as a rule, is in recalling the context, and one who has not read and enjoyed the whole is not apt to get the full significance of the part. Matthew Arnold's selections were of use and profit to Matthew Arnold, but John Smith will be wiser to use his own judgment and make a John Smith collection which suits his own requirements than he will be in laying out good money for a Matthew Arnold collection and then trying to fit his brain to the fragments.

MUSIC

The Pasmore Concert

Beautiful tone production is the aim of Mr. Pasmore's teaching, and his pupils' recitals show that it is not an unattainable one. Clear, round tone, absence of all roughness and forcing, and good enunciation, were the features of last Wednesday evening's singing, and good qualities were apparent in every voice. The length of the program renders it impossible to do justice to the several numbers. Perhaps the most thoroughly satisfactory one was Miss Beulah George's "Io dice que no" from Carmen. Miss George could give cards and spades to many a Michaela whom I have heard. Mrs. Florence Wyman Gardner's flexible soprano had no easy task in the Shadow Song from Dinorah. Grace and lightness were apparent in her rendition. Mrs. J. Bardilini did well with Chaminade's "Summer." It is not often that a soprano of her quality is equal to such delicate elocution. Mr. Frank Tigone gratified the audience with his Verdi romanza, and fully deserved the applause he got. Mr. Nowlin has a mellow and expressive tenor which he made good use of in his two songs. Miss Louise Smith, Miss Anna Obermuller, and Mrs. Arthur Fickenscher and Miss Anna Moore were excellent in their respective numbers. Miss Lida Benedict was a little too timid in her Schumann songs. Illness prevented the appearance of Mrs. Edith Phelps Collins, Mrs. Charles C. Hughes and Mrs. L. A. Larsen. Mrs. Edith Scott Basford appeared in two extra solos, her firm contralto doing full justice to a pretty little Pickanninny Slumber Song. The part songs were well rendered, and the Rheinberger chorus, "Night," with accompaniment of piano, flute, violin, viola and 'cello was an especially gratifying number. It goes without saying that the Pasmore sisters contributed not a little to the success of the recital, Miss Dorothy in particular, with her 'cello obligatos to the songs of Miss Obermuller and Mr. Nowlin. On the whole a most successful and gratifying concert

The Loring Concert

The presence of Trebelli on the program lent an unwonted interest to the Loring Club concert of last week. The artiste appeared in several solos, and with generous encores gave the large audience its full meed of satisfaction. Mlle Dolores's first number was "La Reine Topaze" (Carnival of Venice with variations), a selection well adapted to display her technique and ease of vocalization. Succeeding numbers were "La Violette" (Scarlatti) and Pergolese's "Tre Givorni," followed by Sterndale Bennett's "Gentle Zephyr" and later in the evening Solveg's song from Grieg's "Peer Gynt." For encores Mlle. Dolores gave "Bon Jour Suzon," "Comin' through the Rye" and the Laughing Song from Auber's "Manon Lescaut." Mlle. Dolores is not an artist who enchains her listeners by the magic of temperament or by dramatic fervor, but one who pleases and satisfies by the cleanness and finish of her vocal art. It was expected that she would take the solo part in the Schubert-Liszt chorus, "The Almighty," but not having practiced in ensemble she very wisely declined, and the solo was executed by Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup, who achieved a signal success. Her voice has great carrying power and it soared out in crystal purity over chorus and orchestra. In discussing the soloists I must not forget the club. The opening chorus, "Tally-Ho" from Benedict's opera, the "Lily of Killarney," was given with fine vim. The succeeding number, "Secret Love," a folk-song of the eighteenth century, was one of the best things the club has ever done. The shading was exquisite, and in short the whole rendition without a flaw. The beautiful violin obligato by B. Jaulus was the most notable feature of Paul Schumacher's "Happy to Wander." A chorus from Mendelssohn's "Edipus at Colonna" with double choir, orchestra, organ and piano, inaugurated the second part of the program, dignified and noble music adequately rendered. Doctor Schalkhammer was excellent as usual in the incidental solo of the "Troubadour's Serenade" by Rudolph Wagner. The concert concluded with "Longbeard's Saga" by Charles Harford Lloyd, which was rather draggingly sung by the chorus. The piano obligato was played by Miss Ruth Loring. Miss Loring's neat work at the piano was in striking contrast to the slovenly playing of Mlle. Dolores's accompanist. Mr. Loring directed, and Mr. J. C. Fyfe was organist. The club expects to be able in future to introduce visiting concert vocalists, the engagement of Mlle. Dolores being the first experiment of the kind.

An Evening With Wagner and Elder

An æsthetic atmosphere pervaded the book shop of Mr. Paul Elder on Saturday evening last, the occasion being An Evening with Wagner. Softly shaded lights, old brasses, Japanese prints, rococco mirrors and other articles of vertu formed the background for an audience evidently lovers of art and music. Miss Annie Wilson was the pianist, and proved herself past mistress of the instrument. What her ten slim fingers can do with the keys is wonderful. Miss Wilson's theme was the Prelude and first scene of "Das Rheingold." Her exposition was terse and lucid, and she dwelt more on the musical structure and less on the esoteric features of the opera than most Wagner expounders. After a short preface she played the prelude and scene, making running verbal comments. Mr. Walter Hastings Olney, a young man with a mellow and sympathetic baritone, rendered the "Evening Star" from "Tannhauser." Miss Wilson's second number was Siegmund's Love Song from "Die Walkure," followed by Mr. Olney in Wotan's "Farewell," to which Miss Wilson played the finale, the well known Fire Scene. The audience was keenly appreciative and listened to both pianiste and vocalist with every mark of pleased attention. At the close of the program Mr. Elder kindly invited his guests into the art rooms to inspect a fine collection of photographs.

Madame Eugenia Mantelli, the famous singer who will give two matinee concerts at Fischer's on June tenth and twelfth, is the artist who was the big sensation with the Mascagni organizzation before it collapsed. Mantilli's first program will include "Una voca poca fa," from "The Barber," "Connais tu le pays" (Mignon), "Saco fa," from "The Barber," "Connais tu le pays" (Mignon), "Sapre per te il mio cor" (Samson et Dalila), the Habanera from "Carmen" and other selections from grand operas, besides classic songs. Mantelli made a great success in South America, duplicating her European successes. Her concerts have the charm of novelty in that she renders the different arias of grand opera, fully portraying each character in superb costume, necessitating several changes. Seats for the Mantelli concerts will be on sale next Thursday morning.

The Laughing Song

There is one song in the Dolores repertoire with which she makes a decided hit, and that is the laughing song. She makes a whole audience laugh with her when she trolls out the "Ah, ah, ah, ah, . . . la, la, la, la" of Auber's music. The arrangement of the "Manon Lescaut" song that Dolores sings is by Anne Seguin, and the words of the first stanza are:

My story, yes c'est amoureuse,
And more, 'tis not quite fabulous,
But of a gallant bold
—Ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah—
This gentle commissaire so grand,
Was called severe throughout the land,
Yet truth's not always told
—Ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah—
He loved a lady fair, ah, ah,
Yet, oft would he despair, ah, ah,
For she on him looked cold,
—Ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah—
Now would you wish that I the name
Of this Leander great in fame,
Should quickly let you know?
Well, as it will amuse you,
I cannot then refuse you,
But speak it low, quite low,
No, no, I dare not tell you,
La, la, la, la, la, la, etc.

Dolores, by the way, has often been asked why she never went on the grand operatic stage. Her answer, to such an inquiry, was that she is too indolent. She cannot bear to think of such hard study, et cetera. But I am of the opinion that Dolores knows her limitations. She has many physical shortcomings, and her art scarcely warrants the enthusiasm that she arouses in San Francisco.

On Wednesday evening of last week, Miss Eula Howard, a young pupil of Hugo Mansfeldt, gave a successful piano recital in Mr. Mansfeldt's studio. She rendered a program including works of Brahms, Grieg, Schumann, Raff, Tschaikowsky and Rubinstein, playing the selections entirely from memory and with admirable expression.

The San Francisco Conservatory of Music, E. S. Bonelli, director, has issued invitations for two concerts. Next Wednesday evening in the Alhambra theatre the older pupils will give a concert and on the following Saturday afternoon, June sixth, in Y. M. C. A. hall, the juvenile pupils will give the program.

A Genuine Artist

Miss Mary Carrick is not a child phenomenon, but a serious young woman who, under the guidance of Mr. Hugo Mansfeldt, has studied her Liszt to some purpose. Her program of last Monday evening was a daring one. Liszt spells first of all technique, and afterwards much more, and let it be said Miss Carrick has not stopped short at the first syllable. Many of her readings displayed an unexpected breadth of interpretation and delicacy of phrasing. The program was by no means a trite one, two of her numbers being heard for the first time in this city. One of these was the Legend of Saint Francis preaching to the birds, one of the two compositions in honor of the Abbe's patron saint. It is in the impromptu style, and two voices may be distinctly heard, the twitter of the birds, and a churchly air representing the preaching of the good saint. It has been pronounced the most poetical piece that Liszt ever wrote for the piano. It offers occasion for some very pretty finger work to which Miss Carrick did ample justice, while she brought out very clearly the poetic beauties of the composition. The Concerto in E flat was also new here. While in one movement it contains a number of themes, some of exceeding beauty, and ends in a strong bravura. The second division of the program contained several characteristic numbers, among them the Tarantella, a Lied transcribed by Hugo Mansfeldt, the arrangement of the Evening Star romanza from Tannhauser, and the eighth Rhapsody, in all of which the young pianist acquitted herself admirably. Her power and speed are surprising, and she succeeded in evoking a soul out of the much banged Rhapsody. Mr. Mansfeldt is to be congratulated on his pupil, and the public of San Francisco on the fact that such results can be arrived at by local tuition and without the necessity of going abroad to study.

Last Friday evening at the Von Meyerinck School of Music the following program, compositions of the Romantic school, was rendered, to the pleasure of a large invited audience: Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy (1809-1847)—duet, Oh, Were I in the Cauld Blast, Miss Ward, Miss Heslop; soprano, Auf des Gesanges (On Wings of Song), Miss Herman; soprano, The First Violet, Miss Collins. Franz Schubert (1797-1828)—alto solo, Der Wanderer (The Wanderer), Miss Davidson; soprano, Des Schafers Klagelied (The Shepherd's Lament), Miss O'Brien; alto, Aufenthalt, Mrs. Sterling; quartet, The Night, Arcadian Ladies' Quartet; alto, The Erlking, Miss Feldheim. Robert Schumann (1810-1856)—soprano, Der Nussbaum (The Nut Tree), Miss O'Brien; soprano, An den Sonnenschein, Im Volkston, Miss Schleef; tenor, three songs from the cycle, Poet's Love, Mr. Strauss. Franz Liszt (1811-1886)—soprano, Es Muss Ein Wunderbares Sein, Die Loreley, Miss Heath. Frederic Chopin (1810-1849)—soprano, Maiden's Song, Miss Collins; mezzo soprano, Lithuanian Song, Miss Heslop. Carl Maria von Weber (1786-1826)—soprano, Aria from "Preciosa," Miss Willcox; Prayer from "Der Freischutz," Miss Heath; Romance from "Der Freischutz," Mrs. Denke. Richard Wagner (1812-1883)—alto, Traeume (Dreams), Miss Feldheim; trio of the Rhinedaughters from Goetterdaemmerung, Mrs. Denke, Miss Craig, Mrs. Sterling. At the piano, Mrs. Arthur Lewis.

The confirmation service will be celebrated at Temple Emanu-El next Monday morning at half past nine o'clock. Cantor E. J. Stark has made special preparation for the event, the choir has been augmented to sixteen voices and an orchestra will assist. The musical compositions were partly written by the Cantor for the exercises, others being by Mr. W. A. Sabin, the organist, Scharwenka, Haydn and Auber. The solos in the various numbers will be sustained by Miss Daisy Cohn, soprano, Mrs. Helen Kelly, contralto, Newell Vinson, tenor and Homer Henley, bass; Mr. Sabin will be at the organ.

As is usual at the Philharmonic Society's concerts, a large audience enjoyed the program given at the Alhambra on Monday night. The members of the orchestra did admirable work in their several selections, under G. Minetti's baton. The club was assisted by Miss Foote, an Oakland violinist, and Cantor Solomon, who sang the baritone aria from "Queen of Sheba." In a serenade for flute and strings, the flute part was sustained by E. M. Hecht.

With the Money Makers

A Dull Market

Business in industrial shares has been of small proportions during the week and the fluctuations in prices have been so unimportant that very little attention has been devoted to the market. The situation is due mainly to the apathy of both buyers and sellers. Buyers are backward because they believe that the dullness may be protracted and if that should be the case it is fairly safe to assume that values will seek lower levels. On the contrary the selling element has unbounded confidence in the strength of prices, particularly on the dividend paying securities. The lack of buying orders they regard merely as an incident which may be expected periodically. While sales have been rather moderate and below the average of two or three weeks ago it must be admitted that prices have been remarkably well sustained.

Lighting Securities

Gas stocks have occupied a central position because of the prominence attached to them since various negotiations for acquisition and consolidation have been in progress. San Francisco Gas and Electric shares have been selling quite freely at $55.25 to $56.25, and now that it is practically acknowledged that all negotiations are off as far as that particular corporation is concerned, it is somewhat singular that the price of its shares should remain so steady at current rates. As a matter of fact San Francisco Gas and Electric stock is in exactly the same position now that it was when the shares were dragging along slowly at $42 to $43. The speculative operators on the street have been very successful in working up alternately the bull and bear influences necessary to enable them to profit largely during the last three months, but it is doubtful if the same plan can be manipulated again. The investing public appears to have come to the conclusion that this kind of operations has reached its limit. Pacific Gas Improvement shares have weakened and $39.50 is now about the maximum bid, but sellers are not disposed to accept that figure and are resolutely holding out for $41. A few sales have been made at a lower figure but they are exceptional. It may be safely stated that nearly all the Equitable Gas Company's shares are now in escrow awaiting action by the syndicate which has engaged to purchase all the stock at $5 per share. This syndicate, it will be remembered, put up $75,000 in coin, some sixty days ago, as a guarantee of good faith. During the last few days the same syndicate put up $90,000 more, at the same time asking some additional time. As this money would be forfeited if the buyers failed to carry their project to success it may be safely said the purchase of the Equitable plant is among the certainties of the near future. In the proposed consolidation the syndicate expect to obtain the Independent Light and Power Company's plant for $7,000,000.

Sugar Improving

Sugar stocks have been quite steady, but there has been a paucity of transactions. Hawaiian Commercial is strongly held and brings $47.50 but there are few holders willing to sell at less than $48, and some demand $49. Hutchinson Plantation is steady at $15, with few offers to sell. Recent advices from Honolulu announce that a meeting of the directors of the Onomea Sugar Company has been called for the purpose of declaring a dividend of 20 cents per share payable on June 5th. It is probable that several other sugar corporations will follow suit during the next few weeks, for it is known that the sugar traffic and prices have made important forward strides during the last few months.

The proposed consolidation of the powder companies has not fallen through as some people have imagined. Negotiations have been deferred because of the illness of Mr. Dupont who is in this city for the purpose of bringing about a merger. Mr. Dupont is still confined to his rooms but the negotiations are making satisfactory progress. Giant Powder shares sold up to $75, but by utilizing unfounded rumors certain speculative interests succeeded in breaking the price down to $72.75. Only small lots were secured at this figure, however, and holders are generally loth to sell at less than $74.50 to $75, and it is doubtful if any considerable parcels could be secured at these figures.

Sothern Will Recite This

In the sprightly play Justin Huntley McCarthy wrote for E. H. Sothern, based upon some of the adventures of Francois Villon, the following verses of the vagabond poet are introduced. Mr. McCarthy translated them from the original Villonese, and Mr. Sothern recites them in the first act of "If I Were King," when his boon companions are gathered with him in the Fir Cone Inn. With them, though they do not know it, is the King himself in disguise.

All French folk, wheresoe'er ye be,
  Who love your country, soil and sand,
From Paris to the Breton sea,
  And back again to Norman strand,
Forsooth ye seem a silly band,
  Sheep without shepherd, left to chance.
Far otherwise our Fatherland
  If Villon were the King of France!

The figure on the throne you see
  Is nothing but a puppet planned
To wear the regal bravery
  Of silken coat and gilded wand;
Not so we Frenchmen understand
  The lord of lion's heart and glance—
And such an one would take command
  If Villon were the King of France!

His counsellors are rogues Pardie,
  While men of honest mind are banned,
To creak upon the Gallows Tree,
  Or squeal in prisons over-manned;
We want a chief to bear the brand
  And bid the damned Burgundians dance;
God! where the Oriflamme should stand
  If Villon were the King of France.

  Buffet the foe with sword and lance;
'Tis what would happen, by this hand,
  If Villon were the King of France!

Their Safe Man

No paper in this country more faithfully reflects the interests and views of the plutocrats than Harper's Weekly. It is the organ of the little coterie of men that controls the finances of this country, and therefore if we wish to know something of their policy and plans we should read between the lines in Harper's. Of course it affects a highly patriotic interest in all matters pertaining to national policy, and professes to be unbiased in all discussions of a political and economic character, but between the lines its motives and purposes are to be discerned. For instance, in a recent issue, Colonel Bryan is taken to task for assuming the right to dictate to the Democratic party. He is denounced as a dog in the manger and a common scold, and Mr. Cleveland is held up as a man deserving of public confidence and high esteem. There is no doubt that many good Democrats are of that same opinion so far as Mr. Bryan is concerned. They have no sympathy with him in his objections to Mr. Cleveland, which are based on purely selfish grounds. They are weary of Bryan's bickering, but they have not the utmost confidence in Mr. Cleveland, and mainly for the reason that he is being forced upon the Democratic party by the Republican plutocrats that seek to manufacture public opinion through the columns of Harper's Weekly. If Mr. Cleveland derived his political strength from Democratic sources he would be worth considering as a Presidential candidate, but honest and sincere party leaders are loth to espouse the cause of a man who is more acceptable to the Republican plungers of Wall street than is the representative of the party in the White House. And by the way the opposition to Roosevelt among the so-called Captains of Industry is significant. The President has stuck to party principles throughout his Administration; he has kept his promise to carry out the policy of William McKinley, and so faithful has been the service he has rendered that the politicians who direct affairs and who take their orders from the corporations and trusts have given up all hope of alienating the affections of the rank and file. They know that they must heed the popular demand for his nomination. But what did he do to provoke the distrust of those influential leaders who have bowed to the will of the rank and file? The answer is that he interfered in the anthracite coal strike, and that he attempted in one or two instances to curtail the special privileges of the absurdly rich. In other words he "disturbed business interests." Now the people—Democrats as well as Republicans—have been enthusiastic in their approval of those particular actions that incurred the enmity of the Captains of Industry. They do not regard Roosevelt as a demagogue or as a socialist because he sought to regulate certain enterprises that trespassed upon the rights of the common herd. But Mr. Morgan and a few of his multi-millionaire friends think that they are justified in regarding Mr. Roosevelt as an unsafe man. And as they know that they cannot prevent his nomination they have undertaken the task of manufacturing public sentiment in favor of Grover Cleveland's nomination by the Democracy. Their intense admiration for Cleveland, as reflected by Harper's Weekly and other plutocratic organs, is likely to arouse suspicion, for the ex-President is evidently an example of what they consider to be "a safe man." And judging from their objections to Roosevelt "a safe man," according to their ideas, is not the sort of man we should care to have for President at this time.

The Presbyterians vs. The Mormons

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian church went on record after the usual manner of religious convocations, in passing resolutions calling for the "wiping out" of Mormonism. If resolutions, denunciations, and mere noise could accomplish anything, there would not be a vestige of Mormonism left. Considering that the Constitution of the United States guarantees religious liberty to all creeds, one would really like to know why the Presbyterians should have any more right to "wipe out" the Mormons than the Mormons should to turn the tables and make an end of the Presbyterians. It is true that there are doctrines and practices amongst the Mormons which are repugnant to the majority of American citizens, but the same is true of the Presbyterians. If plural marriage offend one portion of the community, infant damnation is no more agreeable to another. However, the Presbyterians have modified their doctrine somewhat so far as the fate of infants is concerned, and in doing so they shaped their religion in deference to popular prejudice. It is pleasant to feel that one's religion may be attuned to one's transgressions. So far as the Mormons are concerned, when they transgress the laws of the land they should be brought to trial under the civil code, but in matters of opinion or belief they are free to do as they please. It would be better for all concerned if the jarring sects refrained from resolutions against one another, for by indulging the practice they merely call attention to the flaws that may be found in the various brands of up-to-date Christianity. And as there is good in all religion it is unwise to point the blowholes to the scoffers. The clergymen of the Catholic church are usually content to refrain from criticising the Protestant sects, except by way of answer to arguments set forth by controversialists learned in theology, but if they were inclined to find fault with the teachings and practices of others they would condemn the Presbyterians for doing indirectly what the Mormons have been denounced for doing directly. Divorce as recognized by the Presbyterian church is, according to the Catholic notion, the mother of plural marriages. And the Catholic church believes that there is no more authority for a woman to take unto herself two or three husbands than there is for a Mormon to avail himself of the pleasures of polygamy. When it comes to laying out the physical geography and social conditions of the next world, the Mormons know quite as much, and on precisely the same authority, as do the Presbyterians, or any other creed. If it is any pleasure or satisfaction to a Presbyterian to believe himself one of the elect, chosen to enjoy celestial bliss hereafter, where the sweetest music which shall reach his ears will be the groans and cries of those less fortunate beings, doomed, since the dawn of creation, to burn in everlasting torments, for no fault of their own, no one is going to interfere with his premeditated joy. If he believes that the most pleasing incense to the nostrils of the Almighty is the roasting flesh of sinners, and that the greatest mercy to be extended to infants stillborn is to assign them to "the easiest room in hell," all that should be asked is that he refrain from hastening the occasion by practical experiments on earth. If the Mormon believes that he is to possess the land, and to revel in innumerable wives and offspring, and material property, he is just as welcome to his belief. He is just as capable of proving the correctness of his prophecy. All that should be asked in his case is that he defer his pleasures also. People who have lived in Utah, and seen more of Mormons at close quarters than can be learned from a car window, are ready to testify that they are by no means so black as they are painted. At all events, the court calendars of that State have never been clogged by divorce suits, alimony suits, suits for maintenance and other proceedings growing out of the sort of plural marriages acknowledged elsewhere in the United States, nor have we heard much about children tossed from hand to hand like shuttlecocks, sometimes in the care of one parent and sometimes in that of the other, with intervals of Aid Society, Reform School and the street. But religious bodies and reform conventions are apt to waste their strength in words. There is no danger that they will ever take more active measures to accomplish anything. The General Assembly has done its duty and satisfied its conscience, and though they shook the rafters with the thunders of their eloquence, the Mormon church will be still doing business at the old stand, without having experienced the slightest shock.

To Promote Twaddle

The latest culture freak, said to have made considerable headway amongst the socially and financially elect in the East, is "conversation classes." It is the aim of the brilliant mind which conceived the plan, to gather in those "young people who really have no particular idea about anything" and teach them to talk about nothing, in a tone and manner which will give it all the appearance of wisdom and wit, and impart such an air to their utterances that people will long to listen to them. There does not seem to be any warrant for limiting the instructions to young people, unless, as seems to be a fairly well established working-rule, there are none but "young people" in society, no matter how long ago their advent upon the earth took place. Neither has it ever appeared to be a bar to engaging in conversation, that people either had nothing to say, or did not know how to say it. On the contrary, the greater the lack of ideas, the more rapid the flow of words. "Conversation" is a babbling monologue carried on in chorus, without the need for listeners, and indeed, "with no particular ideas about anything" to be communicated, there is no particular reason why any one should listen. If paucity of information is to be the sole qualification for membership in the "conversation classes," there ought to be a perfect stampede of applicants, and the promoters of the scheme should be able to place their terms at rates which would prove practically prohibitive to any but the wealthiest. George Eliot put into the mouth of one of her characters the sentiment that the average young lady of her day "needed lessons not to sing," and a paraphrase of the same remark could be applied to chatterboxes. Instead of trying to perfect them in the art of saying a great deal about nothing, they need to learn to keep silent. Possibly an occasional season of "retreat and meditation" might result in the evolution of an idea. The education of society, the female portion of it, at all events, has always been in the nature of a polish or veneer out of all proportion to what lay underneath the surface, but this latest scheme savors of an effort to make a veneer stand alone, to put a polish on thin air.

Femininity's Love of Style

The eternal question as to the motive underlying woman's love for dress is up for discussion again. Do women dress for each other or for the men? The disputants err in not taking into account the fact that human motives are seldom of an unmixed character. As George Eliot said, our passions do not live apart, in locked chambers, but bring their provisions to a common table and mess together. Love of dress is the resultant of several forces. Sometimes it is mainly a gratification of personal vanity or of the æsthetic sense. Frequently a woman will say, "I like to see myself looking nice." She takes the same delight in prinking that a bird does in preening its feathers or a cat in smoothing her fur. Any admixture of coquetry, or desire to please the other sex, is unconscious or perhaps subconscious. Any woman who has ever deliberately striven to please her husband, brother or male relative in the matter of dress will admit that men are, to say the least of it, difficult. They do not know what they want. Artists aside, men are as a class out and out Philistines. They want to see their women folks looking well but they invariably hate new fashions. Their real likes are confined to what they are accustomed to. At the same time they quickly perceive when a woman looks dowdy or out of style. The artist may prefer long lines, loose draperies, big sleeves and picture hats, but the average man does not unless fashion has accustomed his eye to them. As a rule a man prefers light colors and closely fitting garments. No matter how much a man may rail against corsets, the uncorseted figure is an abomination to him. When the comfortable and hygienic Mother Hubbard was fashionable a few years ago it was the detestation and ridicule of the men which drove it out of existence. Any woman who would dress according to the expressed notions of men would make a guy of herself and would bring down upon her head the ridicule of those she sought to please. Men are impressionists. They take in effect but not detail. A woman's eye, on the contrary, in glancing over a costume will sum up cost, quality, and conformity to the mode in every detail. It is here that women dress for other women. It takes the strongest mind, and one which has overcome every suspicion of vanity, to bear up under the keen glance of an expert who sees at once that her skirt is last year's, or her sleeve last month's, and her collar yesterday's, and to be wearing them argues something lacking in her purse, her taste or her savoir faire. So, while it may be admitted that the fair sex likes to impress the stronger one by dress and appearances taken as a whole, it is the other woman who is most affected by those changes in detail which constitute fashion.

The Pension Grabbers

The greediness of the Civil War veterans is in a fair way to be eclipsed by those of what Mr. Bierce was pleased to designate as the Yanko-Spanko affair. The pension habit is strong in the blood of American patriots. The rush to the firing line when war is declared is equaled only by the stampede toward the Pension Office when Johnny has ceased to come marching home. When men volunteer for war duty we are pleased to regard them as patriots, and on their return to acclaim them heroes, but if their sole aim be to attach themselves to the Government pay roll for life, and to perpetuate themselves as a war burden to taxpayers even to the second generation, it were absurb to credit them with noble impulses and lofty spirits. How are we to differentiate the patriotic hero from the premeditated pensioner? It should be worth almost any ordinary man's while to volunteer for military service in time of war if he were guaranteed, in addition to the glory of having fought for his country, the privilege of drawing a fat pension in idleness during the remainder of his days. In May last the pension payment growing out of the conflict with Spain amounted to three and a quarter millions, and the indications are that more than half the men who enlisted in 1898 will soon be on the pension list. This pension snap is assuming preposterous proportions. It is leading to unlimited paternalism. Even the letter-carriers expect to be pensioned after they have grown tired earning a salary. Why not establish a pension list for every man who is lucky enough to become a public servant?

A Bribe Solicited

Ominous clouds are beginning to gather over the head of M. Combes, the Premier of France, who has been so active in expelling the religious orders from that country. Some Paris papers have made sensational disclosures in connection with the recent expulsion of the Carthusian monks from la Grande Chartreuse. It appears that certain Radical members of the Chamber of Deputies offered the monks exemption from the clauses of the association law in consideration of a large sum of money, and it has been insinuated that the son of M. Combes is on very intimate terms with the faction that solicited the bribe. The monks refused to consider the proposition, and the papers hostile to the Combes have since been conducting an investigation into the matter. Disclosures of a much more scandalous nature are promised, and all Paris is taking a deep interest in the affair. The people of France are so accustomed to revelations of crookedness on the part of their highest statesmen that no matter how scandalous the disclosures may be they will not challenge the credulity of the Parisians. However, familiar as the French have been with evidence of official corruption, since the big Panama scandal, they are far from complaisant, and should proofs be offered of rottenness in the Chamber of Deputies, disaster would surely overwhelm the Loubet administration. It does not take much to sway the French people, and they are quick to reduce parliamentary majorities.

We Set the Pace

A recent sojourner in England comes back to us with outspoken comments on the freedom with which the British aristocracy discuss their anatomies and their diets on all occasions, but indeed there is nothing new in the situation. An English author, in one of his late books, tells of being regaled at a garden fete by the speculations of a lady of title as to how many of those present could still boast of an appendix, and the latest commentator did not find his appetite improved by having his dinner partner discuss the same topic, and advise him to be insured against appendicitis. As far back as 1880 W. D. Howells drew attention to the peculiarity of our cousins across the water in regard to this matter, when he commented on Mrs. Macalister, in "A Modern Instance," as one "who had the freedom of alluding to her anatomy which marks the superior civilization of Great Britain and its colonial dependencies." But after that appendicitis dinner, San Francisco can proudly boast that "We lead, others follow."

A Mild Protest

BY HARRY COWELL

Today the air is thick with thought, is tremulous with theory; but life, which should tend toward perfection, is still turned to petty ends. The gods are dead. Delight is sick. The world has ceased to wonder, and all things have become cheap and commonplace—matters of fact, divested of all divinity. Yet ever are being presented to us the marvels of birth and of death; and between these, the long marvel of life itself, with its supreme marvel, Love. A man is a miracle of miracles, and one that is being wrought every moment. "What a piece of work is man!"—dust indeed, but divine. In a golden age man is the measure of all things; in a leaden age, money.

Call me over-nice, or what you will, but I confess, or rather avow, that the perpetual pig-philosophy that permeates modern reform movements, is an offense in my nostrils. The protruding belly obtrudes itself everywhere. I wish with all my heart that the bread and butter question were well settled; so that the sensitive ear might hear no more the noise thereof; so that the artistic eye be no longer hurt by the sight of men with heads below their shoulders, like those monsters one reads of.

Let every man work, or acknowledge himself pauper or parasite. Rather, let every life be a nice balance between labor and leisure; for this is the first condition of physical, mental, and moral health. Where one class suffers from under-work and over-wage, and another from over-work and under-wage, both might be much benefited by a a more equal division of work and wages. Leisure for the laborer, labor for the loafer; this is admirable; but the end of reform is not replete stomachs, but complete lives; not French cooks for all, but character for all. The right end of reform is the making of men. It is the presence of character which should dwarf every other circumstance, and make pelf and power appear petty and their pretensions ridiculous. The capital circumstance of the cosmos is character. It is, to speak figuratively, the end of natural endeavor, or evolution; and ought to be the end of human endeavor, of the "ethical process." It is the end in reference to which all other ends are means. Where the cosmos has left character man must take it up. Artificial or human selection must supersede natural selection. The merely biologically fit must give way to the socially fit. Man is a modifier of nature, and directs the most powerful of her forces to such ends as seem to him desirable; and character is the end of ends. Character is the mark of a man. Knowledge and love are the essential elements of character. Knowledge without love is selfish and destructive; and love without knowledge is foolish and inefficient. Knowledge and love; duly developed and properly proportioned, these go far to make up a man.

But it is eminently desirable that the man so constituted be self-supporting; that is, society-helping. Hence, despite its dismalness, the importance of political economy. Man does not live by bread alone; but then he does live by bread. My quarrel with the dismal science is because it takes hold of man by the wrong handle. "Let us see," say the political economists, "what would happen were man a mere money-making animal." I, a simple countryman, should like to answer them according to my simplicity, thus: "Man would go directly to the devil." Let no one think that I do not recognize the theoretical value, the scientific good, of so regarding man; but I recognize also, and perhaps more fully, the practical, the social, evil of forgetting afterwards to make the necessary qualifications. If man worthy the name be mainly a spiritual being, characterized by mental and moral and æsthetic qualities, would it not be better, instead of regarding him from the biological point of view, as a mere animal; or from the economic point of view, as a mere money-making animal; to regard him from the ethical point of view, as "infinite in faculty," and then make the qualifications required by the circumstance that man is also an animal?

The desire to develop the mental and moral faculties, to experience the delights of knowledge, of art, and of love, in short, the desire to be a man, is already beginning to play havoc with the older political economy; and the end is even now indicated: namely, that ethics in the future shall be qualified by political economy, and not political economy by ethics.

Every scientist knows that we live in a world of appearances, of shows, of shadows; that the soul of man is the only reality: our world being merely certain states of consciousness, caused, we infer, by things external to us. What these things are in themselves, we know not; what some of their effects upon us are, we know. Even the known soul, or self, of which we are so sure, is an elusive reality, and cannot catch itself. But, save in our severely scientific moments, these appearances are very real to us; and the character of a man is only an inference from some of them, principally these that we call acts, and words, and expressions.

There is thus a genuine difficulty in considering men as characters; but the evil of not so considering them is incalculably great. The common conception of a human being seems to be, such clothes, such color, such sex, such age, such features, such bank account, such position, such title—seldom such character. From fine clothes, fine features, fine manners, fine surroundings, to fine character, the inference is easy and natural; but often false. On the contrary, if we accustom ourselves to consider chiefly character, we soon learn to recognize its presence under no matter what disguise, and cannot be cheated by cheap substitutes.

Look out for man, and money will look out for itself.

Ruef's Princely Income

George Hatton, than whom there is no better-posted man on political affairs in California, stated in a recent article, in the Oakland Tribune, on the subject of the income of prominent attorneys, that Abe Ruef is credited with cleaning up sixty thousand dollars a year. That is far above the estimate which I made shortly after Mayor Schmitz seized the reins of government in his lily-white hands, but since then Mr. Drinkhouse has become a police commissioner, the Schmitz brothers have become more firmly and numerously rooted in the municipal government, and other propitious circumstances have combined to swell the revenue of the Mayor's fidus Achates. Mr. Hatton gives no inkling as to how this young Captain of Industry cleans up sixty thousand a year, but surely he does not believe that it is done by strict attention to legitimate law practice. The only other attorney whose income, according to Hatton, approximates that of Abe Ruef is the eminently respectable E. S. Pillsbury, who draws annual retainers ranging from twelve hundred to six thousand a year from half a dozen quasi-public corporations. It would be interesting to know whether Mr. Ruef is on the pay roll of some of the big corporations, and if so to what end, for he does not represent them in court.

The Loyalty of Schmitz

If Mr. Ruef's income amounts to sixty thousand a year, and I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of Mr. Hatton's estimate, then it is more profitable to be legal adviser to San Francisco's Mayor than to be President of the United States. It has been said of Mayor Schmitz that his one redeeming quality is his fealty to his friend Ruef. Through thick and through thin, despite the odium that has been brought on his administration by his intimate association with a political boss whose practices have frequently been viewed with suspicion, Mayor Schmitz has been steadfast in his loyalty to the man who contributed more than all others to his political success. It has been said that if he could break away from Ruef he would win public confidence and insure his re-election, but he prefers to be as faithful to his friend as Damon was to Pythias. Such friendship is not to be disparaged, but I do not know whether to commend the loyalty of Schmitz more than his wisdom. Perhaps he feels that a man who is smart enough to make sixty thousand dollars a year in his capacity of friend to the Mayor is worth keeping on his staff. And, again, perhaps, Ruef is as grateful as Schmitz. So why should this political partnership be disturbed?

Ruef Exonerated by Chretien

Mayor Schmitz, by the way, recently paid a visit to San Quentin, where he had an interview with "Happy Jack" Chretien, the lawyer who is serving time for attempting to defraud an estate by means of a bogus heir. The interview was solicited by Chretien, who took occasion to make a confession in the presence of several witnesses, one of whom was a newspaper man. The convict has a high regard for dramatic effects, and in a most impressive fashion he solemnly averred that Abe Ruef was in no way implicated with him in the attempt to loot the Sullivan estate. He explained that he made this statement for the purpose of doing justice to a man he had wronged. I have no recollection of Chretien's having implicated Ruef at any time. Indeed I had always believed that he tried to shield him, but that there were certain suspicious circumstances that tended to involve Ruef, who was at that time acting as the attorney for Public Administrator Drinkhouse, since appointed a police commissioner. Chretien almost succeeded in looting the estate, and if he had, Drinkhouse would never have been held responsible, for the decree of distribution drawn by Ruef was so cautiously worded as almost to suggest anticipation of fraud. However, it is not unreasonable to regard that as a mere coincidence due to the extra cautiousness of a man familiar with the ways of the artful practitioner. It was also somewhat of a coincidence that just about that time Ruef allied himself with the Primary League, at the head of which were the people who exposed the Chretien conspiracy. And now Mr. Ruef has the satisfaction of knowing that he has been exonerated by Convict Chretien.

The Cemetery Calm of Burlingame

So many of the gay residents of Burlingame are wandering afar these days that a Sabbath stillness has come over the place, investing it with the peace and quiet of a rural cemetery. The Charles Clarks are among the few people who show signs of animation in the once-bustling home of the smart set. They have been improving the old Hobart residence and enhancing the beauty of its environment, and they have become very popular in the village, for they are spending lots of money. Last week Senator Clark visited his son, and a dinner was given in his honor. There were fourteen people at the table. The Senator has never spent much time in this part of the country, but he has taken a fancy to Burlingame, and he may decide to rear a country home down there.

Conspicuous By Their Absence

There was another function at Burlingame last week—a luncheon given by Mrs. Frank, who, by the way, has not been active in social life of late. She gave the luncheon in honor of four young people who are soon to wed—Genevieve Carolan and Harry Poett, Frances Hopkins and Eugene Murphy. There were sixty people at the luncheon, and there was some comment among them over the failure of the hostess to include that other betrothed couple, Miss Taylor and Mr. Newhall, among the honored guests. It will be remembered that before Miss Pope became Mrs. Frank she appeared to be the object of George Newhall's intense admiration. Indeed, speculation was rife as to whether they were to marry, for Dan Cupid appeared to be busily engaged in trying to arrange the match. However, Miss Pope became Mrs. Frank, and now she is a widow, and Mr. Newhall is about to marry Miss Taylor.

The Reclamation of Newhall

The engagement of Miss Carrie Taylor and Mr. George Newhall is drawing to a close. They are to be married on the seventeenth. The engagement period has been greatly enjoyed by Mr. Newhall, who has proved himself a most devoted lover. For many years he was regarded as a confirmed bachelor, but when his engagement was announced his friends remarked that it was characteristic of him to reach results after the most mature deliberation. This deliberative habit was no doubt responsible for the protracted engagement. Mr. Newhall's years being fully as mature as the deliberation which precedes most of his acts, it might be supposed that he would not have preferred a long engagement, entailing, as it does, frivolities in the way of conventional functions, but he took to it like a two-year-old. The gay convert from bachelordom was even going in for one of those show weddings, with all the trappings and paraphernalia that impart a circus aspect to the solemn ceremonial, but a death in the family made the impending spectacle impossible. The postal authorities were spared the trouble of distributing two thousand invitations, and now they will have a nice, quiet and polite wedding at the Taylor home in California street. The elaborate gowns, et cetera, will be worn by the bride and her attendants, but not for vulgar display.

Wiltsee Says "Nothing Doing"

If more attention were devoted in the offices of the dailies to these columns, they would get some of their news more promptly and with less expense. For instance, it was rank extravagance to pay telegraph tolls for a despatch from Denver about the rumored engagement of Cornelia Baxter Tevis and Mr. Ernest Wiltsee. I published the news of the rumor two weeks ago, and when Town Talk reached Denver, the former home of the young woman who jilted Gerald Hughes, it attracted considerable attention. Thereupon it was wired to the San Francisco dailies, but it was stale news when they published it. Perhaps it will now interest them to know that Mr. Wiltsee, who was in town during the last few days, denies the soft impeachment. He admits that he has entertained the attractive and rich widow, but he declares that no matrimonial plans have been entertained. Mr. Wiltsee is an intimate friend of Mrs. Tevis's father, and he knew her before her marriage with Tevis.

When the Thirteen Patronized Bolinas

This is the time of year when San Rafael's "Upper Thirteen" begins preparations for its annual hegira. It has long been the custom of this exclusive set to disport itself economically at a dusty little place up the coast called Bolinas. The opening of each summer found the elect of Marin's aristocracy filling the stage for Bolinas, a place whose attractions consisted chiefly of a bit of beach about a block long and an air of exclusiveness induced by the forbidding fogs, which appear to be congenial only to San Rafael society people. In the boom days of Bolinas cottages were erected by the George M. Dodges, the Winteringhams, the Vincent Neales, the Harry Francis's and Mrs. Parks, and the hotel was reconstructed and dubbed the "Flag Pole Inn." Its popularity was insured by the fact that its proprietor was a brother of Mrs. Vincent Neale. During the height of the season, when the suburban aristocracy togged out in white duck and real gingham, the isolated resort presented a gala appearance. But the villagers have become tired of the hilarious dissipation of listening to one another and the gleeful waves, so now Bolinas is deserted.

The Glassy Eye

Though San Rafael is itself a summer resort, the elect of the village flee from it at this season of the year. Perhaps it is because they fear contamination from the city folks, or perhaps it is because they object to being forced into the background. The urban aristocrats, whose provincialism is somewhat less marked than that of the commuters, have been known to congeal the atmosphere of San Rafael in summer time, and hence the annual exodus. In this connection I recall the experience of an Upper Thirteenite whose home had been rented by one of our fashionable matrons for the summer season. She met her tenant at the depot one day and gave her a nod of recognition. The city matron raised her lorgnette languidly. The village lady nodded again, but there was no response. "I guess you don't remember me," said the San Rafael woman, "you're living in my house, you know." The San Francisco matron backed away. "If you want to raise the rent, you'll have to see my husband," she said.

The Press Barred

Press censorship has become very popular among Uncle Sam's functionaries since the Spanish War. Federal officers all along the line think that they have the right to bar press representatives or blue-pencil the news whenever they are engaged in any enterprise that might give rise to just but unpleasant criticism. An instance of this autocratic assumption of a dangerous prerogative was given the other day by the men and women detailed to lead the Indians from Warner's ranch at Agua Caliente to a new reservation. A correspondent writes me that the officials headed by an inspector named Jenkins attempted to bar all newspaper men from the Indian village. Their arguments had no effect on the Indians, who would still be wallowing in the hot springs in which their forbears wallowed had not some people in whom they had confidence volunteered friendly advice, but the officials sought to conceal the fact of the unwillingness of the Indians from the public. Inspector Jenkins said he would admit no newspaper man who would not agree to write at his dictation, and to enforce the rule he surrounded the village with a cowboy guard. However the correspondents managed to get the news.

Table Manners From Germany

Those German agriculturists, university professors and students who have been touring the State in quest of knowledge are no doubt representative of Teutonic culture and refinement, and therefore it is, in all likelihood, fair to gauge the table manners of the Fatherland from those of her educated sons. Last week I happened to be in the dining-room of the Vendome hotel in San Jose when those German tourists were enjoying their lunch, and I noticed that nearly all of them used the napkin for a bib. Apropos of German table manners, a San Francisco woman just returned from abroad says that she went into a fashionable shop in Berlin to purchase some beautiful drawn-work table napkins which she had seen in the window. On looking over the various styles, the clerk earnestly warned her against taking a certain set in which there was a great deal of drawn work, with the words: "These, madam, do not give general satisfaction, as they are so porous. You see that when they are tucked into the collar they allow the smaller and softer portions of the food to go through on to the shirt or dress."

Why the Minister Resigned

The Rev. B. W. R. Taylor, who has long been one of the most popular preachers in Southern California, recently resigned the rectorship of St. John's Church, Los Angeles, and thereby hangs a tale the dailies have not cared to discuss. The Rev. Mr. Taylor held the rectorship of St. John's for nearly twelve years, and built up one of the strongest parishes in the State. Two years ago came the trouble that culminated in his resignation. Two prominent women undertook to dominate the affairs of the church and the rector gave them a heart-to-heart talk which aroused their ire. Then he went into the pulpit and preached a sermon on "The Golden Fetters of the Church," which was in the nature of a jeremiad against wealthy people who imagine that Christianity cannot succeed without their co-operation. He caused zig-zag furrows to run down the back of one of his wealthiest parishioners, and then the feminine knockers proceeded to whisper him into disrepute.

Gossip Still Rife

Phillips Brooks once said that when two women in a parish start out systematically to down their minister he might as well pack his duds and quit. The Rev. Mr. Taylor is probably of the same opinion. Persistent slander and gossip got a fair start, and he decided to resign. His vestry protested, but he would not stay, and then they empowered him to name his successor, which he did, much to the displeasure of Bishop Johnson. But harmony has not been restored in St. John's. On the contrary, gossip is still rife, and the women who were responsible for the resignation of the Rev. Dr. Taylor are the sufferers. The current gossip involves the minister of another church, who happens to be the pet of the women by whom the Rev. Taylor was assailed. Altogether it is an unsavory mess.

A Divine's Unholy Smoke

Through an interview published in one of the Los Angeles papers, Dr. Henry S. Van Dyke, last year's moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, provoked a deal of unpleasant criticism. The reporter related that during the interview the great divine and Princeton professor lighted a cigar. Many of the ministers, the missionaries and the members of church sewing societies do not approve of cigars even when they are between the lips of such a fascinating man as Dr. Van Dyke, and they expressed their disapproval of his conduct in unequivocal language. Dr. Van Dyke is not the type of man who abandons a practice simply because some one else disapproves of it, and he has quietly gone on smoking though the tempest rages. The Assembly the next day passed a resolution deprecating the use of tobacco.

The cotillion at El Salero's last meeting of the present season was led by Miss Mae Peters and Rudolph Gingg, Miss Mary France McDermott and Caspar Bovey. One of the figures was especially pretty. It was an original idea, and danced by members only, each carrying a silk flag.

Jordan's Recalcitrant Collar

At the commencement exercises at Stanford Dr. Jordan was himself again in spite of the rude shock he had given his confreres by appearing at the baccalaureate in a doctor's robe. His commencement speech was probably one of the best of its kind ever delivered in an American college, covering, as it did, all the unsolved branches of science and pointing out, in no uncertain way, the work to be accomplished by the young scientist and thinker of the twentieth century. The effect of this gem of oratory was heightened by the fact that the celebrated speaker, when he arose, wore his old, shabby frock coat with a wrinkle at the back and a pair of trousers that bagged at the knees. More than this, the good doctor's coat collar was turned up at the right side and turned down at the left, giving an uncertain effect which was somewhat of a strain to the nerves of the audience. Among those whose censorium was jarred by the Doctor's eccentric toilet was Dr. Elliott, the Registrar of the university, who kept looking at the doctor's coat collar and fidgeting in his chair. At last, during one of the speaker's most telling sentences, Dr. Elliott arose ostentatiously and turned down the offending collar.

The Soporific Flugel

Another humor of the ceremony, although somewhat grim in its nature, was the speech of Dr. Flugel, professor of philology, who was supposed to be the speaker of the day. Like many another educator of undoubted ability, Dr. Flugel is a bore when he talks, and considering the fact that his address lasted somewhat over an hour, you can imagine what a young man has to go through in order to become a full-fledged bachelor of arts. The speaker droned on and on and the audience slept, and when at last Flugel took his seat Dr. Jordan arose to his feet with something that sounded like a sigh and said, "The next will be music." Owing to the unfortunate typhoid epidemic the assembly hall was little more than half full and many sheepskins were taken to the sick rooms of the graduates.

Kept Important Secret a Year

It is over a year since Miss Mattie Folger of Stockton returned from a trip to the Orient, where she had made quite a lengthy visit, and settled down again to what her friends regarded as the humdrum of a staid bachelor maid's life. Great was their surprise when the announcement was made last week of her engagement to Mr. Ernest Barnby of Yokohama. The announcement was made at a luncheon given by her sister, Mrs. C. Bee Hart. Then for the first time did Miss Folger's friends learn that there was a romance connected with her trip to the Orient. The announcement was followed by a display of emotion. Some of Miss Folger's friends burst into tears, but whether the moisture was evoked by joyful emotion or by the indignation incident to the discovery that Miss Folger had kept such an important secret a whole year my correspondent saveth not. The bride-elect sailed alone on the Siberia, and the marriage will take place as soon as she reaches Japan.

Signal Magnanimity

English justices must have some peculiar ideas of judicial impartiality. Justice Grantham, in rendering a decision in a case where one of the parties in the litigation was a Catholic, prefaced his remarks by saying that he "disliked the Catholic faith as much as any one," but intimated that he did not intend to let his private prejudice interfere with strict justice. This is but little better han a proclamation that in his opinion those who differed from him in religious belief were dependent upon his magnanimity for the equal treatment before the law which it is commonly believed is the prerogative of the people. When a man of such narrow views and small prejudices can be elevated to the bench in civilized England, it is no matter for great wonder that the ignorant Russian peasantry fall upon the defenceless Jews. It is precisely the same spirit of intolerance, and would manifest itself in the same form of physical outrage if the occasion were ripe.

"I used to think that a fashionable summer resort was the best place to go for a flirtation with a young married woman."

"Have you changed your mind?"

"Yes; I've come to the conclusion that the average man who has a wife worth flirting with prefers to do the flirting himself. It's usually the fellow that has a freak for a wife who sends her away for a vacation and establishes a reputation for unselfishness."

A Patron of Felines and the Arts

The new hospital which by the terms of Mrs. Kate Johnson's will is to be added to our city's charities recalls memories of that peculiar woman. Most people associate Mrs. Johnson's name with a wonderful collection of cats. She had a tremendous craze for cats, and had their portraits painted in various attitudes. One of these cat paintings covers the whole side of a room, the felines being life-size. Mrs. Johnson was a liberal art patron. It was she who owned Toby Rosenthal's "Elaine" which was once cut from its frame and carried away when on exhibition at a local art gallery. It was later recovered. The old Johnson house at the corner of O'Farrell and Leavenworth streets has been a boarding-house for many years.

A Victim of Melancholia

The melancholy news comes from Berkeley that Louis DuPont Syle, for many years connected with the English Department of that institution, is becoming slowly insane. He is reported to be the victim of melancholia. Indigestion is the primary cause of his mental trouble. When a student at Cambridge, England, he worked so hard that he impaired his health, and gastric derangement followed. While in the State University Syle proved himself to be a man of great breadth of mind. He edited textbooks, wrote for the public press, and proved himself to be a practical and successful playwright, as well as a professor of things that are dead and gone. His activity aroused the spirit of jealousy in the breasts of his associates, who immediately began to knock, and when Benjamin Ide Wheeler came from the East he absorbed the prejudices that Syle had provoked. The disliked professor was given a year's absence in Europe, and while he was gone he was quietly dropped from the faculty list.

Verse That Stung

Syle anticipated the action that was taken, and before his departure he wrote some verse that was secretly distributed over the town and about the campus. Pope at his best wrote nothing that stung his contemporaries more than Syle did his by this effusion. The poem was entitled "Ben, Jim, and Ide." It was a scorching satire on the new President. Wheeler sent the janitors over the campus and had the drastic criticism of his methods consigned to the furnaces in the different buildings. Syle, who was taken into the university upon the recommendation of Professor Charles Mills Gayley, had a falling out with his old friend and college chum several years before the end came. Syle entered the university as an instructor in Freshman English. In a few years he was made an assistant professor with an increase in salary. Not satisfied with his promotion he exercised a pull in the Board of Regents, and without asking for Gayley's recommendation, was made an associate professor. This so angered the head of the department that an estrangement followed. Syle was never forgiven.

The Jilting of Perkins

Southern California society is agog with the romance which is behind Mrs. Jean W. Bowers's broken engagement with Lionel Roberts, the Riverside orange millionaire, and her subsequent betrothal to Edmund Taylor Perkins of Washington, D. C. "Polly" Perkins, as he is affectionately referred to by his friends, is a young civil engineer with no large personal fortune but with the knack of making himself immensely liked in the smart set of the South. It seems that Perkins had been in the train of the attractive golfwoman for several months, had wooed unceasingly, but with what success was merely a matter of conjecture. They were separated, however, long enough for her to meet Mr. Roberts and consent to marry him, and as soon as the decision was reached she telegraphed to "Polly" Perkins that the worst was over. He was at Redlands at the time, so, with the apparent intention of congratulating the fair young widow, he packed his grip and took the next train to Los Angeles. It is not definitely known what transpired there, but Mrs. Bowers's sudden and unexpected change of heart proves that Perkins was a far more eloquent and practical pleader than his wealthy rival. Before her marriage, which proved unfortunate, Mrs. Bowers was Miss Jennie Waters, adopted daughter of Miss Snell, the founder of Snell's Seminary. Miss Snell sent her beautiful charge to Vassar as soon as her preparatory education was completed and Jennie Waters made her record there as the most popular girl that ever came from California.

"My husband is hopelessly out of date."

"Why do you think so?"

"He is always making some public demonstration that is bound to lead people to the conviction that we are in love with each other."

Sharon's Grandson a British Officer

It may interest San Franciscans to know that among the officers of the Royal Horse Guards, one of the Household Cavalry regiments of Edward, King of England, is a son of Sir Thomas Hesketh, and grandson of William Sharon, the millionaire Senator of California a score or more years ago. Another young British officer, whose father was an early day Californian, is Lieutenant William Sillem of the Royal Navy, who received a medal for his distinguished services during the recent troubles in China.

Resurrection of Wilkes Booth

Probably it will never be known whether the Oklahoma man who was buried the other day was really John Wilkes Booth. Junius Brutus Booth, a nephew of the actor, asserted that it was his uncle's body that was buried under the name of George, but he may have been mistaken. The story is vague and improbable, especially as to the identification by people who had not seen the actor for near forty years. There has always been doubt concerning the fate of Booth and for years, every now and then, men have bobbed up in various parts of the country who claimed to have talked with the assassin within a recent period. Edwin Booth, however, was always certain that his brother was dead. His body has always been supposed to lie in the private burying ground of the Booths in Maryland, Edwin Booth having received permission from the United States government to remove it there from its first resting-place. The temporary grave of the assassin of Lincoln was beneath the pavement of a government building in Washington, where it was secretly conveyed in April, 1865.

Bits of History Not in the Histories

Only one man could have told the real reason that prompted Wilkes Booth to assassinate Lincoln. That was John Matthews, an old actor who never gave the world his knowledge. Booth, on the night of the tragedy of April 15, 1865, handed Matthews a sealed document bidding him to read it in a few hours and then give it to the newspapers. But the fellow actor destroyed the document after reading it, and would never reveal its contents. William T. Kent of the Inspector General's office at Washington, D. C., a few years ago told his story of Lincoln's death, of which he was an eye-witness. Laura Keene was playing in "An American Cousin" and a single actor held the boards. Mr. Kent was in the dress circle opposite the presidential box. A pistol shot sounded, but it was thought to be a part of the play. Then a man clambered over the railing of the President's box, lowering himself with the aid of the American flags and draperies to the stage. He faced the audience, lifted his right hand which held a dagger, and shouted, "Sic semper tyrannis!" Mr. Kent, Major Rathbone and others ran to the President's box, lifted Mr. Lincoln from his chair and placed him on the floor, Mrs. Lincoln meanwhile crying, "My God! he is dead" over and over. A surgeon was in the audience and came quickly to the box. It was Mr. Kent who found the revolver that had fired the fatal bullet. He testified at the trial and was one of those who exonerated the stage carpenter, Spangler, from being an accessory to the murder.

Mr. Phelan's Hopes

"Out of the visit may come a Cabinet Minister from California to speak for the Pacific coast." The suggestion comes from Mr. James D. Phelan, formerly Mayor of San Francisco. He addressed himself the other day to the readers of the Bulletin on the subject of the President's visit, and the blessings that may accrue therefrom. He regards a Cabinet job as a blessing, especially if the lightning strikes in the right place, but modesty enjoined silence on the subject of his own peculiar fitness. Grover Cleveland selected a Republican for his Cabinet, and why shouldn't Roosevelt display the same non-partisan spirit by appointing a Democrat? Mr. Phelan is on friendly terms with the President, and he took occasion to impress the latter during his visit by making a thirty-minute speech to him. And by the way it was with rare craft, or rather that species of cunning for which he is noted, that he secured the thirty minutes for himself. Prior to the occasion of the spellbinding he conferred with the orators that preceded him, one of whom was Grand President Noble of the Native Sons, and he declared that as the President's time was limited and as he was consequently impatient the speakers should not consume more than two minutes each. The other orators acquiesced in the suggestion and they kept their agreement. Mr. Phelan took advantage of the time thus saved and rounded period after period, closing with a labored peroration, unconsciously no doubt consuming thirty minutes with a speech that he had been expected to finish in two.

Why Bishop Moreland Escaped

Bishop Moreland has been exonerated. Almost everybody familiar with the affairs of the Episcopal church believed that the Board of Inquiry would decide that there was no occasion for laying clerical linen. However if the charges had been fathered by a man less aggressive than the Vallejo rector and of a more amiable disposition, they might have received closer attention. The disgruntled rector is in his normal condition when dissatisfied. He has served under five different bishops and none of them ever gave him full satisfaction. He sought to have all of them weighed in the balance and found wanting, but he was never successful. Some people thought that the charge of non-residence against Bishop Moreland would be seriously considered. Undoubtedly Sacramento should be the See city of the Bishop of Sacramento, and undoubtedly Bishop Moreland has found the climate of San Francisco more congenial than that of the capital. During his rectorship at St. Luke's both the Bishop and Mrs. Moreland formed many delightful social connections which made life in town a paradise compared with existence in Sacramento. Any one who has dipped into the Sacramento social whirl will sympathize with Bishop Moreland. However it was not sympathy that restrained the Board of Inquiry so much as a desire to rebuke the man from Vallejo.

A Scandal Impending in Labor Circles

Organized labor is rapidly becoming disorganized in this city through the machinations of the leading agitators who have found municipal politics much more lucrative and exciting than the politics of the labor unions. Each agitator who has a following is ambitious of political leadership, and so bitter is the feeling engendered by the manoeuvering for supremacy that has been in progress for months, that the probability is that a split will occur in the Labor Party upon which Mayor Schmitz has relied for his backing. The indications now are that there will be two labor candidates for Mayor in the field at the next municipal election. Meanwhile the leading agitators are devoting more attention to their political interests than to those of the unions they represent, and incidentally a few of them are growing suspiciously rich. A big scandal is brewing and some sensational revelations may be made before long.

Mrs. Antique—I think it an outrage that men should be permitted to be as old as they feel while women are required to be as old as they look.

Mr. Antique—Well, my dear, it appears to me that woman enjoys an advantage by that arrangement. Despite the claim of patent medicine manufacturers nobody has yet invented anything that will disguise a man's feelings sufficiently to belie his age.

Fleishmann Wants to Return

So Marco Fleishmann has turned embezzler and gone to join his brother, the defaulting cashier of Los Angeles and protege of I. W. Hellman! Perhaps if Hellman had caused the apprehension of the first Fleishmann there would not have been a second embezzler in the family. I have been informed that Mr. Hellman received a letter from the defaulting cashier, the other day, which affords an example of rare nerve. The writer stated that he had grown weary of his foreign residence, and that as he wished to return to California he would be very grateful if the banker would make up the deficit. When Mr. Hellman read the letter he was almost overcome by heart failure.

One of Sothern's Stories

E. H. Sothern possesses all the earmarks of the successful actor, even to the knack of telling a good story so that it will pass as such. One of these which he told at the club the other day concerns Sir Henry Irving's illustration of the "American game of brag." The American was in London, according to Sir Henry's account of it, and had been teaching his British cousins the art of taking Manhattan cocktails. At the proper stage of the game the American began to show his national traits and to open the ball with several large, Yankee boasts. "But my dear fellow," said one of the Englishmen, "you Americans certainly have no fog to match the London fog." "Oh, we haven't, haven't we?" said the American, "why, in New York when a fog comes up it's so thick they have to send gangs of workmen up and down the street with shovels to scoop it up into wagons and dump it into the bay, and the bay gets so full of it that the boats have to tie snow plows on in front of 'em in order to get from place to place. And this London fog you're bragging so much about—do you know where it comes from? It's caught in New Jersey, canned by the Fog Trust and shipped to England as the real British article."

When Dreams Come True

My Los Angeles correspondent writes me that Mrs. J. A. Osgood of that city, one of the best known club women of the west, no longer sneers at people who have faith in dreams. She has been telling her friends this story: Recently she dreamed for three consecutive nights that a hearse drove up before her and that the driver said to her, "Get in, I am waiting." In spite of resolutions not to think about it, the matter bothered her and she could not forget her dreams. A few days afterwards she was waiting for an elevator and lost in thought did not notice that it was waiting. The man in charge said, rather impatiently, "Get in, I am waiting." It flashed across her mind that those were the identical words of her three dreams and she drew back, refusing to enter. The cage dropped while ascending and one man was killed and two other people seriously injured. That is why Mrs. Osgood no longer ridicules those who believe that dreams have some significance.

An Admiral's Ephemeral Greatness

An admiral is never without honor except in his own country, as was shown by the attitude of a naval officer in one of the visiting ships who was complimented on the personnel of the Pacific Squadron. "It must be a fine thing to be as great a man as Admiral Glass," remarked a society matron to this heroic son of Neptune. "Oh, I don't know," replied the officer, "it's all right as long as you're admiral, but a retired admiral is no greater than other men. Did you ever hear how Admiral Beardsley, probably the most genial and popular man who ever commanded our squadron, summed up the greatness of admiralty? He had been mixed up in some South American unpleasantness and had acquitted himself so well as to have received complimentary mention from the government. As a result of his temporary fame he was wined and dined all up and down the coast, was the hero of many a ball and water carnival and was the recipient of imperial honors, in a small way, wherever he went. A short time afterward he was retired on half pay, and one good woman, who had seen and admired the admiral's recent honors remarked in his hearing that it must be a grand thing to be an admiral. 'Not so grand as you think, madam,' said the jolly old tar. 'One day you will go aboard and the flags are raised, the sailors stand salute and the guns boom out your greatness, but the day after you are retired you might mount the quarter deck and a little yellow dog wouldn't bark at you.'"

Mrs. "Commander" Kautz

Admiral Beardsley's successor, Admiral Kautz, pretty well kept up the illusion of military meekness, for it was current gossip that Mrs. Kautz, a woman of force and character, was the real power that controlled the destinies of the Pacific squadron. She was a golf enthusiast of the deepest dye but the Admiral hated golf. The old gentleman's preferences, however, did not seem to cut much if any figure, for whenever he touched port he was inexorably dragged to the links and forced to go around the course with his strenuous consort. The naval officers were quick to see the domestic situation in the household of the Admiral and "The Commander" was the nickname under which Mrs. Kautz traveled. On one occasion, while the fleet was lying off Coronado, Mrs. Kautz discovered that the golf course was in need of repair, so she issued her ultimatum to the management of the hotel to the effect that if the course was not straightened up within forty-eight hours she would have her ships removed from Coronado. As the hotel could not afford any such calamity the manager took the lady at her word and put a gang of shovelmen to work.

Her Pull in Washington

On another occasion Mrs. Kautz received a real or fancied social slight from a young officer and succeeded in pulling wires until the young fellow was removed from the Pacific Squadron which he preferred to the Atlantic Squadron, which he detested. Admiral Glass, now in command, seems to be made of less brittle material than his name would imply, but it would be well, in his day of glory, to remember the word of Beardsley and think with humility on the day "when a yellow dog wouldn't bark at you."

Mrs. Willis G. Dodd, who has spent some weeks in New York, has gone to Minneapolis to visit relatives. Her Eastern trip has been a most enjoyable one for she has many friends on the Atlantic coast, and they have done considerable entertaining in her honor. She will return home in about a month.

Those Unconventional Women

Palace hotel habitues have been very enthusiastic over the unconventional conduct of those two distinguished English women, Mrs. Atherton, wife of Colonel Atherton, and Miss Chandos-Pole. It will be remembered that they created a sensation in the grill one evening, shortly after their arrival from the Orient, by smoking cigarettes. Both women are prominent in London's smart set, and therefore it is their privilege to do startling things. I believe that before the marriage of the Duke of Westminster, the richest peer in England, he was very much enamored of Mrs. Atherton. As she had a husband and as he was engaged to a very charming young woman, complications arose, and Albert Edward had to take a hand to straighten them out. Shortly after the arrival of Mrs. Atherton and Miss Chandos-Pole of London, there came to the Palace Mr. and Mrs. Baring of London with a retinue of servants. Mr. Baring is a member of the firm of Baring Brothers, the bankers, whose failure some years ago caused a panic in this country. Mrs. Baring is an American woman but she is more British in manner and speech than any ordinary daughter of John Bull. She has the haughty air of a Queen, and though she does not stand as well with the nobility as either Mrs. Atherton or Mrs. Chandos-Pole, she has a far more important air. I hear that when the Barings were coming over from China they were greatly shocked by the presence of two Chicago drummers at their table. The drummers were barred after the first meal.

The Wife of an Army Officer

There slipped quietly into the Occidental hotel the other day a lady who was formerly rather well known in this city. Under her name of Mrs. Day, however, not everyone recognized the Helen Gardener who was so prominent in the Woman's Congress held here some years ago. She was a great friend of Charlotte Perkins Stetson and after the congress had adjourned Mrs. Stetson and Mrs. Gardener established a little paper, which sad to say died after a few issues. It was at that woman's congress that Helen Gardener had her famous tilt with the handsome Hindoo who was the idol of the clubwomen. As I recollect the affair, Mrs. Gardener gave a lecture on her favorite topic, heredity and prenatal influence. There was a Swami, the highest kind of a high caste, present. The Swami belief does not admit of heredity at all. Each succeeding reincarnation, according to the Swami, is determined by the life of the last, a sort of promotion or retrogression according to desert.

The Hindoo Was Defiled, He Said

When the high-caste Hindoo in his flowing white robes rose and flatly contradicted the lecturer there was consternation. Some of the ladies attempted to persuade him to sit down, but his Swami ire was aroused and would not be quieted. He called Mrs. Gardener's heredity notions blasphemy. Some of the ladies laid hold upon his garment, and then there was blood on the moon, for he was of course defiled and pariahed by their touch. Helen Gardener's husband was there in the audience, if memory serves me aright, and he took a hand in the controversy. The Hindoo declared he had been insulted and the lady lecturer's husband argued that it was the other way around. The affair caused talk but ended without bloodshed.

Sex Problems Her Fad

In the early eighties Mrs. Gardener—or perhaps I should say Mrs. Day, now that she has changed her ideas on the subject of woman's independence of her husband's name—was conspicuous in the world of letters. She was a vigorous writer and for awhile was one of the Arena's editors. The chief topic of discussion in that magazine during her management was the sex relation. She was one of the expounders of the theory that there should be no age of consent. One of her novels is entitled "Is This Your Son, My Lord?" It was the sort of book that a young girl would hesitate to read to her grandmother. It was more in the nature of a medical treatise than a novel, and it discussed the sex relation so far as boys and girls are concerned.

Dunn's Fall From Grace

Francis Dunn, the real estate dealer whose escapade with a young woman at Delmonico's was filled with dramatic interest, is said to be a very intelligent young man. He is a graduate of Berkeley where he was afterwards a professor of pedagogy. He was also superintendent of schools in San Rafael, where he enjoyed the reputation of being a highly moral young man, a pillar of the church and a model husband. Now it appears that he was willing to sacrifice his reputation and bring disgrace upon his family for a mere bauble. Horse-sense is a mental asset that a university degree does not guarantee. A man who doesn't value his reputation above a diamond is a fool. No man likes to be fleeced by a woman, but there are times when discretion is more iridescent than a kohinoor.

William Greer Harrison expects to go abroad soon with his wife, to visit their daughter, who married an Irishman.

English Business Methods

An excellent exemplification of the business methods of the English swell was lately given in this city. A younger son of a noble family, temporarily embarrassed, struck a club acquaintance for fifty dollars—and got it. The next moment he turned around and invited the lender to luncheon. The best the town afforded was consumed in the luncheon and the bill took half the loan, leaving the Englishman almost strapped again and ready to borrow of the next good fellow who happened along.

The Heavyweight Prima Donna

It sounds like a joke, but it has come out in plain, unadorned, managerial print that Schumann-Heink is going to appear in a comic opera that has been specially written for her. Once while starring here the broad lady became entangled with the scenery on a quick exit and she called excitedly, "Ach Gott! for the sake of my eight children somebody save me!" For the sake of her eight children somebody ought to rescue the lady from the multiplied horrors of a "light opera" created to fit her proportions.

O Schumann-Heink, what seads of woe,
What terrors will confound you
When you produce the opera
That has been writ around you!

And will they make you dance and skip
With gay soubrette contortion,
And will the humor be as broad
As you, in just proportion?

Do if you will these funny things
To add to our delights,
But as you love us, Schumann-Heink,
Please don't appear in tights!

The Last Chapter to Date

When Adelaide Murphy made her debut with Julia Crocker and the other buds of her set, who could have predicted such a stormy life for the gay little butterfly? No young girl in society here had more hopes of a steadily serene life than Addie Murphy. A rich father, a doting mother, a luxurious home, plenty of money to spend and a host of friends to entertain her—no other girl could have boasted more privileges. Besides this, little Addie had a European tour and a presentation at the English court. She had admirers, and was even engaged once or twice. On her first trip to Europe she met Mr. Riley, by whom it was said she was jilted. At any rate he married Genevieve Goad Martin. It was shortly after her return that she eloped with young Jack Breckenridge, much to the amazement of her friends, for it was generally believed that the germ of insanity was in the Breckenridge blood. Lloyd Breckenridge, the youngest son, killed himself in a fit of melancholia superinduced by an unrequited passion for a married woman. Florence Breckenridge, the beautiful and only daughter, is in a sanitarium abroad, also suffering it is said from acute melancholia.

Young Jack Breckenridge was such an eccentric chap that it was believed he would, in the course of time, develop symptoms of the hereditary malady. And that was why Addie's father cast her off when she married the flighty youth. No surprise was expressed among those familiar with young Breckenridge's antecedents when, a few months ago, I published an exclusive story about his illness in Paris. At that time I related the story of the unfortunate bride's tragic plight. It was shortly after that the dailies published the news of young Breckenridge's fall from the third story of a Parisian hotel, and later came the report that he had attempted suicide in a fit of melancholia. The saddest circumstance connected with the whole affair is that young Mrs. Breckenridge expects to become a mother.

A Visiting Philanthropist

A distinguished Eastern philanthropist, in the person of James Stokes, is among the prominent New Yorkers who have come hither to escape the heat of the Atlantic coast. He is a brother of Anson Phelps Stokes, who belongs to the fashionable summer colony of Lenox. The Stokes's belong to one of the oldest New York families. They have been prominent in the social history of that State since the Knickerbocker days. James Stokes has done a great deal of philanthropic work in connection with the Y. M. C. A.

A Contagious Name

According to a recent newspaper despatch John T. McCutcheon, "George Ade's friend," has been given a position at twenty thousand dollars a year to supply the new Chicago Tribune with one of his inimitable cartoons daily. Ade and McCutcheon, who belong to the "money-come-easy" coterie that frequents the Chicago Athletic Club and makes the windy city a mad, merry place, have been inseparable companions for years, and this is the more remarkable since two men of spectacular talent seldom get along together. Ade has cultivated the much-abused auto of late and his "Little Whooping Cough" is a familiar sight in the streets of Chicago with McCutcheon acting as assistant chauffeur. The characteristically Adesque name which the machine bears was only decided upon after a long and fierce debate, and the decision was reached by one of the mistakes of genius. The commonplace suggestion that it be called the "Sultan of Sulu" was rejected with scorn, as was McCutcheon's idea that it ought to be christened "The Orator" on account of its large exhaust of hot air. One day when "Cutch" and Ade were bowling along the boulevard outside Chicago their way was blocked by a wide-gear machine which was plainly labeled "L. W. C." "What does L. W. C. stand for?" asked the artist. "Little Whooping Cough, I suppose," said the humorist. A few days later Ade was addressing his own machine fondly as "Little Whooping Cough." "I thought that name belonged to the other machine," said McCutcheon. "It did," said Ade, "but the name was catching."

She Walked in Her Sleep

So poor Sybil Sanderson committed suicide! According to the latest story of her passing it was accelerated by a dose of cologne swallowed with suicidal intent. Those familiar with the reverses, professional and financial, that followed in rapid succession in recent years, and that plunged the once gay singer into despondency, were not surprised to learn that she had made several attempts at suicide and that she had finally succeeded in ending her mental anguish. Since the passing of the unfortunate woman many of the old stories of her girlish escapades have been told, not unkindly, for Sibyl Sanderson was a woman with the courage of her desires and honesty always wins and keeps friends. One of the stories most frequently told is about an incident at a house party in San Mateo many years ago. The host had been very attentive to the fair Sibyl. After the guests retired he remained below to smoke in the library. His wife becoming impatient, after waiting for him a long while, went below and at the library door she met Sibyl in a filmy robe de nuit and with a candle in her hand. Her eyes were wide-open but fixed and apparently unseeing. The hostess addressed her sharply and the young woman blinked her eyes and gave vent to the familiar "Where am I?" Covered with confusion and white lace she explained between blushes that she was a somnambulist and frequently walked in her sleep.

Her Lost Prestige

One of the most absurd stories published in connection with Sybil Sanderson's death is that she brooded over the coldness of the reception she received in this city, and that she never recovered from the bitterness of her disappointment. Sybil Sanderson was piqued over our failure to start the echoes with mad applause, but she did not worry over our apathy. The fact is that the beautiful prima donna always regarded this as a jay town so far as its musical culture was concerned. When she first left San Francisco for the Parisian atmosphere so well suited to her ebullient temperament she was inspired with the hope of great achievements, and with the thought that she would find the appreciation abroad that she had failed to realize at home. She had great confidence in her talent and in her power for conquest. She was at one time the pupil in this city of Alfred Kelleher, the vocal teacher, and one day when she told him that it was her ambition to become a grand opera star he told her that her voice would never be strong enough for grand opera roles. She laughed at him. She felt that she was destined to rank with the greatest of grand opera singers and she struggled vainly to that end until she found that her voice was unreliable and could not stand even the strain of the light operas that had been written for her. Long before her last visit to this city she received rebuffs from continental audiences that sickened her. It was her loss of prestige abroad that prompted her to join the Grau forces for an American tour on which, by reason of her failing power, she proved a sad disappointment.

The Finger Bowl Tabu

The finger bowl is to pass into history. A correspondent writes me from Paris that it is no longer polite to use a finger bowl after dinner, and that the bowl has disappeared from all smart tables. It has even been caricatured in the salon by Jean Veber whose picture, "Julie's Bath," has excited much merriment. It shows a big fat woman washing her hands in a large finger bowl after dinner. The banishment of the finger bowl has long been devoutly wished, for the laving of fingers at table has become a very much abused practice. Some people are not content to dip the ends of their fingers in the bowl, but go to it as though it were a bath, and actually wash their faces and use the napkin for a towel.

Prima Facie Evidence

The fellow who spread the rumor that Joaquin Miller, or "Jokin'" Miller as an Easterner once patly called him, was dead, probably never had an opportunity to talk with the great grey "world poet" who is very much alive from a standpoint of wit. The old man may not be a grand success at Bohemian Club speeches, but at delivering a bit of ready-to-use repartee the poet is just as good as he ever was. Some time ago Wallace Irwin was introduced to Mr. Miller by a mutual friend. "Mr. Miller, this is Wallace Irwin, who is also a poet," said the middle man. The bearded patriarch scanned the chubby young rhymester for a moment, then turned to the other and asked, "Irwin—poet, did you say?" "Yes," replied the friend, "Wallace Irwin, the poet." Miller shook his head. "Oh, no, no!—no poet—too fat, too fat!"

An Official Wedding Photographer

That was a smart wedding of Miss Olive Holbrook and Mr. Silas Palmer in the little chapel at Menlo Park last Wednesday. It was as spectacular an affair as the most enthusiastic lover of the picturesque could desire. Yet it was not suggestive of ostentatious display. Only two hundred and fifty people were invited, which is a comparatively small number these days, and everybody knew everybody and all were sincere in their felicitations. The ceremony and the aftermath were in strict accordance with conventions. The bride looked the part in her graceful train, tulle veil, and a dainty creation of white satin, silk mull and lace that served for a bodice. The groom beamed with delight when the ordeal was over but was palpably impressed with the solemnity of the occasion. The dailies were eager to have photographers on the scene but the privilege was denied them. However, among the functionaries present was an official photographer hired for the occasion to take pictures for the family. After it was all over he sold the papers all the prints they wanted. Hence they had the satisfaction of knowing that the pictures were strictly official.

Miss Blakeman Photographed

As a consequence of the presence of the official photographer the Call secured the picture of a society belle whose fair features never before appeared in a newspaper. I refer to Miss Leontine Blakeman. She vowed a solemn vow, when she made her debut in society a few years ago, that she would never let her portrait appear in any paper. Sunday supp. writers and society reporters importuned her in vain. Even when the bridesmaids at one wedding where she was of the select six sat at a gallery after the wedding in their costumes, Miss Blakeman pleaded illness and the photograph was taken minus one bridesmaid. But the official photographer of the Holbrook-Palmer wedding secured a picture of the bridal party and it was published by the Call.

Hark to Madame Oracle

The pretty wedding gave my dear old lachrymose, gushing friend, Madame La Bavarde, the pretext to spring another one of her justly famous Cæsarian sentences with a puzzle attachment. Speaking of the reception at the Holbrook home after the ceremony, Madame Bavarde says in her usual fervid and hysterical style, "Here the bride and groom received the warmest congratulations—just how warm the flattering voice and moistened eye alone could testify to, for they were friends of an entire lifetime who offered them, friends of her mother without whose enveloping tenderness the bride had made ready for this crowning event of her fine, strong, young life." At first blush that is a bit recondite. The flattering voice and the moistened eye might give the impression that the emotional Madame thought she was writing about a funeral instead of a wedding. And though she seems to say that the eye and the voice were the friends of a life time, if you analyze the sentence you will discover that that is not what she wrote. In the same paragraph she wrote, "The bridal robe really was a creation and should be so dignified." Perhaps she feared that people would think that the robe was the First Cause. She also informed the waiting world that "The bridal bouquet was of orchids, a favorite flower of Miss Holbrook and one which she has identified herself with through the years of girlhood." And yet I never heard of her as the orchid girl. She wasn't even denominated an orchid bride.

She Was Not Superstitious

Olive Holbrook is not troubled with superstitious notions. A few days before her wedding she tried on her bridal gown and veil—"just," she said, "to see how they would look." And they looked very well, both then and on the momentous occasion later on. Mr. Holbrook wept during the entire ceremony at the church, and this seemed unusual for the tears are usually only shed by the gentle sex at weddings. No matter how sad the fathers may feel they usually conceal their feelings.

Bernie Got the Thimble

Miss Hibernia Drown's friends are chaffing her because the thimble in the wedding cake fell to her. They can't realize that the magnetic Bernie is cut out by fate for eternal maidenhood. The ring fell to Susie Blanding and Leontine Blakeman caught the bride's bouquet.

The Hysterical Marie

It is a matter of course that Marie Corelli should raise her voice over the proposed Carnegie library in Shakespeare's birthplace, and it is equally a matter of course that the shrieks and howls which the hysterical female has emitted should be out of all proportion to the cause. According to the Corelli diatribe, historical cottages contemporaneous with that of the great dramatist are to be pulled down in order to make room for a modern dwelling, and the name Shakespeare is to be overshadowed by that of the Scotch steel magnate. There is a widely spread theory that Stratford is today in much the same condition as it was in Shakespeare's lifetime, and it is one of the pet hallucinations of Shakespeare clubs and cults that Henley street, with slight restorations, could be moved back three centuries. This is the basis of the Corelli hysteria, and those who have read only her diatribe are led to believe that rank vandalism is contemplated. Instead of being ancient landmarks with historical associations, the condemned buildings are simply old houses. There is only one genuine Elizabethan cottage in the street, and even that has a modern front. The rest are recent jerry-built imitations, and deserve no more nor greater consideration or reverence than our own so-called "Queen Anne" structures. In plain point of fact, there was, and is as much reason to protest against Marie Corelli's having taken up her residence in Stratford and arrogated to herself the office of Shakespeare's guardian as there is for her to shriek over the library which the mayor of the town begged from Andrew Carnegie.

Philip Verrill Mighels is going East shortly to see about the sale of some of his inventions. He has not been able to do much literary work of late on account of his eyes, but he had a story in the May Harper's that has been much praised. Mrs. Mighels has just finished a society novelette which will probably be out in a few months.

Service Weddings

June promises to be the banner month for button weddings. It began with the marriage on Monday in Trinity of Miss Augusta Goodhue of Beaumont, Texas, and Lieutenant Greer of the Fourth Infantry, the bride and bridegroom sailing for the Philippines on the Logan the same day. On Wednesday in Santa Barbara Miss Burris and Lieutenant Reed of the Fourteenth Infantry were wedded. On Thursday Miss Nellie Jackson and Lieutenant Greenough of the Artillery Corps were married at the bride's home in Van Ness avenue. Next Tuesday in Sausalito will be pulled off the Findley-Cloke marriage, the bridegroom being an Artillery captain. The day following at Fort Washakie, Wyoming, Miss Nickerson will be united to Captain Carson. On the transport, by the way, which carried the Greers Philippinewards, there was another newly-wedded Army pair—Lieutenant and Mrs. Hardenburg, whose marriage occurred in Chicago last week.

Mrs. Bent's Sunday Teas

It has been quite the thing lately for a delegation of Presidio officers to cross the bay to Fruitvale on Sunday afternoons, the magnet being Mrs. Charles Lyman Bent's informal afternoon teas. The Cohen place, "Fernside," is a charming spot to while away a Sunday afternoon and Mrs. Bent, who is spending the summer at the family home, always has a bevy of pretty girls to assist her in entertaining the officers. Miss Russell and Miss Johnson are, I hear, two particular favorites with the Army.

Either Would Be Welcome

Whether Lieutenant George E. Pond or Lieutenant-Colonel John McE. Hyde is chosen as the new chief quartermaster of the Department of California, either would be a popular choice. Both officers are well known here, Colonel Pond being a brother of Commander Pond of the Navy, at present stationed at Yerba Buena. If Colonel Hyde is the government's choice, then society will be glad to welcome back his wife who as Kate Hubbard was a great favorite here. Her father, Samuel Hubbard, was one of the early day society eligibles and her mother was a daughter of Jonathan Hunt, one of San Francisco's first tax collectors.

Mrs. Charles Coolidge, wife of Colonel Coolidge of the Seventh Infantry, gave a luncheon for twelve at the Presidio last week, Mrs. McArthur being the guest of honor.

Mrs. John F. Darling and Mrs. Louise Catherwood La Montagne are spending a few days at the Occidental. Mrs. La Montagne will then go to Del Monte; after a short stay at Edgewood, her ranch near Rutherford, Mrs. Darling will join her daughter.

The G. F. Grays are in San Rafael for the summer. Robert Capelle and family are also located in San Rafael for the season.

The Joe Tobins are at their ranch, "Arcadia," near Calistoga.

The Estate of Divorce

A Story of Human Motives and Social Statutes

Matrimony is the first estate

I. THE PROBLEM.

The Episcopal Archbishop of New York pondered in his palace study. A young man had come and asked him to perform the marriage ceremony. He said that the woman he wished to marry was divorced. He liked the young man's appearance. But the Archbishop had been in his See just three months,—the See was three months old; what liberties could he take with the law? The young man went even further and confessed that the woman was only on the point of being divorced; he seemed to suggest that there were circumstances in which rested the real strength of his own case. Naturally the curiosity of His Grace was awakened. Had the mysterious young man not been so utterly frank over what had happened, the Archbishop might have thought of breaking the law and marrying them. Time and circumstance in view, it was politically inauspicious.

Now on this spring morning His Grace of New York was not meditating on the sin of the world, but thinking thoughts of love and pity—for a woman whom reason told him must be bad. By the Canons guilty—he administered the Canons. He stared hard at his image in the mirror, a souvenir of Venice. He liked that mirror, but it did not teach him a lesson in duplicity. He sighed: the best friend of a diplomatist is an easy conscience and a supply of sophistry. The Archbishop had no best friends. Was he becoming a convert at last to divorce? Momentarily the prelate was ruled by a great and lawless power which corrects the frequent injustice of the law—intuition.

The morning of the Archbishop's dilemma the fast steamer Edward VII had brought to New York a beautiful woman of twenty-nine and her child. Her arrival was especially commented upon in the papers. She was conspicuous. In England, which we will show to be a just country, she was notorious. And yet she was refined, beautiful, charmingly-mannered, very much in love with—her child. But on the other side they regretted the opportunity had escaped them of treating her like a dog. They said she had violated the Seventh Law; she had. But if such an incident is to put the ban on everything, what is to become of society, literature, and the drama? If all the sinners preach, who shall be assigned to preach to the sinners? Since man knows nothing outside of his experience, of what sort is a sinless society, free from lepers in pulpits? When the fact of an indiscretion is discovered, it is always a cynical joke to an impeccable public—which it grins and chews upon—like a bone. It has caught one of its kind; its smile becomes a torch touched to a vicarious sacrifice. The crime, however, is theirs and everyone's; every secret sin is a public sorrow. And the carped-at woman should be canonized for willingness to exist among a treacherous herd. Nevertheless, society exiled Cecilia.

Not long before her travels she had stood in an English court room. In that white man's country they make their righteousness as hard as their law. Aloft before her was a cloaked tribunal. Around, were the pleaders of the law, the officials, witnesses, the crowd. Tall, exquisite, Cecilia in her person was a thrilling tragedy as she clasped a tender child of five against her form and looked at the Justice with awful eyes. He was reading the judgment. He said: "The defendant has committed many unlawful acts, not alone mere statute violations, but a scandal before God and man. (The Divine has precedence of society.) The testimony proves her guilt. One who has so existed must be marked in the community as a moral leper—"

The Judge was preparing his vicarious sacrifice.

"So I decree—"

The Justice raised his eyes. The audience was not looking at him but at the woman. Cecilia was sweeping out of the room with her child. It was the eagle's flight. Law and man were influenced to inaction. Republican humanity obeyed her imperial course. The Justice was about to take away her child; her motherhood drove the sentence back. And she turned the whole land of vigilance into night, escaping unstayed to a country which had not yet condemned her. Fate protected Cecilia, silenced the Justice, stilled the public, and on this spring morning inspired the Archbishop. The prelate began to see the flaw in the law of books, the victory in nature.

II. YOUNG AND INNOCENT

The young man whom Cecilia had first loved was the son of a lord. He was also a poet. Had he not been poetic they might not afterwards have suffered; but poets must buy their brides and their happiness with pain. They are seldom understood except by the woman who loves them. That association, however, is so perfect it recompenses for all other companionship.

Grenlin Montaigne and Cecilia, unmarried, were lovers pure, and engaged. Now Fate separated them in this fashion. One day Grenlin went to visit a spot he loved, Arles, in Frances. A cathedral is there. And poetically he began to dream among the arches of his sweet love, which in this ideal sanctuary he enthroned. He forgot earth. He thought that he was in love with a saint. In fact, he was offering Cecilia as a tribute to his Muse. But he wrote to her every day, and the dreams spun under the arches were in his beautiful letters. Perhaps her intuition began to discern who in reality was the lady love who inspired them.

For one day he received a letter which said: "I do not love you." This was naturally staggering to the unrealism of a poet, at home with the Muse.

She had grown tired of loving only ideally; loving a Man at Arles; an author of dream-letters. Love must be near in flesh and blood; moist lips must touch; the strong arm be felt, the breath of a lover known. So they were separated—his foolishness and her quick whim.

Grenlin materially repacked a Gladstone bag.

Before leaving, he reflected, and wrote: "For your treachery I most certainly had the intent not to write at all, but I wish to see on paper these words: The black seem to turn to blood before my hate and scorn for you, and the bound be placed between us for all time. I am careless whether or not you see this letter. —You, henceforth a pronoun of falsehood."

He then went traveling.

In England woe resulted from his strong letter—the most violent phase of feminine remorse. An egg-shell whim had been crushed. A virile suggestion, acting on Grenlin's usual mystic disposition, had given the girl the ideal man she desired, but alas, the letter with which she won him was the one with which she had driven him away! The bond was welded between them, but he who sealed it was like the dead. She had dismissed the master of her love.

She wrote, seeking for him; it was all without avail. Grenlin was beyond power to heed. He was severally located in Athens, Constantinople, St. Petersburg, and when the thought she was about to overtake him, news came that he had departed for the Far East. Grenlin was in Teheret.

III. BREAKING THE LAW OF ENGLAND.

In the course of time Cecilia married. Fate was again at the bottom of the incident; the only reason was—women marry. It was formula, and Cecilia knew that she was following the formula; she was not in love. A child was born of the marriage.

These are, of course, ordinary events, heightening, however, the complications of existence.

After awhile a man arrived in England, a Man from Teheret, not the man of Arles—Grenlin.

He met Cecilia because they went in the same society, another act of Fate, which delights in bestowing responsibility on people. Many interesting circumstances were now attendant. After they had created intervening incidents which convinced them of their feeling, Grenlin and Cecilia admitted that they loved each other. Her wedding was the only false episode that had taken place; their love the only true. It had the historic advantage.

Grenlin claimed his true love. The husband, Blendennis, brought suit for divorce. Law and Righteousness, it was arranged, should be on his side. He got the divorce. Cecilia, through her own enterprise, kept her child.

These were the facts recited to the Archbishop by Grenlin on that spring morning to gratify the curiosity he had awakened. His Grace decided to render a judgment that would have to do with people's personalities rather than with the law, so he consented to marry them. Paul G. Clark.

A Modern Fairy Tale

His Handicap.

Once upon a time there lived a young King. He was very handsome and clever, wore elegant garments, was tactful and magnetic and had the way with him that all women love.

The King went a deal into the world, of whose pleasures he was inordinately fond. Princesses adored him and one in particular longed to become his Queen. She was young and beautiful and the King was greatly attracted toward her.

But alas! he could not marry her, and for a very good reason: there was a Queen consort. The Queen, said the court gossips, was a dreadful handicap to the King's social progress. She was not young, was rather homely, and her health was not good. It was said that the King would have been only too glad if she would give him a pretext to divorce her.

"She is so impossible," said one of the court ladies to the young Princess who longed to be Queen, "such a pity the King married so young."

"Yes, any man who marries before his taste in women is fully formed handicaps himself in life's race," added a second court lady who had been three times divorced and was on the lookout for another husband.

"Who is handicapped?" interjected a stern voice, as the Queen's confidential maid-of-honor entered the tea-room. "From the look on your faces, I am sure you have been talking of my honored mistress whose feet you are not worthy to wipe."

The court ladies hastily turned their eyes upon their teacups, but the young Princess who longed to be Queen, secure in her beauty and with the audacity of youth, replied:

"Yes, we were. For my part I think she acts just like a dog in the manger. Her husband hates her and yet she won't give him his freedom. She might know he only married her for her money. Now he has plenty of his own, she might give him a chance to form an alliance with somebody who would make a more suitable Queen."

"Perhaps he did marry her for her money," returned the maid-of-honor, "but let me tell you a story."

The court ladies sat at attention, for they knew the maid-of-honor's tales were always worth listening to.

"Years ago," she began, "there lived a Princess. She was not beautiful but she was sweet and wholesome and everybody loved her. She had many fine and noble suitors but she turned from them all because she had lost her heart to a poor Prince who lived a pensioner in her father's palace. He had no kingdom of his own because his wicked cousin had usurped it. Everything in the world he owed to the Princess's father. The King would not listen to his daughter's plea that she might wed the poor Prince, who loved her, he said, with his whole heart and soul. Finally, however, the Princess gained her father's consent to the marriage. More than that, she fixed it so that her husband should have her dot settled upon him, so that he would not feel mean in her presence. She also stirred up the nobles and generals at her father's court to do battle against the usurping cousin, and after some years the poor Prince was given back his kingdom. He was now a rich and powerful King, all because of his wife's love for him."

"That's a silly story," yawned the young Princess, "where's the climax? Any woman would do all that out of ambition."

"Ah, but wait," went on the maid-of-honor, "there's more to it. During the years that the nobles and generals were battling for the poor Prince's restoration, the kingdom of his wife's father was left a prey to marauders. Varied misfortunes overtook the old King who finally died in grief and poverty. His daughter fell ill and for a long time her life was despaired of. When she recovered, she was no longer the same woman. Her sole physical asset was her health, and that was departed. But she never repined, for had she not given wealth and a throne to her beloved?

"Alas! kings, as you know, are proverbially ungrateful. This one, instead of lavishing a wealth of love upon her who had given everything for him, turned from her when he found himself an independent King. His head was turned by prosperity. He made love to other women before the eyes of his noble wife. He enjoyed himself in society when she was suffering on a sick bed. With it all, however, she has been cheerful and lovely, never in any way showing jealousy or resentment. My God, women, yet you speak of my honored Queen as the King's handicap! I wish more men had such handicaps."

The maid-of-honor, in tears, left the room. The court ladies were also weeping.

"Fools!" cried the Princess, "let her crown her unselfishness by giving him his freedom."

And, in the course of time, this is what the Queen did. She went into a convent. The King, however, did not marry the young and beautiful Princess, but another younger and more beautiful. He lived happily to a good old age and never cast a regret behind him. Which is the way of kings and men the world over.

John Bradford's Prayer

John Bradford stood at the entrance gate of a jail in Ludlow Square:
He saw a man go forth to die, and he offered up a prayer.
He offered up, for himself, a prayer, as but pious people can
Who follow rules of the cloth and creed, did this conscientious man.
He offered up for himself a prayer 'neath the archway drear and dim,
And thanked the Lord that another man was to die instead of him.
He used the harassing circumstance of the checkered life near run
To call to notice his godliness, and to draw comparison.
He laid the list of the Christian deeds in the Master-Hand on high,
But not a word was there said for him who was going forth to die.
He prayed so much of his own affairs, and they took so long to tell,
The hangman's key to the great unknown set ajar the gates of hell.
The convict's soul sped its way unchecked by an interceding prayer.
While Bradford muttered his mummery, to his God, in Ludlow Square.

The Poet

He walked amid the multitude
In garb a beggar'd scorn;
His coat had darns and patches large,
His hat the wind had torn.

Past silken gown and feathers fine,
With springing step and free;
The light of heaven was in his eye
The Poet's soul had he!

You

The sun climbs up and paints the Eastern skies,
Then night's dark pall on all the wide world lies;
So swing the days and, though I breathe no name,
I dream of life, and joy and burning fame
—And You.

Upon the street or in my quiet room,
Or walking in the wild wood's fragrant gloom
My thoughts rush on in many a daring flight,
But chastened is my walk by duty's light
—And You.

Temptation meets me with seductive face,
I look unmoved nor give her sweet embrace;
No more in paths of sin my footsteps roam,
But turn to toil; I dream of love and home
—And You.

There is no secret place in all my heart
Where you have not always the greater part;
And when I seek to voice my soul in prayer
I think of Heaven in the silence there
—And You.

For you, I write fool verses such as these;
Perhaps, who knows, my editor they'll please,
He'll pay me something when the week rolls by,
The check will help my soul to satisfy
—And You.

Confound you!
Standing there
With a bill
That is due—
Always You,
Always due.

The Liar's Corner

"Some years ago," said the floor-walker, "a woman came into the store and asked to look at 'them fools.' I knew instantly that she referred to foule, a fashionable brand of dress goods that we were then advertising, and without hesitation I directed her to the proper counter."

"A woman came into our shop," said the sewing machine agent, "and complained that we had deceived her. 'Your advertisement reads "Stands at the head,"' she insisted, 'and mine hasn't any stand at the head.' We immediately changed the wording of our ad."

"Talking of machines," said the lady operator, "I once had to give instructions to a German woman who had just bought a new sewing machine. In showing her how to take the work out I said repeatedly, 'Lift the foot,' referring to a certain part of the mechanism. At last I lost patience and cried out, 'Why don't you lift the foot?' 'I am lifting my foot,' replied the good Frau, 'and I can't get it no higher.' It was her own foot she had been lifting all the time."

"Funny things happen, even in our business," said the undertaker. "An Irishwoman came in to select a coffin for her departed husband. I asked her if she would have trimmings. 'No, no trimmin's,' she replied with decision, 'we had trimmin's enough, sure wasn't it tremens he died of?'"

"We had a funny order from a milliner in the Western Addition once," said the wholesale clerk. "It was in the rush season, and getting short of stock she telephoned down to our place for 'twelve dudes and six black sailors.' It was hats she wanted, of course."

"One of our clerks made a funny mistake once," said the commission man. "A consignment of coffee failed to arrive, and the clerk had to write a letter in Spanish about it. In his letter he inquired after coffee 'con frijoles negros,' which was his literal translation of coffee with black beans, as we put it in English. A reply was soon forthcoming to the effect that they had sent us the coffee but they did not know anything about the black beans, as we had ordered none. The clerk should have expressed himself, 'con granos negros.'"

STAGE

"In Washington" Makes Good

The press agent of the Grand worked up popular interest in the show that opened this week, to a very high pitch. That his industry in promoting popular interest was not in vain was evident Sunday night when, despite the counter-attractions in town, the Grand Opera House overflowed, and hundreds of people eager for a view of the dazzling beauties, the gorgeous costumes and the other sumptuous accessories of an "elaborate production" that they had been reading about morning and evening for a week, turned away filled with poignant sorrow over their grievous disappointment. A press agent who so fulsomely lauds the coming mummer and the impending show takes desperate chances. Some balmy, fog-free night when people are in a mood to be entertained, and in no temper to be bored, a show heralded with screeching headlines, ardent adjectives and ample half-tones will fail to make good, and then instead of calls for the author or the stage manager raucous demands for the green-goods' press agent will rend the atmosphere of the auditorium. Thereafter, perhaps, press agents will sin no more. Fearful as I was that the fateful hour had come, it was pleasing to have misgivings allayed by manifestations of enthusiasm. "In Washington" made good; that is, there were no calls for the press agent. Intelligent people are always willing to make allowance for a man who tries to do his duty well. From the spectacular standpoint "In Washington" is a success. There was no exaggeration in the advance notices as to the quality of the stage pictures. To use a homely expression the management has done itself proud. The performance is wholesome and entertaining from beginning to end, but its brilliancy is in its ensembles. Its music is catchy and the singing of Cheridah Simpson is refreshing despite the disagreeable tendency to tremolo. But the company has no other voices worth speaking about. The German comedians are funny in a way but they incite one to comparison much to their disadvantage. The Esmeralda sisters are lively dancers of the Flossie Hope and Gertie Emerson type, but neither of them alienates my affections from Flossie. Budd Ross and Anna Wilks constitute the cleverest team in the company, and they do a stunt that catches the popular fancy. The company is overflowing with talent of the vaudeville variety, and the numerous principals make the fun fast and furious enough for the most blase theatre-goer. When they are catching their breath the chorus is at work, and the stage manager has made good use of the expansive territory upon which he operates his shapely divinities.

Radiant Cecilia Loftus

Miss Cecilia Loftus is fully as entrancing as her ex-husband's play, and "If I Were King" is the most delicious dramatic dish that has been served to local theatregoers for many a day. However Miss Loftus charmed me first and the play afterwards. Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy's apotheosis of Francois Villon in the person of that fascinating actor, E. H. Sothern, invoked my admiration and enthusiasm, but Cecilia Loftus thrilled me and filled me with delight. Miss Loftus is a dear, sweet, girlish woman and I believe I could watch her forever moving through a garden in a white gown. I should never tire of listening to her melodious and haunting voice and her pretty English speech with its soft and shy intonations. There is in her every movement, in the light of her eyes and in the mellow notes of her voice, the suggestion of gentleness, of simplicity and of the guilelessness of unpretentious youth. Miss Loftus possesses unuual wealth of charm, phyical and spiritual. To see and hear her is to commiserate the author of "If I Were King" on having lost such a wife. Mr. Sothern is of course the star. He is ever in the limelight, and he plays the swashbuckling hero, in whom there is a pretty mingling of pathos and drollery, with exquisite art. However you feel that there are other actors capable of doing the role justice but women endowed with the pleasing personality of Cecilia Loftus are extremely rare. The part she plays is not one to compel admiration for the woman. Katherine De Vancelles is a cold, imperious woman, and too proud to enthuse. Miss Loftus makes no effort to extenuate the woman's shortcomings. Her art is unerring, and yet you cannot fail to note the charm of the actress. But there is another woman in the cast who does some splendid work. I refer to Margaret Illington, the betrothed of Daniel Frohman. Even though she had never won the love of the distinguished manager she would not fail to come to the front. She has the temperament and the art that are bound to win recognition, and the part of the Abbess is so much more favorable to the exploitation of talent than that of Katherine that she easily divides the honors with Miss Loftus. The cast is well balanced and Mr. Sothern receives excellent support. The drama is a masterpiece of romantic play-writing. It is a tale of love and sorrow, of anguish and terror, and your interest never flags. You feel throughout that you behold the catastrophe afar off; that Vilon must die; that his destiny is fulfilled, and as the end approaches the suspense is overwhelming, and suddenly the happy denouement thrills the audience with joy. "If I Were King" is a bright and graceful sword and cloak comedy, the rapidity of events effectively harmonizing with the local color, the violent love, the intense hate and the despicable intrigue. How intense is the life of Villon and Katherine. Hark to the gay and warlike hubbub around them, the sport and the merriment, the high words and the ring of steel in the cavern, the clash of armor in the streets. Hark to the strident laughter of the vagabonds, the squeaking voice of the malevolent King. Feel the magic of the whole atmosphere in which all are plunged, note the frank simplicity of the author's methods, the frequency of rhymes, the comic opera conceits, the word-play, the lyrical character of the whole, the courage with which he points a moral while adorning an elemental theatrical tale, and realize that Justin Huntly McCarthy has achieved a masterpiece.

Frohman Completes His Work

Maude Site is the real name of the young actress who is betrothed to Daniel Frohman, the eminent theatrical manager of New York. Pleasing as seems the name of Maude, and traditionally well-associated with the drama though it be, it did not please the fastidious Frohman. The manager told Miss Site she should have a new name, and set about himself to compose a stage appellation. The young lady happened to be a native of Bloomington, Illinois. Joining the two together, Frohman composed the name of Illington, and selected Margaret to go before it. Satisfied as Frohman may be with his titular handiwork, he evidently is bent on changing Miss Site's name altogether, even in real life. Margaret Illington has one of the most pleasing presences on the boards today. She has not been in the business very long, but has made rapid advance, and her appearance in stellar part at the successful presentation of "Notre Dame" at Daly's resulted in the gratification as much as the surprise of those who were interested in her career.

Tears and Smiles and Kisses

Juliet Crosby in a choker collar with a business-like air gives some fine comedy touches to the part of Hyacinth Woodward, the practically minded secretary in "The Tyranny of Tears" at the Alcazar. She makes her most direct impression, perhaps, in the last act where she is leaving her position, and celebrating the event with a hasty luncheon of a hunk of sandwich, a glass of beer and a piece of cake. White Whittlesey outdrews John Drew in the charm of his love-making. As Parbury, the husband of a weeping wife, he does fully as good work as in "Heartsease." Miss Creighton acts up to him with as much spirit as the doldrums of her role permit. They have one long drawn out kiss that I doubt could be duplicated by that famous osculatist, Olga Nethersole. The Alcazar company is supporting Whittlesey in such an enthusiastic manner that their work cannot fail to be good. Arthur Morrison, Osbourne, Bacon and Miss Gordon all fit into their parts as if they had been built for them.

His Heavy Load

Wilton Lackaye, who is to be here shortly with Amelia Bingham in "The Climbers," told this story the other day to Ferdinant Gottschalk, as a man with a particularly lurid jag hove in sight. "Talking of funny jags," said Lackaye, "early in my career I was associated with an actor who was a fine artist and a good fellow, but over fond of liquid rye. On one occasion he remained dead to the world for two days. The third night he showed up much the worse for wear, with a portion of two days' accumulation. Every one gave him the cold shoulder, and finally he retired to his dressing-room. In the company was an ingenue who was the real article, yellow hair, blue eyes and baby ways. This night in question she had received a birthday book and was busily intent on securing the autographs of the company. I advised her to keep shy of Mr. H—— until the next day. She paid no heed to me, however, for I heard her tap at his door and proffer her request. The next thing I heard was a loud yell and a hurried tattoo on my door. I opened it ,and Miss Ingenue was all of a tremble, as she lisped out, 'Oh, Mr. Lackaye, I think Mr. H—— has hysterics.' Thinking that the d. t.'s had caught him I hurried to his room. He was doubled up, shrieking. When he saw me he roared again and pointed to the book. I looked over his shoulder and followed the direction of his trembling finger. It halted at the date of his birth, opposite which was written a short biblical quotation, 'God Help Me Bear My Load.' "

The story of "The Climbers" which Amelia Bingham will shortly present at the Columbia, tells of a vulgar, but prodigiously wealthy youth, who is said to employ a shop window dresser to set the table for him when he gives a dinner; an unmarried woman with a spectacular vocabulary, a slangy, frivolous girl and a half dozen social chatterers.

A New Weberfield at Fischer's

"Fiddle Dee Dee" will be taken from the boards after Monday night's performance, and "Twirly Whirly" will have its premier on Tuesday night. "Twirly Whirly" ran all this season at Weber & Field's in New York, and we get it almost brand new. It is a modern take-off on the fads and follies of the New York smart set, and among the matters burlesqued are the dog dinner that Harry Lehr sponsored, the game of ping-pong, Mary McLean the unconventional authoress from Butte, the automobile craze, the bull-fight of Spain and the society fad for vaudeville and coon stunts. Spanish students will warble and play the mandolin, and the German comedians will show what they can do with an airship. Maude Amber will be the widow and Barney Bernard will be the Montana authoress. Olive Vail, Flossy Hope and Gertie Emerson will be of the cast and the part of Hanki Panki Poo, the monkey who is the guest of honor at the monkey dinner, will be taken by Harry Hermsen's bright young son. The music of "Twirly Whirly" includes the best composition of John Stramburg, the late leader of Weber & Fields, who died last August.

Nance O'Neil at the Republic

The Republic is now under the management of L. R. Stockwell, who is one of the best known managers in the United States and has long been identified with San Francisco theatricals. The opening attraction under Stockwell's management will be Nance O'Neil, who begins a limited engagement tonight, in "The Jewess." Other plays included in Miss O'Neil's extensive repertory will be the two Sardou plays, "La Tosca" and "Fedora," and it is highly probable that the gifted actress will also be seen in "The Scarlet Letter." In spite of the production of new plays, attended by new scenery and wardrobe, and the large augmented company brought direct from Minneapolis, the prices will remain at a reasonable standard. It was Town Talk, by the way, that first suggested that Nance O'Neil ought to be the owner of the Sardou plays. She had been seen in "La Tosca" in Australia but never here. Shortly after my item appeared, Miss O'Neil received a wire from Melbourne MacDowell to the effect that she might have the Sardou plays. But there was a proviso—MacDowell wanted to go with his plays and be a twin-star. The offer was not considered.

The Stork In Theatrical Circles

E. D. Price, who relentlessly tore himself from the glare and glitter of Broadway to settle here as general manager of the Alcazar and other Belasco and Mayer enterprises, finds himself bound to San Francisco by a new and tender tie. A little native daughter, wafted on the wings of a favorable trade wind, came to his home in Sutter street early Tuesday morning and will be christened Marjorie Belasco Price. The small stranger is as fair as the June roses, and the image of her mother who, as Sallie Walker, youngest child of the late Jonas M. Walker and niece of Gilbert Walker, Governor of Virginia after the Civil War, spent her childhood in the famous old Walker mansion in Oakland.

Pupils of the Jeune Morrow Long College of Voice and Action gave an enjoyable recital last Friday evening, among the numbers being the Trial Scene from "The Merchant of Venice" and the Curse Scene from "The Jewess." Rather out of the common were the imitations by R. C. Madison of Mrs. Pat Campbell in "The Joy of Living," and of Viola Allen in "The Christian." Mr. Madison reproduced the voice and gestures of the actresses imitated very cleverly, and shows decided talent in that line.

At Eugenia Mantelli's two operatic concerts given in Fischer's next Wednesday and Friday afternoons selections will be sung from "Carmen," "The Barber of Seville," "Samson and Dalila," "The Huguenots," "Faust" and "Mignon." The concerts will be given at half past two o'clock and the prices will be only fifty cents, seventy-five cents and one dollar. The sale of seats opens at the box office of the theatre on Thursday morning at nine o'clock.

"Cape Cod Folks," by Sally Pratt McLean, is to be dramatized. This is the book which brought out a series of lawsuits against the author when it was first published many years ago. She had used real names in the story, and the Cape Cod people didn't like it. The only dramatic incident in the book, by the way, is the one where the hero saves another man from drowning and is himself drowned. As this is but the Steerforth incident in "David Copperfield" with a different environment it is hard to see why "Cape Cod Folks" instead of the Dickens novel should be staged at this late day.

Features of Next Week's Bills

There is an enormous demand for the second and last week of E. H. Sothern's engagement at the Columbia. N. C. Goodwin in "The Altar of Friendship" comes next. Julia Dean is in his company.

On Monday night "The Circus Girl" will go on at the California. It had a big vogue in New York and London. John Slavin, the diminutive comedian of the Daly forces who has made such a pronounced hit here, will be seen in the role that made his reputation.

"In Washington" at the Grand has been so warmly received that the management has been compelled to put the seats on sale two weeks in advance. A big run seems assured for the piece.

The romantic hero of "D'Arcy of the Guards" should be a role well suited to White Whittlesey. The Revolutionary war drama will be produced at the Alcazar in fine style.

"Twirly Whirly" will be given its premier at Fischer's on Tuesday night.

"El Capitan" has drawn fine houses at the Tivoli and will continue next week. "The Isle of Champagne" comes next and then "Madelaine or the Magic Kiss."

The Republic opens tonight with Nance O'Neil in "The Jewess," McKee Rankin's version of Mosenthal's "Leah the Forsaken," in which Miss O'Neil has met with such success.

Frank Keenan, the comedian, with Georgia Welles and Kate Long, will present at the Orpheum an original comedy sketch by Edward Elsner. Mr. Keenan made the original New York production of "The Christian" and "The Musketeers," and the same attention to detail which made these efforts attractive is illustrated in "The Actor and the Count." Hanlon's pantomime company, composed of George Hanlon of "Superba" fame and his four sons, will present the latest European and Eastern success, "Phunny Phrolicks," pronounced the best of the kind ever staged. Hale and Frances, novelty hoop rollers and jugglers, will offer the turn that has made them famous all over the vaudeville world. Russell and Locke, singing and dancing comedians, will make their first appearance in this city.

At the Chutes McIntyre and Primrose will make their first appearance. Mr. McIntyre is a son of James McIntyre of the famous team of McIntyre and Heath and is said to inherit much of his father's cleverness. The great Kraton, a marvelous hoop roller, will also be new and the Spraguellos, novelty musicians, will play new selections in their act, "Satan's Pastimes."

A Temple Musical Program

The program arranged by Cantor E. J. Stark for the confirmation service at Temple Emanu-El on Monday morning contained many noteworthy musical features. The Cantor, besides conducting the ritual, participated in the musical exercises where his powerful baritone was of very material aid. The regular soloists of the choir—Miss Cohn, Mrs. Kelley, Mr. Vinson and Mr. Henley—were assisted by twelve additional voices, and in the ensemble work by an orchestra; W. A. Sabin was at the organ. The composers represented were Sabin, Stark, Scharwenka, Haydn, Auber, Reinecke and Cowen, the arrangements being made by the Cantor. For instance the festival service, "Toras Adonai," was sung to the music of a Haydn mass. A very beautiful number was "The Song of Miriam," originally written by Reinecke for a baritone voice but arranged by Mr. Stark as a soprano solo with chorus. This was sung by Miss Daisy Cohn in a most effective manner, the chorus forming a strong background for her clear, pure soprano tones. In the confirmation service Cantor Stark's little son, Josef, took part, reading from the sacred Thora.

Honors for Mantelli

Madame Eugenia Mantelli, the Italian contralto who is to appear at Fischer's next Wednesday and Friday afternoons in grand operatic recitals, has just been made the recipient of a great honor from the King of Portugal. She is now in possession of a diploma of honor from the Royal Academy of Music in Lisbon of which the King is President, conferred upon her through the monarch himself, as a mark of his appreciation of her Carmen and Mignon and in "Cavalleria Rusticana" when recently she was the head of the grand opera company in Lisbon. Mantelli has the King's personal friendship, and the wrapper enclosing the scroll was directed by his own hand. Translated, the document reads:

"Royal Academy of Music; President, His Excellency, the King. Diploma of Honor. In appreciation of the Artistic Merit of the Honorable Eugenia Mantelli we confer and present this diploma entitling her to privileges as corresponding member of this Academy, Lisbon, May 9th, 1903."

The signatures are those of the chairman and secretary of the Board of Directors. Madame Mantelli has sung before every potentate in Europe, and was an especial favorite of the late King Humbert of Italy. Her operatic selections will be given in the magnificent costumes used by her when with Maurice Grau's Metropolitan opera company, and her concert numbers in ordinary full dress attire.

California Conservatory Recital

Students of the California Conservatory of Music of which Otto Bendix is director, gave a recital on Monday evening which was very largely attended. The program was a choice one, among those taking part being Mrs. Elizabeth Hall Sears and Miss Edna Drynan, graduates in the piano department, Miss Lillian Remillard, Mrs. Josephine W. Clark, Mrs. Arristeene Schultz, Fred C. Hotaling and a string orchestra under Mr. Bendix's direction. Mrs. Sears played the Liszt transcription of Bach's G minor prelude and fugue in a masterly manner and Miss Drynan gave a scholarly interpretation of a Saint-Saens concerto and a Chopin number. Mr. Hotaling, whose tenor solo was a feature of the program, was formerly a pupil of Edward Xavier Rolker, with whom he studied for two years.

The Precocious Miss Fleming

If Gertrude Fleming, the ten year old pianist, had played her little piece at a pupils' recital I should say she was deserving of her round of applause and her bouquet, but two hours of Gertrude Fleming proved rather cloying. While giving the child all due credit for what she has achieved, namely, some digital facility and fluency in note reading, it must be confessed that her playing is mechanical, as much so as the little marionette's courtesy which attended each one of her several exits and entrances. Some of her numbers had been memorized, some were played from notes; several, including the Traumerei, were marred by blunders. I do not wish to criticise harshly, for Miss Fleming is undoubtedly a diligent and docile pupil with an uncommon share of native talent, but her friends are unwise to force upon her a too early publicity. What she needs is serious and secluded study that her gift may mature. Forced talents are apt to meet the fate of certain fruits; they fall before they ripen. Miss Fleming also sang Gounod's "Ave Maria." I was surprised to find that she has a voice, a real voice, full, round and unchildish in its upper register. Her singing was vigorously applauded, and the child responded by returning to the stage with a single rose in her hand while her accompanist played the opening bars of the "Last Rose of Summer." It was grievous. The song was pitched too low for her voice, and the little mite, in her eagerness to get to the place where it was proper to pull her rose to pieces, became wofully tangled up in her verses. However, she pulled through after a fashion, but the glamour of her previous success was quite obscured. Miss Fleming was assisted by Mrs. Prentis Peters, Miss Jeannette Finnie, Mr. L. C. Badorun and C. Vandal. The ladies are pupils of Rudolph Foster and acquitted themselves well. Mrs. Peters has a flexible voice and an attractive stage presence. Miss Finnie is new to the concert stage but her fine soprano, with its range and capacity for expression, will certainly insure her success. Her song from "Mignon" and one of her encores, "The Kerry Dance," were most favorably received.

The Stabat Mater of Pergolesi

To present an old classic in such a manner as to interest musicians is not always difficult. But to present an old classic in such a manner that philistines as well as esthetes find enjoyment and profit from it is more rare. Yet that is what Mrs. Marriner Campbell accomplished last week when her pupils presented the "Stabat Mater" of Pergolesi, a work that has not been given in this city since about six years ago. It was an undertaking presenting many obstacles. In the first place the original music was not readily obtainable, the edition in general use omitting three or four of the many trills. As presented on Friday night the Pergolesi work in its entirety was given, with all the little embellishments and trills that marked the music of that period (1710-1736). The singers were Marguerite Slocumbe, Mary Carpeneto Mead, Blanche Young, Ruth Estelle Weston, Ethelwyn Marrack, Marian E. B. Robinson, Virginia Pierce, Grace Marshall and Rebecca Del Valle. One of the most beautiful bits was the duet "Quis est homo" by Mrs. Mead and Miss Marrack. The duet "Quando Corpus" was also very finely sung by Miss Del Valle and Miss Marrack. The "Stabat Mater" came as an end to a program of classic selections and was a fitting climax to the other works rendered. The first part of the program was: Piano solo, Liebes Traume, No. 3, A flat major, Liszt. Etude, Op. 10, No. 12 (Revolutionary), Chopin, Julia Rapier Tharp; Orpheus with His Lute, H. J. Parker, Julia's Garden, James H. Rogers, Helen Crane; Chant de la Sultane, Bemberg, Chanson de Florian, Godard, Marie Partridge Price; Voi che Sapete, Mozart, Virginia Pierce, La Zingara, Donizetti, Grace Marshall; Spring, Henschel, When Mabel Sings, Oley Speaks, Louise McClure; Love Laid His Sleepless Head, Gerard Barton, Ruth Estelle Weston; Give My Love Good Morrow, Macfarren (flute obligato, Mr. A. B. Swain), Mary Carpeneto Mead; O Let the Solid Ground, Birds in the High Hall Garden, Go Not, Happy Day, from song cycle, Tennyson's "Maud," music by Arthur Somerville, Marian E. B. Robinson; Madrigal, Harris, Serenata Espagnol, Bergmuller, Obstination, de Fontanailles, Stella R. Schwabacher; My Mother Bids Me Bind My Hair, Haydn, Nina, Pergolesi, Rebecca Del Valle. These songs very cleverly prepared for and led up to the elaborate Pergolesi number, Miss Pierce's "Voi che Sapete," the "Give my Love Good Morrow" and the Haydn and Pergolesi number of Miss Del Valle with Miss Robinson's song cycle being especially appropriate. The piano accompanists were Mrs. Batchelder, Mrs. Barton, Miss Tharp and Miss Marrack, with Miss Orrie Young at the organ.

Impresario Will Greenbaum says that Patti will really come to San Francisco next January, and will probably sing in "The Barber of Seville" at the new Tivoli. Patti is a wonderful little woman. Mrs. de Young, who met her in Europe last year and renewed old acquaintance, says the diva's voice is as clear and wonderful as ever. And, by the way, it may not be generally known that Patti has sold her voice; that is, after death the larynx that sends out those golden notes is to become the property of some voice specialists to whom the prima donna sold the privilege of examining her magical voice-box.

Bonelli Conservatory Recital

A varied and well selected program was carried out by the advanced pupils of the San Francisco Conservatory of Music on Wednesday evening, Professor Bonelli directing. The honors of the evening fell to Miss Maybelle Kelly for her piano solo, the Liszt arrangement of Wagner's "Tannhauser" march. I have had frequent occasion to commend Miss Kelly's excellent technique and mastery of the difficulties of the instrument. Her work of Wednesday night showed diligent study and improvement on her former efforts. The appreciation of the audience was shown by a storm of long continued applause. Miss Lulu Lichtenstein was excellent in two poetical numbers, a "Shepherd Dance" (Gregh) and Seeling's "Lorelei" with its beautiful singing theme for the right hand. To Miss Gertrude Hodges fell Chopin's difficult "Revolutionary" etude. Her rendition while intelligent lacked somewhat in strength. Miss Fannie Zwerin played a bizarre Russian dance with freedom and boldness, and Miss Edna Montagne displayed a neat touch in Littolf's "Spinning Song." Mr. Julius Goldsmith divided the honors with Miss Kelly in his beautifully rendered violin solo, Bohm's "Legende." His bowing is free and graceful and his tone full, round and satisfying. Little Miss Estelle Grey, a pupil of Signor Laraja, displayed a surprising mastery of her instrument and put a remarkable amount of individuality into her playing for one so young. The little girl certainly has a future before her. She played some airs from "Il Trovatore; Miss Kelly accompanied. The two formed what would be termed on the vaudeville stage a strong team. Miss Gladys Couth, another young violinist, played a "Gavotte Fantastique" by Braun. While her bowing is facile her tone is as yet a little too dry, and the same may be said of Miss Harriet Patterson. Mrs. J. J. Hayden, a pupil of Madame Amata, was quite at home in her aria, and displayed the effect of good training. Miss Ruby Likens showed some faults of breathing in her solo, "Hearest Thou" (Mattei), but was much better in the "Spring Song" with which she responded to an encore. The San Francisco Conservatory orchestra did some fine ensemble work in the selection for the opening number, "A Petits Pas" and "Paroles d'Amour," while the Mandolin Club deserves special commendation for the "Faust" number which closed the first part of the program. Among the pianists Miss Bessie Beatty gave a very pretty rendition of Mendelssohn's Rondo, op. 14. Professor Bonelli was suffering from hoarseness, and the program announcements were made by Miss Blanche Baldwin. This afternoon the juvenile pupils will hold their exercises.

Under the direction of the Misses Ruby and Edith Moore the operetta "Florinda or The Rose and the Pearl" was very successfully presented at Union Square hall on Thursday evening of last week. Thirty children took part in the production.

Helen Hagar, who married Arthur Wilder Moore on Monday in Oakland, is one of the finest amateur pianists on the coast. She was a member of the Ensemble Club, that brilliant organization of musical women that disbanded some time ago.

Last Thursday evening a musicale was given in Steinway hall by the Treble Clef Club. It was an invitational affair.

HOTEL PLEASANTON.

Ever since the Hotel Pleasanton was opened for the reception of guests it has easily occupied the foremost position among the family hotels of San Francisco, which are justly celebrated the world over for an excellence peculiarly their own. The hotel was built some years ago by the late Abijah Baker of Pleasanton, California (after which town it was named), on one of the most desirable and accessible sites in the city. The corner location of the hotel and the court garden in front of the west wing give to nearly all the two hundred and fifty rooms an outside and sunny exposure which is so much sought after by both permanent and transient guests. The halls are wide and spacious and are connected with the entrance floor by a fast running elevator. The furniture, carpets, draperies, etc., are of the most modern make—in fact, from the marble steps leading to the office, to the topmost apartments, there is an indescribable air of refinement and homelikeness. The late and for many years proprietor of the hotel, Mr. O. M. Brennan, has been succeeded in the proprietorship by Mr. E. S. de Wolfe, one of the best hotel men in the country and manager of the Hotel Pleasanton for the past five years. It will be the aim of Mr. de Wolfe to constantly add any new and odd pieces of furniture or any late effects in interior decoration that will enhance the general appearance and add to the comfort of the guests. He has already completed improvements in the reading and billiard rooms and cafe on the ground floor, giving to these apartments the appearance and privacy of an up-to-date club. The old furniture of the reading room has been replaced by new and late designs in weathered oak, the walls being tinted in dark green in keeping with the velvety carpet, while the stained glass windows have been replaced by French plate glass, giving a fine outlook on the surrounding streets. The billiard-room also has been provided in a similar manner, with the addition of weathered oak screens with the upper portion of each in illuminated leaded glass, which gives a striking effect to the room. The cafe has been carpeted with rich Wilton velvet, a new departure and the only one of the kind in the city. It has also been furnished elaborately with circular and straight wall, leather-cushioned settees and polished mahogany sideboard. The harmony and general effect of the whole afford a pleasant and ideal lounging place for its guests, among whom are counted some of the most prominent Californians, while it is constantly entertaining distinguished tourists from all parts of the world. Under the able management of Mr. de Wolfe its fame bids fair to increase.

"Why don't you discharge Mary if she is so impudent to you?" asked young Mrs. Swell's mother.

"Well, I will, but I must write her a good reference first."

"A reference?"

"Why, yes. You don't suppose I want Mary telling everybody how Tom drank too much champagne the other night, do you, and how many times Jack Rich has been to lunch when Tom was away? I'll give her a splendid reference, mamma."

LETTERS

New Author in the Field

"The Legatee" is the first novel of a local writer, Alice Prescott Smith, and though she has not leaped at a single bound into the first rank of story tellers, she has done a creditable piece of work, which gives promise for her future. The scene of the story is laid in the lumber region of Wisconsin, a locality which the writer knows, having herself passed a number of years in that section. The legatee, Robert Proctor, has inherited a business from his uncle, and along with it, the prejudices and dislike of his employes. Proctor is a Southerner, a former slave owner, and a man of the world, and his men, representing ten foreign nations, have a Northern bias. They are poor, ignorant and hard-working, while he is educated, comparatively wealthy, and according to their way of looking at it, idle. He would not have found his life a "flowery bed of ease" at best, at least until some basis of mutual understanding had been reached. Livingston, the village schoolmaster, half-mystic, half-fanatic, foments the discord by his preaching, a jumble of socialism, temperance, religion and fatalism. A demagogue quack doctor, brought into the community by Livingston to supplant the good physician, Dr. Edmister, and commend violence to the mill hands, soon has the village of Wilsonport in a condition little short of anarchy. A hard winter followed by a long drouth is the precursor of a forest conflagration, and the fanatic Livingston has so dominated the minds of the simple people that they accept his declaration that it heralds the end of the world, so that it would be useless on their part to fight the fire or take precautions to preserve life or property. Out of this lurid background there stand forth some well depicted characters. Louis Detiere, the Belgian superintendent of the shingle mill, a giant in strength, fearless, proud of his influence, and spectacular, yet a man when a man was most needed; George Cole, manager at Wilsonport, silent, deeply religious, and above all things, reliable; Heinrich, keeper of the lighthouse, and the two boys, Yngve Torstensen, a mirror reflecting whatever was placed before him, dangerous in dangerous hands, but swinging in the wind like a weathercock, first to one extreme and then to the other, and Adrien Lauzeone, ambitious but soured and disappointed by discovering that education alone is not culture, and that mere schooling does not open all doors. To these add Dr. Edmister and his daughter Katherine, refined and educated, as far above the humble villagers in other respects as their dwelling built on an eminence above the settlement. There is, of course, more than one love story with the inevitable tangled threads, but the knots are satisfactorily disentangled in the end. Though the labor troubles are tragic enough, and the forest conflagration with its accompanying destruction of life and property is appalling, there are bits of real comedy here and there in the narrative. Jessie, the housekeeper, whom Mr. Proctor found as part of his legacy, is as good as any of the women who have been made famous by the kailyard school of writers, and Green, the doctor's man, who worries his mind because the chickens and other fowl will not grow all of a size, so as to look neater in their coops and on their perches, is worthy of a passing word. Much as it shocked the good people of Wilsonport to detect a smile on the countenance of the new mill owner on his first appearance amongst them, at the wedding of his manager, Cole, it will be a serious minded reader who will not commit the same breach of etiquette. The greatest fault to be found with this novel as a whole is that it might have had more force put into the telling. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co.]

When the Book-Lovers' Magazine was established, at the beginning of the year, in spite of the fact that there was already a most excellent literary publication, The Book-Lover, in existence, there was a grand flourish of trumpets and beating of drums and an intimation that now, at last, something had really happened. With the fifth number, it might reasonably be expected that the magazine was established and had settled down to its gait. There would seem to be quite a sufficient number of advertising mediums masquerading as magazines, as well as of magazines of general literature, and the name Book-Lover, or anything embodying it, ought to indicate some near connection with books, their writers and readers. The May number, however, devotes a large portion of its space to department stores, their managers and management, with portraits in tint of the owners or managers of the big Eastern concerns. An attempt at a literary flavor is imparted by a dissertation by the ubiquitous Cyrus Townsend Brady, relating his experiences in trying to buy hairpins and domestic muslin. Then come some half-dozen articles of the guide book variety, telling how to spend six weeks in Europe. True, they are signed by well-known names, and also true, they are well written, but they do not appeal especially to book-lovers, nor are the sections recommended entirely unknown. To those who take their travels in an armchair by the fireside they have no particular excuse for appearing in a literary publication, that is, in one presupposed to deal with literature primarily. Following this come a series of articles, also signed by literary lights, and dealing with "Immortal Women Novelists," George Eliot, Emily Bronte, Jane Austen and George Sand, characters which are exploited daily, weekly, monthly and yearly, year in and year out, in every possible species of printed publication. And the rest is commonplace of the commonplace, in spite of the names of the authors. The pictures are all good. There are some fifteen in color, besides the half-tones, but the Book-Lovers' Magazine is no more a distinctively literary publication than Sunset or the Four Track News is.

Everybody's Magazine is making a good start under the new management. It is perceptibly enlarged, and appears in new type. It is intended that as soon as new machinery can be installed the pages will be cut, thus obviating the necessity for using a paper knife, and the consequent aggravation and annoyance of busy readers. The grewsome and morbid is to be excluded from its pages, and though the new proprietors had not been in possession long enough when the June number was issued to make it a fair test of their success in carrying out their intentions, it puts the magazine well up in the ranks of periodical literature. Especially to be noted among its contents are "Then Ireland Will be Free," an explanation of the new land laws and the means by which their adoption was accomplished; "Twice Born," which tells of the ceremonial life of the Hindu boy, and incidentally refutes many of the popular beliefs current in the rest of the world, concerning the customs of the Hindu race; and the final paper of Lillian Pettingill's series on "Toilers of the Home." Miss Pettingill is a college graduate who undertook to get information at first hand on the much discussed servant question, and her observations and conclusions are in every respect as interesting as those of Mrs. and Miss Van Vorst, whose "Women Who Toil" is one of the books of the hour. Perhaps one may credit Miss Pettingill with even greater enterprise and originality, since the factory has been exploited in all its phases, time and again, while this is the first time that the servant girl has been seen from the servant's standpoint.

Besides his share of the "Kempton-Wace Letters," which are to be published anonymously, Jack London has in press with the Macmillans another volume of short stories of the Klondike region. As Mr. London brought out three books late in the autumn of last year, "Children of the Frost," a collection of short stories, "A Daughter of the Snows," his first novel, and a first-rate boys' story, "The Cruise of the Dazzler," reprinted from St. Nicholas, and giving a graphic account of the operations of the bay pirates, it cannot be said that he is letting grass grow under his feet. But so far from showing any indications of "grinding it out," working the mill for all it is worth, thus far all of Mr. London's work maintains its original freshness, and appreciative readers are always ready for more. — The Bookworm

JOY

In the pursuit of enjoyment there is a great deal in knowing what to do, when to do it and how. Few people nowadays are possessed of these happy faculties, as the expressions "If I only knew," "If some one would only show me," and a thousand others which are heard daily, go to prove. With Edwin W. Joy it is different and a visit to his drug store at 467-469 Kearny street, which has just been thoroughly remodeled, will convince you. The store front, with its large show windows and handsome entrance, is inviting. The interior arrangement is perfect, the fittings elegant and the several separate departments which are necessary to an up-to-date drug store meet with approval. On the cover of Town Talk are shown some of the specialties carried by Mr. Joy in connection with the regular drug and prescription business. Another feature is that of lady attendants for the fitting of surgical appliances in the ladies' private apartment. A full line of toilet articles, perfumes, etc., is also to be found at this establishment. Mr. Joy has had over twenty-six years' experience in the drug business in this city and enjoys the esteem and confidence of the public.

With the Money Makers

Dullness Sets In

A period of dullness appears to have developed in the local market for investment securities. During the early part of the week there was some little show of activity, with prices inclined towards a stronger basis but buying orders became both few and small and the expectations for business were not fulfilled. The market has been almost completely devoid of interest with scarcely any changes in conditions worthy of special notice. The buying element has kept its purchases down to the lowest limit as though looking for lower prices, but indications in this direction have been almost all the other way. Why such a feeling of apathy should spread itself on the situation at this juncture seems wholly inexplicable. At the same time however holders have not lost confidence in the value of their holdings and there has been no manifestation of a willingness to make any concessions in the hope of doing business. The interest in lighting stocks which was so active and at the same time so sensitive a few weeks ago appears to have subsided and for some days past the transactions have been confined to very small proportions. Even the usual street rumors promulgated by interested speculative operators failed to attract the attention of buyers and it is now reasonably safe to say that after the several successful attempts to lead buyers into buying San Francisco Gas & Electric shares the investing public has become weary of its repeated losses and refuses to nibble again.

A Visionary Scheme

The price of these shares, however, is remarkably well sustained, but this fact is doubtless due to the hope that the board of directors of the corporation may before the end of next February succeed in finding new capital, either local or Eastern, to take up the great bulk of shares now held by the Mercantile Trust Company at the fancy figure of $90 per share. It is known that all negotiations along this line have thus far failed but it is hinted that other negotiations are in progress. Summarizing the gaslight proposition in this city it may be briefly stated thus: An Eastern syndicate could purchase the Independent Light and Power Company's plant and do a profitable business wholly independent of the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company, but no syndicate could secure the last named concern and its plant and do a successful business without securing or dealing with the Independent Light & Power Company. This is the whole subject in a nutshell and under the circumstances the prospect of the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company getting $90 per share for any or all the stock the directors have under their control in escrow is decidedly visionary. The other gas stocks are comparatively unimportant factors in municipal affairs and they would be of secondary interest whichever way negotiations for the acquirement of the two big plants may turn.

It seems there is now a hitch of some sort with reference to the new bond issue of the California Electric corporation. This company is a new concern composed of the Bay Counties and a number of smaller concerns. The new corporation issued bonds and made application to the San Francisco Stock and Bond Exchange to have them listed. In accordance with usual custom, the application was referred to a committee to report. Rumor has it that there are some vital irregularities of a legal nature relative to the issue but whether this is so or not cannot be definitely stated yet. At any rate, there has been some hesitancy in placing some of the bonds and it is possible that some of the consolidation proceedings will have to be done over again before a bond issue will be acceptable to purchasers.

Water stocks show very little change from week to week. Prices generally have been very steady and transactions of small proportions. Spring Valley shares are wanted in small parcels at about $83.37 1-2 and buyers are bidding $64 for Port Costa stock although there are few sellers willing to dispose of their holdings at these figures. Marin County and Contra Costa water shares remain steady. Bank stocks are among the strongest on the list. Bank of California shares readily bring $625 and some sales have been effected at still higher figures. San Francisco Savings Union shares have also made a notable advance and holders are now demanding $750 per share and refuse to sell for less. Union Trust shares remain very firm at $2,150 with no offers to sell. Giant Powder stock is showing a good strong tone because of the prospective consolidation of the several large powder plants in this State. As yet this merger has not been completed but negotiations have reached a stage where completion is almost a certainty in the near future.

Sugar stocks have been quiet but very steady. Advices from the islands show crops and business prospects to be unusually propitious. Onomea will pay a dividend this month and it is probable two other companies will commence paying dividends within another sixty days. —The Financier.

THE DANGER OF INJURIOUS SUBSTITUTION.

As the advent on this market of an imitation cigar, at somewhat lower prices than the famous Clear Havanas of Sanchez & Haya, may induce some unreflective dealers to substitute when the latter are asked for or intended, we take the opportunity to caution our readers against committing this error, and generally against a practice that is sure to bring them into discredit. Retailers would be running a great risk of losing trade and of damaging their reputation to assume that when "Sanchez" is asked for some imitation or inferior substitute will answer. No reputable dealer can afford to trespass upon established rights, and it is every dealer's duty to do justice to goods of established reputation. Imitation is the sincerest form of flattery, and it is probably in consequence that on the whole the imitators will rather add than otherwise to the business and reputation of the genuine Sanchez & Haya cigars. At all events, they afford the latter an opportunity and an excuse for advertising their older standing and the superior merits of their goods that might otherwise be thought beneath their dignity.

A Story About De Chaillu

When the late Paul de Chaillu arrived in London after his first exploration of the Dark Continent, he found himself, and his collection of curiosities, which he had placed in the rooms of the Royal Geographical Society, the objects of flattering attention, invitations to breakfasts, dinners, and receptions from notabilities in society, literature, science and politics. Among others, Mr. Gladstone, the Duke of Argyll, and the late Bishop of Oxford wrote to him on the same day. Gladstone worded his letter in the usual way, inviting M. de Chaillu to breakfast. The Duke wrote: "The Duke of Argyll presents his compliments to M. de Chaillu, and begs to inform him that he will visit his collection at 3:30 on Thursday next." The bishop wrote: "Dear sir:—Will you do me the favor of lunching with me at 55 J—— street, on the —th (a day previous to that mentioned in Mr. Gladstone's note.)—Yours truly, Oxon." M. de Chaillu answered Gladstone's invitation, accepting it. But, not being familiar with ducal and episcopal ways, he did not understand the second and third notes. The former, indeed, he seems to have rather resented, for he replied as follows: "M. de Chaillu presents his compliments to the Duke of Argyll, and begs to inform him that his collection at the rooms of the Royal Geographical Society is open to the public at large. Should his Grace present himself he will, doubtless, be courteously received by the officials in attendance." The bishop's note was, however, a hopeless poser; M. de Chaillu had never heard of any public man by the name of "Oxon." So a happy thought struck him. Before answering the note, he would reconnoitre the house that the writer dated from. So he proceeded to 55 J—— street, and, perceiving in the dingy windows of the first floor evidences that a tailor practiced his art there, made no further inquiry. It never occurred to him as possible that a public personage might have rooms above a tailor's shop in a good locality. He did not even pause to compare the tailor's name with the signature at the bottom of the note. The whole thing was clear. "Oxon" was a "vulgar tradesman," who, presuming on his wealth, had written him. Such a fellow deserved no answer. M. de Chaillu appeared at Gladstone's house on the morning mentioned in the note of invitation, and there met a distinguished company. He mentioned to his host that he had received a note from the Duke of Argyll, and described its tenor. Gladstone, then in the same political boat with Argyll, begged M. de Chaillu to excuse any apparent "superiority" in his Grace's epistolary style, on the ground that he "had not received a public-school education!" Among the company whom De Chaillu met at Mr. Gladstone's was the Bishop of Oxford, and he found him the most urbane of gentlemen and most delightful of companions. As they were leaving together the bishop said, "My dear sir, why did you not come to lunch with me the other day? Lord Elgin was there, and some other men I think you would have liked to met. From your not answering my note, I made sure you were coming."

"But I received no note from your lordship."

"That's very odd. I posted the note myself on Monday night. You ought to have had it on Tuesday morning."

"I received no note from your lordship, but I did get an invitation to lunch from an impertinent tailor called Oxon, whom I never saw in my life, and was never introduced to."

"Oxon, my dear sir, why, c'est moi."

"But your lordship's name is not Oxon, but Wilberforce."

"But my See, my See!"

After some explanation M. de Chaillu saw.

Some Emersonian Philosophy

Practice is nine-tenths. Discontent is infirmity of the will. Insist on yourself; never imitate. Stick to one business, young man. Life only avails, not the having lived. Concentration is the secret of strength. Always scorn appearances and you always may. Trust thyself; every heart vibrates to the iron string. Your goodness must have some edge to it—else it is none. Nothing is at last sacred but the integrity of your own mind. Let a man know his worth and keep things under his feet. A true man belongs to no other time or place, but is the centre of things. It is as easy for the strong man to be strong as it is for the weak to be weak.

From "The Pitfall":

Our touching faithfulness to an early love is often only owing to the fact that we never had adequate temptation to be unfaithful.

Our Easy Banks

The failure of Eppinger & Co. discloses the fact that our San Francisco bankers are not the most cautious of men. It appears that the coin stacked up in some of the local banks is "easy money" to those who are inclined to engage in the conventional pastimes of the bunko artist. At the time of the collapse of the Pacific Bank some years ago the business community was startled to learn that it was as easy to obtain money from the vaults of that institution as to dispossess a baby of its bottle. But it was denied that the criminally loose methods of that bank were characteristic of all local finance institutions. Now it appears, however, that our banks may be victimized by practices against which they might be safeguarded by the exercise of ordinary caution. At this writing it is not certain whether any banks were defrauded by Eppinger & Co., but it appears at any rate that the firm could have obtained large sums by false pretences that might have been easily exploded. It appears that there are banks in San Francisco willing to lend money on unverified securities. Eppinger & Co.'s methods by which, at this time, they are believed to have practiced fraud, were very simple. They organized a warehouse corporation, and gave themselves receipts purporting to show that they had a certain quantity of grain on hand. These receipts were accepted as prima facie evidence of the existence of the alleged security. Under the circumstances it is astonishing that they did not prefer to fail for ten million instead of one. However the probability is that they had no expectation of failing; that they were merely using other people's money with which to speculate. If their judgment had not proved erroneous they would have reimbursed the banks and their achievements would have won for them the reputation of being very shrewd financiers.

The Shocking of "Colonel" Hecht

When "Colonel" Mike Hecht threw up his job of Fire Commissioner the other day, it was inferred that he did so in a fit of virtuous indignation. His confrere, Commissioner Parry, who had been charged with stealing a municipal pony, or some kindred offense, had shortly before been whitewashed by His Honor, the Mayor, and the supposition was that the "Colonel" wished to publicly express his disapproval. There was really no occasion for the "Colonel's" hasty action. If he believed that Commissioner Parry stole the colt or embezzled public funds, it was his duty as a good citizen to continue in his job, and by the exercise of due diligence seek to discourage his confrere from indulging petty larceny proclivities. To the casual observer "Colonel" Hecht's precipitous action was in the nature of a grand-stand play, and it may give rise to the suspicion that a little taste of political high life has whetted his appetite for more. Perhaps it has occurred to him that as the Republican leaders are trying to scare up a candidate for Mayor he might attract the lightning by getting into the open field and striking an attitude. This appears to be the most plausible hypothesis upon which to base an explanation of that sudden and unexpected resignation. It is known that up to that time Commissioner Mike Hecht was a most enthusiastic official. His intense interest in fires threatened to become a mania. He responded to all second alarms as though he believed that no big blaze could be extinguished unless he were on the spot. His zeal was such that he had almost become a nuisance, and on several occasions the firemen were tempted to play the hose on him. So his voluntary retirement occasioned great surprise. And it is to be deplored, for if the disclosures in the Parry case were such as to shock the sensibilities of a veteran Sansome street merchant, affairs at the City Hall are in a bad way.

Why Hanna Yielded

The itch for social prestige impels the most independent of men to recant and side-step. A few short weeks ago the Hon. Marcus Alonzo Hanna was solemnly asserting that President Roosevelt should not be indorsed by the Ohio State Convention. He contended that it would be unwise and inexpedient for a convention elected to nominate a state ticket to attempt to dictate to a body that had not yet been called into existence, and whose duty it would be to select and perhaps pledge delegates to a National Convention. While the objections of Senator Hanna were not unreasonable, still a perfunctory endorsement by a State Convention could do no harm. It would be merely an expression of sentiment, and nobody would seriously protest against it except to invoke the personal solicitation of the President and thereby obtain recognition of his political prestige. That was evidently what the Hon. Marcus Alonzo Hanna was after. In other words, he desired to be considered and importuned, and acknowledged as a powerful factor in Ohio politics. So when the President announced that he expected the endorsement of the Ohio convention Senator Hanna agreed that he should have it. Senator Hanna has reached that stage in his career at which he can afford to be respectable, and having acquired unlimited wealth by questionable means he purposes now achieving as much social glory as possible. He recently invited President Roosevelt to the wedding of his daughter which is soon to be pulled off, and the President kindly consented to attend the function. Even an Ohio Senator appreciates the distinction of capturing such a big social lion as the President of the United States. Senators are frequently entertained at the White House but Presidents seldom become the guests of Senators at their homes. It is not surprising then that Senator Hanna coveted the opportunity to yield, promptly and gracefully, a point of political etiquette to the man who is to be his most conspicuous guest on the occasion of the spreading of the wedding feast.

Frauds Promoted by Congressmen

The investigation into the affairs of the Post Office Department at Washington has revealed a shocking state of official corruption. When it was first started Postmaster Payne affected great indignation that suspicion should be cast upon his department. He was quite sure that certain irresponsible newspapers were trying to manufacture a scandal without suitable material. He has since discovered that the newspapers knew more about his department than he did. It appears that the department has been conducted in the interest of politicians who have created new offices for favorites, increased salaries, and bought material for the Government at the highest possible prices. In view of the disclosures that have been made it is not surprising that the Congress has been called upon every year to provide for the covering of a substantial deficit. And it appears that the department was the favorite hunting-ground of the corruptionists of Congress. They procured places in the department for their partisan workers and also for their "ladifriends." Some of the best paying places in the department were held by the "female" friends of gay Congressmen. Before the investigation is ended it will probably be shown that many Congressmen were implicated in the frauds.

The Reading Habit

Agnes Repplier has lifted up her voice in protest against the vice of reading. To be sure Miss Repplier is not the first, nor the only one, but she speaks with authority and is therefore likely to be heard. She sees nothing commendable in the act of reading, without reference to what is read or how much is assimilated, and very sensibly declaims against the abridgement of masterpieces and the effort to read "everything." At the rate that books are produced in these days, those who try to read only those worth the effort are in the same predicament as the conscientious tourist who makes a thirty days' trip to Europe and attempts to take in all the sights catalogued in his Baedecker. He comes away tired to death, and with only a confused jumble of impressions. Reading is only a temporary fad of the masses. To many it is a complete novelty, and as likely to be abused as any other game or occupation. It could have been no more a part of the Divine intention that all should be readers than that all should be painters, sculptors or ship builders. "Reading maketh a full man," but the value of the "full man" depends upon what the filling is. To pore over books will not make a scholar of one who is not endowed with the brain material. The child who must be driven to his books, the youth forced through high school or college, and the people who take books from the circulating libraries because it is the thing to do, would be as well employed in playing tiddlywinks. Abridged masterpieces are about on the level with that functionary said to be employed by fashionable women, to come in during the hair-dressing and manicuri hour and give a resume of the principal news in the mo ing papers and outline the plots of the latest novels, order that miladi may appear to know what she does n No people of sense or intelligence attempt to read eve thing, or even a good percentage of everything that appea There is not much use in railing at the preponderance fiction that is read. It is undeniably true, and perhaps c may admit that it is as deplorable as it is undeniable, b back of that lies the fact that poor as the average novel the books in other lines are worse. Not every one is int ested in biography, and moreover, most of the biograph which make their appearance are those of literary m artists, or specialists in science, and do not interest the m in the street. At the present moment travels are mai the "car window" variety, personal impressions, anecdo and observations, which would be of no practical use to t one who followed the same route—amusing, but of no oth value. Criticism and belles-lettres are mainly of the t book variety, and matured minds do not care to feel li school pupils undergoing a course of lectures, when they down to read. And then, in spite of all that is said abo the devouring of fiction, it is well to bear in mind that the present time there is scarcely a home into which one more magazines do not find their way. When the Centu began the serial publication of its "Battles and Lead of the Civil War," the circulation of the magazine reach a quarter of a million, though there has been no reco made of any increase on account of serial fiction. Eve body's had no complaints to enter when the articles sin incorporated into "The Woman Who Toils" were a part its contents, and the interest in Ida Tarbell's "History the Standard Oil Company" and Lincoln Steffens's ar cles dealing with the corrupt government of municipalit are not driving subscribers away from McClure's month nor have Ray Stannard Baker's descriptive articles prov "a dead, cold frost" for the Century. Jacob I. Riis c count on every book he writes to be a "best-seller," thou he deals in the plainest and homeliest facts. In gener when writers can treat their subjects as if they understo them, put force into what they write, and not fire over t heads of those whom they imagine they are aiming their books have just as much of a chance to become pop lar as have novels.

Our Futile School System

At the close of the school term we hear reiterated, usual, complaints of the failure of the educational cour The colleges and universities lament that the pupils se to them from the high schools and preparatory institutio are not fitted to undertake the freshman course. The hi schools complain of the grammar schools; they in turn l all the shortcomings on the imperfect preparation of t mary department, which finds a lower depth in the dergartens, and the latter shrug shoulders and ask at they can be expected to accomplish with children ose home training has been so imperfectly looked after the parents. There is some ground of truth in each p of the series, but the fault lies in no one department. is a divided responsibility. Jacob I. Riis says that the dern educational idea seems to be that nature made a stake in allotting so many years of growth from boyhood manhood, and we can improve the process and shorten time by putting forcing methods into practice. It s seem as though the State had let contracts with time it for the education of the citizens in embryo. The rk is mapped out on the principle of feeding corn into mill hopper. If the machinery is in good working order will grind all that is supplied to a uniform fineness, and hing is necessary but to remove the meal at one end and ply the grain at the other. In spite of the beautiful ories of the educator, there is considerably more of a ference between the quality and quantity of brain mat- of any sixty or six thousand children of approximately same age than there is between the size and shape of all kernels of corn in the crop of any given year. The l may be run at a uniform speed day and night, week and week out, without affecting the quality of its pro- t, but with the educational mill it is not quite such a ple process. Moreover, the miller expects nothing but nmeal when he feeds corn into his hoppers, and he is isfied when he gets nothing but cornmeal as the result his labors. With the educational mill it is different. No. 1 eat, white or yellow corn, oats, barley, sticks, stones ps of clay are thrown together in one indiscriminate ss, and then the cry goes up because the result is not erfine flour. The schools undertake too much, and do allow sufficient time to accomplish anything. There is reason why the whole sum of human wisdom and folly uld be compressed into the class work of a few years. accomplish everything without conscious effort is the e of the day. Pupils are not kept at any one subject, or branch of a subject, long enough to understand what it ans, much less to master it. They are lifted over obsta- s, carried past dead points, and hustled ahead. They get ough their schooling on the same system that they travel a railroad train. The object is to "get there," and at end of the journey there is a confused jumble of this l that, with an occasional fact half-fixed, like the hazy pression of some house, tree or vineyard passed at full ed. Our educational system is put together with the e attention to stability and care as to detail as that ich characterizes the work of the jerry builder, and a rybuilt education is no more useful or substantial than erybuilt sky-scraper. The only way to do anything h it is to tear it down to the foundations and begin in. It will be found that a comparatively small pro- tion of the materials can be utilized a second time. en parents look forward to the third-birthday of their ldren, as a day of emancipation for themselves ,and im- sonment of the infants in the kindergarten, small won- that they pay little heed to the sayings or doings of the le ones. The kindergartner has her schedule of work l out for her, and in just so many weeks or months she must reach a certain point. The primary school is ready to receive her little charges there and she must not keep the machine waiting. Then there is another breakneck race to reach the point where the grammar school yawns. No matter whether the pupils are ready or not, the school is. Classes must be filled and the average in quantity must be kept up, whether the quality is or not. A few years further on there is the high school, and then the college. It would be an unspeakable state of affairs if the number of high school juniors or college freshmen were to drop below those of the previous year. The procession must be kept on the move at all hazards and costs. Possibly some day a prophet will arise and declare that sending pupils through institutions for education is not educating them; that a large percentage of our youth is over-schooled; that about nine-tenths of those who attend the high school should have stopped short in the grammar schools, and that the idea of making the whole educational system a pipe line for the university is wrong. Each stage of the journey should be made complete in itself. Less should be undertaken, and more accomplished. Instead of rushing pupils through the primary schools in order to fill grammar classes, half-teaching them, and trusting to luck that they will manage, somehow or other, to pick up the dropped stitches, the primary course should be as complete in itself and as thorough as though no child who passed through it would ever have another day's schooling. The grammar course should be conducted on similar lines. A large percentage of the grammar pupils will never enter the high school, and it is defrauding them of their rights that the grammar school should be made a mere contributory to the next step. The high school should not be a step to the university but an independent institution, and should be no more a mere preliminary to a college course than a college course is a necessary forerunner of business life. When the greater part of the work foisted upon the course of study by cranks and faddists is forgotten in less time than is spent in attempting to learn it, common sense would dictate that it be omitted entirely and the time frittered away be applied to the necessary branches without which no amount of nature study, clay modeling or other foolishness will avail.

There is no more refreshing drink at this season than a high-ball of Chapin & Gore.

A Yoshiwara Function

Editor Town Talk: I have arrived at the conclusion, thus far on my travels, that the modesty of the feminine globe trotter is only skin deep. As we have learned to say in Japan, the morals of the seiyo-fu are a lacquer that may be laid, overlaid or removed at the will of the artist. Perhaps I should explain that the term "seiyo-fu" conveys to the Japanese understanding the idea of what he is pleased to call "European style." It is evident that the Japanese are not highly impressed with the "European style" of morality as it has been offered for their observation since Commodore Perry's sailors came ashore to teach the unmoral natives of Hondo how to behave in the manner of seiyo-fu. My own unlimited observation of the globe trotter as he trots through Japan confirms the Japanese opinion of the breed, although I disagree with the Japanese corollary that "if this is a specimen of the seiyo-fu, what must the society of those foreign lands be?"

I have just returned from a rare social function in the Yoshiwara of Kyoto. It is because of what I saw there that I have written the preface to this description, therein inferring that the modesty of the feminine globe trotter is an adjustable commodity to be assumed at home where modesty is at a premium and to be cast aside as a false pretense in Japan where we are expected to do as the Japanese do—a very convenient way of excusing the morbid and insatiable curiosity of woman, who in her globe trotting capacity would not hesitate to compromise herself in the effort to "see all that is to be seen." It had been publicly announced in the foreign hotels of Kyoto that on a certain day, "at the hour of the monkey" (three to five o'clock "seiyo-fu"), the ceremony of "Dochu no koto oyobi tsukidashi no koto" would take place in the Shimabara. In other words, it was made known to the guests of these hotels by the clerks that the demi-monde of Kyoto would parade through the Naka-no-cho or principal street of the Yoshiwara quarter. Not a woman of the globe trotting contingent missed the opportunity thus offered. I heard that one woman arose from a sick bed to be present at the unholy spectacle. I saw one young girl, not more than fifteen years old, in the crowd of foreign spectators—chaperoned by her globe trotting mamma, of course, but rapidly acquiring the wisdom that will soon enable her to chaperon mamma to places even more indecent than the Yoshiwara of Japan.

Sixteen women marched in the procession—that is to say, sixteen "oirans" or "queens" of the Yoshiwara were prominent in the parade. Preceding each oiran were four "shinzos." A "shinzo" is a child who has been educated for the loathsome trade of a "yujo" or courtesan of the higher class. At the side of each oiran walked a "kamura" or female page whose duty it was to adjust the queen's robe when it became disarranged. On the other side marched a man bearing an umbrella, which he held over the oiran to shade her bedaubed countenance from the too ardent heat of the afternoon sun. This procession required three hours to pass the enclosure where the foreign spectators sat. In that time the sixteen queens were supposed to place one foot before the other three hundred and sixty times—the pace, if the peculiar movement can be called a pace, being regulated to consume an interval of exactly half a minute for each step. To walk in the fashion of an oiran out on parade is an accomplishment to be acquired only by long practice. The oiran, it must be understood, is mounted on a lacquered "geta" or clog nine inches high. The feet of the woman are bare and she lifts the clog as she walks, by gripping a cord in the upper surface, with her big toe. As she lifts the geta she pushes it forward and sets it down with the toe pointing directly forward; then she pushes the other foot forward, but lays it at right angles with the foot already planted. The second foot is then turned out and the foot first put forward moves to the front in the same manner. This movement is repeated constantly and without the slightest variation throughout the procession. It is called in the vernacular of the Yoshiwara "hachimonji ni aruka," or "walking in the figure eight."

The dress of these women was gorgeous beyond the limits of my feeble descriptive powers. As I gazed upon that slowly moving pageant of Japanese vice I almost forgave the feminine globe trotters for their presence. Heavy silks massively embroidered in gold and silver depicted peacocks strutting in all the pride of outspreading tails, dragons coiled and twisted with golden scales glittering in the sunlight, tigers silver-striped prowling through bamboo forests, birds of every hue and species, and some that never flew on land or sea, animals possible and impossible, flowers to symbolize every phase of Japanese fancy, faith, and superstition—these were the moving pictures in that passing show of Oriental magnificence. The brocades over which these embroidered kimonos were worn were scarcely less gorgeous, and the obis or sashes were like a dream of Madame Solomon's trousseau in all its glory, for color and pile and cloth of price. It was noticed by the women of that foreign congregation that these obis were knotted in front, forming a great expanse of embroidered designs in arabesque, relief work and arbitrary floral arrangement. The obtrusive prominence of the obi in this position reminded me of an incident in an Oakland society woman's "Japanese evening," once upon a time not so very long ago.

It is related in the salons of the Oakland woman's dearest friends that the guests on the occasion of the Japanese function were instructed to wear Japanese costumes and each of these guests appeared at the house of the hostess proudly displaying the knot of her obi in front. Even the lady of the house did not know better until she was informed by her Japanese boy of all work, who on this occasion was "attending the door" and who went nigh into a fit every time one of his mistress's invited guests came through the portal.

"Why all lady wear obi this way?" the Jap asked, indicating the upper story of his stomach.

"Because it is the proper way to wear an obi," the lady rejoined, forgetting for the instant to whom she was talking.

"No proper way," the boy insisted. "Japanese lady no wear—Yoshiwara girl wear obi that way."

A great light dawned upon that Oakland society woman and it revealed a horrible dilemma. If she advised her guests to shift their obis they would want to know why the fashion had changed so suddenly; and if she permitted the guests to stay it out wearing their obis Yoshiwara fashion the scandal might be printed in the newspapers with the pictures of her respectable guests improperly attired and advertising themselves in a very improper manner from the Japanese point of view. It doesn't matter how the Oakland society woman escaped, but it is certain that this is the first time the story of her misplaced obi knots has been printed.

The women of the Shimabara parade, thus glittering and bedizened, were truly hideous to contemplate. They were plastered an inch deep with white, pasty cosmetic; their eyes were blackened; their lips were stained with vermilion, a daub of vermilion extending from the lower lip almost to the chin; their hair was coiffured in the style called "Shimada"—a pyramidal coil flanked by two wings, the whole surrounded by a dozen or more tortoise-shell hair pins. I would warn the society ladies of San Francisco and Oakland who may think of masquerading in Japanese style on any fancy dress occasion, said women of course, being utterly ignorant of things Japanese or the reasons for such things, that it is not proper for a respectable married woman to wear more than one hairpin in her coiffure, unless she has been married more than once. Only the disrespectable women of the Yoshiwara are permitted to wear as many pins as their coiffure will hold. In Japan an unmarried woman of good character and reputation does not wear ornamental hairpins. The teeth of these frail beauties were blackened as was once the universal custom of Japanese married women. It is impossible to convey the impression that the display of these blackened teeth makes upon the observer who has just been dazzled by the truly Oriental magnificence of the kimonos of these women. Thoughts of the whited sepulchres, graves, worms and epitaphs and all the gruesome details of the death that is said to be the wages of sin obtrude upon the imagination of the man or woman who has shuddered at sight of the smiling oiran and the grinning "yujo" of a Japanese Yoshiwara. When this unclean and unsavory exhibition was ended the foreign visitors mingled with the thousands of Japanese who had crowded the quarter to see the show and went their way to their several jinrikishas declaring that "it was a disgrace to Japan!" What a smug, hypocritical, Pharisaical lot of Pecksniffian Tartuffians we foreigners are when we are abroad in foreign lands! I didn't see a blush on any of the cheeks of that foreign delegation in the Yoshiwara quarter. Even the cheeks of the unmarried women and that fifteen-year-old innocent were callous to the hue that flaunts the shame of a virtuous woman. In their own countries—anywhere in the Western nations—excepting the shameless city of Paris always—these women would not dare to visit a place like the Yoshiwara; and they will talk of this visit to the Yoshiwara of Kyoto only in the privacy of their homes to their most intimate and confidential female friends.

Notwithstanding my contempt for this sort of make-believe virtue, I must echo the universal sentiment of these globe trotting feminine censors of Japanese morals.

It was indeed "a disgrace to Japan!"

The Saunterer

A Chance for An Heiress

Here is an opportunity for a Californian heiress who would like to become the wife of an Italian nobleman and who would appreciate the honor of becoming the mother of a long line of scions of an ancient house. The Count Louis Primoli of the Palais Primoli, Rome, Italy, came to town the other day, and I believe that it would do him no injustice to state in his behalf that he is open to a matrimonial proposition. From what I have heard at the Bohemian Club, where the Count has been the subject of considerable comment, and of which institution he has been an honored guest, I believe that the Count is in this country on a fortune-hunting expedition. Though he is an ardent sportsman and a lover of big game he is intent on a diversion no more exhilarating than the conquest of a Californian girl with a handsome dot, for which he would be willing to exchange a title almost as old as the Vatican.

His Significant Inquiry

In justice to the Count Louis Bonaparte Primoli it should be stated that he has not consulted any matrimonial agency, and that the inference as to the object of his mission is due to an indiscretion in the Bohemian Club. He was introduced in the club by no less a personage than Benjamin Ide Wheeler, President of the State University at Berkeley, and therefore it must be assumed that he has come hither duly accredited. Scarcely had he found himself within the historic walls of that club than he summoned one of the servants and inquired whether there was within easy reach a printed list of the unmarried women of San Francisco which showed their financial rating. Now it is possible that the distinguished Italian nobleman merely wished to regale himself with some very light literature. Or perhaps, having heard that wealth regulated social status in America, he was anxious to familiarize himself with the personnel of our aristocracy. However the story of his inquiry leaked out, and he was duly credited with an inclination to capitalize his title for matrimonial purposes.

Why His Chances Are Slim

The Italian Count is very likely to find this a very dull market. Though the average Californian heiress loves a title as dearly as does the average American girl, the commercial instincts that she has inherited deter her from exchanging wealth for a bauble. The Californian heiress is not yet far enough removed from the workshop, the store or the soil. She is almost as much of a fortune-hunter as the average degenerate scion of a bankrupt nobility. She is not content with being the heir to a few millions, for in this age of great combinations of capital a fortune measured by seven figures is comparatively small. Hence the intermarriage of the children of our plutocrats who deem it expedient to multiply their inherited wealth. The Count Primoli will find that it is much easier to trap an heiress in the East than on this coast. Times have changed since the days when an Italian Prince captured the daughter of Mrs. John W. Mackay.

Braunhart's Excoriation of Gray

That paragon of civic virtue, little Sammy Pestiferous Braunhart, sometimes known as "Buggyrobe" Braunhart, took a jolt of nervine the other day and became courageous. He picked out a man his size, physically and intellectually, in the person of one Harry Gray, a troublesome street contractor who has made himself obnoxious to a large element of this community by ways that are dark, and upon him he heaped abuse of the most stinging kind. The exhibition of temper occurred at a meeting of a committee of the Board of Supervisors of which Braunhart is a member, and in the presence of several citizens and representatives of the press. Then and there Contractor Gray was denounced as an unprincipled rogue engaged in the practice of debauching public officials. He was told that he had thrived in business by corrupting Supervisors, and that he even then contemplated bribing members of the city's legislature. No man with any self-respect would submit to the vituperation hurled at the head of Harry Gray by S. Pestiferous Braunhart, but the contractor stood for the excoriation, and then quietly withdrew without seeking to exculpate himself or branding the charges as false.

No Inquisition Demanded

It was a pitiful exhibition of humility on the part of a man who is somewhat pretentious in a social way, and who belongs to one or two of our clubs, the privileges of which are popularly supposed to be reserved for gentlemen. Fortunately it is a flexible standard by which gentlemen and blackguards are differentiated in local club circles, and therefore that line is not strictly drawn against men who permit themselves to be put on record as cads, suborners of perjury, corrupters of public officials, and bounders. It was moreover an astonishing episode, and the light manner in which it was passed over by the dailies bespeaks the decadence of civic virtue as well as the blunting of the community's sense of morality, for despite the rottenness of municipal politics, and the frailty of our public servants, indictments of that sort are not presented every day. Here was a public official boldly proclaiming a man to be guilty of a crime punishable by a term of years in the penitentiary, and yet not one paper demanded that the Grand Jury institute an investigation into the charges thus publicly made.

Gray's Significant Silence

Though Sammy P. Braunhart is a somewhat irresponsible individual, afflicted with the holier-than-thou mania, it is incredible that he is so utterly devoid of a sense of responsibility as to publicly charge a man with felonious practices were he not prepared to produce the proofs if called upon. He is a Supervisor, and he has been a member of the State Legislature, and therefore he is a man of some standing in the community. It is not likely that he would deliberately slander a man, since he could be prosecuted both by criminal and civil action. Gray's conduct on the occasion when the charges were made was almost tantamount to acquiescence, and unless he seeks vindication in court the inference will be that he does not dare to do so. It is bad enough to be charged with being a crook, but ignominious indeed is the plight of the man against whom a Braunhart utters the accusation, and upon whom discretion enjoins silence.

Why Schmitz Is Objectionable

When the carmen had their strike in this city some months ago Mayor Schmitz was regarded as the friend of the union, and unquestionably his attitude at that time was largely responsible for the speedy settlement of the differences between the strikers and the United Railroads. He hasn't done anything since to arouse the distrust of the Carmen's Union, and yet the representatives of that organization would not be satisfied to have him as the umpire in the event of an agreement to submit the differences that are now the subject of controversy, to formal arbitration. The matter was under discussion some days ago, and the union's representatives said they would be satisfied with Circuit Judge Ross, Chief Justice Beatty, ex-Governor Gage or Garret W. McEnerney. It was intimated to the labor leaders that Mayor Schmitz would like to be put forward as their choice. They sneered at the suggestion, and one of them said by way of explanation, "We have no desire to put Abe Ruef in the way of making a one hundred thousand dollar fee." The fact is that the labor leaders representing the Carmen's Union object to augmenting the political prestige of Mayor Schmitz. They are identified with the Michael Casey faction of the Labor Party.

has the distinction of being one of the few men who ever publicly rebuked Theodore Roosevelt. One evening during his short stay in this city he was twitted about the incident while supping with some friends after the theatre, and he said that the President was always amused when reminded of it. It occurred at Santiago when the United States forces were being disembarked from the transports. Roosevelt was lieutenant-colonel of the First Volunteer Cavalry, known as the Rough Riders, and he was one of the first officers to disembark. In his zeal to move towards the front, he became very officious and annoyed General Humphrey, who was in charge of the Quartermaster's Department. When he could stand it no longer General Humphrey turned upon Roosevelt in an angry manner, saying, "Look here, you tin soldier, everybody knows you have a fine regiment. If there was any doubt about it the illustrated newspapers would speedily dissolve it. But I don't care a blank, blank about all the bad men and great fighters in your regiment. I don't intend to help them to get a smash at the Spaniards a moment before the rest of the army is turned loose. So chase yourself and let me run my end of this business in my own way." That Roosevelt bears no resentment is evident from the fact that he appointed Humphrey to the position of Quartermaster General. It is said that when he sent in the appointment he remarked, "I guess I've got the old man now where he won't talk back."

"She is a symphony in curves from head to foot."

"How do you know? You speak as though you've seen all of them."

"Well, I think I have. I've seen her revealed above the diaphragm in a ball-room costume, and I've also seen her in a bathing suit at Monterey."

A McNab-Phelan Split

While the work of harmonizing the Republican party goes smoothly on, factional strife continues to rage in the Democracy. Internal Revenue Collector Lynch, who has undertaken the task of mending the Republican machine, promises to make a very good job of it, but chaos still reigns in Democratic circles, with the prospect however of satisfactory reorganization being achieved by James H. O'Brien and his associates. The disintegration of the Phelan-McNab element is rapidly approaching the end. McNab has not been able to hold even his own faction together. A split has occurred in the forty-second district, and the other night there was a fight for supremacy. One faction, controlled by the Mahoney brothers, who hope to elect ex-Police Commissioner Mahone to the Mayoralty, made a bitter fight against the henchmen of McNab led by Jasper McDonald. The O'Brien reorganizers took no hand in the scrap, having decided to let the McNab-Phelan minions fight it out among themselves and extend the breach. The Mahoney faction won the battle. The Mahoneys have always been identified with the Phelan wing of the Democracy, and their present attitude toward McNab is significant. It is said to be due to the fact that McNab has objected to D. I. Mahoney becoming a candidate for Mayor.

Melone's Other Son

In the death notices of Drury Melone it was stated that he had but one son, the other having died some months ago. The fact of the matter is that Melone had another son, now nearing forty years of age—the offspring of his first marriage. Howard Drury Melone is his name. He entered the University of California with the class of 1891, but failed to graduate. He dropped back from class to class and finally dropped out without a degree. His father contributed nothing to his support and he was estranged from his mother and seemed a most friendless youth. He was a tremendously big fellow, being six feet four when he stood up straight. When last heard from he was living somewhere in Humboldt county, where he had been the hero of a romantic love affair.

Dr. Hemphill's Courtship

Apropos of the Melones I am reminded of the courtship of the Rev. Dr. John Hemphill of Calvary church shortly after he came to this city and prior to his marriage with Mrs. Coghill. The rumor had spread among his parishioners that their young and handsome pastor was paying court to the daughter of a godless man who conducted a public resort which, horrible to relate, was kept open on the Sabbath. They referred to Miss Woodward, daughter of the proprietor of Woodward's Gardens. When Papa Woodward heard what the church people were saying he became very indignant, and decided that the clergyman should no longer visit his house. Meanwhile, however, Miss Woodward had fallen in love with Drury Melone and she married him.

Mrs. Nuttall to Entertain

Mrs. J. R. K. Nuttall and her mother, Mrs. Rosenstock, have just returned from an extended tour through the East. I hear that Mrs. Nuttall intends to entertain quite extensively the coming season, and with the large fortune she inherited from her father she should cut a wide swath. Mrs. Nuttall is one of the most cultured women in society. She is a brilliant conversationalist and can talk on any subject from Sandow to Sanscrit. Notwithstanding her preference for Christian society she is still loyal to the religion of her race and has done a great deal for it in a philanthropic way.

Sample Smart Set Wit

Ethyl Hager and Addison Mizner enjoy the reputation of being the two wittiest people in the smart set. Therefore their conversation is always listened to with a great deal of attention, and no doubt they find it very hard to live up to their reputation though the things that pass for smart in the smart set are not always samples of genuine wit. A little characteristic conversation was heard on an Oakland boat last Monday when Miss Hager and Mr. Mizner were returning from a house party at the Rudolph Spreckels's. Miss Hager was garbed in a long, tan-colored ulster with a huge white tulle bow at the back of her neck and an immense red hat that looked like an awning. Mr. Mizner wore a tan ulster too, and a cowboy hat. They were the most conspicuous couple on the boat, and their comments on their fellow passengers were not carried on in subdued tones. A woman in a thin white shirtwaist minus a jacket was the first to engage Miss Hager's attention, and she remarked the inappropriateness of such garb for traveling, apparently oblivious to the fact that large tulle bows and red hats were equally a solecism on such an occasion. A woman in mourning prompted Mr. Mizner to suggest that they would probably be treated to a dissertation on death. Then he complained about the pie that he had eaten. He said that it was kicking up a rumpus in his little insides and that he would expire if he didn't have some whisky. Thereupon Miss Hager reached into her grip and produced a silver flask with the remark that the bottle was all right but she feared the whisky was bad. However Mr. Mizner helped himself quite generously. Later on Miss Hager said something so funny that Mr. Mizner almost exploded with laughter and he said that if she didn't stop he would burst. "And if I did," he said, "think of what a mess I would make."

Prognostications Social

Conflicting despatches have reached San Francisco from London and New York about the future movements of Mrs. "Tessie" Oelrichs. One gives the news that Mrs. Oelrichs will spend a long season in London with her friend Mrs. Stuve Fish, and will give some functions there that will make the Londoners sit up and take notice. The other tells us that Mrs. Oelrichs is coming to San Francisco to stay awhile. Nothing in the latter despatch is said as to whether Mrs. Oelrichs is to startle us with some original functions. Presumably she is willing to leave the field of sensational social functions in San Francisco to Miss Ethyl Hager and Lansing Mizner. Miss Hager, by the way, is expected to wake up Del Monte this summer. It is considered a great card for Monterey that San Francisco's most original bachelor maid decided to spend her summer there this year. It used to depend on Hermann Oelrichs to keep matters moving lively at Del Monte. His absence left the field open to any comer. He has been taking the waters in Europe but will return in a few weeks.

The handsome building being erected by Kelly & Liebes at the juncture of Post and Kearny streets has advanced to a point at which it shows the extent to which this firm has gone to surpass all others. The interior decorations and facilities for display of goods will be uniquely beautiful, and one of the most interesting events of the fall will be the formal opening of this magnificent structure on September first. Mr. Philip Liebes and Mme. Lucile, who will manage the millinery department, are traveling in Europe to prepare for the event.

President Theodore Roosevelt's wine is Ruinart.

Salmon Fishing at Del Monte

William Black's novels, in which salmon fishing is described, are the popular reading matter at Del Monte just now, and Professor David Starr Jordan's fish lore is also freely drawn upon for information. No one would ever have fancied that salmon fishing would drive other sports into temporary background at Del Monte, but such is the case. Large catches are daily reported. E. Avery McCarthy and Jimmie Archibald made the prize catch of salmon on Monday. During the morning hours before half past ten they landed ten fish, the smallest being about fifteen pounds and the largest about thirty pounds. They were all taken with a fifteen ounce rod and a linen line, requiring from fifteen to twenty minutes to land each one. Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Tubbs, Horace Platt, Mr. and Mrs. G. D. Wise and E. J. Tobin are among those now at the hotel.

"That must have been a horse on somebody in the lower regions."

The speaker was Old Soak. The time was 5:20 Thursday morning, just as the latest temblor was disturbing the beauty sleep of San Francisco.

"I wonder who was stuck," said the bartender who was mixing a cocktail for Old Soak.

"Judging from the shock it must have been on the house. Satan always was a hard loser." And Old Soak gulped it down.

A Killing Threatened

These are troublous times in the Examiner office. A slender little man with a significant nose, a hypnotic eye and an important air pointed a finger at a fellow journalist in the seclusion of the editorial sanctum the other day, and in sepulchral tones announced in a most solemn manner that he believed certain things had been said about him, that if he found they had been said he would kill the man that said them. Incidentally he expressed the suspicion that the short, stout man he was addressing was the guilty party. Now the sanctum of the short, stout man has the appearance of an arsenal, and whenever the occupant hears the familiar tread of footsteps that sound as though the stepper were practicing a gait suitable for halls of legislation he reaches for a gun and becomes alert. There is likely to be something doing in the Examiner office at any minute. The staff is in a state of feverish expectancy with Mr. Carvalho, the harmonizer, some thousands of miles away.

Congressman-elect Livernash returned to town unexpectedly some days ago. He had started out to gather statistics on labor topics, intending to go all over the country. But he changed his mind before reaching Ogden.

One Engaged, Another Married

The announcement of Edith Findley's engagement to George Gardener occasioned a deal of surprise because it was believed that their romance ended some years ago. The probability is that Mr. Gardener followed the old adage, "If at first you don't succeed," etc. The wedding of Miss Alice Findley and Captain Cloke in Sausalito was a very pretty affair, and was attended by a large number of friends of the young couple. The bride wore a beautiful wedding gown, the gift of her sister, Mrs. Frank Lusk. The Findleys were at one time very rich, and though they suffered reverses of fortune their popularity was never impaired.

The Chivalrous Lynch

Some of the Bohemian Club men are talking of giving a dinner to Jere Lynch, the Egyptologist, to testify their admiration for the chivalrous manner in which he thrashed an offensive fellow who indulged in insulting language in the presence of a woman. The impulsive Jere has been hailed a hero in Bohemia since the news got out that he is a man of muscle as well as of brains. The bath-house incident showed that he is as aggressive as ever, and ready at all times to prove his chivalrous devotion to the fair sex. I hear that he almost drowned the man that he thrashed.

One of the gushing society writers for the daily press, in dishing up a wedding last week, remarked that the bride was married "in the same room where her mother became a bride twenty-five years ago." The bride, by the way, having already passed the thirty-milestone, I wonder how her parents took that pleasantry?

Philip Liebes sailed on the Deutschland, June fourth, for Europe.

The Eppinger Family

"Jake" Eppinger, whose failure of last week has been the talk of California from San Diego to Siskiyou, is an example of a man who has made his way in the world by simple horse sense. Many years ago he opened a little general merchandise store in Dixon, where he sold everything from collar buttons to steam threshers. Those were the times in California when wheat was as good as gold, and among other things Eppinger began buying wheat. At this time he soon showed himself to be exceptionally shrewd and it was not many years before the little town by the railroad track was too small for the rising grain merchant, and he transferred the scene of his activities to this city, with even more wonderful results. It was not long before he was recognized as one of the leading buyers of the coast. Up to the time of the failure his notes were as good as bank paper in Dixon. There is little love lost between several wings of the Eppinger family; several of the members do not speak to each other. Two of the daughters of Herman Eppinger are married to the two Stone brothers, the big dairyman. A third, "Dick," married Dr. Sharp. Mamma Sharp has loads of money, more than the Eppingers were supposed to have in their heyday. She fitted up the young couple with a handsome dove cote and with enviable nuptial gifts. Dr. Sharp embraced the faith of his wife after his usual ardent fashion and now he is the marvel of her relatives for he is the only member who is a constant attendant at the Saturday services at the Temple. The other daughter, Julia, is unmarried. All of these enjoy prominent places in society. It is to another branch of the diversified family that the Maud Eppinger belongs who married Ferguson, the race horse man; likewise the genial Peck, who splurged so heavily as a bookmaker shortly after his marriage with the widow of a theatrical manager.

Mme. Lucille, the well known milliner, sailed for Europe June ninth on the Kronprinz Wilhelm.

Webster a Benedict

As soon as the news of Fred Webster's marriage was disseminated, Society exclaimed, "What will Jennie Blair have to say about it?" For the general impression has prevailed for some years that when a certain obstruction was removed, the Titian-haired heiress would wed the Country Club's ex-president. Fred Webster was known to be a devout admirer of Miss Blair, and the latter was believed to be in Barkis's state of mind. But—the but in this instance, as the tale went the rounds, was that Mr. Webster was deterred from marriage by certain bachelor complications that might lead to a sensational denouement. But as he was married last Tuesday, Mrs. Grundy should retract some of the spicy yarns which she put into circulation. But Mrs. Grundy never retracts. She prefers to guess again and formulate new theories.

Of the Artist Fraternity

Mrs. Fred Goodwin, who is visiting in California with her husband, formerly lived here. The Goodwins have a beautiful home in New York opposite Central Park, where they entertain in ultra-bohemian style. They know all the actors, singers and artists who are worth knowing and the stars delight in the informal receptions where Mrs. Goodwin is the hostess. She has given some very original functions. One, I remember, was an American Indian dinner, where the guests appeared in costume, and at which all the appointments were of Indian manufacture.

Mrs. Jackson has gone abroad, taking her youngest son, Raymond, with her. They expect to be on the continent about eight months. Raymond is, I believe, the only unmarried son of Colonel J. P. Jackson. He is a nice boy and very devoted to his mother, who has been ill a great deal lately.

Not Robert, But John

The June Sunset makes Geraldine Bonner the daughter of the late Robert Bonner of New York, owner of blooded horses and the Ledger. Miss Bonner's father, in truth, was not the Gotham millionaire but plain John Bonner, journalist, without the frills. It was her constant companionship with her father and the aid she rendered him in his writing, that inoculated Geraldine Bonner with the literary virus. She had the talent, inborn, but it is not likely that she would have chosen a writer's career had it not been for her environment. Related to the rich and exclusive New York Bonners and eligible to the best society of San Francisco, the natural career of Geraldine Bonner would seem to be that of a society butterfly. But she chose differently, and well for herself and California, for she ranks among our three best women authors. She is a fine scholar, having had the benefit of French study with her father, who lived some years in Paris and spoke, read and wrote French with Parisian fluency. Mr. Bonner was an editorial writer on the Call, and also did other special writing during his residence in San Francisco. When in New York he occupied an editorial position on Harper's Weekly. It may have been her father's influence with Eastern publications that first, as I have heard it hinted, secured his daughter an opening in the New York magazine world. But Miss Bonner's work would have won recognition without any "pull" of that kind. Her "Boulevardier" tales that appeared some years ago in Vogue were charming, and her novel, "Hard Pan," is a simple but wholly truthful picture of San Francisco life.

Going to Her Venetian Home

Grace Llewelyn Jones is contemplating another visit to Venice this winter, where she purposes to remain indefinitely. The Jones's Venetian home is the old Sebastian Cabot casa and is one of the quaintest and most picturesque buildings on the Grand Canal. Miss Jones lived for years in the old Italian city, where she mingled a great deal with the people, adapted herself to their customs and manners and gained valuable material for her book, "An Historical Fantasy of Venice." Her feeling for Venice and Venetian customs amounts almost to adoration, and it is said that when the news came of the destruction of the Campanile she was completely prostrated. When a fund was started for its restoration she was the first to respond, and worked unceasingly until she had collected a handsome sum for the purpose.

Distinguished Britishers Coming

The Right Honorable Viscount Dupplies, only son and heir of the Earl of Kinnoul, is among the many distinguished globe trotters headed this way. I have received the news from Dr. Charles T. Abbott, lately of this city and now of Reno, Nev. He is a cousin of Lady Dupplies who is accompanying her husband on the trip. They are now in Australia.

When Bohemia Yawns

In spite of the fact that hundreds of men have looked at Aitken's beautiful and amorous statue "Art Lured by Bohemia" in the Jinks Room of the Bohemian Club, it took Nicholas Murray Butler, the clever President of Columbia, to put a new interpretation on the exquisitely languorous figure. He interpreted it as showing that Bohemia was yawning at the length of his remarks, and so laughingly cut short what is considered one of the cleverest speeches ever made within those famous walls. By the way, President Roosevelt wrote a letter to Mr. Phelan expressing

Questioning the College Czar

There is a nice, dignified little contest, the outcome of which is fraught with the greatest importance in the management of the University of California, now going on in the ranks of the faculty of that institution. Aligned on one side are President Wheeler and his staunch supporters, on the other side are Garret McEnerney, Father Yorke, and a number of regents who want "to see a change in the way certain things are being conducted." This interesting difference started several months ago in the dismissal of students "Doc" Woods and Rob Ross from the college. They were caught "rushing" rival classmen. Under the astute system of "passing the buck" adopted by Prex Wheeler their cases were taken up by a standing committee of his appointment. If a report of this committee proves unpopular he can stand from under the avalanche of odium and let the members take the consequences; should it prove popular he can blushingly step into the limelight and claim the honors.

Modified the Unpopular Report

In the present case the report of the committee in favor of the dishonorable dismissal of the culprits proved unpopular. Not only was the punishment deemed too drastic but both lads happened to have influence above the ordinary. Garret McEnerney championed young Wood's case and made such a strong showing that Prex Wheeler thought it prudent to come out of the timber and explain publicly that final action had not been taken on the case as he had not passed on the report. Taking the tip that the committee had worked on the unpopular line and that he had a chance to display the "magnanimous," he modified the report so that the "dishonorable" part of "Doc" Woods's dismissal—the part which barred him from the universities of the land—was withdrawn and his name was simply dropped from the college register. This change allows Woods to return to a university and he is now preparing to enter Columbia. The case against Rob Ross was not so strong and he is now back at college.

Lined Up for Another Contest

However, as I stated above, this round between the head of the institution and several of the regents was simply the skirmish of what is destined to prove a contest of some consequence in the management of the university. The second line-up in the matter occurred the other day. A decade ago there was a man who occupied quite an important position, outside the faculty, among the officers of the institution. He passed away several years since, leaving two daughters. His friends thought it would be a good thing to give one of these daughters a place on the pay-roll of the college so she was provided with a position in the library. The other day, without any explanation, President Wheeler dismissed her from the place. And now Garret McEnerney and Father Yorke have taken up the matter and demand the why and the wherefore. They claim that President Wheeler has no right to summarily dismiss an employe in that fashion without preferring proper charges, and that those same charges must be regularly passed upon by the Board of Regents before action is taken.

In Awe of the Ax

Wheeler, on his side, claims that when he accepted the office of President of the university it was stipulated between him and the regents that he should reserve the power to summarily dismiss any one from the university without question. Certainly he has been dismissing instructors and professors right and left without a by-your-leave, as if he were the Czar and never doubted his power. Garret McEnerney, Father Yorke and a number of other regents were appointed after this alleged power was granted Prex Wheeler. They never subscribed to it; they don't believe in it when a competent Board of Regents is at hand to deal with just such questions. Hence the nice, dignified little contest that is going on. Of course if the opposition wins and Prex Wheeler loses, a vital blow will be dealt to his system of managing the big institution. Many a professor and instructor living in hapless terror of the decapitating ax in his hands will steal through the Berkeley oaks with some show of tranquillity, knowing that the Board of Regents will at least give him a chance of a run for his learning.

A Talented Beauty

An interesting figure in artistic circles is Mrs. Mary Mott-Smith Bird. Besides being a beautiful and well-gowned woman, Mrs. Bird is more than ordinarily endowed with talents. She plays exceedingly well on the piano, sings French and German songs with remarkable sympathy and expression, paints miniatures and models in clay. Lately she has taken up jewelry designing and has already turned out some exquisite ornaments in jade. Being possessed of quite a fortune she is not dependent upon her work for a living. She is a member of the wealthy Mott-Smith family of Honolulu. With her possession of wealth naturally goes an independent disposition. Mrs. Bird's spirit was shown in the manner she treated the directors of the Hopkins Institute at the late exhibition. They refused several of her miniatures which were sent in, and Mrs. Bird resented the criticism on her work in an unusual manner. She went to the gallery where the accepted few of her miniatures were on the wall, and took them away with her. Her independence was loudly applauded by other artists who would have liked to do the same, but didn't dare.

She Jilted a German

It is gratifying to our patriotism to know that Miss Lida O'Brien, whose marriage with Lieutenant Rittler of the Fifteenth Infantry is to take place here on June twenty-fourth, has preferred the United States army to that of Germany. Miss O'Brien, who is a beautiful and vivacious brunette from Southern California, has already been the heroine of an incipient romance with a young German officer. Two or three years ago she went abroad to study music, and while at Berlin met a young German who wore the brass buttons of the Kaiser. The courtship which followed was flowery and Teutonic and the German's ardent wooing resulted in an engagement. Shortly after she returned to this country, and to San Francisco, where she lived at the Bella Vista. In about a year the German officer got leave of absence of sufficient length to give him a flying visit to this country. His Mecca of course was San Francisco and the object of his visit was the charming young Californienne. The man, however, who had seemed a fascinating war-lord in Berlin, against an American background, and in comparison with American men, appeared to be a plain and rather unattractive foreigner. The American girl's coldness became apparent. She had changed her mind. After some weeks of futile pleadings on his part he found that his case was hopeless and returned home. This summer at Monterey Miss O'Brien became engaged to the officer of the United States army. She belonged to a set of girls in San Diego of whom a number are to be army wives. Miss Mabel Gassen was recently wedded to Captain Adrian Fleming, and the engagement of Miss Gerichten has just been announced, to Captain Scott, of the Artillery.

How His Insomnia Was Cured

The election of Dr. Coyle to the moderatorship of the General Assembly has jogged the memory of members of the First church of Los Angeles as to how Dr. Coyle threw them down a couple of years ago when they were looking for a pastor. Dr. Coyle wrote to the church that he was suffering from insomnia and simply could not stay in Denver, and asked what inducements they could offer him to come to First church. The members wanted Dr. Coyle and wired their terms, to which he replied by wire that he would leave for Los Angeles the next week. At the prayer-meeting that week the reverend gentleman told the members of his church that he was going to leave and they forthwith raised his salary. Needless to say he did not go to Los Angeles, and he has not been troubled with insomnia since.

The announcement in Los Angeles last week of the engagement of Miss Belle Coulter and John Posey, while it was not unexpected by a few intimate friends, was a surprise to the social set generally. Miss Coulter is the daughter of a well-known merchant, and the granddaughter of one of the Los Angeles pioneer preachers, the Rev. B. F. Coulter. Miss Coulter has been reared more strictly than most girls. She was not allowed to visit the theatre and when at school was not permitted to dance. John Posey is the son of O. P. Posey the millionaire mine owner, and is interested with his father in valuable mining properties. Mrs. Posey is one of the most prominent women in Los Angeles society.

in the town the sisters, mothers and aunts turned out as a white ribbon brigade and worked all day at the polls in the interest of Puritas and other table waters. When John T. Gaffey, decked out in an ice cream suit and a fifty dollar Panama hat, passed into the election booth, the leader of the white ribboners asked John C. Wray, a well known politician and newspaper man, "Who is that flashy looking man?" When the information was vouchsafed that the man in the loud rags was Mr. Zobelein of the Maier and Zobelein brewery an impromptu prayer-meeting was called with its chief object John T., who has not yet discovered why he was the object of so much interest or why the ancient and honorable members of the white ribbon brigade scowled so fiercely.

President Pierce of the Los Angeles Normal School has issued an appeal for young men to enter the pedagogical profession. He says that there is a growing demand for men as school principals, also a steady increase in salaries. I am told that there are four hundred girls in the Los Angeles Normal School and only twenty-five young men. President Pierce consequently fears that the gentle sex is destined to monopolize the teacher's profession.

The Eccentric Burgess

Gelett Burgess is keeping up his reputation for inane eccentricities, according to latest accounts from the East. A few days ago he was invited to a country house on Long Island for dinner. When the lettuce was served Burgess surprised every one by gravely placing the leaves on his head. The hostess, who had never heard of the vagaries of the author of the "Purple Cow," was more astonished than any one at this extraordinary performance. "Will you tell me why you put the lettuce on your head, Mr. Burgess?" she queried. "The lettuce, did you say?" answered Burgess, "Oh, I beg your pardon, but I thought it was spinach." Burgess leaves next month for a short tour through Italy.

Captivated by Mary McLean

Burgess is to be accompanied on his trip by his sister and Miss Anna Strunsky, joint author with Jack London of the "Kempton-Wace Letters" which the Macmillans expect to be one of the sensations of the silly summer season. One of the daintiest bits of verse ever done by Burgess was inspired by the divine Anna. Just now, according to a private letter from the East, he is receiving most of his inspiration from Josephine Dodge Daskam in New York and Mary McLean of Butte, whom he has met in Boston. The irrepressible Mary has been writing essays in which Burgess has, so he asserts, discerned the spark of genius. Those that know the passionate, panting ways of the purple cowboy suspect that it is another kind of spark that interests him.

From Campus to Editorial Sanctum

Several months have passed since the day when James Nourse was appointed to the city editor's desk of the Examiner—"temporarily" as the wise ones said when they considered Nourse's extreme youth. The new editor, however, is still at his post and the possibilities are strengthened daily that he will hold his place permanently—if anything is permanent in the newspaper business. Nourse is among the youngest chiefs in the business, being in his early twenties, and it has been less than five years since he graduated from college. He is red-headed, ambitious and energetic and it is said that when he was out on the street he picked up more news, great and small, than any other man on the staff. His youth, however, was generally believed to be against him till he proved himself to be perfectly cool and adroit in emergency and to have his fingers constantly on the buttons which connect with public affairs. The fact that Nourse is a college graduate and acquired the rudiments of his newspaper education on a university paper overthrows the theories of the old-time journalists who still believe that a practical man cannot come off a college campus. About '97 Nourse was editor of the Palo Alto, the Stanford University daily, and associated with him were Will Irwin and Joe Timmons, both of whom have been editors of the same paper. It is interesting to know that these three men now occupy leading positions on the three San Francisco dailies, Nourse being city editor of the Examiner, Irwin Sunday editor of the Chronicle and Timmons assistant night editor of the Call.

No Divorce Suit for Him

The sequel to that Delmonico lunch at which Francis Dunn, the erstwhile pedagogue from Berkeley, permitted himself to be separated from a precious diamond, is not to be as the tabbies predicted. Mr. Dunn is to be given a chance to mend his ways. His wife believes, I am told, that his boarding house experience is responsible for his wandering from the narrow path. I have frequently heard it asserted that boarding houses are filled with snares for the unwary female, but never before did I know that young husbands, too, are subject to the temptations that abound in those establishments where families mingle and gossips revel. Some people will be inclined to attribute Francis Dunn's fall from grace and the mess that he made of his adventure, to the manner in which he was reared. His father was a deacon of Calvary Presbyterian church and one of the old school of Calvinists who believe that children should be safeguarded from the evils that lurk in the theatre and that encompass the devotees of Terpsichore. Young Dunn's early life was shielded from all temptations, for his was a most puritanical environment. Probably his case presents a moral.

His Pyrotechnic Career

The escapade in which Dunn sacrificed a valuable diamond is simply one of a string of gem incidents in the life of that erratic chap. He was cut out for better things. With talents in his profession above the ordinary, he was at one time regarded as having an unusually bright future. He was one of the brilliant graduates of the U. C. and came out in the class of '85. He was given a fellowship. Pedagogy was his profession and the faculty of the U. C. was glad to employ him in that field. But Frank Dunn was never the sort of man to be contented in a subordinate position on the staff of a big university. Like Cæsar he would rather be first in a village than second in Rome. After a couple of years of instructing undergraduates he saw his chance. It was Peralta hall, that big caravansary that actor M. B. Curtis constructed between North Berkeley and the bay at the time he fathered the scheme to boom that section and clean up a hundred thousand on a land deal. The building had stood deserted for years, almost as Curtis had left it, so when Frank Dunn came along and made a proposition to lease the big structure with an option of ultimately buying it the dazed owners clung to his vestments till they had unloaded everything in sight on him. He had only a few hundred dollars of capital at the time and with that small sum he tied the big property to himself and started a preparatory school for the university. With his prestige in college circles and the influence he was able to command at that time the venture was a big success from the start and money began to roll his way. But with it there gradually developed a feverish tendency to keep the good round money rolling on its course in other directions. As head of one of the most successful preparatory schools in the State Dunn felt it incumbent on himself to support the dignity of his position with the adornments of good living. In course of time this included specialties in the line of hot birds and cold bottles and soon the corkage bills began to attract attention.

Married a McAllister

Soon after he graduated from the university Dunn married a McAllister. She is considered a beauty. Her mother and sister live part of the time at the country home in Marin county. When her husband started his preparatory school at Peralta hall Mrs. Dunn determined to help him all she could so she laid aside her finery, went into the school-room and took charge of a class of small pupils. Her action had a vivifying effect on the business of the school. The smart Southern set at once resolved to make it "the school" of their set. The new rich at once began a struggle to enter such exclusiveness and they sent their children to Peralta hall to be educated in its aristocratic atmosphere and acquire whatever social light might emanate from the presence of a McAllister. When the tide of rich Filipino youngsters began to set in this way looking for an education, they, too, hied straight to Peralta hall. This invasion, however, though it brought in a load of money, was one of the causes that injured the high exclusive standing of the school, for the smart set, though it may tolerate for the time the blonde colors in the nouveau riche, cannot abide anything with a dark skin be it from the Philippines or from Africa, so the Southern children by degrees were withdrawn from the place. Trailing after them of course went the scions of the nouveau riche. But Dunn balanced this loss by charging the Filipino parents fancy prices for tuition at his exclusive place. They stood for it like wards of the Republic, determined to buy at any price all the mother country offered in education. But when the war boom died away their fees began to fall off and Dunn was obliged to sell his school. It is said that in doing so he made a very fine deal.

Edward Hamilton did a good piece of work when he wrote the plain, unvarnished truth about "the beautiful bandit queen," Docia Nolan, for the Examiner, and if that exceedingly moral journal will take the cue, and let is news columns conform to its editorial preachments a little oftener its inconsistency would not be so painful. It is this practice of glorifying the drabs, publishing their portraits idealized until they rival those of professional beauties, and expatiating on their grace, accomplishments and style, that does the mischief, not the reading of dime novels. There never was a dime novel written with the intention of glorifying crime, nor one that offered an inducement to any lad to follow the career of a highwayman, but there is scarcely a day that dawns that some creature of the half-world is not held up to the adulation and emulation of vain and ill-regulated girls, who imagine that the brothel and the tenderloin are literally palaces, once their doors are passed, and that their denizens revel in splendor and delight. The poor fools find out their mistakes by experience, and for the prodigal daughter there is no fatted calf or holiday garment. It is the women of newspaperdom, with their false sympathy and crocodile tears, who have been to blame for the exaltation of crime and criminals, and now that their hysterics and humbuggery are out of date, it is to be hoped that the men whose duty it becomes to report criminal proceedings will not be actuated by any silly and maudlin sentimentalism, but confine themselves to the same matter-of-fact descriptions which have been reserved for male criminals. Let the weak-minded girls learn to associate dirt, untidiness, foul speech and coarse, common features with the bedraggled plumage of these birds of the night. Let the pictures published be those from the rogues' gallery, where there is no pretty posing and retouching permitted, and while there is no need to lug in the spade when it is not needed, let us get into the habit of calling it by its proper name, instead of delicately hinting at "an agricultural implement." Precious few girls who read Mr Hamilton's description of Docia Nolan will have any desire to follow in her footsteps.

Parvenus in the Orient

My Far Eastern correspondent sends word that China, Japan and the islands of the South Sea are full of wandering Americans. Some of these are merely tramping millionaires adrift from their society moorings, striving in the distractions of travel to escape the ennui of unlimited wealth. Others are adventurers with a definite purpose. The millionaires are not very interesting except in the sense that they might serve to point a sarcastic moral for the sermon of a satirist; they are parvenus for the greater part, out of their province for the first time in their lives, and enjoying their outing as parvenus are in the habit of enjoying themselves—understanding nothing of the real purpose of travel, and paying exorbitant prices for everything their uninformed taste may crave. One of them—an eminent soap manufacturer of Chicago—tried to buy the furnishings of a Buddhist temple at Nikko, in Japan, the other day, and was not only surprised but somewhat indignant when informed that as the carvings and lacquers were ordered three hundred years ago by Ieyasu, founder of the Tokugawa dynasty of Shoguns, there was scarcely money enough in all the banks of Chicago to buy one splinter of the carved facade. The soap boiler might multiply this quotation by the number of similar fragments in the temple and base an offer for the purchase on the resultant sum.

Not Looking for Tigers

Charles Deering, a Chicago young man abroad in the Orient for the sole purpose of spending as much of his father's money as opportunity will permit, has "done" Japan and is now somewhere in the wilds of Korea. When he sailed on the Siberia from San Francisco last March, the Chronicle with its usual accuracy announced that the Deering outfit consisted of nineteen large trunks, and further that it was the intention of the ostentatious young millionaire to shoot some of the tigers of India. This is all wrong. The Deering luggage consisted of only nine large trunks and it is his intention to shoot at the leopards of Korea. If the Russians invade Korea during Mr. Deering's stay in that country he will move on to Shanghai where life is gay and dangers nominal.

She's Studying Japanese Art

Miss Katharine Ball of San Francisco has just finished "doing" Japan and will shortly perform a similar service for China. Miss Ball is the drawing teacher of the San Francisco school department, and an artist of more than ordinary ability. She has devoted her leisure apart from inspection of the "sights" recommended by the guide book, to a study of Japanese prints reproducing the best work of Kano Masanobu (fifteenth century), Iwasa Mathei (born 1578), Hana-busa Itcho, a great colorist of the seventeenth century, and the famous artist Okio who founded what is known as the Shijo or Naturalistic school, about the middle of the eighteenth century. Miss Ball is an enthusiastic admirer of Japanese pictorial and graphic art, but she is somewhat disappointed to find that the Japanese artist, owing to a lack of knowledge of anatomy, is unable to produce anything like an accurate drawing of the human figure. She also regrets that the modern artist of Japan is beginning to insist upon perspective. She fears that if Western ideas of art continue to invade the Japanese ateliers we shall be compelled to rely, eventually, on the tea-box artist for a correct delineation of Japanese scenery and Japanese genre.

Her Genius Unappreciated

Miss Ball's companion in her whirlwind tour of the Near East is Miss Bertha Runkle, the famous author of "The Helmet of Navarre." I asked Miss Runkle if it was her intention to write a book on Japan and China, and she answered that she didn't know—she had not yet decided. Genius is proverbially modest. Miss Runkle was probably surprised to learn that her masterpiece had not yet been translated into Japanese. I will say that the charming young author was annoyed at this dilatory appreciation of a work that The Bookman has lifted into an edition of "two hundred thousand copies," but I am sure that the literary discrimination of the Japanese went below par in the estimation of the woman who wrote "The Helmet of Navarre," when she was informed that the first novel translated from English into Japanese was that stupid romance, "Ernest Maltravers," and that the second work of this character to be reproduced in Kana was that silly biography of "Little Lord Fauntleroy." I am informed by an eminent Japanese critic that one reason why Miss Runkle's novel has not yet been translated into Japanese is because the people of the country are still reading, with childish delight, the adventures of Athos, Porthos, Aramis and D'Artagnan, in Dumas' "Three Musketeers," which some of Miss Runkle's admirers say would have been a rank plagiarism of "The Helmet of Navarre" if Miss Runkle could have written it first. The same eminent critic says that Miss Runkle's book will probably be translated some day if it can be adapted to the requirements of Japanese literary taste and made to fit some historical incident. The circumstance that Miss Runkle has visited Japan and spent some of the money she has made out of the sale of her great novel will unquestionably operate to hasten this Japanese appreciation of her genius. It is doubtful, however, if the Chinese will be moved to the same purpose by the same grateful consideration.

The Reis's Are Bored

J. O. Reis and Mrs. Reis, of San Francisco, are "somewhere East of Suez"; probably studying the races at Shanghai. They undoubtedly prefer the Shanghai races to those they saw in Japan and Manila. If their expressions of disapproval concerning the Japanese are a criterion they will make but a short stay at Yokohama on their return to San Francisco. They are "temple tired" and the shops no longer amuse them. They are longing for the gauds of civilization, having surfeited of the gods of semi-barbarism in the Orient. Harry Gibbs, of Oakland, who is accompanying Mr. and Mrs. Reis on their semi-oriental tour, is completely ennuied with the effort that he has made to "see everything worth seeing." Gibbs has long since "cut out" the temple fad that seizes the tourist as soon as he has thoroughly mastered his guide book. He says that "when you have seen one temple, you have seen them all." He says that his observation of the Japanese confirms a preconceived notion that they are a nation of Gullivers striving to be a nation of Brobdingnaggians. Mr. Gibbs devoted at least three weeks to a close study of the Japanese. It is the opinion of Mr. Gibbs that the Chinese tailors are the cheapest in the world. As Mr. Gibbs expects to return to Manila in Government employ he is slow to wrath concerning the Filipinos.

Californians in Paris

"The Gus Spreckels's are very much in evidence in Parisian society this spring," writes a correspondent. "Mrs. Gus is by no means a leader in the American colony, but she is well liked and has been entertained more this season than ever before. Lily Lawlor is invited everywhere with them and keeps quite a salon at her elegant apartments on Avenue Victor Hugo. A tallyho party consisting of the Spreckels's, Miss Lawlor, Santos Dumont and two Russian princes was seen at Versailles recently, and was much admired. Lurline was dressed entirely in white with one of the chic new poke bonnets trimmed with white fuchsias. Mrs. Gus was a picture in blue mousselaine de soie, and looked young and girlish enough to be her daughter's sister."

Regular Tobin Luck

The Tobins may struggle their best to hide their talents under the toga of the law, the mantle of society or the blazer of the polo field, but those same diffident talents will insist on budding and blooming in other fields. For seasons past the gilded youths of the bay, Hobart, Baldwin, Carolan, Dunphy, the Blingum Band, have all visited Yosemite and each in his turn has essayed to tempt trout from the various streams dividing or emptying into the valley. Last year Hobart and three cronies tried it, but, like the others, all in vain. This year Joe Tobin and a troop of other good fellows went up into the valley to see what kind of a time President Roosevelt was going to have there. For several days he camped up in Little Yosemite during the snow storm then passing over the Sierras. He had heard the stories about the difficulty of catching trout but time, opportunity and desire were all in conjunction and he thought he'd try his luck. Whether it was the storm, or the Tobin mascot, or Joe's method of spitting on his bait, or whether the fish thought it was Roosevelt's hook and were determined to contribute to the valley's glad hand to the President, nobody knows, but the surprised Joe caught eighteen trout. Voila tout, Fortune showered. Coming down the trail whom should he pass but the President's party. As Tobin proudly tramped by, holding his handsome string of fish, Roosevelt exclaimed: "Halloa, trout! those are the first I've seen caught since I've been in the Sierras." "Well, Injuns are the only ones that mostly catch 'em hereabouts," ventured the guide. And Tobin, glorified, marched proudly down the trail conscious that the envious eyes of the head of the Republic were upon him—and his fish.

In San Jose

One of Washington, D. C.'s popular Episcopal clergymen is summering in California at the Vendome in San Jose. He has his family with him. Any number of well-known people are at the hotel this summer. Mrs. J. F. Houghton and Miss Minnie Houghton have arrived for the summer. Among the Oaklanders are Mrs. J. A. Folger, Mrs. David H. Jackson and Miss Katherine Jackson, who are visiting Mrs. Robert Colton, Mr. and Mrs. T. L. Barker. Among the San Franciscans are Isaac Upham, the W. H. Demings, Mrs. E. M. Heller and family, P. Urmy, William Wehner and family, Miss Edna Brown, Mrs. Alex. Forbes, the C. C. Moores, George and E. W. Newhall. Charles A. Belden of New York, now at the Vendome, is a former Californian. The family of Beldens is well remembered here where Judge Belden was interested in San Jose and San Francisco realty. Alfred Holman and family have apartments for the season. Mr. Holman is the recent purchaser of the Sacramento Record Union and was formerly of Portland, Oregon and San Jose. He was at one time owner of the San Jose Mercury. When E. R. Folger came down with his wife and children he also brought his handsome span of bays. Miss A. G. Faries of Minneapolis is spending a season in San Jose while waiting for her brother, Captain Faries, now on his way home from the Orient on sick leave with his two children.

A number of distinguished people are at present in the Yosemite Valley, among them being Governor Pardee and Mrs. Pardee, all the Commissioners, who are holding their annual meeting, and the M. H. de Youngs. The fireworks bought for the President's delectation are to be used on these prominent Californians, since the prominent Easterners had such benighted tastes. The Roosevelt affair, however, will probably put an end to any such injudicious scheme as lighting the falls. I fancy that we shall hear of that no more.

The stork visited the Charles H. Farrells last week and left a little son. This is the first gift of the long-legged bird in this direction and the little heir naturally received a hearty welcome. Mrs. Farrell was Florence Julia Doane and she is very prominent in musical circles. Since her marriage she has not appeared very often at public concerts, but often sings at private affairs.

Mr. and Mrs. R. E. Edwards of Victoria, B. C., are at Byron Springs. Other late arrivals there are Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Pike, Mrs. W. S. Gage, Madame Sorbier and Miss Cecile Sorbier, Mrs. John Cashin and Miss Cashin, Miss Voorman, J. A. Fairchild of Los Angeles, Dr. A. K. Crawford and Miss Trewgore of Oakland.

Mrs. Florence A. Moore and her son Jefferson Moore, of the Hotel Vendome at San Jose, have gone to the Lakes for a few weeks.

MacArthur's Gay Staff

These are strenuous days at the Presidio. The coming of General MacArthur has changed things from what they were in the days of the rotund Shafter. Shafter, who was always attached to posts in the South and West, was not a man given to fuss and feathers. He was at heart very democratic, and looked upon the red tape of military life as simply a means towards an end. Not so with MacArthur. He considers gilt braid and shoulder straps essential features of militarism. He will have no man on his staff who is not possessed of independent means, and who has not the same open sesame to society. Consequently there is a deal of social gayety at the Presidio these days. The high-flyers that surround General MacArthur are the gayest of gay butterflys. Moreover the blood that courses in their veins is a very hot fluid, and life at this far Western post is today one long series of jinks—high and low. The officers comport themselves after the manner of real bloods intent upon painting things a deep vermilion hue. Some interesting stories have come my way about the informal functions that have taken place at the Presidio lately and that are not of the stag variety. Some of them border on what are commonly called orgies, and they have given rise to considerable scandalous gossip.

Back From the Orient

Mrs. H. L. Roosevelt, wife of Lieut. H. L. Roosevelt, U. S. M. C., was a passenger on the Korea, arriving Monday afternoon. Mrs. Roosevelt will be remembered as Miss Eleanor Morrow, daughter of Judge W. W. Morrow, who left here some eighteen months ago with her husband for the Philippine Islands. During her absence she has journeyed among all the Philippine Islands and visited the prominent cities of China and Japan. She will remain on a visit to her parents and friends for a few months.

Villon the Vagabond

From the feet of Master Francois Villon, "Prince of all ballad-makers," "Father of French poetry," Death has long since "washed the mire." No gray saint of his times has had such honor at the hands of immortal mortals and others of less fireful clay as has this golden sinner, this virtuoso without virtue; peccable as a man, impeccable as a poet. For instance: Swinburne, most musical of wordmen, greatest of living lyrists, made a ballad of him beautiful as one of his own. He is the subject of a fine sonnet by the Greek-loving Andrew Lang. Stevenson, the much loved joy-maker, wrote around him "A Lodging for the Night," and made a "familiar study of him under the caption, "Villon, Poet, Student and House-breaker." Master Francis is one of the most engaging of Gautier's "Grotesques." He is, as all the theatre-going world of San Francisco knows, the hero of "If I Were King," written by Justin Huntly McCarthy for E. H. Sothern now starring in this city. John Payne has done his poetry into English; a few of the ballads have been exquisitely translated by Swinburne, and for many tomorrow years will live Rossetti's matchless rendering of the "Ballad of Bygone Beauties," ladies of old time, not, after all, now with the snows of yester-year, but basking, beautiful as ever, in the eternal summer of song that does not fade.

The Patronage of the Gigged

I have often wondered why the world of Respectability, beauty-blind, riding rough-shod in its thousand gigs over the royal hearts of poets, should love so well these vagabonds of song, these ne'er-do-weel sons of Art,—your Villons, Verlaines and Baudelaires. I can readily understand Swinburne's being inspired to write the incomparable "Ave at que Vale" when songless sleep fell upon the dust-defying Baudelaire, whose poesie, a "consummate flower," was "fostered out of dung." But the tender attitude of the gigged is not quite so comprehensible. The explanation is, perhaps, this: Genius makes mediocrity mad with jealousy. When it stands upright, it towers out of reach of envious hands. But they who sit bolt upright in gigs flatter themselves that they can look down on those who sing in the gutter and get mud-splashed by passing wheels. In such case love for the poet is not incompatible with self-complacency. A few years back, in France, the refuge of artists, Death washed the mire from the feet of one whom smug Britain had bound and beaten with many stripes, and then sent out into the wilderness, a scapegoat for the sins of high society. Who among men has the art and the courage to sing the sad, bad, glad, mad name of Oscar Wilde?

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Johnson and Maurice Dore returned early in the week from New York. They are at their San Rafael home for the summer.

A Quiet Place

Scene, the hotel porch.

Mrs. Glib: "It's awfully slow here, don't you think?"

Mrs. Flirty: "Well, I should say so. Thank Heaven, tomorrow will be Saturday and the men will be with us. And then there's that dance in the evening."

Mrs. Glib: "Doctor Pill insisted on my coming to a quiet place to rest my nerves, but really I am quite frantic for a little excitement. I couldn't stand another week of this dullness."

Mrs. Trotter: "When we were in London—"

Mrs. Glib (watching Mrs. Grim who is working a sofa cushion): "That's a new pattern, isn't it? How do you do it? Is it hard?"

Mrs. Grim (folding up her work and putting it into a bag): "Awfully complicated. It's enough to put your eyes out." (Mentally): "She's not going to copy this design if I can help it."

Mrs. Glib (mentally): "Cat!"

Miss Fox: "Here comes that Denton woman. Looking for her husband as usual."

Mrs. Denton goes to edge of porch and calls, "E-li! E-li!"

Miss Fox: "I was just talking to Mr. Denton a few moments ago. He went down the bank when he saw you coming. Said he was going fishing."

Mrs. Denton (mentally): "I hate that old maid."

Mrs. Parvenu: "These must be dreadfully old buildings. So inconvenient. I am just lost without electric lights. At home, you know—"

Mrs. Trotter: "When we were on the Riviera—"

Mrs. Grim: "There's that awful Kidd child squalling again."

Mrs. Glib: "I don't see why people come to a hotel with a tribe of children. Home is the best place for them."

Mrs. Denton (calling her son): "Fred-die! Fred-die!"

Freddie (below): "Yes, ma."

Mrs. Denton: "Is your pa there?"

Freddie: "Yes, ma."

Mrs. Denton: "What is he doing?"

Freddie: "Nuthin'."

Mrs. Denton: "I'll go down and see. I am always so frightened when anybody is near the water." (Waddles off porch and down bank.)

Mrs. Sharp: "There goes that Mrs. Dash from the cottage. She has on her short skirt again."

Mrs. Prim: "What a scandalous rig! If I were to put on such a skirt as that Mr. Prim would—"

Mrs. Trotter: "When we were in Switzerland—"

Mrs. Flirty (yawning): "It must be near lunch time. I'm awfully tired of the cooking. I wonder what they will give us for lunch today."

Miss Fox: "Codfish. They always do on Friday."

Mrs. Glib: "Those people that came up from Fashion Springs yesterday said the board is better than they are getting down there. And there was a strike in the kitchen one day and the boarders had to cook their own meals. Here comes Mrs. Denton with Eli in tow."

Mrs. Smart: "She never lets him out of her sight if she can help it."

Mrs. Glib: "No wonder! The only man on the place except young Mr. Freshleigh, and the Fisher girl has landed him."

Mrs. Flirty: "I saw Mr. Freshleigh and Miss Fisher going for a walk this morning. They invited me to go along but I declined."

Miss Fox (mentally): "That's a whopper!"

Mrs. Trotter: "When we were in India—"

Chorus: "Oh, here comes the stage!"

Mrs. Flirty (mentally): "Two officers among the arrivals, and I just dote on shoulder straps! How lucky that I took the trouble to gown myself becomingly this morning! One never knows when one is going to have a chance of making an impression." (Exeunt omnes.)

The Etiquette of Train Wrecks

Train wrecks are becoming such commonplace occurrences to the California folk who travel that conventional people are asking one another what is proper to be done in the case of this or that emergency which is apt to arise in even the most trivial and harmless train wreck. Custom has given us a code of etiquette for the ballroom, the golf course, the horse show, but, unfortunately, until recently there has been no call for rules to govern gentlemanly behavior in train wrecks. Nevertheless, Town Talk has supplied this deficiency and prepared a book of rules which will enable the reader to slide down an embankment at Santa Barbara or to mingle with a head-on collision at San Mateo and yet comport himself with all the grace and dignity which would be his at a fashionable fete champetre, a reception or a cotillion. Following are a few sample extracts which will plainly show how valuable Town Talk's Book of Train Etiquette will be to the polite traveler of the future:

If, in the general debris, you should be thrown in the company of a lady passenger and should pick up her limb thinking it is your own, it is the conventional and delicate thing to exchange the member without comment, or if you deem a remark necessary, say something like, "Pardon me, madam, you have dropped something." If you wish to retain her friendship you might send a bunch of violets to her hospital on the following day.

Should the train hesitate suddenly and throw you into the lap of a debutante three seats ahead you should not take advantage of the situation and remain there. It would be best to unwind yourself and go in search of a mutual friend who would doubtless be delighted to introduce you.

Outing suits are proper for excursion collisions, toboggan coats for embankment slides and mourning for bridge accidents.

If, after the wreck, you should be encountered by a mere acquaintance, do not feel embarrassed because you are at the time standing on your head and gesticulating with your limbs. This attitude is quite proper under the circumstances, and, should you show self-consciousness, you would be but betraying your ignorance of the correct usuages. As your hands are otherwise engaged it is au tait to offer him your foot to shake. Should a lady acquaintance pass you would best not attempt to raise your hat.

In a head-on collision do not attempt to exchange cards with everybody you meet.

Never call on the conductor to stop the train. It is im-

The Seducers of Yosemite

By Elwyn Hoffman.

Much has been said in the public press regarding the turning down of the Yosemite Valley program by the President; but nowhere have I seen even one line commending him for his action, or criticising the Commissioners for their exhibition of vulgarity. The President's behavior was admirable; no other one thing done by him on his Western trip so marked him as a Man. Caricatured and lampooned as a ruffian delighting in brutal sports; attributed with almost an utter lack of all the finer feelings and sentiments, and supposedly a glutton for the "shouting and the tumult,"—the President, forbidding the insane illumination program and avoiding the conventionalized banquet, entered the Great Valley a giant among dwarfs. It is a sad commentary on Californians that a "rough rider" and a "slayer of innocent wild beasts" should come from New York to teach them how to respect and admire their greatest natural glory; to show them in what spirit men should enter the wonder-place of God and worship at the shrine of Nature. It was a noble exhibition of staunch simplicity, and however a man may disagree with Theodore Roosevelt's politics, for this he must admire him, and admire him sincerely, even though he must acknowledge, in the act of admiration, that he has been worthily rebuked.

And what shall we say of the men who made it necessary for the President to rebuke us? What shall we say of those into whose hands we consigned the Great Valley, believing them appreciative enough of its simple grandeur to keep it as Nature made it, and who have shown that they were so devoid of fine feeling that they thought bon-fires, and sky-rockets, and garish search-lights would add immensely to the beauty of God's handiwork? Indeed, from the strenuous efforts these gentlemen made to carry out their program, one cannot but feel convinced that they have about as much appreciation of Yosemite Valley as a cannibal chief has of the sacredness of a missionary's life.

In a recent newspaper interview Commissioner J. C. Wilson was quoted as saying: "If he (the President) had telegraphed me to push over El Capitan, I would have tried to do so." There is a fine spirit for you! What a nice regard for the glory of the Great Valley is evidenced by that remark! What a truly worthy guardian of our Yosemite is Commissioner J. C. Wilson. No doubt he would really have tried to "push over" grand old El Capitan; indeed, it is not too much to suppose that he would have chopped down the largest trees if the President had evinced a desire to see them fall, and would have esteemed it a great pleasure to put a charge of dynamite under the cliff from which descends the Bridal Veil Falls, to the glorious end that the Falls should be wiped out.

Every Westerner having a streak of manhood in him as thick, if no thicker, than the blade of a case-knife (and a large love of Nature is a part of manhood), ought to be sincerely ashamed and regretful that there are in the West such a flock of crows as the present Yosemite Park Commission. There may be one or two of the Commissioners who have some conception of the nature of the work which they were appointed to perform; but the majority seem sadly incompetent. If the recent exhibition is to be taken as a fair sample of how the Commission look upon Yosemite, it would be well for all true lovers of Nature, and all honest Westerners, to keep their eyes on the Commission and their hands on their guns. It will not do to trust too far gentlemen who believe that God has ordained them

Automobile Topics

That the automobile is rapidly growing in popular favor on this coast is evidenced by the enormous business that is being done by the chauffeurs whose machines are supplanting the back-number hacks and coupes. The people who have automobiles to rent by the hour are doing a thriving trade, so great is the demand by people who prefer the new style of vehicle. Many people have their first auto experience in a hired rig, and they usually like it so well that they proceed to make inquiries as to the cost of a machine and the expense of maintaining one. The town is full of prospective purchasers, and one day last week a single firm in this city—the National Automobile Company—sold five of their vehicles. And as popular as the automobile is in this city, greater is the demand for the motor vehicle in the interior. In San Jose there are fifty automobiles in use, and last week Mr. Snell of the Vendome decided to keep one on hand for the accommodation of his guests.

As soon as people in general realize that the automobile has not only come to stay, but that it is to be universally used for commercial purposes as well as for pleasure, the autophobiacs all over the country will cease their pestiferous efforts to harass the people who are devoted to the promotion of the industry. Rampant legislation against automobiles is being and has been enacted in various states, and there has been considerable agitation to that end in California. It is wise to discourage reckless and irresponsible speeding, but an argument may also be made against unsafe animals and inexperienced drivers. A high-spirited horse that takes fright at the slightest unusual thing should be kept from the highways. That the auto car is destined to become the commercial vehicle of the future is evident from the commercial vehicle contest held last month. The fact was brought out conclusively that makers of pleasure vehicles are as capable of producing successful delivery vehicles, while the concerns which are giving their attention especially to delivery vehicles (outside of the heavy trucks) are still somewhat in the experimental stage.

Last week Mr. Edwin W. Stoddard of the Dunham Carrigan Company, and Phil Bekeart, the gun wizard, accompanied by their wives, took a pleasure trip to San Jose in the surrey which testifies to the Stoddard handicraft. The machine was built as an experiment by Mr. Stoddard who is a thorough machinist, and that it is a success there is no doubt in view of the run to San Jose and back without a hitch.

The motor car in military service has hitherto been used chiefly for transporting men and commissariat supplies and munitions of war, but there is now a movement on foot in France to utilize it for offensive operations. An armored car has been built in Paris.

The whiskey of the particular — Chapin & Gore.

Many society people have been making the run to San Jose and Del Monte. Among the local enthusiasts is Bertha Dolbeer, who was accompanied in her handsome auto last week by Miss Warren and Miss Wagner. Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Buckbee have a beautifully tinted car in which they have made the run. H. B. Larzelere, F. A. Greenwood and C. W. Earle are enthusiasts who have made frequent trips to the Vendome.

The manufacturers of the steam vehicle have adopted a condenser and a kerosene burner, which obviate the necessity of stopping for water and overcome the disadvantage of the large fuel consumption.

Miss Eleanor Haber, the clever niece of George Davis, manager of the Central theatre, is spending her vacation with her relatives in San Francisco. Miss Haber went to New York about a year ago to complete her dramatic studies. Though she intended to stay at her studies for awhile, David Belasco heard her read and approved her talent to the extent of putting her in "The Garden of the Gods" as understudy to Blanche Bates. But as Miss Bates was never ill, her understudy never got the chance to show what she could do. Miss Haber will return to New York in August.

GIVE US A CALL BEFORE PURCHASING

TO THE LOT OWNERS OF CYPRESS LAWN CEMETERY.

San Francisco, June 6, 1903.

To the Lot-Owners of Cypress Lawn Cemetery:

In view of the so-called labor trouble at Cypress Lawn Cemetery, or rather of the boycott which certain labor unions have declared against the cemetery, I deem it but just to you all, as well as to the association, to state a few facts which bear upon the subject.

At the time of the demand for higher wages we were paying $2.25 per day, while other cemeteries were paying from $1.75 to $2 per day for the same work. The demand was that after April 1, 1903, we should pay $2.50 per day for nine hours' work, and a full day's pay for part of a Sunday or holiday, and that we employ none but members of the Cemetery Employes' Union.

On March 29th we had the following notice posted at the cemetery.

"To the employes of Cypress Lawn Cemetery: On and after April 1, 1903, the wages of men employed by the day will be $2.50 per day.

"Nine (9) hours will constitute a day's work. Men working any part of Sunday will be allowed a full day's pay.

"Our pay day will be on the 10th, as usual.

"E. B. M'PHERSON,
"Superintendent Cemetery."

This was entirely satisfactory to our employes.

On April 9th our superintendent discharged a man for using vulgar language. Soon after the association received a threatening letter from the Labor Council, and later a committee called on me and demanded that we take this man back to work, and that we compel three non-union men who were working at the cemetery to join the union. Two of these men have been in our employ for over ten years, and the other one for about two years, which fact alone should indicate to men of intelligence that they were faithful workers.

The committee was told that the men were at liberty to join the Union if they desired, but that I would not compel them to join if they decided against so doing. I certainly would not discharge them, as being an American myself, I believed they had a right to earn a living and support their families, whether they belonged to a union or not.

I fully believe that organized labor has done a great deal for the workingman and will at all times give it every assistance in my power, but I am unalterably opposed to organized despotism, and I will never consent that the President of the Hackmen's Union shall ever manage Cypress Lawn Cemetery.

To my mind I have conceded everything except the management of the cemetery itself. I claim and am certain that we know our own business best, and, therefore, propose to take no dictation from any outsider. I also claim and propose to exercise the right to employ such men as I deem will render us the best service, as Cypress Lawn Cemetery has only attained its present beauty and perfection by the employment of competent workmen selected by our management.

The burial of the dead is a sacred duty that comes to every one, in time, and it seems to me a sacrilege for labor to unite in unnecessarily disturbing these duties. It is, indeed, going a a step too far, and is an interference that must surely meet with your unqualified condemnation. Very truly yours,

H. H. NOBLE,
Mgr. Cypress Lawn Cemetery Assn.

Those hot days last week would have been unbearable to business men had it not been that a cool, refreshing drink was near at hand. Rainier beer was consumed by bottles and bottles, and proved a splendid antidote to the heat. Rainier is the most popular brand of beer on the market.

To look through tears upon a life's mistake;
To feel forbidden pleasures tempt and lure;
To loathe the ties 'twere indiscreet to break;
To gaze upon the coffined corpse of love
With dry, hard eyes; to drain the cup of gall;

This makes up life for that sad child of Fate
Who mourns beside a cold, dead ecstasy.

MUSIC

'he Mantelli Concert

At Fischer's on Wednesday afternoon, Madame Eugenia Man-lli, late of the Grau Grand Opera Company, sang a very popu r program, in very popular style, rising at times into the realms f pure art. From Donizetti's "Favorita" to Wright's "Violets," ie audience was hers: she was literally pelted with applause, nd recalled with flattering frequency. However, more than once after her "Carmen" numbers, for instance) the hands of discrim-nating musicians were significantly mute. There was about the inger just a faint suspicion of the air (detested of artists) of one nder the necessity of making concessions to the prevalent taste r rather, lack of taste. In the "Du bist wie eine Blume" of Ru-instein, where there was perhaps least concession, there was a omething lacking in artistry. Mr. Walter Pyck accompanied ith much sympathy, and his rendering of Beethoven's Sonata athetique Adagio showed a fine appreciation of the great master.

The performance of Pietro Mascagni's "Zanetto" at Fisch-r's by Madame Eugenia Mantelli, Miss Julie Cotte and others ext Thursday afternoon will be an event of much interest to overs of music. The operetta will be put on in fine style. Popu-ar prices will prevail. There will also be several special num-ers by Madame Mantelli and scenes from grand opera in cos-ume.

'uvenile Pupils' Recital

In Grace Litzius, one of the little piano pupils of the San 'rancisco Conservatory of Music, E. S. Bonelli has a pupil of hom great things may be expected. Miss Litzius rendered the aderewski Minuet and a Bolero by Ravina with a knowledge and ntelligence far beyond her years. She has the musical tempera-ent developed to a high degree. This was also noticeable in her ccompaniment to the violin solo of Maude Lange. Another little irl who played at the Saturday matinee recital and whose tem-erament is distinctly that of the musician was Segred Olsson, hose number was Mendelssohn's "Consolation." The other little ianists did excellent work, their tempo being especially com-endable—Sonatine, Kuhlau, by Rose Eichen and Irene Miller; Iungarian Rondo, Haydn, Mazurka, Bohm, Rita Lubelski; Con mour, Beermont, Hazel Chase. But in the little Litzius girl Ir. Bonelli has a pupil who promises to reflect as much credit pon his institution as has Charlotte Voorsanger who, after re-eiving her foundation here, went abroad to complete her stud-s. The recital was not all of piano numbers. Atillo Laraja endered a violin solo, his tone being tiny like himself. His num-er would have been more successful had the accompaniment not een so loud as almost to drown the violin's tones. The little ad seems to have considerable aptitude for his instrument. A Iokatine by Albin was his selection and for an encore he played pretty thing by Monti. Cecilia Eichen, one of Prof. Herzog's upils, rendered a violin solo, a Romance and Tyrolienne by Danbe, very spiritedly, with her sister Rose at the piano. Maude Lange's rendition of a Harris Fantasie was noticeable for its ood tempo. One of the most interesting numbers of the after-oon was the cornet solo, "Young Werner's Parting Song" (Ness-er), by Master R. Crosby, a pupil of Prof. C. Von der Mehden, vith Miss Rita Lawrence at the piano. Young Crosby draws a ine, big tone from his instrument and plays with decided ex-ression. His weakness is his finals, his breath not being equal to long sustained effort. But strength will come with practice. Another enjoyable number was the Laendler by Koenig, for zither and bow zither, by pupils of Prof. Bachman, three little girls and a lad, with Mr. Bachman assisting. They played with spirit and intelligence. A large audience was present and the children taking part received flowers in profusion.

Beringer Conservatory Recital

The pupils at the Beringer Conservatory recital last week were mostly of an advanced grade and the program was artistic and well arranged. Miss Gladys Beringer and Prof. Joseph Beringer opened the program with a number for two pianos, the composition of the latter. It was a "Valse Entrainante" and was very pleasing. Later on the same performers rendered Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" with fine expression and delicate shading. Alice Maxwell, a gifted pupil, played the Chopin Fantaisie Impromptu op. 66 in admirable style and with precision. Hilda Gutfield showed taste and temperament in her rendition of Raff's Maerchon op. 162. Intelligence and fervor were noticeable qualities in Alta Yocom's rendering of Schumann's Romance in F sharp and a Valse Brilliante by Professor Beringer—"Des Gouttes de Rosee." May Heintz rendered Liszt's "Hark, Hark the Lark" with considerable clan and Eurydice Athanasiadon gave a refined and intelligent interpretation of Beethoven's Pastorale sonate. Other participants were Henry Roberts, Maude Sharp Queenie Tilton, Ellen Gedge, Mrs. H. Fromau and Clara Dillon, who gave a brilliant interpretation of Liszt's twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody. One of Madame Beringer's vocal pupils, a lyric soprano, Miss Louise Amiot, sang some operatic music with true dramatic fervor—the aria from "Robert the Devil" and a Recitative and Aria from "Ernani." As encores she sang the dainty coon-song, by Nevin, "Mighty lak' a Rose" and the old favorite, "The Last Rose of Summer."

The Bells of Corneville

The pretty Planquette opera, "The Bells of Corneville," was repeated from its former successful productions last week for the benefit of the Presentation Convent, and was a most enjoyable entertainment. It was given with the following cast: Serpolette, Miss K. Barry; Germaine, Mrs. Lenore Greven; Gertrude, Miss N. Hayes; Suzanne, Miss A. Logan; Manette, Miss E. Gunzel; Jeanne, Miss N. Peters; Henri, H. Wood Brown; Jean Grenicheux, J. Beatty; Gaspard, F. W. Huber; The Bailli, R. Behan; Registrar, T. J. O'Brien; Assessor, C. Bulotti; Notary, A. F. Schleicher; Sailor Boy, L. Galli. There was a large chorus of peasant girls, villagers and servants and an orchestra composed of J. E. Hax, flute, A. Bardet, viola, F. Ghishla, clarinet, H. Bruenn, cello, E. Jordan, cornet, R. Ruff, violin, Mrs. H. Seekamp, pianist, H. Seekamp, musical director. Mrs. Greven as Germaine repeated her hit of the former productions, as did Miss Barry as Serpolette. Harry Wood Brown as Henri had an excellent chance to display the quality of his fine baritone. Mr. Beatty, who is a pupil of Prof. Greven, made a pronounced success as Jean. Mr. Huber, the clever Gaspard of the cast, and a former pupil of Mr. Greven, also received great praise for his impersonation.

The Beethoven Club, composed of fifteen young amateurs, gave its annual recital last Thursday at the residence of Mrs. Brady in Twenty-fourth street. This club meets once a month at the members' homes and they are all very enthusiastic musicians. The program at the recital included works by Ketterer, Leybach, Holst, Gottscalk, Wieniawski, Mendelssohn, Von Wilm, Herbert, Rubinstein, Goltermann and Mozart, and the pianists were Florence Moran, Frances Fitchen, Jennie Thomas, Harriet Game, Nellie Sullivan, Carrie Maxwell Bight, Hazel Colnon, Rose Hizar, Gertrude Albrecht, Florence Nachtrieb, Ada Conlin and Mary France McDermott. —The Music Critic.

STAGE

A Notable Performance

To prefer some of the shows in town to "The Circus Girl" bespeaks a perverted taste. It argues that one is incapable of differentiating a salon prize-winner from a pot-boiler, or of discriminating between caviare and cabbage, brummagem and the genuine article. There is nothing garish or raucous about the performance at the California. It does not run to tinsel or tomfoolery and it does not depend on stock jokes, coarse horse-play or curbstone slang. It is a musical comedy in subdued colors, and the performance is notable for its daintiness and refinement, it is so different from the bizarre and boisterous, strident and slap-dash agglomerations of legs and lingerie, ragtime and rot that have been coming this way for the past two seasons. "The Circus Girl" is the only musical comedy that we have seen in years that is sufficiently well nourished to survive its musical hodgepodge accompaniment. It has sufficient plot to afford entertainment even though the chorus and the songs were eliminated. As a farce it is far superior to "Are You a Mason?" for it has some real flesh-and-blood characters and some genuine atmosphere. There is only one voice in the company at the California and that is possessed by Miss Isobel Hall, who though she has come hither without a Broadway reputation, sings better than ninety-nine per cent of the female vocalists on that thoroughfare. She can take a high note without howling, which is more than can be said of some women who are rending the atmosphere of local playhouses these days. Moreover she has an air of refinement that is refreshing after observing the coarse work of some of our burlesque queens. In Miss Hall, Miss Doro and Miss Dale the company at the California has three young women who in their individual capacity could give prestige to any show. Miss Doro is the most graceful and dainty little woman that ever bewitched a local audience and Miss Dale is a wonderfully charming dancer, and though she has a very small part she shows that she is a woman of temperament and that she can act as well as dance. And then there is Sadie Kirby the character woman, who plays the part of the circus manager's wife in a way that always keeps her in the picture. The central figure in "The Circus Girl" is John R. Slavin, the midget comedian, who is never to be caught in the act of struggling for a laugh, but who is attending strictly to business all the time. As Biggs, the man whose financial distress prompts him to accept a challenge from the terrible Turk, he arouses deep sympathy, and his meeting with the fierce wrestler is excruciatingly funny. The only unsatisfactory feature of the performance is the chorus, and it could be sidetracked without being missed. Its presence accentuates the incompleteness of the production.

White In Brogue

The most exacting taste of lovers should be pleased with White Whittlesey's way of helping Cupid. Whittlesey never makes love in just the same way, but he is always virile and compelling. Except Faversham and Worthing, I can recall no other stage lover with quite such a magnetic way of wooing. In "D'Arcy of the Guards" he is the impetuous young Irishman to the manner born. The Revolutionary drama is excellently presented by the Alcazar company. One could not expect a weekly-change stock organization to give the play with the fine attention to detail that marked the Miller production, but it is a fine presentation nevertheless and worth more than the price of admission. Miss Creighton and Mr. Osbourne are particularly well cast, and Walter Belasco in the role of Sambo is one of the hits of the play.

A New Pudd'nhead

The stage is encumbered with many weeds of hasty growth, that speedily wither or are cut down by the sickle of public disapproval. But when a play sinks its roots deep into the soil of success it thrives and prospers regardless of the individual. James A. Herne is food for worms, but "Shore Acres" prospers year after year. Rotund Odell Williams has gone the way of all flesh and been translated into a fragile and impalpable spirit, but "Way Down East" draws just the same. The Mayos, father and son, have strutted their brief hour and been united in the world beyond, yet "Pudd'nhead Wilson,'" which yielded each fame and fortune, proves equally generous to their successors. Those impetuous young things who make matinee idols of actors, and deny that there is romance in gray hairs, have yet to see White Whittlesey as "Pudd'nhead." It is something that the belles and beauties of the national capital are said to rave over to this day. There were enough perfumed notes of admiration, when he played the part in Washington, to fill the new Congressional library building.

'Tis a great pity that what promised to be a remunerative season for Nance O'Neil was ended so disastrously by the burning of the Republic theatre last Sunday morning. However, we are to have the opportunity of seeing Miss O'Neil as Floria in "La Tosca" for two nights, Monday and Tuesday, next week at the Alhambra. The performances will both be benefit affairs, the first night for L. R. Stockwell and the second night for Miss O'Neil.

It has lately been rumored that Henry Miller's wife, Bijou Heron, would be his leading woman next season. The rumor has been denied by Mr. Miller who will soon open in this city with Margaret Anglin playing the lead. During their last visit to this city it was understood that they were to be married in the near future, but evidently Bijou Heron is an insurmountable obstacle to such a match.

It is said Margaret Anglin will star next season in the dramatization of "Lady Rose's Daughter," and that Ethel Barrymore will have the part of Julie.

Cissy Wont Marry Him

Some time ago it was reported that Cecilia Loftus was to marry Robert Lorraine, but now I hear that the engagement has been broken off. Mr. Lorraine is the ex-husband of Julie Opp who broke off her engagement with Cecilia Loftus's first husband, Justin Huntley McCarthy, to become the second wife of William Faversham.

An Ideal Summer Outing

For real solid comfort and enjoyable rest no country appeals so strongly as that along the California Northwestern Railway. The climate is delightful, the mineral springs are numerous, there are over 300 living streams, many lovely valleys, and lakes, well wooded foothills and ranges, so that a person can have for his vacation any kind of environment desired. You can stop at a mineral spring resort, dwell in a pretty town, rusticate on a farm, camp by a lovely stream, or in a wild and picturesque canyon. To aid you in your choice of a location for a summer outing the company is now distributing "Vacation 1903," a book of over 100 pages. Call or write for a copy. During the summer season special round trip rates are made to many points. On Saturdays and Sundays with return limit Mondays a considerable reduction is made to points (not suburban), and on Sundays one fare for the round trip, so that frequent trips can be made back and forth, and friends can visit those summering along the Road.

"Twirly Whirly"

Though there is a sameness about all Weberfieldian burlesques that makes it difficult to differentiate one from the other, there are distinct features in each that are so timely, grotesque and ludicrous that they invest the whole with the charm of apt satire. "Twirly Whirly" purports to be a satire on the foibles of the smart set but it deals with them in a vague way. It more nearly approaches a dramatization of Mary McLean, the eccentric young woman of Butte, who is impersonated by Barney Bernard with a yiddish dialect. In this role the little comedian shows that he is possessed of true burlesque talent. His admirers would prefer to see him in the familiar role of the Ghetto Jew, but as Mary McLean he affords considerable amusement, especially in the olive-eating scene. A clever bit of satire is the automobile incident in which Kolb and Dill figure. They ride on the stage in their little "Sassy Devil," and they find that it is in need of repair. Thereupon they take out a kit of tools and leather aprons and proceed to tinker. The machine explodes. Such are some of the features that distinguish "Twirly Whirly" from burlesques that have gone before. The dialogue is in the characteristic crisp style of Edgar Smith interspersed with gags invented by the clever principals in the original Broadway production. Winfield Blake and Maud Amber do their usual stunts and Olive Vail exercises her sweet voice in a song with chorus accompaniment that gets several recalls. The chorus indulges in some very pretty manoeuvres that cause you to marvel at the talent of George Lask for achieving picturesque effects on a miniature stage. Flossie Hope and Gertie Emerson are not enough in evidence to satisfy those that admire those graceful dancers, but on the whole "Twirly Whirly" is a characteristic production with all the snap and ginger of the past triumphs of the popular O'Farrell street playhouse.

Her Boisterous Ha Ha

A woman who sat in the audience four rows from the front and shrieked with merriment at everything on the stage was one of the features of the Orpheum not on the program Tuesday night. Russel and Locke, singing and dancing comedians, started her off, and for awhile interest was divided between them and the hysterical woman. Her bashful escort was very uncomfortable because of the attention she aroused, and tried his best to quiet her, but to no avail, until Harry Le Clair appeared with his song, "These Amateurs Make Me Sick," when both appeared to decide that they would not rival the hard-working actors longer, and made a quick exit, much to the relief of every one. A pleasing innovation was the placing of the biograph in the middle of the program instead of at the end, when the people who rush for the ferries and restaurants disturb those who wish to see the moving pictures. The scenes from the Durbar pageant at Delhi are very clear and give one a very good idea of that wonderful spectacle. Frank Keenan and Georgia Welles present a farce by Edward Ellsner, entitled "The Actor and the Count." Although it is written in the usual Orpheum vein, describing the complications arising from matrimonial misunderstandings, it allows the clever actor and actress to display their versatility and keeps the crowd in an uproar all the time. Georgia Welles is a blonde of the Grace George type, and acts with more vim and dash than would be expected from such a frail woman. Keenan is very clever in an eccentric fashion, and does some good character work as the count. Other good turns are Hale and Francis, whose hoops in their dexterous hands seem endowed with life. The three Rixfords, Hanlon brothers, Lutz brothers and the Paxton living pictures are good.

Mayall's New Engagement

San Francisco audiences evidently have the same objections to married couples on the stage that are entertained by Easterners. Since Landers Stevens's hasty marriage with Georgie Cooper neither has been so popular as before that event. Matinee girls who flocked to the Central before the leading man married the soubrette lost interest. But the management has just signed Herschel Mayall to play leads with the Central stock, and that will bring the matinee girls back. Mayall will open in "Faust." Next week comes M. B. Curtis in the play that made him a fortune—"Sam'l of Posen." After a fortnight of farce comedy, Mayall will have his chance. I hear that Georgie Cooper and Landers Stevens are going East. They should have no difficulty in getting a good engagement.

No one who sees Edwin Stevens as El Capitan and then as himself would fancy the men are one and the same person. El Capitan's legs in red tights are thin and muscleless; Edwin Stevens's legs, in baggy English trousers, appear to be stout and muscular. Only the Stevens nose cannot be disguised.

Features of Next Week's Bills

Nat Goodwin is always a welcome arrival here. His new play, "The Altar of Friendship," is by Madeleine Lucette Ryley and is said to be as good as anything Goodwin has ever appeared in. He will have a large house to greet him at the Columbia Monday night. Julia Dean will also have a batch of friends on hand to bid her welcome home.

"The Circus Girl" will continue at the California, and will be followed by "A Gaiety Girl," which was seen here some years ago at the Baldwin.

Tomorrow night the Tivoli will produce "The Isle of Champagne," the opera in which Seabrooke starred for some seasons. Stevens should repeat his former success as Mumm. Arthur Cunningham will be Frappe, Roma will be Abigail Peck and Annie Meyers Diana. The piece will be beautifully mounted and costumed and should be good for a run.

"Twirly-Whirly" promises to be another record-breaker at Fischer's.

"La Tosca," with Nance O'Neil in the title part, will be given on Monday and Tuesday nights at the Alhambra.

We had "Pudd'nhead Wilson" here before but the Whittlesey version at the Alcazar will have the virtue of novelty. It is a wonderful play and its heart interest is particularly strong. Howard Scott is to have the role of the mulatto, and Norval McGregor, late leading man for Janet Waldorf, will be the half-brother. Robert Mantell's "The Face in the Moonlight" comes next, and then "The Three Guardsmen."

In the second edition of "In Washington" at the Grand Raymond Caverly will introduce a diverting parody on the popular song, "The Volunteer"; also a medley of parodies and a number of new witticisms. Cheridah Simpson will sing the "Congo Love Song" and Louise Moore "The Maiden With the Dreamy Eyes." Harold Crane will be heard in a spirited patriotic song entitled "My Own United States." By special request, "The Wedding of the Reuben and the Maid," "Marriage is Sublime" and "I Left Ma' Heart in Dixie" will be retained.

The "Four Emperors of Music," Ed. Howard, Frank Russell, Al. Edwards and Harry Whiting, will make their first appearance in this city at the Orpheum, offering an act of novelty, melody and fun. The Schenk brothers, Willie and Charlie, the world's greatest head and hand balancers, will reappear after a tour of Australia, South Africa and the Orient. Saona, world-renowned for his impersonations of men, past and present, will begin his initial engagement in San Francisco. There is not a noted character in history of the present time that this wonderful mimic does not faithfully reproduce in the flesh. Anna Wilson, the operatic mezzo-soprano, will make her vaudeville debut, singing the Page's song from "The Huguenots" and some popular numbers. Frank Keenan, George Hanlon, Hale and Frances, and Paxton's Living Art Panorama will remain.

At the Chutes will be Russell and Locke, black face song and dance team, Adeline Bichler, the contralto, in popular ballads, Mons. Camillo and Mme. Fona, gymnasts from Orrin Brothers' Circus, Mexico, and Delphina and Denora, novelty musicians, in the act that has won them European fame. Marsh Craig, the sensational novelty acrobat, will be new. McIntyre and Primrose will appear in white face and Kraton will be again on the bill.

LETTERS

Accumulating a Library

"Whoso owneth a book, let him straightway put this book by the side of it," is the manner in which the Booklovers' Magazine begins its review of "The Lost Art of Reading," by Gerald Stanley Lee. One might go further and say, Whoso contemplateth owning a book, let it be this book. Richard Le Gallienne contributed to the April Success an interesting article on the subject of "How to Form a Library," and his first piece of advice is, "Before buying a book, be certain that you will want to keep it." It does not often happen in these days of free circulating libraries, that the desire to own a library is the outgrowth of determination. The best advice one can offer to him who would own a library is to beware of the lists of "hundred best," or "fifty best," or any one's perfunctory "best," and steer clear of uniform sets. Buy single volumes that you will want to read more than once. It is not good policy to put money into sets of reference books, ponderous, many-volumed encyclopedias. Some books of reference one must have, and the symmetrical row of volumes is a temptation to the beginner, more especially as it is a schoolmaster's trick to descant on their values, but unless there is need for daily reference, in these days of free libraries and branches, it is wiser to content one's self with some compact, handy reference volume. The world moves so quickly in these times that a large part of the scientific and geographical information is supplanted by newer discoveries, almost before the books are in print. Selected "libraries" sold in sets are sure to contain much that any individual buyer has no use for and there are few, if any authors who have not put the best of themselves in a few of their books. The individual taste differs at different periods, and what one may not care to purchase today may be the book of books in five years. Still, it is better to enjoy books while they are fresh. A volume which has lain under the eye for a long time without exciting a desire to read it is like a piece of bread which has become stale and dry from exposure to the air. A library should be as individual as a wardrobe, and to stock one's shelves with books that do not appeal to the owner's taste, but are purchased with an eye to pleasing casual visitors or making an impression is as senseless as to lay in a stock of court costumes because they are highly recommended in some book of fashion. A messenger boy's collection of detective yarns is of more use to him, and therefore, in a better sense a library, than half the expensive accumulations of people of fashion and pretended culture. A library of well-thumbed novels is better than a case full of Greek and Latin classics viewed through glazed doors.

"Emmy Lou" In England

That dear, delightful little girl, "Emmy Lou," is about to make her appearance in England, a special edition of Mrs. Martin's book having been prepared by McClure, Phillips & Co., for their English patrons. How it will be received is a different matter, however. Little girls of Emmy Lou's walk in life are not sent to "board schools" in Great Britain, nor do they go about unaccompanied by a maid or governess. Very much of Emmy's "dearness" is manifested in her artless remarks at the family dinner table, but an English Emmy-Lou of the same age would have her meals in the nursery or the school-room presided over by some domestic, and it will not be at all surprising if our little favorite fails to gain the appreciation she deserves because of the lack of a common point from which to look upon her. On the other hand, it has happened often enough that our American authors have received quicker and wider appreciation in London than at home. Emmy Lou won her way into the hearts of readers so that she was more like a living child than a creation of fiction, and her success will bring more pleasure to literary people than the triumphs of the latest American countess ever causes amongst the 400..

Gwendolen Overton's novel has at last been named. It is to be called "Anne Carmel," and the scene is laid far from that of "A Heritage of Unrest," which dealt with Arizona, while the new book is a story of Canadian life. It is to be brought out by the Macmillans, who are also the publishers of a number of other books by Californian authors, notable amongst which are the two new books by Jack London and "Outlines of Psychology," by Professor Josiah Royce.

(These were in Norris's "Salt and Sincerity" department in Critic for April, 1902, a long time before "The Cynic's Calendar" was published; for that matter Carolyn Wells had "misplaced proverbs" out before it, too.)

The bigger a little man is, the less he amounts to.

A disciple is a man who does not understand. He thinks that he is on, but he isn't.

"My son," said the philosopher on his death-bed, "my son, two things you should never do. First, do not endeavor to pry into the future, for if you will only wait you shall know all. And second, do not chase after women, for if you do not they will chase after you. Farewell."

One who knows does not talk; one who talks does not know.

People who take pains never to do any more than they get paid for, never get paid for any more than they do.

It may be that there is a bigger bit of political clap-trap than the statement that all men are created free and equal, but I cannot just recall it at the moment.

"They belong to the landed aristocracy." "Indeed! When did they land?"

Some writers are famous for the books they have written; others for the books they ought not to have written.

There is a subtle sympathy produced by marked passages. Put faint pencil marks, then lend a volume, and you will know your fate.

A woman may be a mystery to a man and to herself, but never to another woman.

The average woman wishes to be idealized and strongly objects to being understood.

The Waste of Public Funds

Mayor Schmitz has discovered that the public funds are wasted in the fattening of tax-eaters, and that as a consequence there is not sufficient money reserved out of the revenues for much-needed improvments. Considering that the Mayor has been in office nearly two years the discovery is somewhat tardy. The Mayor's wail over the wasting of public funds is suggestive of the cuttlefish trick. He is darkening the waters of the political pool in which he has been floundering, to facilitate his evasion of the blame with which he should be charged for many of the shortcomings of this Administration. It is undoubtedly true that public funds are being wasted in salaries but a complaint on that score comes with bad grace from a Mayor whose family draws about sixteen thousand a year out of the public treasury, and who raised the salary of the Secretary of the Park Commission after securing the appointment of one of the several Schmitz brothers to the job. At no time within twenty years did the tax-payers of this city receive so little benefit for the money contributed to the support of the government as they are vouchsafed now. The streets are in a disgraceful condition, the sewers are crumbling and the school buildings are falling into decay, and yet that much execrated instrument, the Consolidated Act, which was believed to be responsible for all our woes until Jimmy Phelan enlightened us and gave us the New Charter, is no longer operative. We are now experiencing the glorious disadvantages of that pharisaical reform of which Mr. Phelan was the prophet, and Mr. Schmitz is a typical exponent. To escape the odium of his misfeasance the Mayor blames his colleagues and tells the people that his hands have been tied by the courts. His hands would not have been tied if he had not started out to subserve his private interests instead of the people's; if he had won public confidence by undertaking to lop off the heads of incompetents; if he had devoted his contingent fund to the procuring of evidence against lazy and extravagant officials; if he had not appointed crooks to office and made it apparent that he had established a partnership with Abe Ruef for the creation of a political machine; in brief, if Mr. Schmitz had gone about his duties in the proper way, public sentiment would have been so strong in his favor that no court would have dared to tie his hands. And even now, if instead of generalizing about waste of public funds he would point out specifically the leaks in the various offices and demand the proper exercise of economy, he might accomplish something for the city.

The Servian Tragedy

There is no chapter in modern history more shocking or appalling than that written in the little kingdom of Servia last week with the blood of a royal couple and of several Ministers, servants and guards. It was a hideous tragedy that shocked the civilized world, so merciless and cold-blooded was the manner in which the savage conspirators dealt with their victims, but the wholesale assassination was not more revolting than the rejoicing of the populace over the bloody deed, and the callous indifference of the people to the terrible fate of those whose blood had been so ruthlessly shed. If the slaughter of the King and Queen and their attendants had been the result of a popular uprising, provoked by acts of injustice and while the populace was inflamed with indignation and resentment, the circumstances would have seemed to justify the act. The popular verdict is not always just but it is sometimes a plausible pretext for the penalty imposed. The Servian tragedy appears to have been vindicated by the popular verdict, but it is a case of the mob glorifying the army. Once more has the autocratic and brutal man on horseback supplied the people with a pretext for a holiday. There is a lesson in the Servian tragedy which all the world may read. The little kingdom of Servia has a standing army of over two hundred thousand men, a number vastly out of proportion to the population of the country. The men of the army are imbued with a lively sense of their importance, and they are ever ready to engage in intrigue when affairs of state are not conducted to their entire satisfaction. The murderous plot was hatched in the army and executed by its officers. And though the people were not in love with their King it was probably because they were inspired with great respect for their military masters that they so readily proceeded to celebrate the revolting crime. The Slavs of Servia are not an ignorant people. Schools are numerous in that country and education is compulsory. Moreover they have a fine university, and there is abundance of culture in the capital. Yet they acted like barbarians when they heard the news of the appalling tragedy. They were eager to testify their allegiance to the army. And such is the effect of the ascendancy of a corrupt military despotism. Perhaps Karageorgevitch will profit by the lesson suggested by the assassination of Alexander, and strive to maintain cordial relations with the army. Being a soldier his sympathies will naturally be with the army, and undoubtedly the murderous conspirators were actuated principally by a desire to put him upon the throne. The people had reason to be disgusted with Alexander but their grievances were not such as to provoke a revolution. The little State has attracted much attention from the world of late. The quarrels of Milan and his Queen, the marriage of Alexander with a waiting lady old enough to be his mother, her effort to palm off a spurious heir on the country—all these things have made up a romance of considerable interest. It was probably this last exploit that nerved the friends of Karageorgevitch to strike. It will now be interesting to watch developments, for the other monarchs of Europe have intimated that the murderers must be punished. The new King will have to make a bluff of some kind to signify that he was not behind the conspiracy.

The Tip From Wall Street

The long looked-for reaction appears to be setting in. The contraction of loans is significant. It means that Wall street is becoming a bit cautious and that the financial magnates are anticipating the long expected era of business depression. However business is still prosperous all over the country and it is possible that Wall street has been drawing its deductions from unimportant factors, but that there have been symptoms of impending depression there is not the slightest doubt. Perhaps they are due to the fact that we are on the heels of another Presidential year, and again they may be the result of the long-continued industrial warfare. Some of the Captains of Industry say there is no cause for apprehension. Yet Wall street is unloading stocks with remarkable persistency, and the prices have been falling rapidly; all of which is suspicious, for if Wall street were sanguine of a continuance of good times it would snap up standard stocks at current rates. The brokers of Wall street are experts in judging economic conditions, and they are not easily disturbed or frightened. The weakness in the iron market is in itself significant. It presages an approaching surplus of material. The inability of the underwriting syndicates to dispose of their holdings of watered issues of stocks and bonds is not to be attributed to a mere flurry. The fall in security prices is very bad for it hits the small investor who invariably rushes in when the booming is approaching collapse.

The Uncertainty of Science

The scientific gents are bewildering us by the way they are smashing our oldest convictions and becoming skeptical of their own postulates. It is becoming more apparent every day that they are only guessing. What they assert today they deny tomorrow. A few months ago Mr. Russell Wallace, the great British scientist and collaborator with Charles Darwin in the establishment of the theories of evolution and natural selection, asserted that he had reached the conclusion that the earth is the actual centre of the universe, and that the supreme end and purpose of this vast universe was the production and development of the living soul in the perishable body of man. The other day Lord Kelvin threw cold water on the theory that the universe just happened, and affirmed that science proves the existence of God. Yet Haeckel says that science proves the non-existence of God, and now comes the renowned Professor Crookes who declares that matter itself may be wearing away. Heretofore we have been taught that matter was indestructible. It is evident that the phenomena of life require something more than scientific explanations. However it is pleasing to those of us who have faith, and that are familiar with the twaddle of the scoffers who repudiate God, to know that science is gradually abandoning its position of utter atheism. And yet science is no nearer the key to the world-riddle than it was a thousand years ago. Ultimate questions are never to receive a positive answer from her. More and more is it becoming apparent that the dogmas of science like those of religion are built upon faith. In the last century scientists were developing theories that threatened to annihilate all of religion's most cherished dogmas, but the reaction has set in. The deduction from evolution was that if man be brother to the worm, he is practically but a worm, and now comes Dr. Wallace asserting the conviction that man is only a little lower than the angels.

Indolence to be Discouraged

It is evident that Mr. Root, the Secretary of War, is intent on improving the personnel of the army. It was at his instigation that recent legislation was enacted providing for a radical change in the scholastic training of officers, and the other day he decided that promotion shall depend on a greater amount of scholastic acquirements than have heretofore been insisted upon. It is the sentiment of the War Department that army officers should not rely for advancement solely upon the resignation, removal or death of superiors. The notion prevails in Washington that many of our army officers have ceased to take their duties seriously; that they are devoting too much time to social affairs, and neglecting to perfect themselves in the military science. As in England petticoat influence is beginning to be felt throughout army circles, and there is urgent necessity for reform. The organization of a general staff which is now occupying the attention of the authorities at Washington is a step in the right direction. It was provided for by legislation which imperatively calls for a higher standard of scholastic training, and which is calculated to discourage indolence and incompetency.

The Wail of the Scorcher

"When rogues fall out, honest men get their dues." The comment of an Eastern paper on the disappearance of the bicycle from the public roads has elicited a lamentation from the erstwhile merry scorcher, who complains that since the advent of the automobile the wheelman can no longer enjoy his outing. How, he plaintively queries, can the bicyclist enjoy a trip on roads which are monopolized by the horseless vehicle speeding along at a rate of forty-five miles an hour, regardless of all but the pleasure of its occupants? How can he "look before and after," trying to keep one eye on what is trying to run him down from behind, while the other is busily scanning the road ahead for the cheerful chauffeur who knows not the rule of the road, and trusts to the speed of his vehicle to carry him beyond the scene of an accident, should one happen to occur? and much more in the same strain. No doubt it is all very true, and equally very melancholy, but the woful wheelman has had his day, and there are other things besides curses that come home to roost. There was a time when he thought that he, too, owned the earth, and that horses were created to be scared and pedestrians run down. The roadway was never wide enough for him if there was a sidewalk and those who were not nimble-footed enough to escape with lives and limbs could pay the penalty of their trespass on his domain. And now the automobile is doing for the wheelman what the wheelman did for the pedestrian. The big fish swallows the little fish and the big fish is swallowed by the whale, so "he knows how it is himself." It's a long lane that has no turning. The sorrowful scorcher who cannot afford an automobile for himself will be obliged to hold indignation meetings with his kind and pass resolutions which may afford him some degree of consolation, for he will get none elsewhere.

The Deaf and the Blind

One of the last contributions of the late Max O'Rell was elicited by a discussion in one of the French papers on the relative trials of the deaf and the blind, and O'Rell, like the majority of those who are not called upon to endure either misfortune, unhesitatingly declares himself in favor of deafness, which, according to his wisdom, is "only an inconvenience," while "to be blind is to be half dead." There was once a learned professor expatiating on the subject of drowning, which, he took occasion to remark, was a most easy death. Amongst his listeners was an ancient mariner, who probably knew more by experience of the effects of immersion than a whole collegeful of theorists. Rising to his feet the old salt excitedly called out, "Don't you believe him! Don't you believe him! Them that tells you that never tried it!" And so it is with those who have had no experience with the trials of the afflicted, be they deaf or blind. It is commonly asserted that the blind are cheerful, while the deaf are morose, but this is a hasty generalization from insufficient premises. Neither blindness nor deafness, unaccompanied by other conditions, will completely change a natural disposition, and even admitting the fact for the sake of argument, it goes as far to prove that blindness is a lesser misfortune than deafness as it does to show that deafness is "only an inconvenience," and that God has endowed the blind with cheerful dispositions as a compensation for their dire misfortune. "When you are deaf," says this philosopher, "you can write, and read what is written to you; there are even signs which can convey to you the thoughts of your friends." And so can the blind read and write, and carry on almost any occupation, since their other senses are quickened, but the deaf neither see better nor acquire delicacy of touch as a compensation for their dulled hearing, and as to sign language, having acquired it, it is as useful as a means of communication, under ordinary circumstances, as classical Greek would be to a castaway amongst the Solomon Islanders. "You are independent," goes on the brilliant reasoner, "you can walk alone; if you cannot hear music you can look at nature's enchanting beauties and admire pictures, etc." But again we are reminded of the old sailor's exhortation. As a matter of demonstration, it is easier for one with defective sight to move abroad than it is for one with impaired hearing, and as a choice between the totally blind and the totally deaf, the blind man has by far the better chance. If it were only in the matter of ordinary politeness and consideration, people who cheerfully make way for the blind or the cripple will consider themselves imposed upon if the deaf cross their paths, and in case of accident, while every sympathy is extended to the blind, the deaf are more apt to be blamed for being in the way. In fact, as O'Rell himself so kindly and considerately states it, deafness is "only an inconvenience" which is resented by every one, and the apparent moroseness of those so afflicted is in reality a measure of self-defence. It is better to assume indifference and lack of interest than to have one's misfortune advertised to every one within sight and hearing. It is just as brutally unkind to prod the deaf and shout at them as it would be to dangle gay colors and pictures before the blind and demand that they see, whether they can or not. The Max O'Rells and others of his stamp exaggerate the helplessness of the blind, who are, unless paralyzed, as capable of dressing themselves without assistance, dining at the family table, or in public, and going about in familiar places as those who have their sight. One of the quicksilver mines in northern Napa county had a blind postmaster who not only handled all the mail for ten miles in every direction, but kept a store and attended to all the business without assistance. These theoretical philosophers have a cheerful way of forgetting the interdependence of the senses. They do not realize how much that they think they hear is first presented to them through sight, nor how much that they imagine they see is first heard. They ignore the effect of smell on taste, or taste on smell, and their time would be much more profitably spent in thanking Providence that they are not called upon to endure afflictions than in making choice of which others should prefer. There is one point upon which the deaf and the blind will agree, whatever else they may differ about, and that is that either misfortune is easier to bear than the comments which people feel called upon to make about it.

Cheap Substitutes

BY HARRY COWELL

Holding, as I do, that serenity (high and habitual happiness) is the summum bonum; that character conditions serenity; that the love of man, the love of truth, and the love of beauty, are the chief components of happiness-bearing character: I think it well to examine critically some of the "cheap substitutes" wherewith the characterless attempt to buy "golden opinions of all men."

And first, of wealth. Are men of wealth necessarily men of worth? Are great fortunes more often produced than appropriated and inherited? Does the guileless, supersensitive soul, guided by the golden rule, reporting the quality of his goods with scientific exactitude, careful not to overreach his neighbor, tend to amass much money? Was not Jesus filled with a divine disgust for gold? Money is a good means, but a bad end. Gold is good when applied to the cultivation of character. Is it usually so applied? How much of all the wealth is spent for the soul; how much for the body? Cannot a person be considered apart from his possessions, as a rich man or a poor man?

Next, of "fine feathers." Clothes are being continually offered as a substitute for character. The best clothes are such as are at once most useful and most beautiful; but to superior souls the beauty of clothing is trivial, never sublime. "Consider the lilies of the field." Can any one imagine Jesus in a swallow-tailed coat, over-careful of the cut, and taking thought for the morrow wherewithal he should be clothed? But worth in a worn coat the world will as yet have none of.

Let us now go on to consider beauty of face and form. From a beautiful face to a beautiful character the inference is so natural that most men make it more than once in their lives where it is by no means justified by subsequent experience. Many fine featured persons consider the contemplation of their countenances such complete entertainment both for themselves and their fellows that the cultivation of the character seems to them a work of supererrogation—unnecessary for social salvation. The general form of a man's features lies beyond his control; not so with his character; and a certain modification of his features is effected by his character, which modification is called expression. This is the soul's work, and undoubtedly made the homely faces of Socrates and Lincoln seem divinely beautiful to their character-loving companions.

Can we speak of age in the same strain without offending? Let us hope so; but if not, we are more concerned with the telling of the truth than with its reception. The instinct of self-preservation we share with all life. Often the selfish live longer than the self-sacrificing. We may grow old without much worthy effort. If reverence be due to old age, then may the parrot take precedence of the patriarch, and many trees, of both. It is such quality of life, not such length, that is honorable. "A wise man's day is worth a fool's life." Here the inference is from opportunity to attainment, from age to wisdom; in short, to character. Not to age then, but to character, is our reverence due.

With some trepidation I proceed to speak of sex. I have not been taught that men should be revered because they are fathers, and belong to the male sex; but I have been taught to revere women because they are mothers and belong to the female sex. Should I then regard with reverence the lady pig because of her sex, which is female; and because of her numerous progeny, which prove her very much a mother? May not bad women also be mothers? Was not one "Margaret" the mother of a countyful of criminals? My reverence is held at a higher price, and cannot be so cheaply bought as by sex and motherhood. The noble woman do I revere, not for her sex, which she has in common with the beasts that perish, and by no effort on her part; but for her distinctly human qualities—not because of her motherhood, which also is common, but because she is a certain kind of mother.

He who declines to be obsequious to princes and potentates is ever deemed impudent. Yet should a man be loyal to character if a traitor to crowns. It takes a nice courtier to discover the worth of princes when they are pleased to travel incognito. May not a title descend to a scamp? Must a man be moral before he can possess a coat of arms? Seldom is a prince or peer responsible for his position; each should have honor in proportion to his character, if he have character in proportion to his opportunity. Are the holders of certain political positions correctly styled honorable? Are judges the embodiment of justice?

Do manners make the man? A lord bows in a certain stately fashion over a kid-covered hand; therefore he should possess without producing, and others should produce without possessing? This is not a fanciful, but an actual, argument. Courtesy which does not correspond to the feelings is a gilded lie. Let men deserve love, or else expect disapproval. Compare the frankness of Christ with the falseness of your fine gentleman.

Patriotism, which is often but enlarged egotism, perverts our appreciation of character. Being British, what need to bother about being a man! Many a patriot have I known who would lord it over archangels on the ground that they were aliens. Love worth; and if the spot of earth where you chanced to be born have more of worth than all other spots, let it have most of your love. Nobility is of no nationality. Are you not a citizen of this whole world and also of the world to come? Wherever your thought is, there is your country; and the nature of your thought determines whether that country be a dry and barren desert, or a bleak and bare mountain, or a rank malarial marsh, or a fair and fertile valley, full of flowers and delights.

The Saunterer

Because Hearst Is a Candidate

The influence of political alliances is far-reaching. It is but a short time now since a reconciliation between Mr. Hearst and Mr. Phelan took place, yet it has become noticeable that the Examiner has already altered its attitude toward the Bohemian Club. It will be interesting to note the various outcomes of this Hearst-Phelan alliance, for it is to be remembered that Mr. Phelan is president of the club against which the Examiner, with considerable right on its side, declared a deadly feud. The circumstances of the quarrel between the Examiner and the Bohemian Club are still fresh in our minds. At the time of the assassination of Mr. McKinley several clubs of the city declined to longer have the Examiner on the tables of their reading rooms, and the Bohemian Club was among the number. At that time all the Examiner men in the club resigned, and shortly after "The Family" club was organized with a view of alienating members of the Bohemian Club. Even though politics have made it expedient for Hearst to become friendly to President Phelan of the Bohemian Club, it is yet not likely that that friendliness, in any positive degree, will be extended to the organization of which Phelan is now the head. The outcome of the alliance, however, will be worth watching.

Phelan Again to the Front

Some time ago I predicted that notwithstanding the shortcomings of Jimmy Phelan's political past, before many years had elapsed he would be remembered only for the good that he had done. That my augury was not as chimerical as it seemed is evident from the fact that at this early date he is being seriously discussed as an available candidate for Mayor, and by people who are not unfamiliar with the public temperament. The local dailies have eschewed reference to the matter for the young multimillionaire has not been pardoned by all the publishers in the high towers, but San Francisco correspondents of interior papers have told of the impending renascence of the recently repudiated ex-Mayor. Of course Mr. Phelan has too much sense to test the fickleness of the public at this early date, and he would not be considered as an available man were it not for the fact that it is feared in Republican circles that Abe Ruef will control the next Republican convention and secure the nomination for Schmitz. It is believed that with Schmitz as the Republican candidate Phelan could divide the Republican vote, and stand a pretty good chance of dividing the labor vote, too. In other words it is believed by sane and sagacious political leaders that if Schmitz were the Republican nominee, James D. Phelan would be the most available man for the Democracy.

The Assurance of His Sponsors

Moreover those same political leaders are prepared to make a very strong argument in his favor. They say that he spends a small fortune when he makes a campaign, and that he is one of the best campaigners in town; Mammon is the most effective of all campaigners, and from experience Mr. Phelan has learned where the long green does the most good. They admit that his action in putting the police on the trucks during the teamsters' strike would be urged against him, but they say that with his glib tongue he would vindicate his conduct in a measure, south-of-the-slot, and that he wouldn't have to on the other side. They also admit, for the sake of argument, that he was the shiftiest man that ever occupied the Mayor's chair, that he was always playing both ends against the middle, that he made civil service a pretext for building up a political machine, that his conduct in the race-track matter was such as to justify Prince Poniatowski in saying that he was no gentleman, that he permitted the editor of the Examiner to name the Police Commission for the purpose of securing the Chief of Police, and then stole the Commissioners away from him, and that he proved himself, if you will, an arch schemer false to principle, untrue to the people, and ever ready to resort to tricks that even peanut politicians despise; yet they can come pretty near convincing you that Artful Jimmy would send Eugene back to the fiddle, if given the chance to exhibit his mettle.

Why He Is Strong

Their confidence is significant not alone of the disfavor in which the Schmitz-Ruef alliance is held, but also of the faith which people have in the power of wealth. They will confess any old indictment that Mr. Phelan's enemies may bring against him, and yet they will argue that he is not impossible as a candidate for Mayor. They point to the fact that notwithstanding the condemnation of his conduct in club circles at the time that he went back on his promise to Prince Poniatowski, and when he vetoed a measure that he had induced his friends in the Board of Supervisors to vote for, he has been honored by election to the Presidency of the Bohemian Club. If men who are presumed to have a high sense of honor regard the pungent political past of Mr. Phelan so lightly, why, it is asked, should the mob be expected to express its disapproval? Incidentally attention is called to the fact that Mr. Hearst has forgiven Mr. Phelan, and that the Examiner would not oppose him, and it is said that he has made social connections of late that insure him immunity from the abuse that might have been expected from the other tall towers.

He Was an Honest Mayor

And above all, it is argued, by his sponsors, that public memory is not retentive, and that the present Administration has been so bad that Phelan's friends have been busy contrasting it with his. They declare that if the newspapers had been as unfriendly to Schmitz as they were to Phelan they would have stirred up such resentment against the fiddler that he would long since have been run out of town on a rail. Whatever else Phelan did, he kept his appointees in such restraint that they never threatened to despoil the City Hall dome of its copper lining. Moreover he didn't put money into the pockets of the Spring Valley company, nor did he assist the lighting companies in their fight to maintain a monopoly at the expense of the public. The best thing that can be said of him is that he has enough money to be above temptation, yet I haven't heard anybody suggest his availability as an umpire to determine the rights of the employes of the street railroads. Yet he would undoubtedly be glad to accept the position. Meanwhile, though he is pleased with the confidence of his friends he has not the slightest inclination to shoo Schmitz back to the catgut. However he is as fond of the political pastime as ever, and a few weeks ago he sent word to his old-time followers to get together and fight for control of the machine. He assured them that the sinews of war would be forthcoming.

When Cissy Was Younger

In an interview with Ashton Stevens, the divinely fair Cecilia Loftus gave her age as twenty-six. No gentleman would dispute a woman's age, and what does it matter anyway, how many delightful summers have passed over the glorious head of the radiant Cissy? However, some time in the distant future, when the generation that first saw the versatile actress giving her imitations on the vaudeville stage shall have reached the sere and yellow leaf period, some contemporary stage-door Johnnie captivated by the perennial freshness of the English woman's charms may wonder whether she is really as young as she looks, and then, perchance, somebody might recall that in the year 1903 she had attained her twenty-sixth year. So, while she was about it Cissy might just as well have lopped off two or three more years, for no actress cares to be any older than she looks—on the remote side of the footlights. I have no desire to challenge the candor of Cecilia Loftus. For all I know she may have started out as an infant prodigy. My first recollection of her was as a mimic on a London stage many years ago, when Lily Langtry worked off a bon mot at her expense. She was then the wife of Justin McCarthy. One night when Mrs. Langtry was in the audience Cissy Loftus gave an imitation of her, and it was apparent domestic affairs would soon necessitate the temporary retirement of the clever mimic. Just as she finished her imitation of Mrs. Langtry the latter remarked, "I do hope that Cissy will give a good imitation of Justin McCarthy."

Nat Playing Solitaire

Ambition and cupidity play sad havoc with matrimonial relations in the histrionic profession. Here is Nat Goodwin, husband of one of the most beautiful women that ever trod the boards, touring the country unaccompanied by his statuesque spouse. The ravishing Maxime is off in other parts earning money and fame on her own hook. Mummers are beginning to emulate the decadents of society; they regard the marital relation as a pretext for getting far apart. I know that Daniel Frohman objects to wives having their husbands in the same company, and that he has separated many a loving couple, in the interest of the box office, but I do not think that he could force autocratic stars to bow to his stern decree should they prefer to remain together. Nat Goodwin, for instance, need not have separated from his beautiful wife, if both preferred to live as married people should. However, in stageland there is no more significance to a separation of husband and wife than there is in the effete society of Newport. When Nat and Maxine announced that they intended to star in separate orbits, somebody started the rumor that it was the beginning of the end; that a multi-millionaire was going to wed the luscious Maxine, but I have been assured that the story is without foundation.

Why They Parted

The separation of the comedian and the statuesque beauty is, I have been told, partly in the interest of the family exchequer, and mainly for the benefit of Mrs. Goodwin, who desires to be a star, and who knows that she could not achieve her ambition in the company of her husband. So the separation is a matter of expediency. Two stars in one family are better than one from a financial standpoint, and yet the Goodwins made a great deal of money together and are today quite wealthy. They could have remained together without fear of bankruptcy. They have a luxurious home in the East, and up to recently they maintained one in England, too. It was remarked one day not long ago that Maxine Elliott had everything that her heart desired whereupon a friend observed, "Yes, Nat has always been very good to his wives."

Apropos of the separation of married mummers I am reminded that Mr. Sothern and Virginia Harned were inseparable until after they established the relationship of husband and wife. It was marriage that opened their eyes to the advantages of starring alone. The same thing happened when Hackett wedded Mary Mannering, and when Robert Tabor became the husband of Julia Marlowe, and the separation of the latter resulted in a divorce. And such is the sequel, by the way, of nearly all the expedient separations in the theatrical profession.

Lines to Maxine

Before Maxine Elliott was married to Goodwin she was admired from a distance by all the Johnnies. They scarcely dared to approach the Juno-like and sarcastic beauty, however, though she received many "mash" notes which she pasted in a scrap-book and retailed for the edification of her friends. One of the cleverest of the sets of verses was written in San Francisco. It follows:

They say you have a scrap-book, fair Maxine,
More divine than any chap-book, dear Maxine,
Full of songs and roundelays,
That were written in your praise,
For in truth you're quite the craze,
Sweet Maxine.

You have set my heart on fire, tall Maxine,
But there are others who are prior, my Maxine,
Else 'till now I'd not have tarried,
Ere to you my love I carried,
But the fact is, I am married,
Loved Maxine.

That Divorce Story

The general talk of the impending divorce of Nat Goodwin and Maxine Elliott seems to have been founded on the general dramatic belief that a man must be divorced until he can prove himself married.

"You are divorced," the public said.
The actor smiled and shook his head.
"I still maintain a wife today,
To love, to honor and obey."

"You're separated, then," they said.
The actor frowned and shook his head.
"I am a true, domestic man;
I travel with her when I can,

'Tis simply Frohman, not the heart
That keeps my wife and me apart."
"You've surely quarreled," the public said.
The actor blushed and shook his head.

"I must confess our sole emotion
Is self-effacement and devotion."
The public said, with gestures frantic,
"God save your souls, how unromantic!"

The Aztec Jinks

The Bohemian Club is making great preparations for its Aztec jinks and expects to eclipse the notable achievement of last year. The managers of the affair expect to surpass in spectacular effects anything hitherto attempted by the club, and those who have read Louis Robertson's libretto in blank verse pronounce it a lyric masterpiece. The lake bed is to be the scene of the teocalli which was the truncated pyramid on which the Aztecs offered their living sacrifices. An elaborate drop curtain will fall behind it. The hillside where so many jinks have been held is to be abandoned for the nonce and the electric light effects will be something to be remembered. There was some talk of retrenchment this year, for the last jinks though beautiful were costly, and Jimmy Phelan is reported to have said that expenses must be reduced. But Dr. Jack Shiels, who is to be the sire of the occasion stoutly objects to the practice of economy and he says he is going to surpass all previous efforts if he has to mortgage the club pictures in the attempt.

Stewart and Joullin Disagree

There are to be some changes in the cast of last year, I hear. Jack Wilson, who forgot his lines on that memorable occasion, is to be Montezuma, and promises to be letter perfect. Dick Hotaling is to be the seer as he was last year and Bob Aitken, the sculptor, will again bare his many inches in delectable nakedness in the role of a young lover who is to be sacrificed on the top of the teocalli. The lover has a solo to sing, but as Aitken is not a vocalist the song will be sung behind the scenes by Donald Graham. And concerning this feature of the performance, by the way, there has been much good-natured discussion. Dr. Stewart, who is writing the music, and Donald Graham have always been warm friends, and one refuses to play in any one's back yard without the other. Dr. Stewart wrote the tenor solo of the lover especially for Graham's delightful voice which has often awakened the echoes of the grove with "Noel," but Amadee Joullin, who was to produce the scenic effects, objected to Graham in the part of the lover on account of his adipose. Dr. Stewart insisted however that Graham should sing the part, and as it was easier to supply a scenic artist than a composer Joullin the painter was obliged to withdraw, and Robert Aitken the sculptor was substituted. Aitken will be sure to design some novel effects though he has not had the experience of Joullin in such things.

Miss Dore and Miss Charlotte Dore will spend the summer in Santa Barbara.

A Social Strategist

Mrs. Eleanor Martin may not be the real, imported article according to the stringent standards of the Newport smart set, but she has certainly learned to keep tight rein on the snobs and toadies of our little society by much the same means employed by the elect of the Eastern oligarchy. She has sufficient Irish keenness to know the social weaknesses of human, and especially feminine, nature, and she has been a queen among toadies long enough to understand the manners and customs of the little animals. I am told that her reception or days at home are a revelation in her methods. She has mastered the first principle of social government, which is to keep people waiting, and this she employs variously, both in her own home and the homes of others. It is a proverb in society that to have Mrs. Martin on time one must bid her a half-hour earlier than the others, and even this does not always bring her in touch with the clock. It is also smilingly hinted over the teacups that her drawing-room on her days at home reminds one of the waiting room of a fashionable physician where well-dressed people whisper and yawn, and wait, and wait, and wait. Finally the good-natured regent wearing her hat sweeps into the room and holds a brief—very brief court. I am told that she fosters this pose to an almost reckless extent, and will remain upstairs on the most trivial business, apparently forgetting all about the anxious idolators waiting below; then, as the afternoon shadows lengthen she will remember her social obligations and descend. Mrs. Patrick Campbell is not the only one who has learned the gentle art of making people anxious.

A Superb Diplomatist

The fact is that Mrs. Martin is a great social strategist. She is easily the queen bee of the local smart set hive. She leads and others follow. It is interesting to study her methods. She has great faith in the potency of publicity, and though most society leaders affect an aversion for newspaper notoriety though they secretly court it, Mrs. Martin, who abhors dissembling, makes no effort to deceive people as to her aims. For instance, Mrs. Shorb White is a frequent guest at her functions, and that lady is the social gush writer of the evening Post. When she attends a Martin function she does so in her capacity as official reporter of the affair, though of course she has the entree to society. For a long time she was Mrs. Martin's chief boomer. But Mrs. Martin is sometimes anxious for a wider publicity than can be obtained through the services of one gush writer, as for instance the other day when she invited both Mrs. Shorb White and Mrs. Monroe Salisbury to the same function.

Two Gushers at One Feast

Now Mrs. Salisbury is a social leader herself. But she is something more; she writes the social gush for the Bulletin. For a long time the identity of Madame La Bavarde, the author of those Caesarian sentences in the Bulletin, was a dark secret, but now it is generally known not only in newspaperdom but throughout society. Why Mrs. Salisbury should desire to conceal the fact that she is of the literati I do not know unless it is because she is ashamed of her English. Writing for the press is as honorable an occupation as running a boarding house, or directing the social enterprises of the ambitious climber. Moreover it is a snap for a social leader to be the editor of a society gush column in a great daily; she can subserve her own interests while attending strictly to those of the newspaper that enjoys the inside information which she possesses. As Madame La Bavarde, Mrs. Salisbury has exceptional facilities for rose-strewing her own social path while attending to the work of booming her friends. Some of the smart set pretend to be much amused by the gush work of Madame La Bavarde, and they say that at times it is awful; but Mrs. Salisbury knows the weakness of the 400, and she appeals to it. And our good old friend Mrs. Martin, who as I said before abhors dissembling, boldly shows her appreciation of publicity by inviting the two gush writers to the same luncheon. That only other gush writer, the Chaperon of the Examiner, was not invited, but she isn't a press agent for the 400. She belongs to the Mission set and the lesser elite. Her columns are read only by the social pretenders of the common people, and she writes as though she is one of them.

Though Mrs. McLean Martin has often expressed her distaste for San Francisco as a place of residence she does not let her dislike extend to Santa Cruz. She arrived in town this week with her daughter, Katherine Martin, and met Theodosia, Mrs. Frank Grace, who with her husband came up from the South a few days ago. They will all go to Santa Cruz for the summer.

An Erratic Court

Though the wheels of justice that revolve on the top floor of the Parrott building are not well oiled the learned jurists manage pretty well to suppress evidence of friction. Last Wednesday those gentlemen gave an exhibition of ill temper that was most unusual, and it naturally surprised several members of the bar who had business before the court. But our Supreme Court is decidedly erratic. It does some astonishing things, as for instance the reinstatement of Horace W. Philbrook, the recalcitrant attorney, who was disbarred some years ago for grossly insulting a member of that august tribunal. Instead of showing signs of repentance after his disbarment Philbrook proceeded to revenge himself on the justices. He published pamphlets assailing them, he brought suits for damages against them, he dogged their footsteps, and he resorted to all sorts of schemes to harass and torment them. After annoying them for years he petitioned for reinstatement, and instead of expressing regret for his conduct and retracting the damaging statements he had made, he asked them to "right the wrong" that had been done him by the court. Much to the surprise of many people Mr. Philbrook was restored to favor.

Pursuit of Helen De Young

Some of the shrewd observers of the smart set whose favorite diversion is that of shadowing Dan Cupid believe that he has designs on Helen de Young, and that the consummation of his plans so far as she is concerned is soon to give society folks a more than ordinarily palatable morsel to roll on their tongues. Several of society's beaux have been very attentive to Miss De Young, and the keen observers have noted significant manoeuvres on the part of a millionaire bachelor who has been kept busy evading the nets of match-making mammas for years. But the fair Helen has kept the gossips guessing. However it is apparent that she has stimulated rivalry among the young men of the elite.

An Unconventional Heiress

Word having been passed that Miss Beryl Whitney is to spend a part of the summer in California, the few eligible youths left in society are brushing up their wits with view to making a conquest of young Parker Whitney's sister. It was about the time of Parker's unconventional marriage with Daisy Parrott that his sister was having her own little unconventional experience, of a different nature, at a smart Eastern boarding school, a rollicking escapade during vacation in which figured several other schoolgirls of equal social prominence and wealth. Miss Whitney's reputation for wit and daring having preceded her to the wild West, she is sure to be a belle at Del Monte, where her mother is at present staying. She will be an heiress, for her father's wealth is estimated at about five million dollars. The Whitney estate includes the twenty-two thousand acre ranch at Rocklin in Placer county, mines in Pueblo, and real estate in various parts of the United States.

The Busy Stork Again

Word comes to me from the East that the stork will shortly visit the home of Dr. and Mrs. Brownell, who are at present in Baltimore. Mrs. Ira Pierce has been with her daughter for some weeks, and Mrs. Cyrus Walker has gone East to be present when the expected event happens.

Wedded a Nome Lawyer

Word comes to me from the Frozen North that the statuesque beauty, Laura Meigs, who queened it at Belvedere for a season, married some time since one of Nome's most prominent lawyers. Her beautiful mother, who is if anything more attractive than her daughter, is however still a free widow. The younger girl, Lucile, has taken a position in one of the business houses of Nome. The Meigs's went to Nome among the first of the Cape pilgrims, but they returned after one season there. After a short residence here when Laura, who has literary ability, held a position on the Call, they again traveled Northward. They are Southerners and a most kindly, hospitable family. Hobson the hero is one of their cousins, and Mrs. Dorsey, the artist, whose recent divorce case is still remembered, is another cousin.

Lieutenant H. L. Roosevelt, stationed at Alongapo, Philippine Islands, a son-in-law of Judge Morrow of this city, has been promoted by the President to the position of Assistant Quartermaster on the staff of the Marine Corps, with the rank of Captain. In the list of promotions, Captain Roosevelt is at the head, in the rank of captains.

Pardee's Procrastination

Governor George C. Pardee is keeping a lot of Republican job-chasers on the anxious seat, and incidentally he is fomenting trouble for himself. Nearly every man that ever filled the gubernatorial office admitted at the close of his term that his greatest regret was that he procrastinated in the distribution of patronage. The reason is plain; the longer a vacancy exists the greater becomes the number of applicants for the job, and when the appointment is made every man that failed to get it feels that he has a grievance. By making appointments promptly the executive prevents soreheads from accumulating. Governor Pardee has deliberated over the Bank Commission for months, and the consequence has been that people that never thought of seeking one of the commissionerships have been bringing influence to bear on the Governor within the last few weeks in the hope of landing the job. The only explanation of Pardee's procrastination is that he did not wish to appoint certain men to whom he was under binding obligations, and that he kept the matter open to give their enemies ample time to assail them with a view of rendering them politically impossible. That trick is as old as the hills, and it is played quite often. No man is invulnerable against the attacks of enemies when he is after a political job. If he be kept in the limelight long enough somebody will produce evidence of his unfitness.

Views of Nathan Strauss

Mr. Nathan Strauss, the man chosen to settle the differences between the United Railroads company and its employes, is comparatively a stranger to people on this edge of the continent, but in the East he has long been known as one of the most distinguished of public-spirited citizens. His views on public questions are always eagerly sought for he always has something practical to suggest. In an interview in the New York Herald recently he pointed out to Democrats their duty under the existing conditions of the party and the Government. He said that a tariff for revenue with incidental protection is the true traditional Democratic policy, and that it should be made the distinctive issue of the next campaign. On the subject of a candidate he said, "Let the gentlemen with personal grievances keep them to themselves. The country is not interested as to who was right or who was wrong in the past. The people have no sympathy with factionists. They care nothing for past controversies that have long been closed and cannot be reopened."

The Last of the Quartet

When Frances Hopkins changes her name today to Mrs. Eugene Murphy, the last of the quartet of handsome Hopkins girls becomes a matron. Though Frances was only a cousin, she always seemed more like a sister to Helen, Edna and Georgie, with whom she was invited everywhere. She is a much more radiant beauty than the fair, pale Helen, who ranked as the queen-beauty of the quartet. She is a brunette with a plump figure and a beautiful neck and shoulders. Frances Hopkins is the daughter of Will Hopkins and a grandniece of the founders of the family fortune, Mark and Moses. Her father was not mentioned in Uncle Moses's will, chiefly, I have heard, because he never joined in with the family adoration of the millionaire. However, Mark was more kind to his independent nephew and left him a fat chunk of his fortune. The Will Hopkins's home is in Michigan, and Frances is said to have left several adorers lamenting when she made up her mind to marry Eugene Murphy. The latter is a grandson of "Marquis" Murphy, one of the founders of the firm of Murphy, Grant & Co. He is very young and not much taller than his fiancee, and though he hasn't much wealth he is ambitious. He studied law with Lent & Humphrey and was recently admitted to practice.

She Is Very Feminine

Dr. Anna G. Lyle is again at home from Europe and is at the Occidental. She bears her honors so lightly that one would scarcely fancy that this tall, charming blonde young woman was recently appointed to a professorship in the Vienna University. Miss Lyle is one of the most stunning looking Californian girls that ever went abroad, and she is quite as feminine a type of beauty as her sister Martha, Mrs. Pierre Humbert. She has the well-groomed look of the New York woman, and a marked British accent that does not go well with her avowed American heart. Though she has passed so much time abroad, Dr. Lyle is extremely patriotic and says she considers an American the superior of any other man.

Willis Polk to Return

It is reported that Willis Polk is about to return to San Francisco. He does not care for Chicago and wishes to remain here permanently. So there will be another era of artistic house building for San Francisco, but also—more's the pity—there will be chimneys that won't draw, as witness the Press Club jinks room. Polk never produces anything that is not artistic but he has a way of forgetting important things, such as the stairways to upper stories and little things like bathrooms and closets.

Damaged While He Slept

Because a Pullman car porter failed to perform the functions of an alarm clock for him Mr. Harrison Dibblee of San Rafael has brought suit for damages. As Mr. Dibblee is a representative of the elite of Ross Valley it may be set up by way of defence that he could not be awakened by the ordinary means employed to arouse a man from slumber. It might also be urged that nobody hailing from the drowsy village is ever thoroughly awake, and that when

Mr. Dibblee was snoring the porter believed him to be in his normal condition, and that it would be useless to disturb him. If the rule is to be established by which the Pullman company is to be held responsible for such laches on the part of its porters, then Colonel Henry I. Kowalsky need not bother himself any more about spurious heirs. It would pay him to spend all his time crossing the continent for the porter doesn't live that could keep the Colonel awake. But it isn't likely that the court will establish any such rule for it is a maxim of the law that it does not exact impossibilities, and how could Pullman porters be expected to wake passengers when they themselves spend all their time in slumber?

Dibblee's Missing Van Dyke

Mr. Harrison Dibblee, by the way, occasioned considerable gossip in Marin when he shaved off his stunning Van Dyke, which had invested him with a distingue air. When he first appeared in his undress-face his masculine friends were astonished and the feminine ones were shocked. The explanation of the facial metamorphosis was that the beard had aroused too much admiration, and that it was offered as a sacrifice on the altar of peace and harmony. It is incredible however, that a man would deliberately shed his beard to render himself less attractive. I am inclined to regard the explanation as a joke. Yet Mr. Dibblee's sister-in-law has been quoted as saying that while the danger was not entirely averted by the removal of of the wind-breaks it was at least minimized.

In Fair Helen's Train

If Paymaster Skipwith of the Marblehead does not capture one of our belles before long his failure will not be due to his being a laggard in love. Some months ago when the Marblehead was in port the young paymaster was most assiduous in his attentions to Lurline Spreckels, and the gossips of the smart set thought that the dashing young heiress showeed a marked preference for his society. At any rate it was believed that civilian beaux were de trop when the snug uniform of the navy was in sight. But Lurline went off to Paris, and the Marblehead steamed down to Central America to protect the interests of Uncle Sam. Once more the Marblehead is in port, and Paymaster Skipwith is capering nimbly as of yore and as though his heart were as light as ever. Miss Helen Dean is now the object of his attentions, and as a consequence the paymaster is such a frequent visitor to San Rafael that he has begun to assume the air of a commuter.

Egry's Clever Brother

Few except musicians know that one of the most brilliant performers in San Francisco, as well as one of the most exemplary of citizens, is the brother of the late Hungarian genius and Bohemian violinist, Paul Egry, who recently ended his reckless life with a bullet in his brain. The brother I refer to is Arthur Weiss, who is now cellist at Fischer's. It is characteristic that the living brother should have preferred the homely name of Weiss to the spectacular one of Egry. Weiss, however, is the surname he was born with, while that of Egry was taken by the roving brother for professional purposes. Both sons inherited their talent from their father who is a violinist. There is nothing of the Egry grand-stand in Weiss's playing, but he has both the technique and the temperament, and his more studious and temperate habits will probably take him farther than Egry ever could have gone with his fiery methods.

"I cannot understand why Slam should be regarded as a genius. I know him to be an ingrate, a cad and a bounder."

"Oh, you've merely observed some of his eccentricities."

Teddy's Impartial Boosting

Now that the university authorities are beginning to compare notes on the Presidential visit there seems to be a pretty general impression that Teddy can dispense pneumatic oratory with the best of them. It seems that upon his visit to Stanford University he made a speech there and referred to Dr. Jordan as a man whom he admired, not only personally, but whose philosophy of life and of action made him the beau ideal of American manhood, or words to that effect. This made the Santa Clara pedagogue swell with pride. Then Teddy went across to Berkeley, and pictured Dr. Benjamin Ide Wheeler as another hero of American manhood and the possessor of just about the admirable qualities which he had attributed to the Santa Clara valley pedagogue. Now it happens that there are not, from pole to pole, two more mathematically opposite men, in looks, dress and character than Jordan and Wheeler, and it is surely not soothing to their jealousy that they should have been swathed in hot air from the same mill. And the cynics in educational circles are still wondering if the President ran out of adjectives when he got through at Berkeley and whether he eulogizes all college presidents according to a set formula.

Jordan Disliked

The President's skill as a hot air artist was under discussion at Berkeley the other day, and a friend tried to console President Wheeler by remarking, "Well, you know that the President is your friend anyway." The speaker didn't add that it was known that Roosevelt was not Jordan's friend, but it is the knowledge of that fact which imparted the hot-air flavor to the President's remarks at Berkeley. Nothing that Roosevelt did on his whole trip occasioned half the surprise that his eulogy of Dr. Jordan provoked, for all the members of his party knew that he cordially disliked the President of Stanford. He believes that Jordan abused his confidence ever since the publication of an interview with the Palo Alto pedagogue in which the latter quoted the President as saying that his predecessor was a jelly-fish President. Jordan repudiated the interview but Roosevelt always believed him guilty.

"Do you think you'll accept him if he proposes?"

"Well, it all depends on whether he will give me time to get used to his face."

Contributing to Her Father's Relief

Professor Syle, late of the University of California, clings to the belief in the country sanatorium where he is suffering that he is pursued by a nemesis. Whether he is right in that surmise and whether that nemesis is directed by one of the most influential members of the faculty at Berkeley, as several of his friends believe, is a question over which there is much wrangling across the bay. Certainly the misfortunes that followed Professor Syle immediately after those satirical lines appeared, have continued till at last they are striking at the members of his family through him. His daughter is now working in a bakery in Oakland and is contributing all she can to maintain the family home in Berkeley and help defray her father's expenses at the sanatorium. Her mother taught her housekeeping and she has turned the teachings to account by furnishing a specialty in fine cakes to the place where she is employed. She is considered a very pretty girl and far above the average in intelligence. Of late she has been turning her attention to magazine work and within the last few months she has had articles in Munsey's and the Cosmopolitan. Her friends expected great things of her had she been permitted to follow up this talent under more favorable circumstances, but now under the stress of her father's troubles and lack of time owing to other employments she is obliged to turn out rush work at the expense of her literary judgment.

Wrangling Over the Question

The question of who wrote those satirical lines for which Professor Syle is suffering banishment from scholastic positions, according to his friends, is still a matter of warm debate in the university town. Professor Syle was given a year's vacation soon after they were found posted on the college campus; this leave was virtually his dismissal for very soon afterwards he was dropped from the faculty. Professor Ardley, who was suspected of having a hand in the clever screed, found it best to retire about the same time. Professor Syle thought he would have no difficulty in getting a position in the East. Indeed when he first went East he was warmly welcomed at a number of big institutions and several of them extended him invitations to give a series of special lectures. Everything looked exceedingly bright for a good position on the faculty of one of the leading universities when suddenly its attitude towards him changed, as did that of the others who had publicly invited him to deliver the lectures. His friends claimed that word had been sent on from the west to "blacklist Syle" and that the man who sent it had influence enough to make the request effective. Not long ago there was a chance to test this claim of his friends that he is being systematically hounded out of positions; he was offered a good place in a prominent high school in this State. It is said he would have declined it. At any rate he was taken to the hospital under nervous collapse while his friends were discussing the matter.

A Shocking Invasion

The aristocrats of Ross Valley are greatly perturbed over the influx of the polloi who are threatening to impart to the exclusive village a plebeian atmosphere akin to that of Mill Valley. They have swarmed over the green slopes of Ross in droves, and they have polluted the air with the pungent odors of their camping outfits. The sacred landscape has been desecrated, and the aristocrats are horrified. Moreover it is painful to them to be compelled to ride in the narrow gauge cars with the trades people from town, and I hear that they have asked the management of the North Shore road to provide a special car for the exclusive use of the permanent residents of Ross, and it is said that if the request be denied they will withdraw their patronage and drive over to Greenbrae where they can connect with the blue-blooded seven-fifty from San Rafael on the California and Northwestern road.

The death of Mrs. J. W. Havens was particularly sad. She had everything to live for, and her life was at its brightest point. Gertrude Goewey was a very clever girl, highly cultured and she had traveled a good deal. When she married, about a year ago, it was a surprise to her friends, for she had always said she enjoyed her free bachelor-maid existence too much to change. Her husband is heartbroken at her loss.

Too Much Christian Science Alleged

The friends of Mrs. Havens, across the bay, were shocked over her sad death, and many of them are of the opinion that if she had received proper treatment her life would have been saved. But it is not unusual for people to rush to that conclusion when loved ones have passed away. Frequently when an illness has a fatal ending there are friends or relatives of the deceased who believe that if some treatment had been resorted to quite different from the one that failed, the life of the unfortunate would have been saved. Consequently the gossip anent the death of Mrs. Havens is not surprising, though it is exceptionally spirited and at times rather severe. Some of the friends of Mrs. Havens say that too much reliance was had upon Christian Science in her case, and that the representatives of the medical fraternity were summoned when it was too late. Gertrude Goewey inherited considerable property from her father before her marriage to John Havens, who is the nephew of the rich Mrs. Shattuck of Berkeley. Some two months ago she gave birth to a son, and her illness dated from that event, which was a great shock to her constitution. Her condition went from bad to worse, and the young wife and mother faded away in an astonishing manner. Mrs. Shattuck, I believe, has great faith in the efficacy of Christian Science, and it is probably due to that circumstance that there is so much gossip over the case.

Some of the Week's Weddings

Society had many weddings to attend this week, but none could complain of lack of patronage. Grace church was crowded on Wednesday night when Miss Ermine Louise Thompson was united to Samuel Mountford Wilson. The bride looked lovely, as did her sister, the matron-of-honor, Mrs. Elmore Leffingwell, and the bridesmaids. Miss Ethel Boechtel, one of the bridesmaids, is a strikingly handsome girl and looks very much as her mother did at her age. Miss Ruth Clarke is also a very attractive young girl. She is a daughter of the Alfred Clarkes.

Also a Wednesday wedding, but quietly celebrated on account of the bride's family being in mourning, was that of Miss Kate Clement and Dixwell Hewitt. The bride was in the regulation costume, and looked stately and charming. The Hewitts will live in San Francisco.

A Slanderer's Apology

It appears that I was mistaken in assuming that Supervisor S. Pestiferous Braunhart believed what he said when he publicly charged contractor Harry Gray with having debauched public officials. It was a grave charge to make, and uttered by a member of the Board of Supervisors it seemed to bear the seal of authority. No decent or responsible citizen would make such an accusation unless he were prepared to offer evidence in corroboration of his statement. However, familiar as I am with the record of the slanderous Braunhart, I should never have credited him with the least of the finer qualities that distinguish gentlemen from cads. Two weeks after uttering the accusation Braunhart addressed a letter to the board afflicted with his membership, in which he stated that he had no knowledge of the Gray brothers ever having acted in an illegitimate manner in their dealings with "this Board"; also that his attack was provoked by "an unwarrantable reflection" on his "veracity and good faith." What a shameful confession to make! And incidentally how ridiculous! Here we find Sammy confessing that he is a malicious liar and at the same time pleading in extenuation of his wanton slander that it was provoked by an "unwarrantable" attack on his veracity. A somewhat paradoxical plea, to say the least. Incidentally I should suggest to Mr. Harry Gray that while he is about it he should procure a more comprehensive apology. Braunhart originally charged that Gray had been debauching Supervisors for years, and that he was ready and willing to corrupt the incumbents. In his letter he merely states that he knows nothing about any illegitimate dealings with "this Board."

The Countess Called a Halt

When the Count de Castelmenardo favored an American heiress with his title, he was probably laboring under the delusion that he could spend as much of her money as he pleased, but the Countess has a tight hold on the purse-strings. She has the title, and now she regulates the family finances as she deems proper. The other day it was stated in the despatches that she had published a notice in a New Jersey paper that she would be responsible for no bills that she had not authorized. And then she sailed away with her title for Buenos Ayres leaving the Count at Hackensack to ponder his hard luck. If a few more of our title-laden heiresses were to follow the example of the countess, foreign fortune-hunters would be more cautious when searching for rich game. The Countess is a woman of pluck and independence. She visited this city about three years ago after an interesting experience in the Klondike. She was then Edith Van Buren, and she is the daughter of General Thomas B. Van Buren, and a niece of William Walter Phelps. Some years ago she caused a good deal of talk in Europe by visiting a number of fashionable watering places without a chaperon. Her Gibsonian type of beauty attracted much attention, but despite her pulchritude and her wealth she managed to remain single until she was thirty-five or thereabouts. Three years ago she went to the Klondike with Mrs. Raymond Hitchcock and they staked out a claim near Dawson. They became very popular with the miners, and they separated in a huff. Subsequently Miss Van Buren wrote a book entitled, "Two Women in the Klondike." Then she started on a tour of the world, and she met the Count and wedded him in Nice.

The Tullys in Clover

After a New York season which many a Californian writer would give his eyes for Richard Tully and Mrs. Tully (Eleanor Gates) have come quietly back for a rest in their native State and are spending their summer in Berkeley near the university from which they graduated. Mrs. Tully's summer has been made the more glad by the fact that she has been offered a five thousand dollar guarantee for another novel of the same nature as the "Biography of a Prairie Girl," which gave her immediate literary standing. The book was written on the advice of the Century Company and its order came like manna from heaven to the then struggling young graduate from California. When she first went to New York she saw an editor of the Century personally, and offered him the manuscript of a short sketch which later formed one of the chapters of the volume. The man looked over the copy, but before he had read many pages he shocked her seriously by saying, "The Century will publish this and we would like you to give us several more like it and let us bring them out in book form." The young woman was overwhelmed for a moment by this lightning-stroke of luck, for she had come expecting to face the traditional editorial coldness, and so much success all at once was quite unnerving to a girl of little or no previous literary experience. The order, however, was a renewed inspiration to her, and she went home and wrote like mad until the book was completed and the copy was in the hands of the printer. The play, "The Strenuous Life," which Tully has sold and which is being produced in the East is founded on "James Wobberts, Freshman," the college farce which was so successful at Berkeley that it was produced in the Grand Opera House by a student company and played to packed houses for several nights.

Ferry, Not Bridge, Whist

The Tiburon ferry commuters have sought to beguile the tedium of their twenty-five minute, bi-daily scoot across and back, by organizing a whist club, where a peculiarly virulent type of bumble-puppy is kept on exhibition for all comers, catch as catch can; rules—razzle, dazzle; time limit—the trip; stakes—five cents a point, stand and deliver. A committee, in emulation of certain London clubs, is now discussing the advisability of limiting the amount of winnings permitted to any one player in a given week to twenty-five hundred dollars, but Dr. George H. Powers, who has been known to win as much as one dollar and fifteen cents in two trips, and "Uncle Joe" Matoon are violently opposed to the change and to all change, except small change.

Game Protection With a String to It

The members of the Country Club, the Tamalpais Sportsmen's Association and devotees of rifle and scatter-gun generally are complaining bitterly of the contemplated action of the Marin Supervisors in proposing to shorten the season for deer to two months and the quail and duck season to three. The present State law, adopted at the last session of the Legislature, after much pow-wowing, allows three and one-half months' deer shooting and four months for birds, and members of shooting clubs aver that these restrictions are amply sufficient to insure the protection and preservation of the game. But what exasperates the respectable sporting element above all things is the fixed idea, for it is more than a suspicion, that this draconian ordinance is aimed entirely at them and is not intended for home consumption. They point to the fact that during the past two seasons the administration of the game laws in Marin has been turned over by the Supervisors to a club

How He Knew

Yo may talk as you will about the snobbery of army officers, but the good fellowship extended to the only colored captain at the Presidio is all that even President Roosevelt would require. It was this officer who recently crowded Lieutenant Lowenberg and his fair young bride out of their quarters, this being the privilege of his rank; but the act did not detract from his popularity, as the colored captain when he took the Lowenberg cottage was simply acting on orders "from above." He is a West Pointer and is universally regarded as one of the best officers in the service. Shortly after his return from the Philippines, it is said, one of his rhookies returned tipsy from the city and was overheard calling the captain a "darned fool." He was dragged before a court-martial for the offense and a witness called who overheard the remark. "Did you hear the defendant call the Captain a darned fool?" asked the Judge Advocate. "Yes sah, yes sah!" replied the black positively. "Quote the words of the defendant exactly," went on the inquisitor. "He sayed, sah, 'He's a da'n fool.'" "Well, how do you know that he meant the Captain?" was the next question. "Well, I cutn'ly knew he wuz meaning de Capting, cause I took a look round an' de Capting, sah, war de only da'n fool I done see."

It Was a Servian Feud

The correspondents of the dailies appear to think that the Servian tragedy was the result of an outburst of local passion against the person of Queen Draga. The fact is that it was the culmination of long years of intrigue carried on against the reigning family by the rival claimants to the Servian throne. Moreover it is a case of the sins of the father being visited on the son. An ancestor of the Karageorgevitchs who led the revolt against the Turks in 1804 was assassinated by order of Milosch Obrenovitch, an ancestor of Alexander, who had supplanted him after he had been forced to take refuge in Austria. From then to the night of the assassination of Alexander and Draga, the Karageorgevitches have carried on intrigue from Vienna and other European capitals against their successful rivals, but it was only in recent years that they were given encouragement by the Servian army.

Favored the Pickle Man

According to my Far Eastern correspondent, Miss Bertha Runkle, the author of "The Helmet of Navarre," was disappointed on learning that her novel was unknown to the literature of Japan, but from private correspondence I learn that in the English and American colonies of Hong Kong she was lionized almost as much as she was in this city last winter. Among her most ardent admirers were an English nobleman and an American millionaire pickle manufacturer. Notwithstanding her romantic temperament she appeared to favor the suit of the pickle man.

On the Wrong Track

The citizens of that once popular seaside resort, Santa Cruz, are awakening from their lethargy. They are putting forth festive signs of life, and the long-closed shutters of her cottages are to be flung wide to the sunlight. They have decided to lure the joy-seeker by employing the seductive charms of the Heavenly Maid. In other words they are going to spend their money on brass bands, and judging from the list of those engaged for the season, it won't be hard to interpret what the indignant wild waves that lave the northerly shore of Monterey bay are saying in the good old summer time. I predict that when some of those bands begin to play, Major McLaughlin will be driven from his majestic home on the hill, and that Governor Jeter will apply for a writ of injunction. Those dear, unsophisticated citizens of Santa Cruz are proceeding the wrong way round. Raucous brass bands are not what the somnolent seaside burg needs to stimulate the summer traffic. Get together, good citizens, and build a first-class hotel, in spacious grounds, and put it in charge of a hotel man, and then people will go to Santa Cruz as of yore and spend their money. Ten years ago Santa Cruz was up to date. Now it's ten years behind the times. It has stood still while other resorts have been bidding for the fashionable trade.

Teddy Was Bucked Off

The pen-slashing of the Yosemite Park Commissioners inflicted by my friend Elwyn Hoffman stirred the choler of those gentlemen in a way that prompted them to hold an indignation meeting. Jack Wilson was the most aggrieved of the bunch, and he was thinking of doing something desperate, such as instituting a libel suit against this paper, or having Mr. Hoffman arrested for slander, but Billy Foote, who has had great and varied experience with newspaper critics, advised him to go slow. "You may be able to prove that you're a good Commissioner," said Foote, "but you never can tell what matters may be deemed pertinent to the issue." So the indignant Wilson calmed himself. The Commissioners say that they have been grossly misrepresented by the newspaper stories concerning events in the Valley during the President's visit. They say that they exploded dynamite just to give the visitors some conception of the remarkable echoes during thunder storms and that the President and his companions marveled at the effect, and were delighted. Incidentally the Commissioners tell some funny stories about the President. They say that despite his boasted horsemanship he was bucked off the nag that he rode, and experienced a head-on collision with a snow bank. Billy Foote says that Teddy made him tired by calling for his warbag as soon as he entered the valley. "I think," said Foote, "it was the same bag he had at San Juan hill." Billy has never forgiven Teddy for appointing colored men to office in the South.

Berkeley Club's Personnel

Mrs. Frank M. Wilson, the president of the Town and Gown Club of Berkeley, is visiting in Chicago, and upon her return the members of her club expect to be entertained with an account of how they manage women's clubs in the city of grime. Mrs. Wilson is a very keen observer and has a bright manner of placing her facts in sentences. It was not she, however, who got off the famous witticism that went the rounds of Berkeley when the Town and Gown Club was first established. One of the members, a university matron if I remember rightly, was asked who formed the membership roll.

"Oh," she answered, "it is composed of ladies from the university set and women of the town."

The clubman to whom this information was vouchsafed thought the mot too good to keep to himself and it speedily passed into history.

Ethel and Leontine

Miss Leontine Blakeman is having "lots of clothes made," as her friends put it. They are wondering if there is any truth in the saying that dumb things tell tales. Leontine's cousin Ethel, by the way—Mrs. Tomlinson—is not coming to San Francisco this summer. And she denies that her mother may be a grandmother before the year is over.

Piloted by Cupid

A pretty little romance in the nature of a Utah elopement ended in this city last Friday when Miss Ida M. Ostlund became the bride of Dr. Allen Zimmerman. The doctor is a well known dentist in Salt Lake City. Some months ago business called him to Logan, a near by town. There he met Miss Ostlund, the daughter of a prominent and well-to-do retired merchant, with ideas of his own regarding his daughter's future. After the first meeting between the young people Dr. Zimmerman found various business excuses for visiting Logan. Last month Miss Ostlund came here to visit relatives. A little while later the doctor, too, came to this city—not to visit relatives but to cultivate relatives—and he and Miss Ostlund were quickly married. The next day, Saturday, they sailed for Honolulu on their wedding trip. On their return—well, by the time they return they are hoping that Papa Ostlund will give them his parental blessing.

Fresno is now at its usual summer white heat and those residents who can do so are escaping to the mountains, seaside and springs. Mr. and Mrs. Lee L. Gray arrived at Byron Springs this week. Mrs. Gray is as pretty as when she was Blanche Verdenal, and made her debut in New York society under the wing of her mother, Mrs. D. F. Verdenal, wife of the Examiner's Gotham correspondent. Her elder sister, Lottie, also married a Fresno man, Colonel William Forsyth. Others at Byron this week are Mr. and Mrs. Tom Clunie, F. C. Hotaling, Samuel Sussman, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Crossitt, W. D. English, Mr. and Mrs. George Melbourne of Victoria, B. C., and Mrs. Kate B. Davis of Boston.

The Hegira Del Montewards

The vexed question has been settled as to Pearl Landers's choice of an outing-place this summer. She will go to Del Monte. Mr. and Mrs. Parker Whitney will also summer at Del Monte, with Mrs. Whitney mere. The Jack Parrotts and family will be at the hotel all season. At present among those at Del Monte are John W. Twiggs, J. J. Moore, W. W. Wagner, Miss Flood, Miss Maynard, Mrs. M. Irvine, Mrs. I. H. Lewis and J. W. Byrne. Of course because Miss Flood and Mr. Twiggs both find Monterey interesting at the same time the gossips are again busying themselves in prophesying an engagement.

A Breezy New York Letter

The following is from a San Francisco newspaper man sojourning in New York:

At a recent graduation exercises of a New York medical school the statement was made by one of the physician speakers that in the near future neither the middle west nor the far west would send students to the New York colleges, "not on account of superior development in the West," as he phrased it, "but on account of the utter demoralization of the youth from Harlem to the Battery." One of the atrabilious papers took up the declaration of the medico and propounded several leading questions to him, the most startling of which was: "Is New York morally worse than San Francisco?" The man of pills and scalpel withdrew within his shell, fearing the notoriety of a discussion in the daily press, but a reporter with boring propensities squeezed out a reply. It ran as follows: It is ridiculous to place San Francisco on the same moral plane with New York. I know the Western city, its sinks of inquity and the much bruited looseness of conduct of its men and some of its women. The French restaurants of San Francisco are known the world over and they may be pernicious institutions. At any rate such vice as exists in the Western city is cloaked and covered and its women are all presumably virtuous. That does not hold in New York. Take the great "White Light" district, Broadway from Twenty-third street to Forty-sixth and the tenderloin section, and what do you meet at every step? Here are the theatres and to work your way from car to lobby a path must be cut through a pack of femmes du pave. Ride in any street car at any time of the day, walk down your best avenues, and what do you find? The women of the half world and others of a lower cast brushing elbows with the best and the purest. There is no distinction in dress or in locality. The two polar classes may almost be said to mingle and this it is that is so disheartening to the parent who wishes his son or daughter to come to the great metropolis to study. More than one editorial in the great New York papers are promised on account of the doctor's lament. But what cares the New Yorker? He is too busy to take such matters seriously.

* * * * *

Rumor has it that W. R. Hearst will return to New York much earlier than the date set upon at the time of his departure with bride and suite. When he left New York he said he would not be back until November but those who know some of his private affairs are preparing for his home coming in August. There is no question that there will be a shaking up in the New York office. Everybody expects it and great disappointment would result should the even-tempered violence of the Journal's methods remain undisturbed. And some very important changes are promised for the Examiner at the end of the summer season. Mr. Hearst is now in Northern Italy making the best of his honeymoon.

Hermann Oelrichs, fresh, ruddy and to the unflattering eye, corpulent, arrived on the Kaiser Welhelm der Grosse on Tuesday. One of the New York papers said he was going to San Francisco to look after the completion of his four million dollar hotel, the Fairmount, just as if Hermann Oelrichs had only business interests in San Francisco. Mr. Oelrichs's affection for the city is sincere. In fact it is his home. His voyage across the Atlantic was a jolly one. Some of his fellow passengers were old-time friends such as Levi P. Morton, Captain Richardson Clover, former naval attache to the American Embassy at London, Adolph Lewisohn and President Baker of the Atlantic Transport Line. E. H. Harriman, now midway across the Atlantic, left on Tuesday on the Kronprinz Wilhelm, minus his vermiform appendix. He laughed at the operation which freed him from the good-for-nothing, functionless attachment. "At present I'm not even interested in stock operations, let alone surgical ones," he said just before boarding the ship at Hoboken. "As for N. P., S. P. or U. P., I am not going to give them a thought. My vacation will be a vacation. The automobile's the thing and I shall try them through France, Germany and other continental countries before my return."

William Haber, son of Joseph Haber of San Francisco, has received an interne's position at Mount Sinai Hospital on account of an exceptional high standing in competitive examinations. This hospital wil soon move to its new quarters in Fifth avenue, a few blocks from the magnificent three million five hundred thousand dollar Carnegie home. The Mount Sinai hospital, when ready for occupancy will be the most thoroughly equipped in America. Its location is the finest in New York city, in Fifth avenue opposite the park.

Complaint of the Fair Amouress

(Translated from the French of Francois Villon and published by request)

I.

Meseemeth I heard cry and groan
  That sweet who was the armourer's maid:
For her young years she made sore moan,
  And right upon this wise she said;
  'Ah fierce old age with foul bald head,
To spoil fair things thou art over fain;
  Who holdeth me? who? would God I were dead!
Would God I were well dead and slain!

II.

'Lo, thou hast broken the sweet yoke
  That my high beauty held above
All priests and clerks and merchant-folk;
  There was not one but for my love
  Would give me gold and gold enough
Though sorrow his very heart had riven,
  To win from me such wage thereof
As now no thief would take if given.

III.

'I was right chary of the same,
  God wot it was my great folly,
For love of one sly knave of them,
  Good store of that same sweet had he;
  For all my subtle wiles, perdie,
God wot I loved him well enow:
  Right evilly he handled me,
But he loved well my gold, I trow.

IV.

'Though I gat bruses green and black,
  I loved him never the less a jot;
Though he bound burdens on my back,
  If he said "Kiss me and heed it not,"
  Right little pain I felt, God wot,
When that foul thief's mouth, found so sweet,
  Kissed me—Much good thereof I got!
I keep the sin and the shame of it.

V.

'And he died thirty year agone.
I am old now, no sweet thing to see;
By God, though, when I think thereon,
  And of that good glad time, woe's me,
  And stare upon my changed body
Stark naked, that has been so sweet,
  Lean, wizen, like a small dry tree,
I am nigh mad with the pain of it.

VI.

'Where is my faultless forehead's white,
  The lifted eyebrows, soft gold hair,
Eyes wide apart and keen of sight,
  With subtle skill in the amorous air;
  The straight nose, great nor small, but fair,
The small carved ears of shapliest growth,
  Chin dimpling, colour good to wear,
And sweet red splendid kissing mouth?

VII.

'The shapely slender shoulders small,
  Long arms, hands wrought in glorious wise,
Round little breasts, the hips withal
  High, full of flesh, not scant of size,
  Fit for all amorous masteries;

* * * *
* * * *
* * * * *

VIII.

'A writhled forehead, hair gone grey,
  Fallen eyebrows, eyes gone blind and red,
Their laughs and looks all fled away,
  Yea, all that smote men's hearts are fled;
  The bowed nose, fallen from goodlihead;
Foul flapping ears like water-flags;
  Peaked chin, and cheeks all waste and dead,
And lips that are two skinny rags:

IX.

'Thus endeth all the beauty of us.
  The arms made short, the hands made lean,
The shoulders bowed and ruinous,
  The breasts, alack! all fallen in;
  The flanks too, like the breasts, grown thin;

* * * * *
* * * * *
* * * * *

X.

'So we make moan for the old sweet days,
  Poor old light women, two or three
Squatting above the straw-fire's blaze,
  The bosom crushed against the knee,
  Like fagots on a heap we be,
Round fires soon lit, soon quenched and done;
  And we were once so sweet, even we!
Thus fareth many and many an one.'

M. Edmond Rostand has been admitted to the Academie Francaise, and yet it was only the other day that a Chicago judge decided that he was a plagiarist.

"Parsifal" is really to be presented in New York. Manager Conreid paid no attention to Frau Wagner's protests, but went calmly on with his preparations.

"You say that a few years ago he was poor, and that now he is rich and that he is a self-made man. How did he get his start?"

"He was a walking delegate for the Building Trades' Council."

The Glad Summer Time

Showing that "Where to go for the summer" is not always happily answered by believing the glowing terms of advertisements and "hearsays."

I.

Fernwood, June tenth.

My dear Anne,

I knew you would be pleased to hear that we are settled in Fernwood, and taking nerve tonics on account of the excitement here. We have a hammock and Lillie is stretched therein reading. No one spoke to us last night—the day of our arrival—but Lillie got out her guitar and we sang and had a good time by ourselves. This morning every one thawed and came and talked to us—all the women, I mean. The men left on the train last night. There are some more coming next week. We leave on Monday—you know how it always is.

This morning Lillie and I were on the see-saw, and then we went to the swings and hoisted our dresses up to keep them out of the dirt. We were swinging towards the sun when a young man came out from the trees and asked us about the picnic grounds. I wanted to ask him how he liked the flowers on my stockings but he went away, and I suppose it is for good.

The weather is grand. The swimming tank is empty and the dance-hall is closed. We are going for a walk now, and to mail our letters, for there's no other amusement in sight.

I think Lillie and I will go to Outremer or Villa Blank in August. I hear they have tennis and pingpong and golf there—and men. Don't think we are unhappy here. We are having a nice, peaceful time and accumulating flesh.

Yours mountainously, Beatrice.

II.

Outremer, June tenth.

Dearest Beatrice,

I suppose you and Lille are having a gorgeous time in the mountains. I am rather sorry I did not go with you. We reached here two days ago, and haven't seen a man since our arrival except one old Papa and a man with rheumatism. Mamie and I went in bathing this morning, and my face is a sight. I have cold-creamed it, however, and besides I don't care much as there is no one here to look pretty for. We sit on the beach, eat and read and bathe, and that's about all. I think Mamie and I'll move on to Fernwood or Villa Blank in a month or so. They say they have any number of attractions there—MEN.

Yours seashorely, Anne.

III.

Villa Blank, June tenth.

Dear Anne,

Please forward this to Beatrice after you read it. I'm simply too brain-fatigued to write more than is necessary to get return letters. Flora and I have been here a week and have talked ourselves out, read every paper-covered novel in sight, played pingpong until we hated the look of a ball, exhausted tennis and golf—and are now ready to go. Only we have paid a month's board in advance (they knocked off some because we did), and will have to see it out. If you were thinking of coming here, don't. Why, girls, Flora and I are simply wild because we didn't go to Fernwood or Outremer. We hear that those places are the most fascinating spots and simply crowded with masculines. Condole with us, up here, with twenty women boarders beside ourselves and the only man the Chinese cook. Well, we will surely try the mountains or seashore when we get away from here.

The Society Woman, the Dancing Bear and the Lion that Wouldn't Roar

A Fable.

A Society Woman with a Penchant for entertaining Celebrities of every kind once invited a Visiting Author to dine at her Palatial Home. The Author, who did not know this particular woman from Eve, thought he might as well Accept her Bid, because after all a Good Dinner anywhere is not to be despised.

Therefore upon the Date of the Dinner, the Visiting Author showed up in his Happiest Rags. He found himself one of Nineteen Guests, and his place was at his hostess's Right Hand.

The Society Woman did her Best to make the Author talk, but he preferred to Eat. The other guests sat Silent waiting for the Celebrity to drop a few Epigrams and set the Pace for them. But he ate in almost absolute Silence and so the dinner took on the Aspect of a Quaker Meeting. No one dared be the first to speak. Even Champagne failed to Loosen Tongues.

When they adjourned to the Drawing Room, the Author was still wrapped in Meditation. The apres-diner promised to be about as Serious an affair as the meal itself.

But among the guests was a Foolish Youth who had a pair of Clever Feet. The Youth was in the habit of doing Ballet Stunts for his friends, and he had quite a reputation as a Carmencita and Belle Baya.

When he found that the Society Woman's program for the evening had not been Laid Down, the Foolish Youth suggested that they have some Music.

"But as an Author is the Guest of Honor," deprecated the Hostess, "I thought a conversational evening would about cover the bill."

"So it would," returned the Foolish Youth, "only no one seems willing to start the program."

To pass the time before the conversation should begin, therefore, he took the floor and gave a Pas Seul of not much Grace but considerable Originality and Abandon. In a short time the company began to Brace Up, and before an hour had gone by they were all doing Cake Walks, the Visiting Author applauding with both Hands and Feet.

The moral to this is that it is better, for social purposes, to be a Dancing Bear than a Lion that Won't Roar.

Automobile Topics

San Francisco was rather slow to take to the automobile, but the tentative period has passed. At first the wiseacres predicted that the motor car would never come into general use in this city, on account of our hills. They were regarded as insurmountable obstacles destined to ever stay the popularity of the motor car, but those proud eminences have long since ceased to be regarded with aversion by the chauffeur, and people that otherwise would be inclined to take to the auto are not deterred from doing so by reason of the fact that San Francisco is not a dead level. One day last week it was demonstrated by Mr. Lee, the manager of a local agency, that the grade of California street between Kearny and Stockton is not too great to be overcome by the power of a very small machine. He ascended it with two passengers and in the middle of one block turned the auto around and backed up for a short distance.

The automobile industry has made great strides in this city within the last few months. It has been going ahead by leaps and bounds, and a great deal of capital is to be invested in it within the immediate future. Two or three companies are now in process of organization, the purpose of which is to deal in mobes, and to carry on a general business incident to the trade. So important is the industry destined to become that it is a matter of only a short time when the Park Commissioners will be forced by public sentiment to recede from their attitude of antagonism toward the up-to-date mode of travel. In all the large cities of the world the automobile is recognized as the vehicle of the day. Prejudice is rampant against it only along the cowpaths. It is admitted into Central Park, New York, along all the drives, and the only park in which limitations are enforced is our own Golden Gate. However the prejudice of our Commissioners is easily accounted for. The automobile has not yet thrust the horse into the background in this city and lovers of horseflesh are so partial to the equine that they think the animal should be shown every consideration. But in more enlightened communities the auto and the horse are dividing the honors. The animal and the motor are entering upon friendly terms. In all parts of the country the auto men are seeking to educate the horse up to a recognition of the right of the mobe, and they are bidding fair to win the horse in advance of his master. Professional trainers are devoting their attention to the training of horses so that they shall not take fright at the "teuf-teuf" of the motor, and it is no longer unusual to see a horse regard a passing auto with complacency.

One of the most enthusiastic of the auto men in this State is F. A. Hyde, President of the California Automobile Club. He is doing more toward educating people with a view of popularizing the motor car than any other man in the State, and his efforts are entirely unselfish, for he is interested in no special car. He has rendered valuable service to the club by attending to legislation in interior towns. He has done much toward convincing people that the chauffeur has rights that should be respected.

It is held by some medical authorities that the automobilist who allows his desire for speed to render him oblivious of all danger suffers from a delirious intoxication similar to that produced by morphine; also that deafness, bronchial troubles and certain forms of catarrh may be traced to the automobile. There are other authorities that speak in high terms of the automobile as an agent of health. They say that cases of neurasthenia and insomnia have been cured by motor car rides, and that the easy jolting experienced when going at a good rate of speed has the same effect as horseback riding. Automobiling like all out door exercises may be robbed of its beneficial effects by overdoing it. There is no doubt that scorching is bad, and it is equally certain that motoring with prudence is healthful.

Mr. W. H. Deming is said to have the record for fast time and safe journey to Mount Hamilton in his fifteen-horse poweer auto. He made the trip from the Hotel Vendome to the summit in two hours and twenty minutes, a distance of twenty-six miles and a climb of over four thousand feet. He returned in one hour and twenty-five minutes.

Dr. H. Nelson Jackson, who left this city on May twenty-third to make the trip to New York on his auto, was heard from a few days ago, and he was then almost through Idaho. He is making the journey in easy stages, stopping at points of interest along the route. —The Automobilist.

The climate is delightful, the mineral springs are numerous, there are over 300 living streams, many lovely valleys, and lakes, well wooded foothills and ranges, so that a person can have for his vacation any kind of environment desired. You can stop at a mineral spring resort, dwell in a pretty town, rusticate on a farm, camp by a lovely stream, or in a wild and picturesque canyon. To aid you in your choice of a location for a summer outing the company is now distributing "Vacation 1903," a book of over 100 pages. Call or write for a copy. During the summer season special round trip rates are made to many points. On Saturdays and Sundays with return limit Mondays a considerable reduction is made to points (not suburban), and on Sundays one fare for the round trip, so that frequent trips can be made back and forth, and friends can visit those summering along the Road.

STAGE

The Altar of Friendship

Coming as it does after "If I Were King," Madeleine Ryley's somewhat invertebrate comedy drama "The Altar of Friendship" seems a trifle tame. But for a midsummer diversion it is as refreshing as a breath of fog on a hot day. If you sit through it in a pliant, plastic mood you can enjoy it to your heart's content and feel that you haven't wasted a minute. And that is the mood everybody should take to the theatre with him, for if you go to be entertained it is absurd to assume an attitude of defiance toward every one on the stage, as though you were saying to them, in the language of the man from Missouri, "You show me." "The Altar of Friendship' 'is a wholesome little comedy, cleverly constructed and of effervescent dialogue. But to the analytical mind, or to the student of the drama who knows all about the dramatic verities and what should constitute a play, but whose ideas are purely theoretical, it lacks a substantial pretext. All the complications arise from the fact that Arnold Winnifred trifles with the affections of a pretty typist who was the protegee of Richard Arbuthnot. Arnold marries Richard's sister, and then Arnold discovers that Richard had wronged the pretty typist. He saves his brother-in-law from exposure, and permits people to believe that he was the responsible party. Presently he falls in love and is about to marry when his betrothed hears the gossip about the typist who had been trifled with, and then he is in an awful predicament. In the end the truth comes out and Richard's sister goes away with her husband and a broken heart. Madeleine Ryley mixes things up and handles the complications in masterly style but you cannot help thinking every little while that this is the twentieth century, and that people do not make so much ado over the peccadilloes of a gay young bachelor. It is a contemptible thing to wrong a poor, confiding little girl who whacks a typewriter all day, and Arnold was undoubtedly a scoundrel, but the average up-to-date brother doesn't get into a white heat over the discovery that his brother-in-law has a past. Neither does the average up-to-date wife break her heart when she learns that she has married a man who had a very serious love affair once upon a time, and who took advantage of a trusting girl. Instead of pitying the girl who was seduced she is most likely to congratulate her husband on having escaped the wanton's wiles. That is the way the world wags, and it's a pity that things are not as Madeleine Ryley pictures them in "The Altar of Friendship." Hence I say that one should be in a plastic, pliant mood to enjoy it. Otherwise one might fail to enthuse over the sacrifice made by Richard Arbuthnot which wasn't anything more than any man would have been willing to do under similar circumstances. But it is refreshing and wholesome to feel for a few hours that sin is so heartily detested as it appears to be in Madeleine Ryley's little play. Moreover it is pleasant to attune onself to the note sounded in the pretty comedy, for in doing so one finds that the humor of its situations is infectious, and there is one scene that imparts something that very strikingly resembles a thrill. The play is very prettily staged, and Nat Goodwin makes the most of the character of Richard Arbuthnot. He plays the part with his characteristic drollery, and Zeffie Tillbury is a satisfactory substitute for Maxine Elliott. A little more vivacity on her part would indicate a livelier sense of the bubblesome nature of Sally Sartoris, but she is effective. Julia Dean has a part that does not enable her to make much of an impression on her audience. The other members of the company contribute adequate support.

At the Alcazar

"Pudd'nhead Wilson" is a play with good meat in it. In the years it has been on the stage it has not suffereed in comparison with newer productions. It is an attestation to "The play's the thing." There are not many really good plays, but the Mark Twain drama is one of them. Even if a poor company handled it it would still be interesting. The character of David Wilson is unique. Its success depends on the effacement of the actor's personality in favor of the role. Roxy is a part offering splendid possibilities for an emotional actress. The last time I saw the play Theodore Hamilton was Wilson and Eleanor Moretti was Roxy. Moretti is not an attractive woman, physically, but from her mother she inherited temperament. And her Roxy was a creation that stood out far beyond any of the other characterizations in the play. In her great scene with her son she wrung the heart. Hers was the intense acting that draws an audience out of itself. Remembering that wonderful Roxy, I was prepared to be disappointed in Miss Creighton's. It scarcely seemed possible that such a satisfactory exponent of society parts could inject the proper amount of intensity into the sixteenth-negress with her warm blood and passionate temperament. But Miss Creighton's Roxy is a strong impersonation, and from the artistic viewpoint is the best thing she has yet done during her engagement at the Alcazar. Oza Waldrop is a sympathetic Rowy and Miss Howe as Patsy, Wilson's sister, is all the role calls for. Whittlesey as the old man, with his peculiar fad for recording thumbprints, the "pudd'nhead," always holds the audience's interest.

Sam'l of Posen's New Play

All this week M. B. Curtis has been appearing in his original, famous role at the Central theatre. It is some years since "Sam'l of Posen" came this way, but it is always good to draw. Next week Curtis will appear in "The Greenhorn." Speaking of his role of Mosche Petsche in this play, Curtis is reported as saying: "I am the first man who ever played the part of the German-Jew on the stage in this country. On returning to the United Stater after an absence of four years, during which I visited all the principal cities in the world, I determined after witnessing the performances of other impersonators of Jewish characters, to revive my former creation and begin where they leave off. I consider my new play far superior to 'Sam'l of Posen.'" The Central stock will support the comedian in this play, as in that of this week. Myrtle Vane, the new soubrette, has already established herself a favorite. Millar Bacon, the new juvenile, has also won favor.

Nance O'Neil in Sardou Drama

"La Tosca" will have all the virtue of a new production next week at the California, with such a Floria as Nance O'Neil will be. She played the role in Australia but has never been seen here in it. It calls for intense emotion and Miss O'Neil is at her best in roles of that kind. She will play "Fedora" later. In her support are McKee Rankin, Charles Millward and E. J. Ratcliff.

The Isle of Champagne

Edwin Stevens is the whole show at the Tivoli this week. The role of Mumm in "The Isle of Champagne" requires great endurance and agility on the part of the leading comedian, and Stevens apparently remains indefatigable and spontaneous to the drop of the curtain. Seabrooke used to make his points by entirely different methods, but Stevens is funnier and does not work nearly so hard. The introduction of Mary Cahill's song from "Nancy Brown," "You can't fool all the People all the Time," makes a big hit, and Stevens is obliged to repeat it again and again. Annie Meyers looks wonderfully young in a number of fetching gowns and acts with all her customary vigor and dash. Hartman and Webb make the most of their very small parts. "The Isle of Champagne" has some rattling choruses, which the Tivoli people render with a swing that is very effective.

Next week will be positively the last of "In Washington" at the Grand. Another of the Rogers Brothers attractions, "In Central Park," will follow.

There's a good deal of music on the Orpheum's bill this week, but the audience likes it. The "Four Emperors of Music" give a very diversified and entertaining stunt. Anna Wilson, formerly of the Tivoli company, wins applause for her solo, and Saona makes a hit with his clever impersonations of great people.

Bryant's Realistic Stunt

The place of Alcazar stage manager left vacant by Charles S. Bryant's departure for the East will be filled by Fred Butler, formerly of the Grand, who will be a good man to keep the pace set by the brilliant young director. Bryant's early success, it would seem, was compassed equally by ability and the executive knack of making himself liked, for considering the brief length of time he has been before the public there is not a more popular man in the profession. A spirit of bon cameraderie always existed between himself and his company, as may be shown by the following incident which occurred during the rehearsal of the last farce which he put on at the Alcazar. "The Man from Mexico" had been staged with considerable care, and at the dress rehearsal members of the company came to Bryant and requested that, instead of criticising, he would sit out in the pit and see if the performance was really funny enough to laugh at. So the three hilarious acts were put through and the actors kept peeping down at Bryant to see how he was taking the humorous passages. To their great surprise and no small alarm the manager sat before them wearing a bored expression of unchanging solemnity. Then they put forth their best efforts to be ridiculous, they strained the incongruity of the situations, but still evoked from their one-man audience no more lively applause than a look of mild interest. Through three long, thankless acts the performers sweated and horse-played and grimaced, but Bryant never cracked a smile. It was not till the next night when the piece proved a roar from start to finish that it dawned upon them that the stage manager's laughless visage had been the result of an acting even more consummate than their own.

Already extensive preparations are going on at Fischer's for "Sapolio," the burlesque on "Sapho," which is to follow "Twirly Whirly" at Fischer's theatre. Ten new "show-girls" have been engaged from New York to augment the present chorus.

The Second Mantelli Concert

My colleague, the Music Critic, considers Mantelli somewhat lacking in artistry and suggests that she "plays to the gallery." Now in my opinion the reverse of both those opinions applies to Mantelli's singing. At her concert on Tuesday afternoon she certainly did not force her dramatic effects. She was the artist at all times. Mantelli is a singer who grows upon one, to use the homely phrase. At first you merely approve her; then, as her program continues you awake in interest that grows until it reaches enthusiasm. Her personality does not at once please, but in the end you begin to believe her a beautiful woman and a splendid artist. Her Carmen is sensuous rather than sensual; it pleases the mind more than the senses. Hers is a graceful, charming Carmen, rather devoid of diablerie. I thought her art at its best point in the tender "Mignon" song, the "Connais tu le pays," and the number from "Les Huguenots," of the operatic selections, and in Grieg's "Ich liebe dich," Tosti's "Good bye" and Oley Speaks's "April Rain" of the lighter music. English, however, is evidently hard on Mantelli's throat. The hard English words do not bring out her liquid tones as do the Italian, French and German works. There was a small audience present, far too small to testify public appreciation of the artist's worth.

Time's Changes

Any one who remembers San Francisco theatres ten years ago cannot fail to be impressed by the changes in their character. The old Standard is no more. The Bush street theatre, where Crane gave us "The Senator" and Marie Wainwright produced "Twelfth Night," also exists but in memory. Stock musical comedy prevails at the California, which when it was made the "New" California played the finest Eastern attractions, ranking with the Baldwin. The latter, which was the best-beloved of all our theatres, went up in smoke close upon the engagement of Hackett in "The Prisoner of Zenda." The Columbia gets the attractions now that the Baldwin once played. When the Columbia was the Stockwell, it had Aubrey Boucicault, E. J. Henley and a stock company. When it was the Powell street theatre, it had grand opera by the Hess company that moved over from the Orpheum. The Orpheum, regarded as a "hoodoo" house, as long as opera held its boards, found high-class vaudeville the best kind of a mascot. The Alcazar, also a poorly paying investment for years, is with its splendid stock which produces the best plays from the East now one of the most popular theatres in the city. Fischer's, which lost money when a variety house and beer hall, has made it hand over fist since it turned itself into the home of weberfieldian burlesque. The Grand is no longer Morosco's, the melodrama house. After its seasons of syndicated stars, it is now playing the Rogers' Brothers' "In Washington" and the S. R. O. sign is out. The Central now draws those who used to fill Morosco's to indulge their taste for melodrama and sensational incidents. The Tivoli no longer gives us Strauss and Suppe, Offenbach, Planquette, Cellier and Genee. Instead we find there the works of the "new" composers, De Koven and his contemporaries. The changes in the local theatrical world would be worth exploiting in a whole page of a Sunday supplement.

The Neill-Morosco Enterprises, the new Western theatrical corporation, which introduced its first company at the Burbank theatre, Los Angeles, May seventeenth, has secured the exclusive rights to a long line of the best recent stage successes, such as "In the Palace of the King," "Hearts Aflame," "Mrs. Dane's Defense," "A Royal Family," "Janice Meredith" and "The Way of the World."

Among the new burlesques to be put on shortly at Fischer's is "The Big Little Princess" that Weber and Field are now using with such great success on their road tour. "Sapolio," the "Sapho" burlesque, is to follow "Twirly Whirly."

Ezra Kendal's performance in "The Vinegar Buyer" proved one of the most pronounced hits of the New York season. He will continue in the play all through the summer and comes here in August.

Amelia Bingham follows Goodwin at the Columbia. She will open her engagement here in either "A Modern Magdalen" or "The Climbers."

To banish the blues nothing is so efficacious as a drink of Chapin & Gore's Old Reserve bourbon or rye.

Smiling Lydia Back Again

When Lydia Yeamans Titus last appeared at the Orpheum she gave one night a little exhibition of temper. It was deserved, for the gallery joined in the chorus of "Sweet Marie" without an invitation from the singer, and Mrs. Titus didn't like it. The fair Lydia, by the way, is one of the highest-salaried singers in vaudeville. She is also one of the most popular, and before Jessie Bartlett Davis and Camille d'Arville went upon the circuit, Lydia shared her popularity with nobody but Josephine Sabel. No one has ever sung a baby-song with quite the charm of Lydia Yeamans Titus. And it was she who introduced "Molly Newell" to popularity. "Mollie Newell, don't be cruel" used to be hummed and whistled all day when Mrs. Titus was singing it on Orpheum programs. She is a daughter of Annie Yeamans, the veteran comedienne, and a sister of Jennie Yeamans. She made her first hit in farce comedy with Hallen and Hart.

E. D. Price, general manager of the Belasco and Mayer enterprises, is in New York, securing plays and players for the Alcazar and Central theatres and arranging the details of the road tours of Florence Roberts and "The Dairy Farm." He returns the first week in July.

Florence Roberts is putting in a time of rest before beginning her September starring engagement. She has been visiting the theatres with her husband, Louis Morrison. Last Saturday they were in a box at the Columbia.

Features of Next Week's Bills

For the second and last week of his engagement at the Columbia Goodwin will give a revival of "When We Were Twenty-One." Julia Deane will have the principal feminine role and Zeffie Tillbury will be the Firefly.

At the California Nance O'Neil will appear in "La Tosca," opening tomorrow night.

"Monbars," Robert Mantell's fine romantic play, will follow "Pudd'nhead Wilson" at the Alcazar. The latter has drawn so well that it will run another week.

Flossie Hope and Gertie Emerson have a new song and dance entitled "My Starlight Sue" which they will put on Monday night at Fischer's for the first time. It is a great novelty and promises to be as big a hit as the popular song "Chimmie."

The new songs introduced into "In Washington" have made a hit, and the piece still packs the Grand at every performance. "A great show," everybody says of it.

"The Isle of Champagne" has scored at the Tivoli and will be continued.

M. B. Curtis in "The Greenhorn" will hold the boards next week at the Central, after which will come a week of "Joshua Whitcomb" with James Corrigan in the title role.

It is many years since Lydia Yeamans Titus was here, and she is sure to receive the warmest of welcomes on her reappearance at the Orpheum. Lydia is still assisted by her husband, F. J. Titus, and in the musical skit, "The Wrong Organ," introduces the charming song, "Sally in our Alley." Hayes and Healy, the "Ringmaster and the Circus Rider," are new. Hayes is a slender six-footer and Healy a short, plump chap. Allan J. Shaw, the original "Emperor of Coins," is a new arrival from Australia, a coin manipulator of dexterity. Perry and Lulu Ryan and Emma Wood, the "World's Trio," will appear in a novel act, and Vernon, the ventriloquist, will be new.

The baby sea-lion is a drawing card at the Chutes. It was born last week and now rivals the incubator babies in interest. In the theatre the new people are Saona, the impersonator, the Flying Wrest family, aerial marvels, Conroy and Pearl, comedy sketch artists, and Frederick "the Great," a magician. Hayward and Haywood, singers and dancers, Delphino and Palmora and Marah Craig are on the bill. —The Playgoer.

Mantelli's Rebuke to Ill Breeding

We have had many local exhibitions of bad manners at concerts, but the climax was capped at Mantelli's second recital last Friday. In the midst of the "Nobil Signor" song from "Les Huguenots" that opened the second part of the program an usher noisily preceded a woman into a box. The singer was disturbed in the midst of an aria, and she rebuked the late-comer by turning in her direction and singing directly at her for several bars. But the woman in the box was undismayed, and chatted with a companion in loud tones and later on she roused the indignation of the audience during Mr. Pyck's exposition of a Chopin number. The woman should have better sense for she was once a professional singer on the Orpheum circuit. Moreover if she had been attentive she might have obtained a few much-needed pointers for the improvement of her own vocal art which never won the praise of the artistic. By the way, it is high time for managers of concerts to make and enforce a rule against the seating of people during a song or instrumental solo.

A Musical Repartee

One old story, retold with interest by old opera-goers of New York, whose musical life is still bounded by the memory of Grisi and Mario at Castle Garden, is this: "These are your little Grisettes," said the Emperor Nicholas to Mme. Grisi, meeting her one day at St. Petersburg with her two little girls, Rita and Clelia. The third daughter, Mrs. Godfrey Pearce, was not yet born. "No, sire," answered Madame Grisi, with an appropriateness almost too happy for reality, "they are my little Marionettes."

The regular monthly program of sacred music will be rendered at St. Dominic's church tomorrow. The principal feature of the program will be Mendelssohn's cantata "Lauda Sion," sung by the choir of the church, under the direction of the organist,

Sir Arthur Sullivan's song "The Lost Chord" realized little short of fifty thousand dollars, one-third of which was the share of the composer.

Miss Edith Decker, the young prima donna, has returned home after a successful tour of the country with Signor Abramoff, her instructor. They have been in vaudeville together for a year, presenting an act from "Faust," and they are now preparing for a trip to Italy, arrangements having been made for Miss Decker's debut in grand opera at the principal opera house in Milan. While in New York the young prima donna made her appearance at the Metropolitan Opera House, and she received most enthusiastic praise for her work.

It scarcely seems possible that Marcia van Dresser should have been engaged by Manager Conreid for the Metropolitan grand opera forces. Yet that is what the despatches say. Miss van Dresser is a beautiful woman and very magnetic, but when she was with the Bostonians she could scarcely manage the music of the contralto parts. Her voice is rich and charming in speaking roles but was not at all suited for comic opera. It must have developed some new qualities if she is to enter grand opera.

Mr. Samuel Adelstein will spend his summer vacation on a two months' tramping and fishing trip among the mountains and lakes in the vicinity of Tahoe.

Edwin Stevens sends the company as well as the audience to laughing sometimes with his interpolated bits of fun. Stevens is funnier some nights than others. It just happens when he is in the humor. When he feels in perfect trim he is full of pranks, and that is what makes his impersonations so entertaining.

Hother Wismer left this week for the Hawaiian Islands. He will be away about six weeks. —The Music Critic.

To Jessica

True to my soul as the steel to the pole
You have been to me ever.
Evil has thrilled me
And sorrow has chilled me,
Grief and regret for a wasted life filled me;
You have been near me
To comfort, to cheer me,
Bound firm and fast by a tie none can sever,
Close to my soul.

When we are dead and the last word is said
We will still be together.
Fear that I'd lose you
Has made me abuse you,
Sully your life that your God might accuse you;
Sin has engrossed you
And Heaven has lost you
That I might have you and hold you forever,
Living or dead.

From a Garcon's Dictionary

Attitude—A very important part of a waiter's uniform, and necessary to be altered when dealing with guests on the first, second and third floors.

Bachelor—One who spends his money freely and never dines the same woman twice.

Dalliance—When a masculine and feminine guest eat little, talk in spasmodic gusts, but sigh a good deal.

Dessert—Sometimes it is fruit of the season, but it largely depends on what went before.

Frapped—A word applied to the wine when it has reached the proper temperature, and to the woman when she hasn't.

Hunger—A craving for something not always on the bill of fare.

Husband—A frisky married gent who never takes his own wife above the first floor.

Love—A sentiment often involving exceedingly lavish expense, and large tips at dinners a deux.

Madame—A feminine guest who is always very coquettish but absolutely discreet; has a fine taste in wines.

Mademoiselle—A feminine guest usually rather timid at first.

Sacrilege—The wasting of good wine on an uneducated palate.

Tip—An uncertain quantity. It is what every honest waiter expects. It is recompense for good service and discretion. Its size is often regulated by the risk the patron is running. It's an index to the character of the giver, and sometimes to the character of his companion.

Wife—A frisky married woman who knows the elevator boy by his first name. —The Lexicographer.

A Book of Merit

"The Log of a Cowboy" is not the story of the cowboy and the lady, but the plain, unvarnished tale of the haps and mishaps of a drove of cattle and the men of the outfit who started from the Mexican border in the spring of 1882 with three thousand head of long-horns to be delivered at the Blackfoot Agency in Montana early in the following September. Whether Andy Adams, the author of the book, is identical with "Thomas Moore Quirk," the trail hand whose "log" it purports to be, or not, he evidently writes of what he knows, and a more interesting "human document" I have not met with since I read "The Cruise of the Cachelot." Although the whole narrative is given in the first person, the ego is suppressed, and the writer keeps himself in the background and takes up rather less of the reader's attention than the other hands. The little glimpse he gives us of his child-life in Georgia, while his father was serving in the Confederate army, and it devolved on his mother to keep her little family together and their livestock out of the hands of the soldiers of both armies, makes one hope that some day Andy Adams will find himself in another biographical mood and tell us more of his early years. Although this narrative deals with the history of a single "drive," it is one of the longest, since it extended over some three thousand miles, from the southern boundary of the United States to nearly the northern, and though the cattle were tractable and then on the whole as well-behaved and peaceable an outfit as the profession could produce, there is scarcely an incident or accident that did not occur amongst them, so that it is, in effect, a complete epitome of an occupation which time and circumstances have relegated to the "days that are no more." It was a primitive life, of hard work, monotony and privation, varied by the wild excitement of stampedes, meetings with Indians and rustlers, long drives where the cattle were maddened by thirst, and perilous river crossings where they were mired in the quicksands. After the weary months on the trail, varied only by the chance meeting with the advance guard of some other outfit, the few hours of wild dissipation in some frontier cow-town seem more like the antics of schoolboys let out for recess than the deliberate actions of responsible men, and they call for less moralizing than the so-called pranks of the college youth, and if the boys played poker around the fire at night when they might have been reading Shakespeare, it is to be taken into consideration that a pack of cards weighs considerably less in a saddle pocket than a book. This is a book which will appeal to men more than to women. It is one which cannot be exhausted by a single reading, and no amount of writing about will give an adequate idea of its value. It possesses more interest than nine novels out of ten, and while there is not attempt at "characterization," the various men in the outfit, Jim Flood, the foreman, "The Rebel," Honeyman, Quarternight, Officer, Blades, Borrowstone, and all the rest of them, are as clearly differentiated in the mind as though they had had pages of description each. They were not Sunday-school boys out on a picnic, by any manner of means, but after a detailed account of their work and their hardships, taken as a matter of course, our respect for the professional cowboy ought to move up a few notches. The book is brought out by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. in the excellent style which characterizes their work. Illustrations are by E. Boyd Smith, who probably deserves credit for the cover design also, of a section of the "circle-dots" and their attendant.

Californian Stories

A writer for one of the local magazines reiterates the old plaint that since Bret Harte died there has no one writing of California in the way that California should be written about. "The gods are dead!" How familiar it is. To be sure no one is making a specialty of gentlemanly gamblers and red-shirted miners. I wonder if any one could conceive of a miner in anything but a red shirt? But if the writer of the wail would just take the trouble to look into Pearson's monthly, and I am presupposing that he (or she) has the capacity to recognize a good thing when it is before him, he would find a series of as good San Francisco tales as he can ever hope to enjoy. I refer to "The Picaroons," which Gelett Burgess and Will Irwin are contributing, and they are vastly better stories than Bret Harte ever wrote after he left us. Pearson's, by the way, is looking up. Besides "The Picaroons," and plenty of other good fiction, there is a paper by Mabel Shippie Clark Pelton, author of "A Tar-Heel Baron," entitled "Where Women's Clubs are not," descriptive of the life of the women of the foothills of North Carolina, where the scene of her novel is laid; an instructive and interesting article on "Photographing from a Balloon"; "Jerome vs. Crime," which of course refers to the methods of the New York District Attorney; "The Beet Sugar Industry," and an exhaustive resume of the history and settlement of Oregon. The cover design and one paper, "A Honeymoon Pilgrimage," are by Edward N. Marshall.

Other People's Ideas

From Lever's "Davenport Dunn":

Were one to treasure up the score of all the petty slights he may have received in life, so that in some day of power he might acquit the debt, success would be anything but desirable.

Leave people's vices alone, then; they're the same as their debts—if you're not going to pay them, you've no right to talk about them.

You know everything if you read the papers: accidents and marriages, the rate of the money market, the state of the crops, who is dining with the Queen, and who is skating on the Serpentine, who is ruined at Newmarket, and who drowned at sea, and then all about the playhouses, and the wonderful panoramas; so that let conversation turn how it will, you're ready for it.—Skellet.

What we fancy must break our hearts to do we can bear, and bear patiently, and, what's more, so learn to conform to, that after a few years of life we wonder that we ever thought them hardships.—Grog Davis.

It is by no means an uncommon delusion for ill-natured people to fancy that they are great moral physicians, and that the bitters they drop into your wineglass and my tea-cup are admirable tonics, which our constitutions may require . The drug is not always an evil, but the doctor is detestable.

From "Life's Common Way," by Annie Eliot Trumbull:

It is not the cataclysms of life that hew our destinies, but the quieter succession of days and nights which determines how the cataclysms shall leave them.

It is one of the hardest and one of the most incredible lessons of life—this discovery that where we were prepared for opposition there is nothing but vacuity. The resources of a final appeal reserved as a crucial weapon, vanish with the realization that there is nothing for that appeal to reach.

It is the little more or less that makes all the difference in life between apparent harmony and utter discord.

The presence of a third person is often a remarkable emollient in difficult domestic situations.

"To travel, whatever we may say to the contrary, is one of the saddest pleasures in life; when you begin to feel yourself at home in some foreign land, it is because you have already begun to make it your country."—"Corinne"—Mme. de Stael. —The Gleaner.

GEORGE MAYERLE'S glasses were examined by U. S. Inspector of Customs, and were found to be FAR SUPERIOR to all others, and since then the Inspector himself has been using them with greatest satisfaction, because they are very restful and soothing to the Eye and strengthen Weak Eyes.

MR. GEORGE MAYERLE—Sir: I have been using the glasses made by you for nearly seven years, and I feel it but justice to say that my eyes have much improved since I commenced to use them. My eyes never tire and sight is much stronger now. Very truly yours,

American vs. English Society Women

A big London daily paper is just now conducting one of those discussion tournaments on English society so provocative of rancorous barbs, sarcastic shafts and pitiless truths. Last week "The American Woman and Her Influence" was the topic and the writer of the article, in striving for effect, allowed his or her imagination full scope, as the following extracts will demonstrate: "I have the greatest admiration for the American woman who remains an American girl, so long as she does not become ashamed of canned goods or pickled pork or silver ingots that provide her with such chic frocks and necklaces of pearls. It is the hybrid that sets one's teeth on edge—the Chicago-Park Lane-four hundred-upper ten variety. I accuse this hybrid of striking at all that is most cherished in the home life of England; at all that is most modest, unselfish and reverential. I accuse her of introducing the apelike decadence of New York society, where extravagance is distinction, display is nobility and notoriety the ideal at which to aim. I accuse her of neglecting duties to which she has married and setting evil example to those of a lower station. She is a snob to her dainty finger tips. Her tuft hunting, her struggles for social advancement, are based on the American plan of 'getting there.' She has no scruples in her methods of applying to social life the ethics of modern finance. She has no conception of home life. Her husband is a partner to be thrown over if tending to bore. She either neglects or spoils her children. She considers knowledge of domestic economies degrading for so wealthy a lady. She has no reverence, therefore cannot understand that there are duties which long custom has bound around a high name she has bought. Her actions are those of a creature newly civilized yielding to whim or caprice. In dress she encourages prodigality, which is the curse of womankind today." Two days after this article appeared an American peeress made answer. Part of her letter is as follows: "I am the wife of a British peer. My father's money was honestly made by a man with brains and not by a man with a grandfather. It made a vast difference in this Anglo-American contract, if you will so have it. Let us strike a balance and see who got the better bargain. My husband gave a peerage, a bad reputation and an encumbered estate, shady friends, endless debts and a broken constitution. I gave a fortune, good health, good looks, revived prosperity and happiness. If it were not for American women a large proportion of your great estates would have been lost to British aristocracy. Your House of Lords would by this time have been turned into stores for want of better purposes, and your noble descendants of William's emigres would probably be obliged to work for a living or else seek in marriage the daughter of some British millionaire of the people. Is not all this crusade against American women to be traced to the petty jealousies of your own women, who, knowing their inferiority in intellect and looks, leave no stone unturned to sneer at us, to make our lives as uncomfortable as possible, and to show us, when they can safely do so, how much they regard themselves as our superiors?" And still cases like the late Yarmouth-Thaw marriage continue to occur in society.

"Sapho" as a Standard Play

The decadents of London are said to be in thrills over another drama of the "Sapho" type and the actress who plays the leading role, though hitherto unknown to fame, is likely to become a leading favorite of the British stage. The new play is called "Margot" and is adapted from Daudet's play of that name. Special importance is attached to the play by the London critics because it bears such a strong resemblance to "Sapho," which was written by the same author and which attained such a success among the same class of theatre-goers both in England and America. Thus it appears that "Sapho" has become a standard by which to judge of the popular value of a certain class of dramas. The reviewers also predict a prosperous run for the new play in this country. Do they come to this conclusion by the run of "Sapho" on this side of the water? That is hardly a fair criterion. At the time that Olga Nethersole produced the French work she was at the height of her popularity. Clever in certain lines, she found in the title part just the kind of role to set off her emotional powers to their very best advantage. But what seemed at the time a sort of "Sapho" craze was due not so much to the vulgar and daring characteristics of the play and any general public liking for such a vulgar mess as to the very sensational advertising methods adopted by Miss Nethersole and her managers to attract attention. Nothing was left undone by them to boost the play as a new French sensation. A great deal was made of the stairway scene, which was one of the least objectionable of all the unconventional things in the story, but it offered an excellent hook to lift the whole mess into the daily prints. To drag the whole thing before the public and keep it flaunting constantly in view trouble with the courts was persistently sought. So much discussion was at last aroused that the courts were forced to take a more drastic course than the scheming business managers bargained for. The play was actually forbidden for a time in New York and other cities, while others quite as immoral were permitted to run their course. This notorious handling gave to Daudet's play an importance that it never merited as a theatrical production and certainly never deserved on artistic or ethical grounds. Some color is given to the claim that "Margot beats Sapho" from the report that Mr. Charles Frohman, as soon as he learned the plot and the source of the new drama, despatched one of his most reliable representatives to witness the first presentation with a view to securing American rights. Outside of the question of the immoral standing of "Margot" there is after all a limit beyond which the most prurient manager, actor and actress dare not go in the first-class theatres of this country. This was about reached in the scenes between Sapho and her companions. To the credit of San Francisco it may be said that plays of this class have received far less support here than in any city of equal size in the country.

Change Coming for Missionaries

The government of France has given out that hereafter missionaries who go out to convert the heathen shall depend upon themselves to keep the peace. They are not to count on gunboats and armies and indemnities when strife and riot are stirred up about them, and if they do not like the prospect, they are at liberty to remain at home and leave the heathen unchristianized. This is an eminently common sense and practical decision, and one that cannot be too early adopted by other nations. More than one-half of the misunderstandings with minor nations, not to mention actual wars, have been brought about by the meddling of these self-constituted regulators of the consciences of other people. Three-fourths of the correspondence of the State Department is in connection with trivial "encroachments" upon the assumed rights of these people, who, by a fiction of their own imagination, regard their domiciles as "United States territory" and any trespass as an "invasion." The ordinary missionary has no more right to go into a foreign country and commit what to the natives are crimes and sacrileges than the savages would have to land in the United States and tear down churches and mutilate monuments. The average missionary knows little, if anything, of the beliefs of the people upon whom he foists himself. He considers it quite unnecessary to understand them. He believes he is right and they are wrong, and that in his mind settles the whole matter. If missionaries were content to confine themselves solely to the matter of religion they would find themselves with all the work cut out for them that they could possibly do. Usually, however, they begin by interfering with the status of women, and meddling with trade and manufacture. In some cases if the missionary is not himself the agent for some patented article, his son or his father or his brother-in-law is pretty sure to be, and more than once it has happened that letters have been addressed to the Secretary of State, calling upon him to interfere in their behalf to drive some rival from the field. Where there is a question of loot, the missionary—but the late Boxer uprising showed what some missionaries do in that line. And in the matter of indemnity it is surprising what a value the old clothes and rustic furniture assume. After the Boxer trouble the average claim for indemnity was over ten thousand dollars. How could any humble servant of Christ accumulate any such sum while performing missionary labors among poor natives? To this usual run of up-to-date missionaries there are of course exceptions, men who go forth taking their lives in their hands and laboring with zeal in the work to which they have dedicated themselves, but they are never found demanding armored cruisers to be sent to their rescue, nor presenting extortionate bills for imaginary damages. Their baggage is not rich in loot when they return home—if they ever do—nor do they seek to evade customs duties by prevarications. Hawaii is so close to our back door that we of California cannot avoid a knowledge of missionaries and missionary efforts there. If government backing is withdrawn, so that these gentlemen go abroad on precisely the same terms as jack tar, who deserts from his ship, there is apt to be a surprising falling off in the interest in the welfare of the souls of "our benighted brethren."

The Stead Boom for Mediums

San Francisco's whole tribe of wonder workers—spiritualists, clairvoyants, trance mediums, wand wavers, crystal gazers, seers, astrologers, and all the rest—came out of their dreams this week to explain William T. Stead's wonderful story of the medium who predicted the assassination of Alexander and Queen Draga of Servia. Most of them declared it was as simple as prophesying the rising of the sun. Most of them declared that if they had just had one little chance to finger that royal stationery they could have fallen into a catalyptic fit just as easily as Mrs. Birchell and just as easily have given the details of the approaching crime. Not one of them expressed even a jealous doubt as to the genuineness of the medium's prediction and every one of them enthusiastically patted Mr. Stead on the back and declared he was "a real gentleman for so courageously standing up for the truth." Indeed they can well afford to say nice things about Mr. Stead's course in the matter, for it's safe to say his story regarding the prediction has given the medium business the best advertisement it has received in a decade. What is generally claimed to be the most plausible explanation of Mr. Stead's story is given by Dr. Isaac Funk. Dr. Funk does not believe that the veil of the future can be lifted but he is satisfied there is a great deal in auto-suggestion. He might be classed in the ranks of the telepathists. He is personally acquainted with Mr. Stead and accepts his cable statements of the story at par. Dr. Funk's conclusions are that the Servian gentleman who handed the royal paper to the medium had some knowledge of the plot to kill the King and that the sensitive clairvoyant received a dim flash of what was transpiring in his mind through telepathy. "She was the receiver of the waves of thought that without doubt pass from soul to soul without the use of the senses. She was much like the sensitive mechanical receiver of the telephone that makes it possible for one to recognize the voice of a friend hundreds of miles away. Thought waves are like the waves of electricity in wireless telegraphy. They catch and impress the receiver with which they are attuned." Only the truth from the Servian gentleman regarding the state of his mind at the time of the episode will ever determine the value of this explanation.

Attack on the Gambling Craze

One of those protests against gambling is now sweeping over the land: the usual sign that marks the gaming world recovering from plunging without limit. Good resolutions are hardest refurbished after a night off. Seattle has been badly plucked by a gambling combination and it has recently passed a lot of new laws to keep itself good. So have Fresno, Bakersfield and a number of other cities up and down the coast. Saratoga, the Mecca of the Eastern fashionable gambling coterie, gained such a notoriety last year for the flagrant way in which that vice was catered that it is doubtful whether the big games dare open up, notwithstanding the barrels of money the bankers are sure to win from the gullible. Canfield, the leader of the professional gamblers there, is having his hands full trying to keep out of the net of the law in which "reform" politicians are trying to enmesh him. In London the crusade against fashionable gambling has made great headway this season. Women of prime social influence are uniting to prevent the spread of the evil. The Ladies' League is going to direct its efforts to persuading well-known hostesses to prevent gambling in their own houses among their women guests and more especially among the girls. Many hostesses, the Duchess of Portland among them, have all along refused to allow gambling among their guests, and others there are who have only allowed bridge to be played for nominal stakes. The artful way in which innocent young girls are drawn into the games and fleeced is shown in the case of one who was asked down to a country place for the week's end by a schoolgirl friend. In the letter of invitation she was told incidentally that she would be taught bridge. Toward the end of her stay the youthful visitor was informed by the mother of her girl friend that she owed two hundred dollars on her card games. The girl, until then under the impression that she was being taught bridge and not having the faintest idea that she was playing for money, wired to her father. He came down posthaste and not only refused to pay the money but gave the hostess a strenuous piece of his mind. Little incidents of this kind do heroic work in killing the game.

Extravagant Cost of College Athletics

In a recent Yale Alumni Weekly there is published a twenty years' exhaustive study on the finances of Yale athletics. This budget contributes some highly interesting data on modern athletics as conducted in the big up-to-date colleges. Something more than extravagance is expressed between the lines. In the last twenty years the cost of that institution's athletic field has grown from seventeen thousand to eighty thousand dollars. In 1881, the incomes from baseball, boating and football were respectively $7,254, $7,426 and $2,792; total, $17,472. Twenty years later the incomes from the same sports were $21,644, $7,377, $50,219; total, $79,240. In expenses the contrast is no less strong. In 1881 baseball, boating and football cost respectively $6,863, $7,348 and $2,689; total, $16,900. Ten years later their costs had jumped to $17,080, $26,716 and $24,911; total, $58,707. The total receipts in all branches of athletics last year were $83,460. The absolute bigness of that sum, almost satirical as derived from an educational institution, suggests a few illustrations. At four per cent it capitalizes at almost $2,100,000, and is the same, were the thing conceivable, as an athletic endowment fund of that sum—an endowment some half-million dollars larger than were the Yale funds twenty-five years ago and almost half as large as are all Yale's vested funds now. Yale's athletics have today a gross income one-third as large as Yale had in 1877. This extraordinary state of affairs is thus explained by Clarence Deming, of the class of '77, who raked up the matter: "That the systematic supervision of Yale athletics finances under Mr. Camp has been a force making for economy and for a system based on experience there is not the slightest doubt, but it has to meet as a counter force an undergraduate lavishness in matters of detail which runs up high bills. Unfortunately, too, the evil tends to self-perpetuation. Probably on an average not fewer than two-thirds of the athletes on any particular team or crew pass into the next crew or team year by year. These prolong or increase positively what may be called a tradition of luxury and high expenditure. The team of one year hates to be stinted in the privileges—be they parlor cars, good hotel rooms, lush supplies and good living—enjoyed by the team of the year before, and its demands are hard for the athletic managers to resist. It is to be hoped that with the Yale field improvements done we shall see the waxing athletic extravagance cut down to a more rational basis and a seat at the big football game within reach of the student who is earning his way through college." Brother Deming has probably not figured that the bulk of this eighty-three thousand dollars is drawn from graduates and outside people and that all of it is spent on athletics, which is the way of the modern college to advertise itself to the world and thus stimulate matriculations and big classes.

How He Sows and Reaps

It pains me beyond full measure of expression to report that the missionary of the evangelical churches is not working in the Japanese vineyard according to contract.

It grieves me to relate that he is not "sacrificing" himself to "the cause of Christianity in a heathen land," as the Sunday school orators and the statements of the "Home Boards" persistently declare.

I fear that the sympathies of the little boys and girls of the "missionary bands" are being worked on a false pretense, and that the nickels of these confiding innocents are filched by unscrupulous persons more intent upon serving the mammon of their personal interest than in any earnest effort to convert the pagan from his idols, to proselyte the Buddhist in his blindness, to snatch the Shinto brand from the burning, and to "spread the light" in dark places.

I found the missionary in Yokohama living on the fat of the land. His house "on the Bluff" is a dream in a land where dreams are the regular occupation of the sleepers. His servants are legion. His carriage outshone the chariots of the legations of Tokyo. His 'rick'sha for family shopping and casual "gadding" is nickel-plated, runs on bicycle wheels, and is dragged by two kuruma-ya tandem, clad in purple and fine cotton. His home is adorned with costly bric-a-brac from the Benten-dori, carvings of Miyanoshita, lacquers of Nagoya, cloisonne of Kyoto, brocades of Osaka.

As I am an honest pagan this Yokohama missionary is not "sacrificing" much for the nickels of his unsuspecting almoners In truth, he can make the nimble nickel aforesaid "go farther" than the dollar of the ungodly spent on geishas and "shinzos" in the Tea-house of the Hundred Steps. He has learned the ways of the heathen trader and when that Oriental names a price the bargaining missionary immediately offers one-half, in full confidence that he will eventually get the thing for at least "a third off."

In the hot months of summer the missionary of Yokohama shuts up his missionary shop in town and with his family hies him away to Nikko, Hakone, Fuji, Miyanoshita, or some other of the many cool retreats of Japan. Every missionary in Yokohama knows where to lay his head o' nights in the dog days, and if he has not secured a permanent country home on long lease he is not wholly "on to his job."

The Yokohama missionary has three sources of income: he receives a regular stipend from home, he receives periodical contributions from his Japanese congregation, and he is frequently "helped in the good work" by unwary and unobserving tourists affiliated with the sect out of which the missionary has bloomed like the irises of Horikiri.

Besides these sources of income every missionary in Japan is "allowed" from one hundred to three hundred dollars a year for each child born "in the service." This money is for the education of the child during its minority. It is a generous allowance and provides a piano, a bicycle, a mosquito yacht, and all sorts of good clothes for the boys. It provides for the girls silk underwear, crepe kimonos, picture hats, embroidered parasols, brocaded purses with elegantly carved netsukes, tennis outfits, and imported French shoes for gala occasions when the elite of Yokohama light their silk lanterns for ichi ban "functions."

The missionary travels second-class, as beseems his humility and the purpose of his profession, but this is not the reason; he is, by courtesy of the steamship companies and the railroads, allowed a cut rate amounting to twenty-five per cent of the regular fare. By traveling second-class on short distances and third-class over short routes, the thrifty missionary of Yokohama saves many yen for the luxuries of his life in Yokohama and at the summer resorts.

Notwithstanding all this, "the good work goes bravely on." It is conducted by the "graduates" of the mission schools—Japanese who are as eager for the ease and emoluments of the missionary business as is the missionary himself. None of the money paid to these Japanese satellites of the missionary comes out of his pocket. It is duly charged on the home books to "expenses." A Japanese preacher or teacher can make more money in this work than by any other means, for as a rule he is born of the coolie class, and if he were not "educated" for the work he is now engaged in he would, in all probability, be honestly earning an average of thirty cents a day dragging a jinrikisha.

The missionaries of the evangelical sects have been hoeing in the Japanese vineyard for more than a hundred years, and by liberal padding of their reports they are able to claim at the present time fifty thousand "converts" in a total population of nearly forty-five million. I don't think any comment on my part is necessary.

I asked one of these missionaries who was complaining that he had been "laboring" in Japan fifteen years, why he didn't go home.

"Why should I go home?" he asked in reply. "I am comfortable enough here even if it is somewhat dull, tedious and monotonous; and the good Lord only knows what I could turn my hand to in my own country. I have lost my grip on things in America, so I suppose I am condemned to live and die in this heathen land."

The missionaries do not like the Japanese. They accuse them of many sins; not only sins of commission but sins of omission. They lock their valuables and money and even the food of their kitchens, from their servants, who are invariably Buddhists or of the Shinto religion. They distrust the people whom they have been ordained to rescue from the error of their ways.

I was about to enter the temple contiguous to the mortuary shrines of Shiba Park in Tokyo the other day when a young man, a Japanese, laid his hand on my shoulder and leered round into my face. It was very evident that he was under the influence of sake. I shook his hand from my shoulder and asked him what it might please him to want with me.

"You Christian?" he asked in a maudlin tone.

"No," I answered by way of proper rejoinder to an impertinent question. The answer aided by the sake staggered my interlocutor for an instant, but he recovered immediately, and again laying his trembling hand on my shoulder he hiccoughed:

"Tha's too bad. I Christian—good Christian."

This is the first drunken man I have seen in Japan. I hope the fellow was lying to me concerning his religious belief.

Now, in conclusion, let it be distinctly understood that I am not objecting to the missionary as such. Furthermore, it is none of my business what he does with the money that he receives from the little Sunday-school children. Moreover, it is immaterial to me whether he "converts" anybody in Japan or not. My sole idea in writing this expose of the Yokohama missionary (whom I do not claim is a type of the genus Japonensis), is to let the Sunday-schools and the Home Boards know that this particular missionary is not "sacrificing" anything for "the cause." It is my purpose to deprive him of the special plea that he is undergoing hardships, enduring privation or suffering in any degree whatever. I don't care how fat he grows on the contributions of confiding sectarians—that is entirely his business—and theirs. But I do object, as every honest man in Japan objects, to the false pretense upon which he appeals to the sympathy and works on the credulity of the faithful of his native land.

Dame Grundy Still Guessing

Mrs. Grundy is see-sawing between the theory that the Parrotts have forgiven the Parker-Whitney elopement and the belief that the olive branch held out by the parents was the usual make-believe stage prop used on such occasions to fool the public. The gossips who have kept tab on the pros and cons of the affair lean towards the idea that the rind of forgiveness is a very thin one and peels off at the first approach of the young couple. Daisy Whitney has entertained a great many of her girl friends at the Whitney ranch at Rocklin. Helen Wagner has just returned from a delightful trip there. Marie Louise, the sister of the bride, however, has not paid her any conspicuous visits, and Mrs. Grundy has used that fact as evidence of parental displeasure still holding out. To cement this version of the affair comes the news that Mr. and Mrs. Parrott and Marie Louise, instead of going to Del Monte according to schedule, are booked for an extended tour of Mexico. As the sudden change of their plans tripped on the heels of the Parker Whitneys' announcement that they too would summer at Del Monte, the gossips claim that the Parrotts are distinctly two when the Parker Whitneys enter the calculation. But there are others who see mere coincidences in these moves of the Parrotts and they claim Dame Grundy is barking up the wrong tree and will soon have to take to the tall timber.

Far From the Madding Crowd

When the Huntingtons hied themselves to Piedmont for the summer, society was so shocked it could scarcely sit up and take light refreshment. That the multi-est millionaires in our midst should go the way of the commuter possed the understanding of the smart set. Of course there are people in Oakland "among our best families" and no one has held their residence in that burg as a personal failing. But in the eyes of the San Mateoite the Huntingtons committed rank heresy when they chose it for a summer residence. I am told that Mrs. H. E. wanted to rent a place somewhere in the sacred confines bounded on the north by the Tobins and on the south by the Hopkins's, and she promised to entertain in the house-party royal style dear to old England. But her daughters, who dislike everything that smacks of society, urged her out of this idea, and Clara Huntington-Perkins, the married daughter, echoed their sentiments by promising to pay a longer visit out here if the family planted its summer roof-tree far from the verandas of the ultra-fashionables. So Piedmont was pitched upon and Mrs. Perkins has already arrived to make good her promised visit.

Has Broken Six Engagements

Senator George C. Perkins and Miss Pansy Perkins left for Europe on Monday. Miss Mae Perkins will leave in about a fortnight for the Orient. In Hongkong she will be the guest of the Wileys. The Perkins girls lead very pleasant lives, full of variety. Neither girl is in any hurry to marry. May has been engaged six times but on every occasion she has broken it off. One of her fiances was Mr. Bew, an Alameda druggist, and a reported fiance who however denied the engagement was "Bob" Mein, who is now reported engaged to Miss Adelaide Deming. It is Bob Mein's brother Will who is to marry pretty Pauline Fore of Oakland in the fall.

Will Marry Outside Her Faith

Jessica Davis, the pretty little cousin of the Peixottos, is going to follow the example set her by them and marry outside the faith which Peixotto Sr. upholds as a pillar in the synagogue. While Jessica was attending college at Berkeley she became engaged to Arthur Nahl and though her parents did not violently oppose the match they were naturally not entirely in sympathy with her views. She wished to marry Mr. Nahl immediately upon his graduation and go to Mexico with him, where he was offered a position as mining engineer. But parental entreaties induced her to wait a year and finish her own course at college. Now that she is graduated and is still of the same heart the family have sent their last objection to roost and Mr. Nahl is coming up from Mexico in September to claim his bride and carry her off to his picturesque adobe.

Fate of Huntington's Money

Mrs. Collis P. Huntington has just given an imposing library building to the Normal and Agricultural Institute of Hampton, Va. The edifice will cost about one hundred thousand dollars and is donated to the memory of Collis P. Huntington. Mr. Archer M. Huntington joins his stepmother in the gift and will select the list of books best suited to the requirements of the Hampton students. He is planning an expedition to the old Spanish colonies of South America, in which he is deeply interested. His researches in this fruitful but almost untrodden field have already won him the unusual honor of membership of the Spanish Academy of Medici and the Portuguese Academy of Lisbon. Meanwhile nephew H. E. Huntington is following his ambition in middle and southern California in the endeavor to become the owner of the longest trolley system in the world. His plans at present contemplate linking the leading valley and intramountain towns from Sacramento to San Diego. He already controls four hundred miles of trolley lines in the district and is right in the midst of organizing new companies and building new roads. If the new system is ever dubbed "The Huntington" there isn't much doubt but what the active soul of the energetic old railroad builder will contemplate it more fondly from the "trust" heaven than he will that one hundred thousand dollar granite edifice with its picturesque dome in Hampton. He always had an eye for the best tariff producer, did energetic old Collis.

Is More Stunning Than Ever

To her intimate friends Lucy Bradbury asserts that she will never marry again, but there are one or two young men in Southern California who are doing a lot to try to make her change her mind. The fair Lucy is if possible more stunning than ever and as perfectly gowned as when as the wife of millionaire Jack Bradbury she led the Los Angeles and Santa Monica gay set, the set that did not care what it did nor how it was done since it had a good time, and a good time meant plenty of bottles and—but that is ancient history now. Lucy's latest conquest is a young man of good family from the East named French. He is living on one of Mrs. Banning's ranches and has become popular in Los Angeles society, to which the the woman whom rumor says he wishes to marry is not admitted.

Ambition of the Athletic Colonel

Colonel E. F. Preston of San Francisco and San Mateo is one of the most picturesque attractions at Lake Tahoe this season. The Colonel, be it known, is intent on reducing his waist-line. He is one of the disciples of William Greer Harrison who abominates embonpoint, and has long been an advocate of the strenuous life that leads to the shad belly. He converted General Barnes to his athletic religion, it will be remembered, but the poor General died before he had time to pose as an "after taking" exhibit. Not daunted by the experience of the ill-fated Barnes, Colonel Preston started out to render his curves less voluptuous, and every afternoon he could be found at the Olympic Club tossing the medicine ball and perspiring like a hired man. But the medicine ball was too slow for the impetuous Preston. His flesh was stubborn, and a few pounds a week were about all that he could shed in moisture. Therefore it was that he hied himself to the high altitudes and substituted the row-boat for the medicine ball. He pulls all over the lake from early morning to the lunch hour, and in the afternoon he tramps the mountain paths with the courage of a lion. When he shows up for dinner he looks very tired but firm. He is gradually reducing his figure to the Guy Barham mold, and he looks quite graceful in his tuxedo. And yet when I gazed upon his supple form the other day I could not repress sad thoughts of the late General W. H. L. Barnes.

Miss Denfy—Charley Coupon fairly raves over her face and figure.

Miss Envy—There! I always knew it; it's the craziness in the Coupon blood coming out at last.

New Beauties on the Stage

Miss Maud Marian Taylor of Snell's Seminary does other things beside teach. She has written a number of clever sketches for stage presentation that have met with success. One of them, "An Artist's Folly," was presented at the amateur dramatic affair at Fischer's last Friday. It served to introduce Miss Beatrice Bromfield of San Mateo, a niece of Ed. Hamilton of the Examiner, and Miss Hortense Steinhart, who masqueraded under the name of Elizabeth Hartstone on the bill. The latter is a daughter of the Joseph Steinharts, formerly of Stockton but for some years residents of San Francisco. Miss Bromfield is a strikingly beautiful young woman off the stage, but in the costume her part called for—a Pierrette affair with a short skirt and peaked chapeau—she did not show at her best. She is of the Maxine Elliott build and her role of a burlesque actress was not in harmony with her type. She has a pleasing voice and a graceful stage presence. Miss Steinhart, who had the part of the artist's wife, carried it off so well as to win sincere applause from Florence Roberts, who was in a stage-box. She is a pretty girl, not yet twenty years of age, and it was against her parents' wishes that she took up dramatic study. As her heart is in her work, and her first appearance was so successful, it is possible her parents may withdraw their opposition in time.

Wasted Sarcasm

They were cleaning up the I. O. U.'s after a poker game at a well known club the other night when one of the men who had lost money paused in writing out the check and sarcastically asked of his executioner: "How do you spell your name?" "Any old way will do," he answered, sweeetly, "first put all your care in spelling your own correctly."

Heralding Her Relatives

Madame La Bavarde (Mrs. Monroe Salisbury) took occasion the other day to acquaint the anxious readers of the Bulletin with the fact that her brother, Crittenden Robinson, the professional pigeon-shot, contemplates returning to this city before long. Incidentally she related that he had won many prizes abroad and that he was noted for his firmness and other remarkable qualities which she modestly refrained from stating were characteristic of the Robinson blood. Heretofore it was popularly supposed that the column edited by Madame La Bavarde was reserved for the chronicling of the social doings of the 400, but it appears to be devoted also to the circulation of intelligence about the movements of the editor's relatives. Mr. Robinson was formerly an attorney in this city, but he never worked at it very hard. He knew more about a gun than he did about Blackstone, and I have heard at different times that he was making a very good living shooting in pigeon matches at Monte Carlo and other resorts in Europe.

"Have you had any experience at cooking?" asked Mrs. Fussy, anxiously of the new applicant.

"Experience! I should say so. I've worked in nineteen places in the last two months."

Showers of Bridal Gifts

People who have been to all the smart weddings in years say that Carrie Taylor's gifts reached the high-water mark in costliness. The stones in the diamond necklace and diamond tiara which Mr. Newhall gave her were collected abroad by a special diamond expert employed for that purpose by Mr. Newhall. Chief Wittman of the police force, who has found Commissioner Newhall a great friend, did the handsome thing and sent a gift that could compare with those of millionaires. The captains of the police pooled and purchased a dozen plates fit to serve a king on. It had been whispered that Miss Taylor objected to her fiance's position on the police board and many of her friends expected that he would resign before his marriage. Whether these gifts propitiated her is not known but the fact remains that Mr. Newhall did not resign but merely took a leave of absence while he does Europe with his bride.

Shadowing the Detective

A short time after the costly presents began arriving with such clock-like regularity the Taylor family observed, to their surprise and alarm, that their movements were being watched by a strange and dangerous looking man. The fellow kept pacing up and down in front of their establishment eyeing it warily. and occasionally, when he thought that nobody was looking, he would walk through the gate and on to the lawn where he would cast furtive glances about. The household became generally alarmed and telephoned to Mr. Taylor to come home, and observing the man from a quiet window he decided that he was either a thief or a crank. He was about to ring up police headquarters when Mr. Newhall arrived and the prospective father-in-law took him into his confidence. "It looks to me, George," he said, "as though your engagement presents were attracting a gang of thieves." "How is that?" asked the fiance. "Just look at that fellow," said Mr. Taylor, "he has been out there watching the house for the last six hours." George Newhall laughed. "That man," he explained, "is a private detective whom I sent to look out for the jewelry."

Engraved Wedding Announcements and Invitations

ROBERTSON, 126 Post Street San Francisco

An Embarassing Situation

During the wedding breakfast which followed the ceremony there occurred an embarrassing misunderstanding. Everybody present was not invited to stay to the wedding breakfast, and those who were bid to participate were told so by means of cards enclosed in each invitation. The tables were set for some two hundred guests, for the repast was in the nature of a family meal and the Hopkins, Taylor, Newhall and Pope families are very large. Nearly everybody present, however, seemeed to regard himself as bidden to the good cheer, and when the guests repaired to the table it was found that there were many more breakfasters than there were places provided. Some extra places were spread and measures taken to meet the embarrassing emergency, but some were obliged to go away who had cards, and many more retired cursing the convention which turns the wedding guest hungry away from the feast. And now society is wondering whose fault it is that the convention of wedding cards should not be understood by those who go to fashionable marriages.

Will Preserve the Newhall Home

When the Newhalls return it is expected that their house on Pacific avenue will be ready for occupancy. Immediately after his engagement with Miss Taylor was announced Mr. Newhall bought a half block on the avenue and it was thought that he would build one of the handsomest houses in the city there. But the old Newhall home in Van Ness avenue has so many tender recollections for him that George Newhall could not bear to live in any other house, so it is to be moved on to the new lot and will go through a process of remodeling that will entirely modernize it. Mr. Newhall's mother was devoted to the old home and it is out of sentiment to her love for the place that the son has resolved to preserve the building as his home.

New Style in Wedding Gowns

The gowns that the matrons of honor and bridesmaids wore at the Taylor-Newhall wedding were the gifts of the bride and may be taken as forerunners of next season's styles. The skirts struck a new keynote for they were guiltless of that sheathed-in-to-the-knees effect which has distinguished the gowns of the past two seasons. The newest skirts give the appearance of having goods to waste for they not only swish in voluminous ripples at the feet but show generous gores that dimly suggest the full gathered skirts of elder days.

Surprised by an Ante-Wedding Call

One story going the rounds of the very inner circle anent the heavy shower of wedding gifts is regarded as rather a joke on the bride. Shortly before her marriage she called on Susie Blanding. Miss Taylor was very gushing, and Miss Blanding was at a loss to account for the visit, as well as for such a demonstration of affection. But a short time thereafter came an invitation to the reception and ceremony. When asked by her girl friends what she had sent Carrie Taylor, Miss Blanding replied:

"Nothing. Why should I send her anything? I hardly know her."

Lady Martin's Predicament

Mrs. Eleanor Martin is in New York, according to one authority on matters social, and from another equally reliable source we learn that she is on her way to Europe with the Downey Harveys. As a matter of fact that indomitable lady is like the poor only in one respect—we always have her with us, for she hates to travel. It was the news of the serious illness of the Peter Martin baby that gave Mrs. Martin the idea of going on to New York. But as soon as the wires ticked the glad news of the child's recovery Mrs. Martin changed her plans. She loves a wedding, and with two of them billed here last week all the king's horses and all the king's men could not budge her. It was at the Hopkins-Murphy wedding that Mrs. Martin created a mild sensation by dropping her point lace handkerchief which the wind immediately picked up and sportively carried away. Several gallants gave chase to the fluttering bit of lace and one lanky spinster finally captured it. "Thank you," said Mrs. Martin, "I won't let that happen again. I forgot my safety pin, do you happen to have one about you?" When the young man came to, he offered to go into the house and get one though he couldn't for the life of him fancy what Mrs. Martin wanted of it. But she nonchalantly pinned her handkerchief with it on to her sleeve just above her elbow, remarking that she always pinned her lace ones there as that was the only way she could keep them.

Took Liberties With the Bride

Mrs. Martin was not the only one that the wind took liberties with. It lifted the bride's veil like a sail as she crossed the lawn and carried away several pieces of it as souvenirs of the occasion. But the newly-made Mrs. Murphy didn't seem to mind a bit. It is only a young and pretty bride like Frances who can stand the glare of an al fresco wedding. The noonday sun is not as kind as softly-shaded lamps and some of the guests did not stand the test as well as the bride. There was not a little comment over Mrs. Gus Taylor's being singled out as the only one of the Hopkins sisters to act as matron of honor. As a matter of fact they were all three asked to officiate but Georgie Hopkins-McNear had a previous bid from the stork, so of course she could not accept and Edna Taylor thought Georgie's absence from the bridal party would be less conspicuous if she kept her company. The automobile which the bride and groom raced off in would have won the prize at a fiesta and was decorated by the Mesdames Taylor and Mrs. McNear.

Gay "Bobby" Eyre

"Bobby" Eyre was King Jovial of the occasion, and as he at one time was supposed to have his heart triple-plated with devotion for Frances Hopkins his facetious humor was taken as proof of the plating being entirely worn off. He made the hit of the day by remarking that now that the Hopkins's had a Quinn and a Murphy in the family they ought to take the shamrock as the family flower. Mrs. Grundy thinks she has discovered that Mr. Eyre is very much interested in Miss King and the matchmakers are ready to cry "Next!"

Republicans are now dropping the old party war cry, "the full dinner pail," and practicing the new Roosevelt slogan, "the full perambulator."

To Frisk or Not to Frisk?

The Larkspur summer girls are said to be the gayest girls going and some alluring tales come from there. One matron with several marriageable buds complains that unless a girl is a bit gay she doesn't have a show and if she is gay she is talked about. It's a trying situation, isn't it? But it's a question for the demure ones to decide for themselves. As for the Larkspur men, they need no press agent. One man, I hear, has played havoc with the summer girls' hearts. He is a big dark Englishman who boasts good looks and a melancholy air that hints of a past.

Peer Captures American Beauty

The news of Miss Lily May's engagement at Paris to Lord Bagot furnished chit-chat at many a tea-table throughout the week, for although Miss May is a scion of a well-known Baltimore family and is in no wise personally identified with Californian society, her sister, Julia, is the present Mrs. William Babcock, and two of her brothers, it will be recalled, married the Misses Coleman. The Mays have been famous for ten generations throughout the Southern and Middle States for their good looks. The family, which was never a wealthy one, was seriously impoverished by the war and when the first of the brothers—it was Harry—arrived here he was well content to secure a position with Wells Fargo & Co., driving an express wagon. It is needless to say that he was thoroughly competent to handle the ribbons on that somewhat prosaic conveyance, for he had driven his cousin Fred's four-in-hand from about the time that he left off short trousers.

Not a Millionaire

Miss Lily May has made her home with her widowed mother in Paris for the last six or eight years, and enjoys an established position in the most exclusive circle of the noblesse of the ancien regime. She is tall, statuesque and blonde, and like all her family is a Roman Catholic. Lord Bagot was born in 1856 and is about ten years her senior. He is a member of the House of Lords and the holder of the baronage of Bagot created in 1780. He is well off, but is not a millionaire.

Were Dressmakers' Models

When old "Billy" O'Brien, one of the bonanza kings, acquired the Sharon house in Sutter street, after the failure of the Bank of California, being a bachelor he sent East for his sister, Mrs. Maria Coleman, to come and keep house for him. Mrs. Coleman was a widow with pretty twin daughters, the Misses May and Cecilia Coleman. Prior to their uncle's striking it so rich they were, owing to their beautiful figures, models in a New York costumer's establishment; whatever the Coleman sisters "tried on" for a prospective purchaser never failed to sell. They took well with San Francisco's smart set, and their weddings in the old Sutter street mansion were only a bit less grand than that of Clara Sharon and Frank Newlands, which had previously taken place in the same room. Harry May of Baltimore married one sister, his brother, Doctor May, became the husband of the other, and both couples went East to live. Mr. O'Brien and Mrs. Coleman both dying the home in Sutter street was purchased by Mrs. Abby M. Parrott and there she still resides during the winter.

The Sam Buckbees are still determined to take that automobile trip to Yosemite, though friends have assured them that the road to the valley is strewn with the splinters of autos that have in the past attempted the feat. One or two automobiles really have reached Yosemite, but—whisper it low—it took stout horses to help them over stiff ascents like Priest's hill. The Buckbees declare they are going in a horseless carriage, and horseless the trip shall be if they have to get out and pull the machine up themselves. They are trying to induce Ethyl Hager and some of the other enthusiasts to join them but it looks as though the Buckbees would have to pioneer the way alone.

Hunting for a Happy Sire

The Bohemian Club is hunting for a sire for the low jinks. The jinks have become so specialized now that a man has to be capable of writing a libretto for a comic opera in order to be able to sire successfully a low jinks. No one who is competent and who is willing to give the time has as yet been found. While a man is writing a low jinks he might be earning money for himself with far more credit and glory, hence no one seems desperately anxious to rush in to fill the breach.

All Her Wishes Granted

Mrs. George Pope expects a visit from the ciconia alba next month. The first time, she is said to have wished for a daughter, the second time for a son, and both wishes were granted. Her friends say if the long-legged bird brings "a pair" on his third trip the young mother will have the wish of her heart gratified. Mrs. Pope is one of society's prize beauties, but she is a devoted mother.

Miss Janet Newlands, daughter of Senator Newlands of Nevada, was married to Dr. William Bernard Johnston, of Washington, at Chevy Chase Church, Washington, last week. Owing to the recent death of Mrs. Newlands's sister, the wedding was a quiet one, only members of the families of the bride and bridegroom being present.

Mrs. Spreckels Won't Be Defrauded

My Paris correspondent writes that Mrs. Gus Spreckels is the "rich American" who threatened to sue a dealer in antiquities for selling her a spurious Renaissance chair. Influence hushed up the matter and neither the name of the lady nor the dealer appeared in the published reports. But the wiseacres in the American colony say it does not take a clairvoyant to tag Mrs. Spreckels as the lady who was "took in." They also claim to have "inside" information to the effect that the dealer returned to her the price she paid for the imitation antiquity rather than have his trade ruined by a public airing of the matter. Mrs. Spreckels, writes my informant, discovered the fact that she had been imposed upon in a singular way. She was displaying her "trouvaille" to a friend who goes in for Renaissance objets d'art herself. Instead of going into ecstasies over the chair the visitor laughingly demanded whether Mrs. Spreckels had bought it from a certain dealer. "Well, I have the mate to it," she teasingly said, "and you can have it if you'll pay the cartage and promise to remove it from my hotel at night, else my reputation as a connoisseur might be ruined."

How the Trick Was Played

"You needn't tell me how old Papa F—— did the trick. I played leading lady to him once myself and I know just how he does it. He told you that it was a pleasure to show things to an appreciative customer, and when you had bought everything you wanted he impulsively invited you to come some day to his chateau where he kept his rare prizes. It is a charming chateau, is it not, particularly that bedroom with the Renaissance bed and chair? Of course you wanted the chair at once—everybody does want either that or the bed and some have taken both, I suppose. Papa F—— pretends he doesn't wish to sell it, he really can't part with such a personal treasure, but you finally succeed in persuading him. Forthwith he loses no time in replacing your chair with another spurious imitation and similar flow of 'patine' on tap." But Mrs. Spreckels evidently is not nursing a reputation as a judge of antiquities and bijoutry so she gave the dealer a raking that has stirred up a howdy-do over the deceptions practiced by such dealers. Incidentally she got her money back.

Caught a Famous Collector

A story of a like fraud on a famous collector is now going the rounds of the Parisian art lovers. A wealthy amateur bought a bahut which three great experts had conscientiously certified to be genuine. Not long ago he had it moved into another room and in shifting it a panel was broken and the thing sent to Picard, the great Picard whose fortune would be still larger if he could mend reputations as deftly as works of art. The owner in great trepidation accompanied his pet prize to Picard's to see whether it was beyond mending. "Mon Dieu!" exclaimed Picard, examining it. "It is the bahut that I made myself a few years ago!"

Was Mrs. Birdie Vanderbilt Caught?

My same correspondent is responsible for the statement that it is generally believed in Paris that the antique carved book shelves which Birdie Fair-Vanderbilt bought at an extravagant sum were manufactured for a dealer who bought up half a dozen tumble-down houses in Marseilles and put cabinet-makers to work converting the oak beams and rafters into "centuries old" furniture. The wood is naturally worm-eaten and after it is carved, dry rot is cleverly imitated on it. As a chisel can not work on dry rot its presence is taken as a badge of authenticity. Thus the way of the collector is pitted with fraud.

Looked Through the Keyhole

Superintendent of Schools "Billy" Langdon is about to introduce several innovations in the school department. Among other things, he has set for himself the old herculean task of taking the department out of politics. Recently, in a meeting of the teachers, he dared to say that the school system of San Francisco was twenty years behind the times. This created no end of adverse comment, which finally came to the speaker. At a subsequent gathering, Langdon silenced his critics by bringing substantial proof to support his declarations. Some of Langdon's former deputies are the centres about whom some very amusing stories radiate. Once when one of these assistants was in the Western Addition examining schools, he had occasion to congratulate a very young teacher upon her good discipline. "But you understand," said the lady, self-depreciatingly, "my children always behave when visitors are present." "That may be," was the answer, "but I know they behave, for I looked through the keyhole in the door for several minutes before entering."

How He Impressed the Children

Another tale is told of L. A. Jordan, who until recently was one of Langdon's aids. He was visiting one of the grades in the Lincoln school. Just before he was about to leave he said: "Children, do you know who I am?" "President David Starr Jordan, of Stanford University," piped up a small tow-head. Jordan smiled benignly. "My dear little man, my name is Jordan, but I am not David Starr Jordan, neither am I the President of Stanford University. I am L. A. Jordan of the Department of Education and one of the Deputy Superintendents of Schools. David Starr Jordan is at the head of but one school, while I am at the head of many."

The Surgeon's Quandary

I heard a good story the other day about the handsomest and most prominent of the smart set physicians, a man with a large female following and who is considered a very skilful surgeon. Among his patients was a woman upon whom he had once operated for appendicitis. Subsequently she went East, and she became ill again. A physician diagnosed her case as acute appendicitis, and said that an operation was necessary. "But," said the patient, "that is not possible, for Dr. Mc—— removed my appendix several months ago." However, the physician insisted that she had an appendix and that she should go on the operating table. She did so and the operation proved successful. The physician put the appendix in alcohol, and later on he visited this city and called on Dr. Mc—— with whom he was well acquainted, and showed him the contents of the bottle. After examining it the local doctor exclaimed, "I wonder what it was I removed!"

Joyous Time for the Great Unwashed

While Labor is swatting Capital and Capital is sidestepping and trying to get in a solar plexus blow on Labor, Weary Willie is traveling cheerfully about the West and having the time of his life at the expense of the combatants. By a combination of circumstances brought about by the good times the country is enjoying, Weary, with a dollar or two in his pocket, can travel on the railroads up and down the State in as comfortable a fashion as the man who pays first-class fare. For him the day of the well-worn brakebeam is temporarily suspended, that is if he knows the ropes. Coming up through the San Joaquin valley the other day, I helped a Past Master in the Pilgrim Procession over the price of his breakfast and in a burst of gratitude he revealed to me how it is that all the Weary Willies are traveling so comfortably and freely these good old summer days.

Way the Game Is Worked

Big improvements are being pushed forward by the railroads at Chatsworth Park, in the southern part of the State, at Salt Lake and along the Redding section, and in these full dinner pail days the companies are finding a scarcity of laborers in particular sections So in the papers in the big towns they are advertising for laborers to go to Chatsworth Park, Ogden and various other places. To get to the vicinity of Los Angeles from this city all Weary Willie has to do is to go to the employment agent and put up his fee of one dollar. A traveling agent then takes charge of him and all the other applicants, gives them each a ticket and puts them on board the cars. To get from Los Angeles into Nevada, as an applicant for work on the railroad cut-off there, costs Weary Willie two dollars. Any Weary who can't bone or dig up two dollars for such a trip doesn't deserve to enjoy it. That they do enjoy it and that they are "on to the lay" is evidenced by the great numbers of them who are knocking about the State. Of course their application for work to the employment agent is all a bluff to get the railroad ticket. The other day the agent took twenty-seven "laborers" down to Chatsworth Park. They all got off at the station and the agent shouted cheerfully, "This way, boys." Every man jack of them shouldered his blankets, turned his back on the agent, and started over the hill to Bakersfield. By the end of the week most of them had exhausted the hilarities of Bakersfield so they made application to the employment agent there for work in Nevada. Each of them worked Bakersfield for two dollars and with this money they got their tickets to Utah. Most of them left the train at Sacramento, some dropped off at Truckee and a few went as far as Reno. Those who drop off at way stations in this fashion usually pick up a few easy dollars by selling the balance of their tickets to any one about town who cares to travel to its destination.

Trying to Block the Game

The railroad company has tried to stop this sort of traveling by compelling the applicants to deliver up their blankets to the agent, who is ordered to hold the goods till the work ground is reached. Weary Willie dodges giving up his kit by buying a cheap roll of comforters for fifty cents. These he ostentatiously turns over to the keeping of the agent while his private kit he secretly hands to some obliging fellow about to board the train, and asks him to take charge of it till the train starts. However Weary's summer skylarking trips over the State are bearing a different sort of fruit, for deserving laboring men have heard him brag of the trick he is playing and they are taking advantage of the opportunity offered to get to towns where they are confident they can obtain work.

Captain Cloman's Pet Story

Captain Syd. Cloman, who was so popular in clubdom as well as in army and navy circles, has gone away, but no one who knew him is likely to forget his pet story. Captain Cloman especially disliked after-dinner speaking—really disliked it. Cloman was really modest and his heart went pit-a-pat every time he was called upon to speak. His pet story under these circumstances concerned a man whose domestic happiness had been ruined because he was forced to live with his wife's family. After a great many wrangles the wife died; the husband did not regret it for he foresaw emancipation from his relatives-in-law. When the day of the funeral arrived the undertaker in charge touched the man on the shoulder and said, "As the two closest mourners you will ride to the cemetery in the carriage with your mother-in-law." "Indeed, I will not," replied the man. "But you must," insisted the undertaker, "no other carriage has been provided." "Very well, I'll walk, or go on the car," said the man, "but I won't ride with that odious woman." The undertaker drew himself up stiffly. "Then I stop the funeral proceedings right here," he declared. Under the circumstances this ultimately brought the man to terms. In this bitter predicament, he burst out: "Oh, all right. I'll ride with the old lady if you insist, but I want you to understand that you've ruined the pleasure of the entire day for me."

Mrs. Slowgirl: "Can you see why Miss Stunner wears such a peculiar bathing suit?"

Dick Hazard: "Oh, I thought everybody could see through it."

Californian Hustler in England

A young San Franciscan who has been "doing things" in England is J. Russell Selfridge, the second son of Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Selfridge. Young Selfridge was a volunteer engineer in the navy during our brush with Spain and wished to remain there, but he was nearsighted and Uncle Sam didn't want him. So the young engineer and electrician went to Switzerland where he was in the employ of Mr. Butters who owns the electric roads in Geneva. From there he joined the British Westingham Company which constructed such wonderful things in such double-quick time near Liverpool. Just now he is at Cowes in the Isle of Wight, where he is working for the King. He is bossing the building of a miniature Annapolis. The building is officially known as the New Naval Cadets' Work Shop. Not an English contractor would look at the job under a year and so this hustling American company undertook the task and the King is going to drive a golden spike at the opening ceremonies on August fourth.

Didn't Rise to the Occasion

Marshall P. Wilder, the diminutive humorist, was evidently not too tiny to receive Cupid's arrows, judging by his romantic marriage in New York on Wednesday. Generally the professional funny man fails to win the adoration of women, but Wilder must be classed among the exceptions. When Joe Redding was last in San Francisco he told a funny story about the short comedian. It was at a Lambs' Club dinner. Wilder was one of the orators, and when he rose to speak, with his hand on the table in approved Depew style, his head scarcely topped the wine glasses. He spoke a few words, when Augustus Thomas, the playwright, arose and interrupted him:

"Mr. Wilder," he said, severely, "it is customary for a speaker to rise when he is addressing the members of this club."

Where is the Stepmother?

The San Mateo colony has been augmented by the addition of Mrs. W. B. Weir, who has settled there for the summer in a rented cottage. Mrs. Weir, like her sister, Mrs. Henry Bothin, enjoys quiet country life. Mrs. Weir closely resembles her brother. By the way, when Mattie Whittier came out here to live, accompanied by her trunks and household goods, rumor said Papa Whittier intended to give his children a stepmother and had invited Mattie to come on for the event. But it hasn't happened yet, and one hears nothing more of the prognostication.

Enigmatical Philippine Situation

"What card is President Roosevelt playing in sending General Wood to the Philippines?" is the question most frequently asked in Manila official circles, according to my correspondent. Those who consider themselves on the inside, he says, claim that Governor Taft is to return home at an early date, and that General Wood is to succeed him as Civil Governor. The office of Military Governor, or Governor-General, became practically extinct when Governor Taft was inaugurated Civil Governor, July 4, 1901. Probably no man stands closer to President Roosevelt, or has his confidence to a greater degree than General Wood. In less than three years he has climbed the military ladder from Captain in the medical corps to Brigadier-General. If Wood should succeed Taft there would be changes galore in Manila official circles. Major-General Davis, who is at present the commander of the island military division, retires from active service July twenty-sixth. There is no doubt he will remain in the Philippines and succeed Professor Dean C. Worcester as a member of the Civil Commission. The appointment of Worcester was one of the mistakes that the late President McKinley lived long enough to realize.

Taft as a King-Pin

Those on the inside are wondering what the President intends doing with Taft. Some of them seem to think he would like to reward him with a seat on the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, but that he fears the Senate will refuse to confirm the appointment. At any rate, if Taft's name is sent in it will precipitate a Senatorial fight on the policy of the Administration in the Philippines and this is something the Administration is not looking for. No one may guess what story of rottenness may come out if such a mess is aired. It has been said that Ambassador Choate, who has announced his intention to resign within a few months, is to be succeeded by Taft. But when the solution of the problem was cabled to the Governor he frankly said that he considered his present position greater than that of Ambassador to Great Britain. It is understood that Governor Wright intends to resign shortly and accept an offer made him to become a member of a well known New York firm of which ex-Speaker Carlisle is a member.

Filibusters Working the Islands

The Philippine insurrection has made filibustering profitable and many adventureers have been indulging in this paying pastime since Uncle Sam poked his nose into the Orient. Just who is back of the present big scheme is not positively known but many European arms manufacturers have been busy day and night for some time filling orders for China and these islands. The latest advices report vessels carrying three hundred thousand stands of arms lying off the shores near Hongkong and awaiting the opportunity to smuggle their cargoes into these islands for the natives. It is understood that the arms are consigned to representatives of German firms here but there is so much mystery clouding the matter that the authorities are, so far, all at sea. The British authorities at Hongkong are watching the vessels but the latter have taken the precaution to keep outside the law's limit.

KING EDWARD IN PARIS.

The French papers just received from Paris bring more interesting particulars of the festivities which marked the visit of the King of England. As might be expected they offered him champagne on all occasions, and it is worth mentioning that the Montebello was the only brand served at the review in Vincennes, at the gala performance at the grand opera and at the reception at the Hotel de Ville. That King Edward did not seem to be bored by all these ceremonies is quite evident from the following account of a reporter of the Petit Journal: "The King walked to an elegant buffet, prettily decorated with orchids and white lilacs. He took the cup which was offered to him as a souvenir and filled with Montebello champagne, and turning around, he slowly raised it with a graceful circular motion. After a few words of greeting pronounced by Mr. Deville, president of the Municipal Council, the King drank in small sips, with evident pleasure, and passing," as the Petit Journal says, "his royal tongue over his equally royal lips."

Will Prevent Railroad Wrecks

"Such accidents as those that occurred, last week, on the North Shore railroad are up to the management to prevent," said a well known railroad superintendent, commenting on them. "A little better knowledge of how to run a railroad will keep them out of that kind of track jumping. Other problems in accidents bother the most of us. Inventors are working all the time to overcome the casualties that run through the most experienced management. I've just received a letter from Colorado which tells of a new device that promises to greatly reduce collisions and save thousands of lives annually. The new appliance is a sort of looking-glass to be hung on each side of an engine. It enables the engineer and fireman to see the roadbed for six miles, both in front and in rear of the moving train. The chief value of the invention is that it doesn't make any difference if the road is straight or curved. The instrument works on the principle of the mirage and is called the miragescope. It has been tested on the Rio Grande, the Colorado Midland and several other lines and has passed all the tests favorably."

The Late Queen's Fad

The late Queen of Servia was a woman with fads. She was very fond of dogs, and treated them as if they were human beings. She had a Christmas tree for them, and on the tree were hung the sort of palatable morsels that doggies love. The animals were trained to take these dainties off in a well-bred manner. The Queen used to invite her friends to the dogs' Christmas tree, and the harrylehr-like function was considered quite a social event.

Another Remarkable Strike

In talking of the remarkable strikes of this very eventful year, a well known water front labor leader declared our strike of the grave diggers ranked among the first. "But it has its fellow in Hartford, Ind.," he claimed. "Alfred E. Norton started grocery stores there and ran them 'as Christ would.' He refused to unionize his stores and the labor people forced him to close out. It's only fair to say that Norton is still in the fight and stoutly declares he'll win out yet. The whole thing is unique. Norton has some fifteen grocery stores now in the Middle West. He started them only a little while ago and his success has been phenomenal. His idea was patterned on Rev. Sheldon's book 'In His Steps,' and he determined to conduct his grocery store 'as Christ would.'" He limited his daily profits to two dollars and a half on each store and after that amount was earned each day he sold goods at cost. The poor, however, were allowed to buy all the time for cost. When Norton broached his idea everybody laughed at him and declared he was sure to fail. But he tacked up the following rules on his front door and went ahead:

Business for the day closes promptly at 6 p. m.
All employes are paid in full at the close of each day.
All transactions are cash and no books are kept.
All goods are sold at cost after $2.50 profit for the day has been made.
There is no delivery service.
No liquors, tobacco or cigars are carried in stock.
To the poor all goods are sold at cost at all times.

People Shy at First

All goods in his groceries are marked with the cost price and the selling price. Customers are notified when the daily profit of two dollars and a half has been reached by striking out the selling price, leaving the cost price, at which price the goods are sold for the balance of the day. At first people were somewhat shy of dealing with him but after they learned that he was living up to his announcements, his business grew by leaps and bounds. Within six months he was establishing branch stores in near by towns.

His Troubles with Labor Begin

Right in the midst of his success in Hartford his troubles with labor began. Mr. Norton is very careful in his selection of clerks and usually employs persons who are identified with church work and whose moral and religious standing are above reproach. No one is employed who drinks or uses tobacco. In this wise his corps of assistants are gathered from the various walks of life. This soon came to the attention of organized labor. He was asked to unionize his store. He not only refused but declared he would have nothing to do with union clerks. The result was that all good union men were requested to boycott the store run "as Christ would run it." For a few days his receipts suffered. He lost customers from the ranks of labor, then the tide began to turn and "sympathetic" customers began to patronize him. It looked as if he would win out when suddenly a new obstacle appeared. The owner of the building in which the grocery was located was drawn into the fight. He is in the grain and flour business. Pressure was brought to bear on him by the union people and he was also threatened with a boycott unless he ordered Mr. Norton to vacate. He had to give in and Norton was ordered out. Then he discovered that no other property owner in town dared to rent him a store. He has withdrawn his goods from the town, "temporarily," he says, and is preparing to buy a lot, erect his own building and get back into the fight.

Declares He Is Still In the Fight

Norton has some fifteen stores behind him now, all conducted "as Christ would." Though the profits from each, two dollars and a half per day, seem small, the aggregate nets him thirty-seven and a half dollars every twenty-four hours and $11,731.50 annually. What is more, his idea is growing. Since he started he has been on the crest of the wave of success till he dashed against the labor union. He never permits his money to remain idle. As soon as his profits have accumulated to a sufficient sum he invests the whole amount and another Christian grocery store is added to the list.

Belle (excitedly): "He tried to kiss her? What did she do in the emergency?"
Tom: "Met it face to face."

His Idea of Society

Harry Farwell of the "Chicago Farwells," who was out here two years ago and attracted some attention at Monterey, has come to the front in his native city as a rival destined to outshine the unique career of Harry Lehr. The public prints have taken to publishing extended notices of his eccentricities, all in line with Harry's bizarre parties, doll "toting," bracelet wearing and monkey-shine exhibitions. But here the comparison ends. Young Farwell compiled a "Beauty Book" and put in his wife's picture as queen of them all. Up to date he has been known as the brother of Mrs. Hobart-Chatfield Taylor and Mrs. Reginald de Koven, but hereafter these attractive names will have to be preceded with Farwell if they are to shine in the social advertising furnished by the scion of that name. Farwell is a handsome young fellow, just out of college, with wealth and leisure, and he turns naturally to society for diversion. His wife is a beauty and she warmly seconds his ambition. When an undergraduate he attended a dinner at his sister's, Mrs. Reginald de Koven, and some one asked him what his ambition was. He replied: "To lead the best set in the best city in the best country." That was in Chicago at the time society was suffering the throes of giving monkey dinners.

Sanford Bennett, Alameda's crack society baritone, is at Byron Springs with his wife. Among the other arrivals at Byron this week were W. D. English, J. P. Farley of Chicago, Dr. J. P. Fraser, J. E. Krumb, H. Kohler, Miss Alma Mitchell, Mrs. Loring Pickering, R. A. Crothers, Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Zellerbach, Robert F. Gallagher, Mrs. A. P. Hotaling and W. E. Comback.

Humor of the Pope

The Pope is not without a certain sense of humor, as is proved by the following story recently told of him: To please the friends of an artist whose zeal is decidedly in advance of his skill with the brush, the Holy Father allowed him to paint his portait. When the work was completed, although scarcely recognizable except to the eye of faith, the artist asked His Holiness to be good enough to write a text underneath it. Leo XIII, after a few moments' reflection, wrote: "It is I. Be not afraid," and signed it, "Leo. XIII."

Will Marry Her Pastor

Senator Clark's sister, Miss Ella Clark, is to marry a Los Angeles preacher. The young woman—but she is not young, and her lover is on the shady side of fifty and baldheaded—is religiously inclined and has been a member and worker in the church of which Rev. James A. Newell, D.D., is the pastor. He is a Presbyterian, and although his church is small and rather obscure, well liked. The two have known each other about nine years, Miss Clark having been a frequent visitor at the Newell home until the time of his wife's death, about three years ago. Before going to Los Angeles Dr. Newell had pastorates at Placerville and Santa Clara, at which latter place he had the same charge for sixteen years.

Has Reached Her Goal

It looks as though Mrs. Milo M. Potter "has came" so far as Southern California society is concerned. As Mrs. Jones she was the housekeeper at the Van Nuys, as Mrs. Potter she bids fair to displace even the leaders of society in that part of the State. She has been entertaining in a lavish way. Not long ago she took a car load of the most select young people of Los Angeles to the Potter in a special, where for two days they were entertained in royal style, the affair being given in honor of Mrs. Potter's daughter, Miss Nina Jones. Tonight Mrs. W. G. Nevin is to give a house party to three dozen at Brighton Beach in honor of Miss Jones, who is not having the same social difficulties to overcome as her mother.

Camping Popular This Year

But a few years separate us from the period when society never took its summer outing save on a hotel veranda. That was the period when a girl would not dare attempt the summer campaign without at least three big trunks of smart clothes. When Del Monte was her choice, all her occupation consisted in changing her clothes, and at least six changes in a day were de rigueur then. Now all that sort of thing has passed into history. The smart girl carries with her to the country a short skirt for walking, a few shirt-waists, and perhaps an organdy or dimity frock or two for dinner wear. If she has Ethyl Hager's independence, she dresses in any old thing that suits the day's program. And this year she has become a convert to camping. To have a camping place of one's own is now considered fully up to the distinction of owning a country-place. The H. K. Fields have a charming camp near Guerneville, and they entertain occasional friends up there in as hospitable fashion as if all the comforts of home were in easy reach. Their camp is luxuriously appointed, of course, but for all that 'tis a real camp. The Lunings have a beautiful camp near the Geysers, within driving distance of Cloverdale, and with a swimming pool in the river by the side of which the tents are pitched. The Shays of Oakland have their camp at Camp Taylor, and rarely miss a season there.

The Joe Tobins have rented the old Sutro place above Calistoga and are living a dolce far niente sort of life with the Van Ness's as their only neighbors. Alice Hager is visiting the Tobins and will divide most of her summer between them and the Van Ness's.

Why He Didn't Go

This sounds like one of Barney Bernard's Yiddish witticisms, but it is not. Nor was it intended as a joke. A well known Market street manufacturer was to have been one of a party that left for the Yosemite this week. At the last moment he sent word that he could not go. When asked what the matter was, he answered:

"Matter! Why, my boy swallowed a nickel and I have to wait to see how it comes out."

Sired Our Greatest Race Horses

"It is an interesting fact," said Colonel Weatherley, the well known horseman, to a group in the Palace cafe the other evening, "and one that most turfmen are unacquainted with, that all the great racehorses in this country and England can be pedigreed back to three animals that came from the Orient. That's a sweeping claim, I'll admit, but I'll wager a good round sum that if you take the winners in the last Derby, Suburban, Oaks, Futurity, Brooklyn, Metropolitan—in fact, any of the big stake events, you'll find their strain goes back to the trio of horses I'll name. All three are known in turf history by the names of the men who imported them into England. They are the Byerley Turk, the Darley Arabian and the D'Arcy Arabian. Byerley was a soldier of fortune who did martial service in Turkey and when he left for home the Sultan couldn't think of anything better to give him as a gift than a famous horse in his stables.

Gave Lexington to America

"On this charger Captain Byerley did yeoman service for King William during the campaign in Ireland. This time he was rewarded with a princely manor. But Byerley was a man of war, not of peace, and the quiet life on his new possessions was his undoing. He lost all he had, including his famous horse that has fixed the Byerley name in history. American horsemen owe this animal a monstrous debt of gratitude for he was the direct ancestor of her greatest sire, Lexington. America's other great sire, imported Leamington, can be traced back to the Darley Arabian; he was taken into England somewhere about two hundred years ago and was a very famous sire.

Bought the First Derby Winner

"Diomed, the winner of the first English Derby, was a descendant of the Byerley horse. He was brought over to this country, so you can readily understand how much we owe to that strain. Diomed was a very noted sire and died in Virginia when he was thirty-one years old. He cost his buyer one thousand dollars—a strong contrast to the prices, one hundred and five thousand and one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, that Charles Reed and W. B. Macdonough, respectively, paid for St. Blaire and Ormonde, the only other Derby winners ever landed alive in this country except Diomed and St. Giles. He proved more valuable than both of them put together. His descendant, Lexington, alone, when mated with Alice Carneal, left an indelible strain on our trotting stock. Imp. Leamington, America's other great sire, stood even closer to his Arabian ancestor. He came down through the great Eclipse. But showing the descent only goes to prove what I claimed; that is, if you trace back the strain of any of the great race horses of today, you'll find it ends in one of these three Arabian horses."

"Yes," concluded the heeler, standing next the bar, "you can run down Abe Ruef all you want, but he's all right. I'll bet while you're standing here hammering him he's going about doing good."

"Maybe," rejoined an ex-Speaker, "but who's this fellow Good, anyhow?"

His Hope May Be Fulfilled

It is one of the not uncommon freaks of fate that Anton Roman should have died within the year after the demise of his brilliant literary discovery, Bret Harte. Roman, too, was one of the few remaining of Harte's old-time Californian friends who always had a good word for the errant genius, even after his departure from America. The old bookseller was the first to see greatness in "The Luck of Roaring Camp." "California needs you, Frank," he said at the time, "but it won't take many more like that one to take you East and keep you there." Roman's prophecy was of quick fulfillment, and Harte quit the coast for good within a few months. "When Frank left," said Roman, shortly after Harte's death, "he said that we would be sure to see each other again. I had always hoped that this would be true, but now, I guess, it's too late."

Working for Renomination

The Republican politicians are so well satisfied with the returns from the Schmitz regime that they are making herculean efforts to continue it. If the lines that are now out remain taut there is every chance that he will be nominated by them at the next municipal convention. The out-and-outers are looking around for a straight Republican to head the ticket. They not only want a man of business capacity and standing but one whose record will bear the scrutiny of the labor element in the party. At this critical juncture of affairs this is a composite in politics that is exceedingly difficult to find. Schmitz's chances for renomination therefore lie chiefly in the inability of the opposition to dig up an available man that will rouse the enthusiasm of the big wings of the party. Slack, Fisk, Kellogg and Kirkpatrick have all been carefully weighed in the scales. The first three will not take the nomination for business reasons. Kirkpatrick is not an ideal candidate for the place just now because it is feared his resignation from the Harbor Commission, in order to run, might cause serious political complications; also Labor might take a clout at him for any one of a thousand unknown reasons. Meanwhile Schmitz is patching up his fiddle preparatory to drawing the long bow when he thinks is will do the most good. Just now his henchmen are exercising their strongest efforts in palliating that eccentric political trip he took East and in trying to recapture the lost labor cohort that is following Casey toward the promised land.

May Brideblossom—Mercy, I'm so nervous I can't keep from trembling.

Mrs. High Society—Don't mind it, dear, you'll get over it after your second or third venture. It's only altar fright."

Hail To The Cummerband

How much closer in touch with things eastern we are now than we were several seasons ago. Duck garments are the regularly accepted thing de rigueur at balls in New York this summer and already several smart affairs have been had here under the same authoritative dictum. The yachting clubs are responsible for the new convention, a convention I am sure that is bound to spread. It means extra comfort, less expense, and adds vastly to appearance. In the Orient the formal evening dress consists of a jacket, white duck trousers, a cummerband and dress shirt, no waistcoat at all. The costume is more becoming than the conventional black swallowtail. Young men, or old men who prefer to appear young, wear cummerbands of various hues and colors, with effects at once startling to the eye and appealing to the taste. Climate has of course a great deal to do with the lightness and color of the goods but during the period of our warm summer days some sort of a change ought to be made from the regulation stiff, conventional evening dress, and that's what the yachtsmen are trying to do.

A Plague of Saints

A Mexican correspondent tells me that the wholesale and unabating invasion of Mormons into the realm of Diaz is becoming a cause of alarm to the statesmen of the Southern Republic. Diaz, however, does not seem to care, for he has cheerfully allotted to these people a large and fertile tract of land in Northern Mexico, and thitherward the Saints are flocking at the rate of several thousand per month. It is even hinted by some of the more zealous that a new Mormon capital is soon to rear its stones amid these Aztec hills where wives are a-plenty and the Mormons may increase as only Mormons can. The granting of this territory to the Young propaganda is a bit of corruption, it is hinted, on the part of Diaz, and is well in keeping with the Tammany policy of the foxy President. As far as public sentiment is concerned the move is not a wise one. Nothing is more abhorred than polygamy among the devout and orthodox Catholics, and the open practice of plural marriages in the very midst of such people is apt to result in a bloody uprising that will drive the Mormons back to the States and cause some discomfort to the Diaz government.

"They say Abrams follows the races. I can't understand how he makes money if he sticks strictly to business."

"Easy enough—he's a pawnbroker."

Choice of Happy Harry Paris

Genevieve Carolan's engagement with Harry Poett is considered most appropriate by their friends. Genevieve is one of the so-called beauties of society and indeed she comes nearer deserving that praise than most newspaper-made beauties. She just misses being a beauty, but if Paris comes to town with that apple he would find it hard to hit upon any one girl here with undisputed right to that title. He'd have to make the apple into sauce and divide it round and Genevieve would surely come in for a spoonful. At one time it was popularly believed that she was engaged to Laurance Scott but his marriage with Caro Crockett disproved that. Mr. Poett, whom she will marry, is a brother of Mrs. J. H. P. Howard who has a place down near the Carolan home.

Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Maurer are shortly going abroad to remain for some time. They will go to Paris and to Bayreuth.

Prank of Stanford Students

College jokes are generally of a quality to weary the average citizen, but three wealthy young men from Pasadena played one last week that is well worth going down in college history. The reckless collegians came up to the city from Stanford as soon as the semester was over, and they spent a week and all their money putting a proper fresco on the town. One morning it dawned on them that, being out of funds, it was a case of "East, West, home's best," so they agreed to take the next train for Pasadena. When they counted their aggregate capital, however, they found that they only had enough to buy two tickets, so one of them would either have to stay behind or ride under the seat. Upholstery was better than free lunch, they decided, so lots were drawn for who should ride as excess baggage. As it happened the youngest and wealthiest of the lot drew the unlucky straw, and the two more fortunate tipped the wink to each other and went to the ticket office, apparently to purchase transportation for two. Really, however, they had money enough for three tickets which they duly purchased. So they started down to Pasadena with the panting young swell doubled up like a dog under the seat. Before they had gone far people who knew them got on to the car and, seeing the eccentric pose of their opulent fellow citizen's son and heir, they wondered if over-study had driven him insane. Pretty soon the conductor came along and one of the boys handed him the three tickets. "Who's the third ticket for?" asked the puzzled official. "Oh, that's for the man under the seat," said the young fellow nonchalantly. "What's he doing there," asked the conductor. "Somehow he always prefers to ride that way," said the youth as the blushing victim swore, undoubled himself and came out into the light.

Some people that have incipient paresis flatter themselves that it is their artistic temperament.

Followed the Flag to Success

Captain William T. Littlebrant, who is at the Presidio with the Twelfth Cavalry, awaiting transportation on the Sherman to the Philippines, is by no means paying his first visit to San Francisco. Though Stockton born, his father being an ex-Mayor, Captain Littlebrant received most of his early education in San Francisco. He later taught school awhile and then went to West Point, graduating high and being commissioned in the Cavalry. He married a St. Louis heiress, who died at the birth of twins. The children have for years been the charge of their father's relatives in Stockton. The Captain fought in the Cuban campaign and of late has been stationed at Fort Sam Houston, Texas.

Promotion for Diss

While Captain Littlebrant has been winning honors in the regular service, one of his old schoolmates here, J. Wallace F. Diss, has been winning his spurs in the National Guard. Lieutenant-Colonel Diss, aide-de-camp on the Governor's staff, has just been commissioned Colonel and Chief of Engineers. Colonel Diss has long resided in the South, and is prominent in politics in that section. Some ten years ago he was in the newspaper business.

There is another pretty button wedding on the tapis when Miss Clara Swigert, eldest daughter of Colonel Samuel Swigert, U. S. A., will be the bride, and Lieutenant O. P. M. Haggard of the Second Cavalry the groom, and the wedding is to take place next month. Miss Swigert has earned for herself the past winter the reputation of being one of the most expert of chafing dish cooks, all her concoctions being pronounced "simply delicious."

Captain B. C. Morse, U. S. A., formerly on the staff of General Shafter and one of the most popular officers who ever held that position, arrived here a few days ago en route, with his regiment, the Seventeenth Infantry, to the Philippines, whence they will sail on the first of July.

He (on the beach)—I won't hurt you if you'll let me kiss you.

Gay Del Monte

There will be a week of polo at Del Monte beginning the first of August, followed by the Pacific Coast Golf Association's championship tournament, which will also include the match for three beautiful Del Monte cups. The season at the hotel is now in full swing, with auto parties around the seventeen-mile drive, golf matches, evening parties at the club house, swimming and fishing. Among those who came down this week are Mr. and Mrs. Douglas Watson, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Murphy, Fred Greenwood and C. W. Earle. J. F. Williams, the much written about South African mine owner, is at the hotel with his family.

Told Over the Wine

AND OVERHEARD AT BINKBAND'S.

[Scene: The interior of a fashionable restaurant at 7 p. m. The brilliantly lighted place is filled with modishly dressed people, most all of whom are in high spirits and bent on getting all the enjoyments that money affords. Dick Blase is sitting at a table a deux at one side of the big room. With him is that exceedingly well preserved and handsome widow, Mrs. Dasher.]

Dick Blase (taking up the menu card)—Same old scene; same old faces and, b'gad, it looks like the same old menu. Why don't the roof fall in and make a change?

Mrs. Dasher—Nonsense, Dickie, dear. Come, get out of your doldrums. Order some wine on the ice. There, I think that's quite an inspiration as a starter. (Blase continues to gloomily scan the menu and pencil his composition of the dinner while Mrs. Dasher gaily proceeds to clear her mind.) You're getting too moody, Dickie, and I warn you I'm not going to permit it. Perk up, or take the consequences. (Shakes a forefinger ominously at him.) Be careful that you select an irreproachable dinner or I'll—I'll—yes, I'll dine next with Tommy Tower. There he is, and still with his comedy lead wife, I do declare.

Dick Blase (brightening)—Gad! so he is. I thought they were to be divorced after that incident at the San Mateo roadhouse. Why, Charley Rappide told me at the Del Monte clubhouse that he expected to marry her before fall. He had on an elegant skate at the time and was spouting confidences like a gusher so he must have been trying to tell the truth.

Mrs. Dasher—Never doubt it. But Daisy Tower has all the money in that combination, you know—loads of it—and I fancy Tommy, with his florid tastes, doesn't like being cut loose from such a bank roll, even when he finds his wife in—well, in such a rapid way.

Dick Blase—Eh, yes—oh, I see, sort of Charley Rappide way, eh? Begad, that's good, Elsie, but you always were deucedly bright.

Mrs. Dasher—Precisely. How delightfully you are improving. I hope you now begin to discern the advantage of employing me as your physician; for one thing it will save you the expense of—well, say a trained nurse. Try some of these truffles on your fillet. They're good for the kidneys. This is rattling good wine, isn't it, Dickie dear?

Dick Blase—Out of sight. Have some more. Here, garcon, fix the wine. Hulloa, I say, look over there. Isn't that Gadsby? Bud Gadsby. Jove, how gray he's grown! Egad, I haven't seen the little duffer since he went dotty on Flora Flashlight and took her to the Orient. Let's see, that was some six years ago. Didn't he give her a whirl in Paris? Of course he did. They say she cost him close on to one hundred thousand dollars and twenty years of his life before she let go. Egad, he looks it; walks as if he were an ex-member of the paresis club, doesn't he?

Mrs. Dasher—Serves him right when he might have married Maybel Gaybred and lived happy ever afterwards. Maybel had a sloppy crush on him at that time. I've always wondered what there was between them. Bless me, there's Mabel coming in now with young Van Sittart. And, Dickie, as I live, she's hooked him sure. See, she's wearing the Van Sittart diamond on her collar. I'd know it among a thousand. Old Mrs. Van Sittart showed it to me, one day, and told me the brilliant's history. Well, well, I hope for dear old Maybel's sake that it's really the ring and the book this time. Maybel can't afford to keep up the gait she's going. Men have memories and—well, she won't always have that face and figure to hook a gudgeon like young Van Sittart.

Dick Blase (with a show of enthusiasm)—Begad but isn't she a high-class filly? I suppose it's the old Stetson stock in her. It's wicked blood, maybe, but it's the true blue blood all right. She's a thoroughbred. Just look at that bust. What a swing she gives to her hips as she walks. What coloring and what a carriage. Whew, but she's a stunner if there ever was one. By Jove, if I felt half as young as Van Sittart, I'd give her all the Van Sittart jewels, every last damn one of them, and throw in Shreve's in the bargain, just as a tribute to beauty, you know.

Mrs. Dasher—Yes, Dickie, dear, and I know the kind of tribute you'd exact.

Dick Blase—Elsie, did I ever—

Mrs. Dasher—No, dear, and you're not going to now, I'm sure, so order another bottle, not quite so cold. Who are those two Paris models with the Count?

Dick Blase (setting down his well used wine glass)—Hulloa, he has hooked something new, hasn't he? They're New Yorkers, that's patent in their carriage and clothes. Ha, there's Gadsby bowing to them, so they belong to the elect, "our society: hot society," as the song goes.

Mrs. Dasher—Yes—er, as the song goes. I suppose from the looks of things we'll see them later in the nominations of the San Rafael clique. That blonde will look somewhat different after a hayride to Marati's, won't she?

Dick Blase—Have some more wine. Are they going to give the regular course of hilarities over there this summer?

Mrs. Dasher—That's what the dickie birds say.

Dick Blase—The dickie birds had—hic—I beg your pardon—I say the dickie birds had better not chirp too loudly this season or the papers may have a few more of the same old kind of sensations. That story about Billy Highlife and his wife came within an ace of getting out. Sadie must have been deuced clever to manage it as she did. How did she do it, anyway? You know everything, Elsie; you ought to know the inside of that.

Mrs. Dasher—Maybe I do, Dickie. But hadn't you better pump a little less strenuously on the wine? Remember we are to go to the vaudeville tonight yet. What were you remarking—oh, about Sadie's cleverness in the—the—but the word clever doesn't express her talents. Sadie's attainments in—um—well, social life, would land her first under the wire in any class event in the diplomatic service. When Billy came home to the hotel so unexpectedly that night he had on a skyscraping edge. Sadie was on to his condition as soon as she heard him fumbling at the door, so she refused to open it. She told him to go to the clerk, get another room and stay there till he was in proper condition. Billy was sporting either a brash temper or a suspicious mood; anyhow, he cut her short by beginning to kick on the door. Think of that situation in a fashionable hotel, for a girl of Sadie's temperament. Of course, heads began to pop out of doors all along the corridor to see the shindig. What did Sadie do? When the woodwork began to crack, she threw on a long cloak, coolly flung open the door and calmly walked down the hallway to the room of her fast friend, Millicent. Naturally, Billy followed her to have out his tipsy say and naturally, when they both returned to their own rooms—well, appearances were all on Sadie's side and Billy had to apologize.

Dick Blase—They say—um—I beg pardon—they say Harry Highbury isn't chasing her so—so warmly since that ep-episode.

Mrs. Dasher—Not so openly, perhaps, but just as warmly. By the way, Dickie, hadn't you better turn off the wine. You've had enough for tonight. Have you noticed the magnificent black pearl Sadie's wearing? That's Harry's last badge.

Dick Blase (with a grin)—Same as Mamie's diamond solitaire, eh? um—beg pardon.

Mrs. Dasher—Not a bit of it, you suspicious old boy. Mamie got that diamond of Reggie Million all right, all right. She gave him just one kiss for it, really only one, and with not the slightest bit of feeling in it. She's just about as simple as Reggie, you know, and she told me all about it in the first flush of wearing it. I'm sure it's a straight story for right after she got it Reggie developed the fever that produced the Stanyan street flat and that little blonde Rivoli chorus girl, and the automobile and all the other impossible things.

Dick Blase—Well—er—well, I never could quite make out whether Mamie was—er—just simple, or—er—er. I say, Elsie, what's the matter with having another small bottle—just one?

Mrs. Dasher—Not a smell. You bad boy, you've been drinking too much already. Come along now. We'd better cut the vaudeville. I'll take you to your rooms and fix you up for the night. You're in no fit condition to turn loose by yourself now. I'm afraid you'll meet tempting companions at the club and be led into making a night of it. So come along with me.

Dick Blase—Orright, an', Elsie, I say, be a little bit good to me for ol' times.

Mrs. Dasher—Don't talk nonsense, Dickie. Walk straight as we go out. Keep up appearances. I'll see what's best for you when I get you to your rooms. Remember, I told you I'm your physician—not your nurse. (Exeunt)

Lines To My Wife

Your clinging arms lie 'round me, soft and warm,
And in your eyes shines all the love you feel;
I read its message in your trembling form
And faultless charms you coyly half reveal.
You're mine, all mine. Each trick and roguish glance
How well I know them, know each trifling grace
That marks you vulner'ble to love's advance.
How well, how well, I know that trustful face.
In playful mood you ask if I still love
The woman of my choice—
I wonder what you'd do
If I, defying earth and heaven above,
Should tell you just how tired I am of you.

Smokes Ten-Centers

General Frederick Dent Grant is said to be as fond of the weed as was his famous father. He likes strong cigars. A story was told me the other day apropos of the General and his fad. A porter had just relinquished his traveling bags and the General handed him a half-dollar.

"If it's all the same, sah," said the porter, "I'd rather have a cigar instead."

The General smiled in a puzzled way as he returned:

"Why, certainly, but you can get five with that coin."

Automobile Topics

Mr. Cuyler Lee, agent for the Western Automobile Co., 201 Larkin street, is in receipt of an interesting letter from Willis Pike, manager of the Castle Bros.' interests in Fresno. Very recently the firm purchased three of Mr. Lee's machines and Mr. Pike took one of them to Fresno on the initial trip. In recording his experience Mr. Pike writes: "I arrived home Sunday after a very pleasant and uneventful trip from the machine's standpoint. The auto worked beautifully all the way through. The little machine did not make a miss and saying we were delighted and pleased is putting it mildly. We made the run from Oakland to San Jose in an hour and fifty-five minutes, not half bad for a beginner, and we could have easily averaged for the whole trip twenty-two miles straight."

Launching a Big Enterprise

L. Eugene Lee, for the Pacific Automobile Company, has just purchased the big lot at the southwest corner of Golden Gate avenue and Octavia street for seventy-five thousand dollars. On this site the company promises to erect one of the very finest automobile establishments in this country at a cost of one hundred and twenty thousand dollars. In the plans of the new building the ground floor alone will have a capacity for three hundred machines arranged in a semi-circle, after the fashion of a modern locomotive roundhouse. There will be reception rooms for ladies and gentlemen and everything in automobiling conveniences will be provided. Woodworking and upholstering departments are to be introduced on a large scale. On the premises will also be a safe and grill where superior and prompt service is promised. Other floors will be devoted to the machine shop, supplies and fitting, renting department, blacksmith shop, etc. There will also be clubrooms, a library and other conveniences, gotten up in such style as to make the place the most attractive of its kind on the coast. The men who are handling this big enterprise are well known for the thorough and successful way in which they handle such ventures. The principal members of the company are: E. P. Brinegar, Harry D. Morton, George S. Nixon, Frank M. Lee, Henry C. Cutting, W. Arthur Stringer, Paul Seiler, Jessie S. Andrews, Reuben P. Hurlburt, I. N. Miller, J. D. Lee, Byron Jackson, J. M. Wilkins, W. S. Arnold, P. F. Rocket, G. W. Andrews, L. Eugene Lee.

Nearly all the municipal officers of New York who are obliged to go about in rigs while attending to their duties have given up their horses and have taken to automobiles.

Small Cost of Automobiling

Henry Norman has figured out the following cost of an automobile for a family of two in modest circumstances. He prefaces with the statement that the family under consideration will save something on cab fares and will more than likely take its whole holiday in using the machine. This saving of fares and usage he puts down at $75.00. His budget figures are:

Cost (loss on selling it after two years' use, per annum)	$250 00
Tires (two years average)	75 00
Gasoline (4,000 miles per annum at 20 miles per 22-cent gallon)	44 00
Oils, etc.	50 00
Repairs	26 00
	$445 00
Less saving in cab and railway fares	75 00
Net yearly cost	$ 370 00

His warning advice is: "Buy your automobiles from the makers or the makers' agents; discover by comparison of prices at what places you can get supplies and accessories cheapest, combined with direct personal relationship, with an intelligent, responsible dealer who knows his business, and then getting everything from him, let him know that you propose to do so until you find out that he is overcharging you; never permit your driver to purchase supplies, nor consult him about your purchases, and never under any circumstances let your automobile be 'overhauled.' With this advice I think I have opened to him the door to a possession which, more than anything else in the material world, will increase his interests, his opportunities and his happiness." —The Automobilist.

"Harold, I can't possibly understand how you can be so cheerful over the fact that the lawyers haven't settled up papa's estate yet."

"Why, it proves conclusively there must still be something left."

What Constitutes a "Drunk"

The Chairman of Boston's Police Board, Hon. William Henry Harrison Emmons, has just established a standard of inebriety, by which he proposes to measure all cases coming under his jurisdiction. His test is simply and clearly defined. "I consider," he says, "that a man is drunk if his gait is unsteady, though his mind is clear. If a man's utterance is not clear and his breath smells of liquor, he may be able to walk as well as you or I, but he is nevertheless drunk. To my mind it makes no difference whether or not the man is able to keep moving along towards his home; if any one of these conditions is found present, he is drunk and I should expect the police to arrest him." If the Emmons standard were adopted in San Francisco, the police would be kept rather inordinately busy, especially since the cocktail habit has spread itself to the gentle sex. The chewing gum manufacturers might, however, reap a benefit. Boston must be an awfully naughty place.

STAGE

At the Columbia

Nat Goodwin donned this week that comfortable role of the convivial bachelor that fits him so snugly in "When We Were Twenty-One." Nothing that he has done of late years seems so spontaneous, so natural. The piece was written to fit him and Esmond could not have selected happier situations. They are set in a wholesome domestic atmosphere with an excursion into the gayer life. All the phases of that gayer life have been artistically portrayed by Goodwin on and off the stage till he is a master craftsman in every shade of them. It is the field par excellence of the born comedian. The situations on the domestic side of the play offer him the chances where he has always been ambitious to win success—in pathos. And those same situations contribute that fireside atmosphere of wholesomeness which have made it so attractive to the higher class of theatregoers and which have raised it as a production above the mass of plays turned out by the playsmiths of the past decade. Since the company was last here the third act, the one bit of tinsel, has been refurbished, a manifest requirement, but it still flashes like a false gem in a setting. The cast is almost identical with the exception of Miss Dean. She is new in her part and suffers in comparison with her predecessor, Maxine Elliott. But time will unquestionably bestow on her those fine and delicate touches which enable the other members of the company to make such an excellent production.

The Orpheum

The Orpheum shines with a splendid all-star cast this week. It is a timely, well balanced bill, that goes with a snap and gives one the full round of vaudeville entertainment, from trick and ventriloquism, through farce comedy to high class music. Lydia Yeamans Titus, after her successful trip abroad, is back with a number of bright, catchy songs, sung as only she can sing them. The gallery began to whistle them the first night, proof that they are of the right stuff. She is unique in her line and has never failed to score a hit during her engagements here. The way the applause has been recalling her this week shows that she is still keeping her record. Drawee and his dog assistant do some unusually clever juggling. The World's Trio contribute several captivating novelties in singing and dancing and Hayes and Healy unload a budget of extravagant comicalities that would draw a laugh from a grave-stone. They are unusually good in their line, but so is the rest of the bill for tnat matter. Go and you'll understand why.

"The Greenhorn" at the Central

M. B. Curtis did not belie his new play when he said it was good. It is a very cleverly built frame for the comedian's picture of a Hebrew type. "The Greenhorn" has a New York background, and the scenic features are elaborate. Interest naturally centres in Curtis himself, the first exponent of the Jewish type in comedy. We have had others since "Sam'l of Posen" made his debut—Warfield, Bernard and their imitators—but Curtis still holds his own in his particular line. He is very strongly supported by the company, an especially good bit of work being Georgie Woodthorpe's Swedish servant.

One of the features of the Amelia Bingham season at the Columbia will be the magnificent display of gowns from Paquin and Worth. Wilton Lackaye, W. L. Abingdon, Ferdinand Gottschalk, James Carew, Alfred Fisher, Madge Carr Cook, Bijou Fernandez, Frances Ring and Lillian Wright are of the support.

When "Twirly Whirly" was presented in New York it threatened to be rather a failure until Fay Templeton sang a song called "My Particular Friend." It turned out that the song was written by Wilton Lackaye, who can do other things beside act.

White Whittlesey is running James Neill a close race for versatility. He has already played in Henry Miller, John Drew and Frank Mayo roles, and next will give us a Robert Mantell part and then an Alexandro Salvini.

Charles Wyngate, who has joined the Alcazar company, is not playing his first engagement at that theatre. He was of the company some years ago, and last year played there with Florence Roberts. He is a handsome man, and a strong addition to the stock.

Broadhurst & Currie will send their funny farce, "Mr. Jolly of Joliet," to the coast next season. Edward Garvie will again appear in the title role.

Mr. J. H. Linehan of Chicago, general agent for the Western and Southern department of the Phenix Insurance Company of Brooklyn, N. Y., has been in the city for some time reorganizing the Pacific Coast agency. He has installed Mr. A. C. Olds, the well known Missouri insurance man, as coast representative. Mr. Linehan expressed himself as being much pleased with the insurance situation on the coast, and is very enthusiastic over the remarkable development of California.

A New Tosca and Scarpia

While opinions may differ as to Nance O'Neil's La Tosca, there can be but one verdict upon Ratcliffe's Scarpia. It is a remarkable piece of dramatic work, differing from that of the other Scarpias we have seen in purpose and detail. Ratcliffe's Scarpia is the tiger, as opposed to the bull of the other versions. He is subtle, and conceals his savagery beneath the mask of piety and courtesy. One can conceive the iron grip beneath the velvet glove in Ratcliffe's Scarpia. In the third act, where his dissimulation culminates and the hypocrite unmasks himself before his intended victim, Ratcliffe holds the audience's attention as it were in a vise. In the fourth act, he does not perhaps carry one along by the spell of his acting as MacDowell does. It is in this fourth act that MacDowell always scored his best innings with his auditors. MacDowell, the big, handsome animal, can bring out the brute in Scarpia's role more forcibly, if less artistically, than Ratcliffe, who is not of imposing build. But no one should fail to see this new Scarpia, if but for the purpose of contrast, and forming an opinion on the character itself. MacDowell's personality always obtruded itself so that a correct estimate of the Sardou creation was rendered wellnigh impossible. Nance O'Neil's La Tosca is also different from those of Fanny Davenport and Blanche Walsh. She is graceful and charming in the light work of the first act, and proceeds without any false notes to the pathos and tragedy of the third act. In the fourth, by omitting some of the business we have grown accustomed to, she lessens the effect. Her strongest work is in the third act. The other characters are faithfully portrayed. Millward makes an effective Mario, Ricca Allen as the Queen and Agnes Ranken as Gemerino are happily cast. The version is not so clear cut as the Davenport "La Tosca."

Features of Next Week's Bills

It's a great company that Amelia Bingham, the only actress-manager of our country, has gathered about her for "The Climbers." Wilton Lackaye and his wife will be of the roll, and Bijou Fernandez, who are all favorites here. "The Climbers" is very modern in dialogue and setting, and there will be some beautiful costumes worn. The second play of the engagement will be "A Modern Magdalen." The sale for the opening night of the Bingham season at the Columbia has been very large.

At the Chutes will be seen Kartelli, slack wire performer, Robinson and Grant, George W. Moore, monologuist, Kraft and Daly; character entertainers in "The Copper and the Kid," and Frank Cushman, the "20th Century Minstrel," in a new act. The Cabaret de la Mort is a new addition to the attractions.

Barney Fagan and Henrietta Byron will make their first appearance in this country in over six years at the Orpheum. As a popular song writer, dancer and comedian, Mr. Fagan holds an enviable position and Miss Byron is one of the daintiest comediennes before the public. They were the reigning sensation of London for five years and have been in Australia for the past seventeen months, where Mr. Fagan staged all of the big pantomimes for Williamson and Musgrove. The Wang Doodle Comedy Four, a quartet of colored entertainers, will present "The Darky Dancing Master," for the first time in this city. Julian Rose, in "Our Hebrew Friend," will be new here. William J. Evans and Gladys St. John will also be new. Vernon, the ventriloquial star, will introduce his original creation, a walking figure of Nat W. Wills, "the happy tramp," and give a number of the monologuist's best songs and parodies, by special permission of Mr. Wills. Lydia Yeamans Titus will continue. Mabel McKinley, a niece of the late President McKinley, will shortly be heard at the Orpheum.

Nance O'Neil will give the last two performances of "La Tosca" at the California tonight and tomorrow night. On Monday night we are to see her for the first time in "Fedora," which is considered by many to be the greatest of all the Sardou dramas. The play is full of opportunities for a display of the powerful dramatic and emotional art of the sort that Miss O'Neil revels in and it should show the remarkable young actress to a better advantage than anything she has yet given us. Following "Fedora," Miss O'Neil will present here for the first time "Romeo and Juliet," with new scenic effects.

In "Monbars" in which Robert Mantell made one of his sincerest successes, White Whittlesey will have a most congenial role. The Alcazar production will have all the New York scenery and effects. Monbars, the hero, is a child of the people, a navy underling during England's war with France. He becomes a pirate captain and makes money for himself and the people he loves. Then he falls in love with a Marquis's daughter, whom he saves from a mad dog's bite. There's a lot of "go" in "Monbars" and it will crowd the Alcazar at every performance.

Tomorrow night at the Grand "In Central Park" will receive its premier here. The production will be the same as that used by the Rogers Brothers at the Knickerbocker, New York. The piece is in three acts representing the interior of a matrimonial agency, the roof garden of the Waldorf Astoria and Central Park. The last will be rendered effective by the introduction of carriages, horses, automobiles and bicycles. The company will be strengthened by the addition of Camille Walling, soprano, and Kitty Irwin, character comedienne. Among the specialties will be new parodies by Raymond and Caverly; trio, "Rosalie, My Royal Rosy," Cheridah Simpson, Raymond and Caverly; "When Reuben Comes to Town," Camille Walling, Martha de Roy and Raymond and Caverly; "Duchess of Central Park," Camille Walling; drinking song, Cheridah Simpson; coster song, "Father Wants the Cradle Back," and ballad, "There's Nobody Just Like You," Harold Crane; "If Cabby Told Half that He Knew," Cheridah Simpson; song and dance, "You Have Such Beautiful Dreams," and Japanese serenade "Kijo," Budd Ross and Anna Wilks; "Matrimonial Agent," Herbert Sears, "The Girl You'd Just Like to Know," Louise Moore, and a new military march by Charles H. Jones, performed by forty beautiful girls. At its conclusion Cheridah Simpson will appear attired in doublet and hose and sing "The Music of the Military Band."

On Monday Misses Hope and Emerson, assisted by the entire chorus at Fischer's, will introduce a great novelty into "Twirly Whirly." The mangement intends that this specialty shall come in the nature of a surprise. There will also be two new additions to the company. C. C. Whelan, the specialty actor who has appeared in all the leading vaudeville houses of this and foreign countries, and Tom Guise, the basso. The next show at Fischer's will be the funny travesty on "Under the Red Robe" and "The Three Musketeers."

"Madelaine, or the Magic Kiss," will be the Tivoli production on Monday evening. It will be a novelty to many. The plot concerns the legend of Grimm, which runs, that when one of the noble family reaches the age of one hundred years, he will die if he is not kissed by a pure young girl, but in case this is brought about, twenty-five years will be taken from his life. Stevens will be the Baron, Hartman the Doctor and Webb the Baron's scribe. Cunningham is the schemer, Annie Myers Matrimonial Mary, Lee the steward, and Marie Welsh Margot.

As the Central's midsummer attraction, "Joshua Whitcomb," will be put on with James Corrigan in the title role. It was Joshua Whitcomb who made Denman Thompson famous, and the piece has a pretty heart thread running through the comedy scenes. In conjunction with the fun there are specialties galore, among them being vocal numbers by Myrtle Vane, Millar Bacon and the Columbia quartet, and a whistling solo by Eugenie Thais Lawton.

"Ben Hur" Coming

Gottlob, Marx & Co. are making elaborate preparations for the coming of "Ben Hur." The Grand Opera House has been secured for the engagement, which will open on November second. Owing to the magnitude of the production, the piece cannot be staged in any other city in this State. Klaw & Erlanger will mount the play here exactly as presented in New York, for one entire season, and during the past three years in the principal cities of the East and Middle West. The great chariot race, originally presented with but two chariots and eight horses, will be staged here with four chariots and sixteen horses. Three trained camels will also be utilized in the production here.

San Francisco Honored

Three San Francisco musicians have been honored by an invitation to become members of the international committee of honor for the Richard Wagner monument festivities in Berlin, during the week beginning September fifth. These exercises are to be a gala event in Germany. The three San Franciscans who have received and accepted invitations to serve on the committee are Hugo Mansfeldt, Hermann Genss and Joseph Beringer.

Without Blare of Trumpets

A very prominent artist came to San Francisco some months ago and settled down to a quiet home life. There was no announcement of her coming and few outside of those who know everything musically had any idea that our city had received such attention. This newcomer, who has, I am told, been compared with Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, is Mrs. Mabel Gray Lachmund. She finished her musical education with four years in Leipsig, with Bruno Zwintscher and Reinecke at the Conservatory, and with Emma Koch of Berlin. She came to San Francisco directly from Europe after a brief three months at her home in the East. In a quiet way, Mrs. Lachmund has already created a stir in musical circles by her rendering of Chopin and Schumann, of which she has made a specialty. She has done some accompanying work abroad and here that has won her praise from famous singers. Mrs. Lachmund is now staying in Berkeley. She intends to appear in recital work next season on this side of the bay.

Anne Boleyn's Song

A most beautiful and little known air of the time of Henry VIII is "Oh, Death, Rock Me Asleep." Both music and words are supposed to have been composed by unfortunate Anne Boleyn. Its tune and one verse are to be found in a manuscript of Henry's time, written for one voice without accompaniment. There is in the British museum, however, another copy with accompaniment for the lute. The tolling of the passing bell and the utter melancholy of the whole air perfectly represent the misery of the words. One verse is:

"Oh, Death, rock me asleep! Bring me to quiet rest;
Let pass my weary, guiltless life out of my careful breast;
Tool on the passing bell, ring out my doleful knell,
Let thy sound my death tell.
Death doth draw near me,
There is no remedy."

Shakespeare alludes to it in "Henry IV" when Pistol exclaims:

"What! shall we have incision? shall we imbrue?
Then, death rock me asleep, abridge my doleful days!"

Carrie Roma's arrangement of "Nearer My God to Thee" for soprano solo and quartet with violin obligato, was a feature of the musical services at the First Congregational church, Oakland, for two successive Sundays.

The King of England and the Czar of Russia are both expert banjo players.

Miss Gertrude Judd is spending her vacation in Sonoma county.

Henry Heyman is the guest of Mrs. W. B. Collier and family at their summer home, Rancho Kabana, near Lakeport.

Valuable for Mothers

Every little girl, whether of high or low degree, seems to be born with an innate love of housekeeping, and to make dollie's bed, wash and iron her clothes, cook little messes and give tea parties with toy dishes is the joy of her existence. Unfortunately this natural bent is not always, or even often cultivated, and the little housekeeper loses her interest and either never regains it, or is forced through rebellion and sulks to learn what, by judicious management, she should have glided into unconsciously. "The Child Housekeeper," a little manual compiled by Elizabeth Coulson and Anna G. Chittenden, though meant as an assistant for those engaged in teaching elementary domestic science, ought to awaken mothers to their opportunities. The book is not intended as a manual of training for domestic servants, and there is nothing in it that needs a book from which to teach it, but for all that the book is a welcome addition to the library of how to do things. The authors wisely presuppose that while homes are provided with every comfort they are not supplied with the latest scientific apparatus, and the lessons are arranged with a view to utilizing such paraphernalia as are sure to be available. Each lesson is introduced by a suitable song, music and words by Alice R. Baldwin, and at the end is a list of stories which can be read or told to the little girls, or placed in their hands for reading. Throughout are bits of verse, and hints and stories, such as any wise mother ought to have at her tongue's end to add interest while her little maid learns to perform her tasks, and while, as before mentioned, the book is designed for teachers, it is full of suggestion to those whose classes are composed of their own little ones. Mechanically it is one of the prettiest books of the year. It is printed in fine, clear type, on excellent paper, and profusely illustrated. The cover is in a checkerboard pattern of blue and white, with a centre design of a scroll of music surrounded by housekeeping implements. It is issued by the A. S. Barnes Company for $1.50, and one must add, cheap at the price.

Little Novels

The book of short stories is said to be a worse proposition, from a commercial standpoint, than the volume of poetry. It usually happens that when a purchaser has examined the index, he finds that he has read nearly, if not quite all the contents, whether he has preserved the magazine numbers or not, and unless in exceptional cases, he does not care to re-read them. The Macmillans have adopted a new plan of publication. Some of the short-long stories which have attracted particular attention are published by them in a "Little Novel" series. "Philosophy Four" is a college story, detailing how two gay grasshoppers wasted their time during the term, and were brought up standing by the imminence of examination and the certainty of failure and its consequences. The luck that favors fools and children was with them, and those who have not forgotten their own school and college days will appreciate all that happened. Owen Wister is the author of the tale, which made its appearance first in Lippincott's magazine. Another of the series is "Mr. Keegan's Elopement," by Winston Churchill. This was originally printed in the Century, before Mr. Churchill became known as the author of "best-sellers," and will probably be quite new to a large number of readers. Mr. Keegan did not elope himself, but he managed all the details, and indeed, might be said to have produced the elopement, which he brought off successfully. The affair took place on, or rather from, the island of Madeira, and was conducted on novel lines.

Clever Short Stories

To pass over F. Hopkinson Smith's volume of short stories, "The Under Dog," will be to miss a treat. There are thirteen of them, but if there is anything unlucky about the number it is in there not being more of them. They vary, from grave to gay, but are always concerned with some one of the unfortunate brotherhood who always "get the worst of things." "These Under Dogs —grave and gay—have always appealed to me. Their stories are printed here in the hope that they may also appeal to you," says the author in concluding his preface, and there will be few readers not willing to assure him that they do. The first three tales, grouped under the general title, "No Respecter of Persons," concern the "moonlighters," and the manner in which a literal interpretation of the revenue laws is made to work hardship on the least guilty. "Cap'n Bob of the Screamer" is our old friend, "Caleb West's" assistant. "Plain Fin—Paper Hanger," is a running mate for Terrence Mulvaney, and it is a lucky thing for the army and the London constabulary that they never happened to meet. "Compartment Number Four" relates a most humorous mix of identities, owing to the prevarication of the station agent with regard to sleeping car berths. It resulted in confusing some European royalty, traveling incognito, with the supposed members of a circus troupe. Perhaps the story which makes the deepest impression is that of "Marny's Shadow." "The Diffendorfer" is such a lonely figure, and one has a haunting notion that "Diffendorfers" are all about us, if we only knew. But there is something good for every temperament, and there is so much youth and life about the telling that it is hard to convince oneself that there is another Smith, a man of middle age, and a son of this author, who is also writing books. "The Under Dog" is from Charles Scribner's Sons. Some of the illustrations, of which there are a full dozen, are the work of the author.

Elinor Glynn, who wrote "The Visits of Elizabeth" and "The Reflections of Ambrosine," and who is preparing to enlighten us concerning the visits of Elizabeth's offspring, is a sister of Lady Duff Gordon, who conducts the London dressmaking establishment known as "Lucette's."

As to Juvenile Literature

Attention has been directed, once more, to the great improvement in children's books, which, even in the middle of the last century, were of such a doleful cast, discussing death and immortality and relating the pious conversations of most unnatural little people who all died young, and who, we cannot but believe, were happier dead than living. The whole object and aim of children's books, in those days, was to inculcate moral lessons, to instruct, and to preach. The elders preached at the children and the children preached at one another. Their playground, by preference, was the churchyard, and by way of entertainment they copied epitaphs, measured the length of the little graves, and reflected that even babies died. Whether or not there were any flesh and blood children who acted as models for these unearthly little creatures, with their pious comments, at the ripe age of five years, it is certain that their type was considered most admirable, for any one who has had the opportunity to overhaul an old Sunday-school library, almost the only source from which children could draw reading matter, can testify to the lugubrious biographies and memoirs of imaginary, or at least unknown "saints." While there is no denying the morbid unwholesomeness of such "literature," it had one decided merit—that of early turning children away from children's books, if at the same time it did not turn them away from reading. In a recent symposium in T. P.'s weekly, made up of answers to the question, of what child's book most impressed people prominent in literary circles, it appears that the majority had but one use for the juveniles of their day—to abominate them and keep from contact with them. Joseph Conrad says he does not remember ever to have read a child's book as a child. At the age of six he was enjoying Victor Hugo's "Toilers of the Sea," and he is making the acquaintance of children's books now, with the assistance of his own small son. Max Pemberton had read all of Dickens by the time he was twelve. Clement Scott had made his way through "Arabian Nights," "Don Quixote" and "Dr. Syntax" before he was six. "So I don't think I wanted any children's books after that dose." Arthur Morrison confesses to a loathing for children's books. "Pilgrim's Progress," "Robinson Crusoe," and then "Guy Mannering" were his favorites. "After 'Guy Mannering' I think I never read a child's book of any sort," and "Guy Mannering" came to him at the age of nine or ten. Andrew Lang says his children's books were grown up books. But children's books are made so attractive in these later days that the children never do grow up, or at best, they are but grown up children. Not only are children's books attractive in both manner and matter, but the books which delighted Andrew Lang, Arthur Morrison, Dr. Nicholl and Edmund Gosse are pared and clipped to fit the children. We have adaptations and Bowdlerizations, and makings over, so that there is not only the incentive to escape from the child's literature, but actual inducements offered to remain childish. Some idiotic publisher once went so far as to extract a "Little Folks' Series" out of Dickens, by taking out all the parts of his novels in which children figured and reprinting them separately. Minds, like bodies, will not grow tall by stooping down. The children of today are better off than their grandparents in the matter of reading, but when they have themselves reached the age of their grandparents, will their minds be as well trained after their continuous diet of spoon meat? —The Bookworm.

"I wonder if your two favorite fruits are the same as mine, Miss Sweetgirl?" he asked, as they sauntered slowly through the park.

"I'm sure I don't know, Mr. Dearboy. What are your two favorite fruits?"

"A date with a peach," he answered, and the moon had to get behind a cloud to save the situation.

Naming Children

Three of a Kind

While we were visiting at a small village in one of the Carolinas we went one afternoon to see one of the old negro mammies in her own log cabin. She was highly honored at the condescension of "de ladies," and was much concerned that the call might not be disturbed by the presence of her children—"lo'teen pickaninnies," she called them. Of course, curiosity was too strong for the youngsters, and soon the one door was blocked with curly heads and wide-open eyes. When Mammy perceived them, she just turned around and, gathering up her skirts as one does in front of a flock of trespassing chickens, cried out "Shoo!" and the cough-drops disappeared.

But towards the end of our visit Mammy needed the services of a helper to put out the jelly and cake that she insisted we eat. Stepping to the door, she called—

"Mariana!"

Soon three girls in single-piece coverings came bashfully, but curiously, through the door, and all were given orders by the bustling mother.

"But," said one of the callers in a half-jesting way, "are all three named Mariana, Mammy?"

"Yes," the old woman explained, "all three. You see, when de lil' gi'ls came, 'fo I got 'round 'gain, de folks jest call 'em all Mariana, an's no good changin'. An', anyhow, when I wants a pickaninny, I jes' calls 'Mariana,' and one's sho' to come."—Juan Lippincott's.

Four of a Kind

Four children at one of the summer hotels, are known by the names of "One," "Two," "Three" and "Four." The eldest is ten years of age, and they are all fine, handsome children, who would commend themselves to notice even if it were not for their names. The cause is a freak of the father. He explains that having frequently noticed the intense dissatisfaction of children with the names bestowed upon them he resolved to give his children the opportunity of selecting their own names, so he calls them "One," "Two," etc., until they reach the age of twelve years, when they are given the privilege of selecting their own names. The plan, he says, has given much satisfaction to his family.
